Does ■ never happen that strangers call upon us when our strength is almost exhausted, and when what strength we have is hardly equal to inevitable work, when there are letters to be written which there is hardly time to write, when practical questions of great difficulty in of great importance to ourselves or other people are pressing for settlement, and every moment we are in command for thinking about them is precious? And at such times have we not in our weakness and impatience shown want of courtesy to people for whom in more fortunate hours we should gladly have killed the fatted calf? Do none of us speak kindly, and even with irritation, to most innocent persons when we have just heard that we have made a bad debt or after a sleepless night through which we have been tormented with neuritis or when we are fighting hard with the miserable depression caused by a bad liver? I am not excusing offences committed in such circumstances, I condemn them. But I would we think it fair for other people to find an adverse judgment of our general character on the ground of these occasional transgressions? If not, let us remember the words of Christ: 'Whosoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them.' Be just.

There is a very common mistake about the meaning of the precept. It is sometimes taken as though it required us to rule our conduct towards other men by their wishes: to do this would often be a folly and a sin. ■ really requires us to rule our conduct towards others by what our wishes would be if we were in their place and this is a very different matter. In other words we are to make what we see to be their real interests our own. I have heard of foolish fathers who, when one of his girls was fourteen or fifteen years old, gave her the choice of a pony or of remaining another year or two at school. The child naturally elected ■ have the pony, and most children of her age would do the same. The father's conduct was ruled by the child's wishes and he inflicted on her a grave injustice. From what I remember of him I believe that he knew no better. A sensible father will not always act according to the wishes of his children but will consider how those wishes would be modified and corrected if the child had a fuller knowledge and a larger experience of human life. No wise man would wish ■ enjoy temporary pleasure at the cost of lasting injury. We are unjust to our children if we do not give them the benefit of our wisdom as well as of our love. And we are unjust if we do not in applying this rule of conduct, give to other men who may be excited by passion, by hope, or by fear, the benefit of our calm judgment, and if we do not in all cases guide our conduct towards them by what we may be sure is our clearest perception of their true interests, even when this requires us to act in direct opposition to their most earnest wishes.

The rule may sometimes restrain us from acts of mischievous good-nature, it may sometimes even give us to a stern severity. A man appeals to me for a testimonial and I may have reason to believe that if I give it him he will have a good chance of securing an excellent appointment. He is in urgent need of it, for he has had a great deal of trouble. There is no harm in him, and I should be glad to help him. But I am doubtful, and more than doubtful, whether he would discharge the duties of the position satisfactorily. He says that if I were in his position and he in mine I should place a hard for his recommendation. But I have to think not only of the man himself, but of the people to whom he wishes me to recommend him. If I had to make the appointment myself should I like them to recommend me a man about whose fitness they were uncertain? Should I like them to tell me of his merits and not even to hint at his disqualifications? Is it just even to be applicant himself to give him the support he asks for? If I were in his position should I—if I were a wise and honest man—wish to be recommended to support the duties of which I was unable to discharge? Apart altogether from the obligations of veracity, this "golden rule" may require me to refuse to support his application. This Christian law would diminish the immorality of testimonials.

Or it may happen to detect a man in some criminal act. I may discover that he is an old offender. All the evidence may be in my hands, and by using it I might send him into penal servitude. The impulses of compassion make me shrink from prosecuting him. The man himself attempts ■ turn me aside by appealing to the precept, 'Whosoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them.' If I were in his case and he in mine, should I not passionately appeal for mercy? Yes, but this does not decide the question. This very law may compel me to prosecute. I have to think, not merely of the individual man but of those whom he will wrong ■ his criminal course is not arrested. I have ■ think of the community whose interests I happen ■ be in a position to protect from unknown unme-sured injury. While the man is at large and unpunished I cannot tell who may receive harm. If another man were in my place I should wish him to prosecute, and if I am to serve others as I wish them to serve me I must send the criminal to gaol.

The "golden rule" is a guarantee of justice. Justice without generosity is cold and unlovely, but men who are conscious of being generous must not suppose that for them the rule has no practical value. I have known people who could be nobly generous, not in money merely, but in things far more precious—in affection, in sympathy, in appreciation of the work and character of their friends, in the unsparring devotion of time and thought and labour to the service of those who attracted their interest, touched their pity, commanded their confidence. And yet they could be guilty of atrocious injustice. For the most part men of this sort have an morbid sense of their own importance, they carry themselves as though they were born in the purple. There is a certain regal manner in their assumption of the powers and services and virtues of others. They bestow their honours with a royal liberality and grace. But it never seems to occur to them that those to whom it is their delight to be generous have any "rights" which mere justice obliges them to acknowledge. They are Cruisers in their way—not constitutional sovereigns, absolute monarchs under no obligations to any man. Like Herod they will swear to give half their kingdom to any one that pleases them, and they will keep their oath, but like Ahab they will take Naboth's vineyard if they happen to fancy it, and will take it without scruple. No Jephthah is necessary to urge them to do it. To make men of this kind sensible of the fatal defects in their moral life is a very difficult matter. They think that they are rich in works of supererogation, that they have "merit" to spare for the commonality of mankind. They are the very Pharisees of morality, they do so much more than justice requires that it is impossible to persuade them that they do less. They regard themselves with unqualified moral complacency. There is a delight, an exhilaration, in speaking generous words and doing generous deeds in which the man who is merely just is a stranger. When we have given a ten pound note, which we can hardly spare, an old schoolfellow who has got into trouble, our hearts are flooded with a certain noble satisfaction. There is no such after glow when we have merely paid our baker's bill. It is much more pleasant to be generous than to be just, but it is much more necessary to be just than to be generous.

The Christian Revolution is a discipline of justice as well as of charity. Men become unjust through their covousness, Christ has told us that the wealth which we call ours is not ours but God's, and his taught us to lay up for ourselves treasures in heaven. Men are unjust through their ambition, they trample on the rights of others in their passionate desire for rank and reputation, Christ quenches the feverish thirst for earthly fame by revealing to us the possibility of winning the divine honour.

Men are unjust under the pressure of anxiety and misfortune, in trying to save themselves from calamity and loss they are reckless of the wrongs they inflict on others, Christ has made the surprising discovery that we can rely on God's sympathy, defence, and help, through all the chances and changes of this uncertain life, and his encouraged us to cast all our care on Him. Men are often unjust because they form the habit of supposing that if they respect the rights and meet the claims which are protected and enforced by law they have done all that in strict justice can be required of them. Christ has warned us that there is a judgment to come, and that when this life is over we shall be judged by a law more searching and more equitable, and sustained by more terrible sanctions, than any that human tribunals can administer.

Above all, Christ has revealed the august greatness of every man—however obscure may be his earthly position, and however helpless he may be to vindicate his personal rights. We wrong men because we have not sufficient reverence for them. This is the root of all injustice. Brigands who will plunder a palace will leave the unguarded treasures of a temple untouched, their superstitious reverence for the gods restrains them from sacrilege. Men who will treat a peasant with reckless and insulting cruelty will treat even a fallen prince with the most tender courtesy. To those who really believe all that Christ has revealed of the present relations of every man to God and the infinite possibilities of righteousness, wisdom, power, and blessedness, which are the inheritance of every man in Christ, every man will be invested with an awful greatness which will make an invasion of his rights an act of irreverence and profanity. Perfect justice is the fruit of a profound sense of the greatness and sanctity of human nature.

A FORNIGHT IN HOLLAND.

By AUGUSTUS J C HARRI

SECOND PART

ON leaving the Hague a few hours should be given to the dull university town of Leyden unless it has been seen as an after noon excursion from the capital. This melancholy and middle-aged little town which was the birthplace of Rembrandt surrounds the central tower of its Burg, standing in the grounds of an inn which exacts payment from those who visit it. Close by is the huge church of St. Peter's—Hofkerk—of the fifteenth century containing the tomb of Van der Werff burgomaster during the famous siege who invited the starving people when they came demanding bread or surrender that he had sworn to defend the city and with God's help he meant to keep his oath but that if his body would help them in the defence, they might take it and share it amongst those who were most hungry. A covered bridge over a canal leads to the Biedenstrasse where there is a picturesque grey stone Stadhuis of the sixteenth century. It contains the principal work of Cornelius Engelbrechtsen of Leyden the pedestal is a naked body, out of which springs a tree—the tree of life—and beside it kneel the donors. The neighbouring church of St. Peter (1315) contains the tomb of Boerhaave, the physician whose lectures in the university were attended by Peter the Great and for whom a Chinese mandarin found an illustrious Boerhaave medicine, an I hope quite sufficient diction.

The University here has fallen into disrepute since others were established at Utrecht Groningen and Amsterdam but Leyden is still the most flourishing of the four. When William of Orange offered the citizens freedom from taxes, as a reward for their endurance of the famous siege they thanked him but said they would rather have a university. Grotius and Cartesian (Descartes) Vinnius and Gouss were amongst its professors and the University possesses an admirable botanical museum and a famous collection of Japanese curiosities.

The IJssel cuts up the town of Leyden into endless islands connected by a hundred and fifty bridges. On a quiet canal near the Beesten Markt is the Museum, which contains the 1st Judgment of Lucas van Leyden (1494—1533) a scholar of Engelbrechtsen and one of the patriarchs of Dutch painting.

A few minutes bring us from Leyden to Haarlem by the railway. It crosses an inlet between the sea and a lake which covered the whole country between Leyden Haarlem and Amsterdam till 1839 when it became trouble some, and the States-General forthwith after the fashion of Holland voted its destruction. Enormous engines were at once employed to drain it by pumping the water into canals, which turned the sea and the country was the richer by a new province.

Haarlem, on the river Spaarne, stands out distinct in recollection from all other Dutch

Market Place Haarlem

(1468—1533), one of the earliest of Dutch painters—an altarpiece representing the Crucifixion, with the Sacrifice of Abraham and Worship of the Brazen Serpent in the side

place in Holland—the Groot Markt—surrounded by quaint houses of varied outline, amidst which rises the Groot Kerk of St Jero a noble cruciform fifteenth century building. The interior, how ever is as bare and hideous as all other Dutch churches. It contains a monument to the architect Cornelius designer of the famous locks of Ruyt with the defender of Holland against the fury of the sea and the power of the tides. Behind the choir is the tomb of the poet Bolder dyk who only died in 1831, and near this the grave of Laurens Janszoon—the Coster of Brabant—who is immortal in his native town but never believed outside it to have been the real inventor of printing. He is said to have cut out letters in wood and taken impressions from them as early as 1473. His partisans also maintain that whilst he was attending to his night work praying for patience to endure the ill treatment of his enemies all his implements were stolen and that when he found this out on his return he died of grief. It is further declared that the robber was Faust of Mayence the brother of Gutenberg and that it was thus that the honour of the invention passed from Holland to Germany where Gutenberg produced his invention of movable type twelve years later. There is a statue of the Coster in front of the church and on its north side his house is preserved and adorned with his bust.

Amongst a crowd of natives with their hats on, talking in church as in the market place we waited to hear the famous organ of Christen Muller (1735—38) and grievously were we disappointed with its discordant noises. All the men smoked in church and thus we saw rejectedly but it would be difficult to say where we ever saw a Dutch man with a pipe out of his mouth. Every man seemed to be systematically smoking, away the few who he possessed.

Opposite the Groot Kerk is the Stadhuis, an old palace of the Counts of Holland remodelled. It contains a delightful little gallery of the works of Frans Hals which it once transports the spectator into the life of two hundred years ago—

such is the marvellous variety of life and vigour impressed into its endless figures of stalwart officers and handsome young archers pledging each other at banquet tables and seemingly to welcome the victor with joyful smiles as he enters the chamber, or of serene old ladies regents of hospitals seated at their council boards. The immense power of the artist is shown in nothing so much as in the hands often gloved dashed in with instantaneous power yet always having the effect of the most consummate finish at a distance. Behind one of the pictures is the entrance to the famous secret room of Haarlem seldom seen but containing an immense collection of hints or relics of the time of the famous siege of Leyden.

April and May are the best months for visiting Haarlem which is the bulb nursery garden of the world. Onions and tulips are advertised for sale everywhere. Tulips are more cultivated than any other flowers and ministering most to the national craving for colour, but times are changed since a single bulb of the tulip Admiral Liefkenshoek sold for 4500 florins one of 'Viceroy' for 4200 and one of 'Imper Augustus' for 12000.

Now we entered Amsterdam to which we had looked forward as the climax of our tour having read of it and pondered upon it as 'the Venice of the north,' but our expectations were raised much too high. Anything more unlike Venice it would be difficult to imagine and there is a terrible want of variety and colour many of the smaller towns of Holland are far more interesting and infinitely more picturesque.

A castle was built at Amsterdam in 1204 but the town only became important in the sixteenth century. It is situated upon the influx of the Amstel to the Y as the arm of the Zuider Zee which forms the harbour is called, and it occupies a huge semicircle, its walls being enclosed by the broad moat, six and a half miles long which is known as Buitensingel. The greater part of the houses are built on piles of wood, it seems to say that the inhabitants lived on trees like roots. In the centre of the town is the great square called Dam, one side of which is occupied by the handsome Royal Palace—Het Paleis—built by J. van Kampen in 1648. The Nieuwe Kerk (1408—1570) contains a number of monuments to admirals, including those of Van Ruyter—"immensus tremor oceanum"—who commanded at the battle of Solby and Van Speijk, who blew himself up with his ship in 1631 rather than yield to the Pelgians. In the Oude Kerk of 1300 there are more tombs of admirals. Hard by, in the Nieuwe Markt, is the picturesque cluster of fifteenth century towers called St. Antonieswag, once a city gate and now a weighing house.

But the great attraction of Amsterdam is the Picture Gallery of the Linnenhuys, called the Rijks Museum and it deserves many visits. Amongst the portraits in the first room we were especially attracted by that of William the Silent in his skull cap by Miereveld, and of Mina of Utrecht wife of Johann van Oldenbarnevelt, a peaceful old lady in a ruff and brown dress edged with fur, by Mouton. The two great pictures of the gallery hang opposite each other. That by Bartholomew van der Helst, the most famous of Dutch portrait painters, represents the Banquet of the Musqueteers, who thus celebrated the Peace of Westphalia, June 16 1648. It contains twenty-five life size portraits, the best work of the master, and was pronounced by Sir Joshua Reynolds to be the 'first picture of portraits in the world'. The canvas is a mirror faithfully representing a scene of actual life. In the centre sits the jovial, rollicking Captain de Witt with his legs crossed. The delicate imitation of reality is equally shown in the Rhemish wine glasses, and in the hum to which one of the guests is helping himself.

van Ruyt emerging from their watch house on the Singel. A joyous troop pursue their leader, who is in a black dress. A strange light comes upon the scene, who can tell whence? Half society has always said that this picture was the marvel of the world, but that it is unworthy of its artist, but no one has ever been quite indifferent to it.

Of the other pictures we must at least notice, by Nicholas Maes, a thoughtful and leaning on a cushion out of a window with a cat beneath, and by Jan Steen the Patriot Crier, a single scene of tavern life in which the waiter, mud clogs to the patriot hanging aloft, who looks knowingly out of the eige, whilst all the other persons present go on with their different employments. In the 'Ive of St. Nicholas' another work of the same artist, a naughty boy sits a birch rod in his shoe, and a good little girl is len with gifts, is being praised by her mother whilst other children are looking up the chimney by which the discriminating fury of the devil is supposed to have taken her departure. There are many beautiful works of Knyff, most at home amongst waterfalls. A noble Vandyke of 'William II' is a boy, with his little bride, Mary Stuart Charles I's daughter, in a brocaded silver dress, and the famous Verburg called 'Internal Advice' (known in England by its title of 'Stillwater House'), in which a girl sits in white satin is receiving a lecture from her father, her back turned to the spectator and her annoyance or repentance, only exhibited in her shoulders. Another famous work of Verburg is 'The Letter', which is being brought in by a trumpeter to an officer seated in his uniform, with his young wife kneeling at his side. Of Gerard Dou Amsterdam possesses the wonderful 'Evening School', with four luminous candles, and some thoroughly Dutch children. A girl is labouriously following, with her finger the instructions received and a boy is diligently writing on a slate. The girl who stands behind instructing him, is holding a candle which throws a second light upon his back, that upon the table falling on his features indeed the painting is often known as the 'Picture of the Four Candles'.

Through the labyrinthine quays we found our way to the Westerhoof to take the afternoon steamer to Purmerende for an excursion to broek, 'the cleanest village in the world'. Crossing the broad Amstel, the vessel soon enters a canal, which sometimes and which then, after passing locks, becomes level with the tops of the trees and the roofs of the houses. We left the steamer at IJ Schouwen, and entered, on a side canal one of the hick chuten which, until the time railroads were the usual means of travel—a long narrow cabin encased by mats, forms the whole vessel and is drawn by a horse and led by a boy (het jachtje)—a most reliable easy means of locomotion, for movement is absolutely imperceptible.

As the people was even more exaggerated than in Stockholm. There is really very little remarkable in it, except even a better sense of cleanliness and coarseness than in the other Dutch villages. It was autumn and there seemed no particular attempt to remove the decaying vegetation or trim the little gardens, or to sweep up the dead leaves upon the paths ways yet there used to be a law that no animal was to enter IJssel for fear of its being polluted. A black path winds among the low wooden cottages, painted blue, green, and white, and ends at the church with its miniature tombstones. The most interesting excursion to be made from Amsterdam is that to the Island of Marken in the Zuider Zee—a huge meadow, where the peasant women pass their whole lives without ever leaving anything beyond their island, whilst their husbands, who with very few exceptions are fishermen, see nothing beyond the fishing-towns of the Zuider Zee. There are very picturesque costumes here, the men wearing, red woollen shirts, brown vests, wooden shoes for caps, and gold buttons on their collars and knickerbockers, the women, embroidered stomachers, which are handed down from generations and enormous white caps, lined with brown to show off the hair, and with a chin strap cover for week days, and their own hair flowing below the cap over their shoulders and backs.

diamond turt and gold pins, for our companion, took us to the Helder, and we awoke next morning at the pleasant little inn of Du Bur, upon a view of boats and nets and the low lying Island of Texel in the distance. The boats and the fishermen are extremely picturesque, but there is nothing else to see, after the visitor has examined the huge granite Helder Dyke, the artificial fortification of north Holland, which contends successfully to preserve the land against the sea. There is an admirably manned Naval Institute here. It was by an expedition from the Helder that Nova Zembla was discovered, and it was near this that Admirals Ruyter and Tromp repulsed the English fleet. Texel which lies opposite the Helder, is the first of a chain of islands—Vlieland, Terschelling, and Ameland, which protect the entrance of the Zuider Zee.

The country near the Helder is bare and desolate in the extreme. It is all peat, and the rest of Holland uses it as a fuel.

We crossed it to Alkmaar which struck us as being altogether the prettiest place in the country.

Approach to Alkmaar.

and is possessing all those attributes of cleanliness which we usually give to Breck. The streets, formed of bricks fitted close together, are absolutely spotless, and every house front shines fresh from the mop or the syringe. Yet excessive cleanliness has not destroyed the picturesqueness of the place. The fifteenth century Church of St. Lawrence, of exquisitely graceful exterior, rises in the centre of the town and, in spite of being hideously defaced inside, has a fine vaulted roof, a coloured screen, and in the chancel, a curious tomb to Florins V. Count of Holland, 1296, though only his heart is buried there. Near the excellent Hotel du Burg is a most beautiful almshouse, with an old tower and screen, and a lovely garden in a court surrounded by clipped lime trees. And more charming still is an old weigh house of 1542, for the cheese, the great manufacture of the district, for which there is a famous market every Friday, where capital costumes may be seen. The rich and gaily painted façade of the old building, reflected in a clear canal, is a perfect marvel of beauty and colour; and artists should stay here to paint—not the view given here, but another which we discovered too late—more in front, with gabled houses leading up to the principal building, and all its glowing colours repeated in the water.

■ is three hours' drive from Alkmaar to Hoorn, a charming old town with bastions, gardens, and semi-ruined gates. On the West Poort a relief commemorates the filial devotion of a poor boy, who arrived here in 1579, laboriously dragging his old mother in a sledge, when all were flying from the Spaniards. Opposite the weighing-house for the cheeses ■ the State College, which bears a shield with the arms of England, sustained by two negroes. It commemorates the fact that when Van Tromp defeated the English squadron, his ships came from Hoorn and on board were two negroes, who took from the English flagship the shield which it was then the custom ■ fix to the stern of a vessel, and brought it back here as a trophy. Hoorn was one of the first places in Holland to embrace the reformed religion, which spread from hence all over the country, but now not above half the inhabitants are Calvinists.

In returning from Alkmaar we stopped to see Zaandam, quite in the centre of the land of windmills, of which we counted eighty as visible from the station alone. They are of every shade of colour, and are mounted on poles, on towers, on farm buildings, and made picturesque by every conceivable variety of prop, balcony, gallery, and insertion. Zaandam is a very pretty village on the Zaan which flows into the Y, with gaily painted houses, and gay little gardens, and perpetual movement to and from its landing-stage. Turning south from thence, a little entry on the right leads down some steps and over a bridge to some cottages on the bank of a ditch, and inside the last of these is the tiny venerable hovel where Peter the Great stayed in 1697 as Peter Michaeloff. It retains its tiled roof and contains some old chairs and a box-bed, but unfortunately Peter was only here a week.

The evening of leaving Zaandam we spent at Utrecht, of which the name is so well known from the peace which terminated the war of the Spanish succession, April 11, 1713. The town was the great centre of the Jansenists, dissenters from Roman Catholicism under Jansenius, Bishop of Ypres, condemned by Alexander VII. in 1656, at the instigation of the Jesuits. The doctrines of Jansenius still linger in ■ gloomy houses. Every appointment of a bishop is still announced to the sovereign pontiff, who as regularly responds by a bull of excommunication, which is read aloud in the cathedral, and then immediately put away and forgotten. Solemn and sad, but pre-eminently respectable, Utrecht has more the aspect of a decayed German city than a Dutch town, and so has its Cathedral of S. Martin (1254-67), which is only a magnificent fragment, with a detached tower (1321-82) 338 feet high. The interior is usual, ruined by Calvinism and yellow paint. It contains the tomb of Admiral van Gent who fell in the Battle of Solbay. The nave, which fell in 1674, has never been rebuilt. The S. Pieterskerk (1039) and S. Janskerk offer nothing remarkable, but on a neighbouring canal is the quaint Paushuizen, or Pope's house, which was built by Pope Adrian VI. (Adrian Florizboom) in 1517. Near this is the pretty little Archbishop's Museum, full of mediæval relics.

From Utrecht we travelled over sandy flats to Kampen, near the mouth of the wide river Yssel, with three picturesque gates — Haghen Poort, Cellebroeders Poort, and Broeders Poort, and a town hall of the sixteenth century. Here, as frequently elsewhere in Holland, we suffered from arriving famished at mid-day. All the inns were equally inhospitable. "The table d'hôte is at 4 P.M., we cannot and will not be bothered with cooking before that, and there is nothing cold in the house." "But you have surely bread and cheese?" "Certainly not — nothing."

At Zwolle, however, we found the Kroon an excellent hotel with an obliging landlord, and Zwolle, the native place

objects of interest to see unless a leaning tower can be called so, with a top, like that at Pisa, inclined the other way, to keep it from toppling over. An hour's walk from the town there is said to be a fine still inhabited castle, and, if time had allowed, respect for S. Boniface would have taken us to Muiof Terburg (1608), is a charming old town with a garden of gardens, a fine church (externally), and a noble brick gateway called the Sassenpoort.

It was more the desire of seeing something of the whole country than any thing else, and a certain degree of misplaced confidence in the pleasant volumes of Harvard, which took us up from Zwolle, through Friesland, the cow paradise, to Leeuwarden, its ancient capital. Sad and gloomy as most other towns of Holland are, Leeuwarden is sadder and gloomier still. Its streets are wide and not otherwise than handsome, but they are almost deserted, and there are no objects of interest to see unless a leaning tower can be called so, with a top, like that at Pisa, inclined the other way, to keep it from toppling over. An hour's walk from the town there is said to be a fine still inhabited castle, and, if time had allowed, respect for S. Boniface would have taken us to Mui-

merwouda, where he was martyred (June 8, 853), with his fifty-three companions. King Pepin raised a hermitage on the spot, and an ancient brick chapel still exists there. Here and elsewhere in Friesland nothing is so worthy of notice as the helmets — the golden helmets of the women — costing something equivalent to £25 or £30, handed down as heirlooms, sitting close to the head, and not allowing a particle of hair to be visible.

In the late evening we went on to Groningen, a university town with a good hotel (Seven Provinciën), an enormous square, and a noble tall Gothic tower of 1491, whence the watchman's sounds his bugle. Not far off is Midwolde, where the village church has fine tombs of Charles Jerome, Baron d'Inghusen and his wife Anna von Ewsum.

As late as the sixteenth century this province was for the most part uninhabited—savage and sandy, and over-run by wolves. But three hundred years of hard work has transformed it into a fertile country, watered by canals, and sprinkled with country houses. Agriculturally it is one of the richest provinces of the kingdom. This is mostly due to its possessing a race of peasant-farmers who never shrink from personal hard work, and who will continue to direct the plough whilst they send their sons to the university to study as lawyers, doctors, or churchmen. These peasant farmers or boers possess the erfpacht, or right of hiring land on an annual rent which the landlord can never increase. A peasant can bequeath his right to his heirs, whether direct or collateral. To the land, this system is an indescribable advantage, the cultivators doing their utmost to bring their lands to perfection, because they are certain that no one can take away the advantage from themselves or their descendants.

On leaving Groningen we traversed the y, monotonous, desolate district of the Wolden, sprinkled over at intervals by the curious ancient groups of stones called Hunnebedden, or beds of death (Hun meaning death), beneath which urns of clay containing human ashes have been found. From Deventer (where there is an old weigh-house of 1828, and a cathedral of S. Lievin with a crypt and nave of 1334), time did not allow us to make an excursion to the great royal palace of Het Loo, the favourite residence of the sovereigns. The descriptions in Harvard rather made us linger unnecessarily at Zutphen, a dull town with a brick Groote Kerk (S. Walpurgis) which has little remaining of its original twelfth century date, and a rather picturesque "bit" on the walls, where the "Waterpoort" crosses the river like a bridge.

At Arnhem, the Roman Arenacum, once the residence of the Dukes of Gueldres, and still the capital of Guelderland, we seemed to have left all the characteristics of Holland behind. Numerous modern villas, which might have been built for Cheltenham or Leamington, cover the wooded hills above the Rhine. In the Groote Kerk (1452) is a curious monument of Charles van Egmont, Duc de Gueldres, 1538, but there is nothing else to remark upon. We intended to have made an excursion hence to Cleves, but desperately wet weather set in, and as Dutch rain often lasts for weeks together when it once begins, we were glad to hurry England-wards, only regretting that we could not halt at Nymegen, a most picturesque place, where Charlemagne lived in the old palace of the Valckhof (or Waalhof, residence on the Waal) of which a fragment still exists, with an old baptistery, a Stadhuis of 1534, and a Groote Kerk containing a noble monument to Catherine de Bourbon (1469), wife of Duke Adolph of Gueldres.

We left Holland disliking its inhabitants more than those of any country we had ever visited, without a single recollection of a kindly word or action received during our short stay in the country; but with an unpleasant impression of greed, avarice, selfishness, and insolence on the part of all we had come in contact with. Probably a longer stay in the country might have much to modify such an impression, but this was the result of a fortnight's scamper through it. We felt also that we should urge our friends by all means to see the pictures at Rotterdam, the Hague, and Amsterdam, but to look for all other characteristics of the Netherlands in such places as Breda, Dordrecht, Haarlem, a Alkmaar, and Zwolle.

GOD'S ENGLISHMEN.

Historical Monographs on the Prophets and Kings of England.

By CHARLES STUBBS, M.A., VICAR OF STOCKHAM, AUTHOR OF "VILLAGE POLITICS," &c

I.—ARTHUR, THE MYTHIC KING.

MORE than six hundred years ago, an old monk connected with the Abbey of St. Albans, sitting down to write his History of the English, complained that he was much vexed by the question, put either by some foolish or some envious critic, as to whether the record of merely secular history was worthy of the labour and the study of a Christian man. Full of the lofty consciousness of the value and the sacredness of historical learning, Matthew Paris justified the task he had undertaken, first by an appeal to the highest instincts of man, and then by a quotation of the words of the Psalmist, "The just shall be had in everlasting remembrance." "A man," he said, "who is without learning, and with no care for the memory of his forefathers, will surely sink to the level of the beasts. It is upon such a one that the curse of the Psalmist will rest 'The memory of the wicked shall be cut off from the earth . . . but the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance. If thou forgettest and despisest the departed of past generations, who will remember thee?'" "It was to keep alive," he adds, "the memory of the good, and to teach us to abhor the bad, that all the sacred historians, Moses, Joseph, Cyprian, Eusebius, Beda, Prosper, Marianus Scotus, and other deep-souled writers, have handed down to us their chronicles."

I think it was Carlyle who once said that "a nation's true Bible was its own history." However that may be, of this, at any rate, I am sure, that, in taking the subject of these papers from the records of English history, I shall be doing no dishonour to that greater Bible which rightly we reverence as the very Word of God, if only I can make any one realise the religious sense of all history, if only I can succeed in bringing home the fact of which Matthew Paris was one of the earliest witnesses among English historians, and which, thank God, has never wholly died out from amongst us, that God is not less a King over England than He was over Judaea, that every advance in righteousness and good citizenship among our people is but another step forward towards the fulness of the time when the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdoms of God and of His Christ. All through the history of the Jewish people, the haunting sense of a great idea, of the divine mission of the nation, is never absent from their records. In the Genesis, the Exodus, and Deuteronomy, in the Chronicles of their Judges, Kings, and Prophets, continually we may hear the echo of the words—the refrain, as it were, of a great national anthem—"We are thy people, O God!"

But England has had also her sacred mission in the world. Our country has had her divine Genesis and Exodus, her Chronicles of Kings and Prophets. And surely some of us, at any rate, as we have lately read the story anew, in the pages of Mr. Green's "Making of England," and his "History of the English People," cannot but have felt that we, too, as well as the Jews of old, have been a "chosen people," that Milton was right after all when he spoke of "God's Englishmen," and that we, each one of us, are only worthy of our great national heritage in so far as we show ourselves conscious of the divine sanction which lies behind it.

I begin this series of sketches of the prophets and kings of England with King Arthur. I could not well begin with any other name than his. It is true that there is small probability, and very little historical foundation, for all the stories of heroic deeds which have gathered round his name. History, indeed, only tells us that he was a petty prince of Devon, whose wife, the Guinevere of romance, was carried off by a king of North Wales, and scarcely recovered by treaty after a year's fighting, that he was murdered by his nephew and buried at Glastonbury, and that his remains were supposed to have been discovered there in the time of Henry II. Still one cannot but believe that there must have been some nobleness in a character which have given him a life beyond the grave, the memory of which has lingered on in the imaginations of bards and minstrels, to become to after generations ■ his countrymen the true type of all kingly and knightly virtues.

We are all familiar in these days with Mr. Tennyson's great epic poem, "The Idylls of the King," where under the semblance of Arthurian legends, the Poet Laureate has told us the Parable of the Human Soul, its conflicts, temptations, victories, and final goal. But ■ is in "The Book of King Arthur and his noble Knights of the Round Table," arranged and modelled into epic form from contemporary French and English ballads and stories, by Sir Thomas Malory, in the reign of Edward IV., that the true hero and ideal King of English Middle Age Romance may best be known. How great was the influence of that great epic, not only in nourishing the imagination but also in fashioning the manners of English gentle men in the times of the Tudors, we may gain some hint from the terms in which Caxton, our great English printer, speaks of it in the preface to his first printed edition in the year 1488.

"I have set it down in point," he says, "to the intent that noble men may see and learn the noble acts of chivalry, the gentle and virtuous deeds that some knights used in those days, by which they came to honour, and how they that were vicious were punished and oft put to shame and rebuke, humbly beseeching all noble lords and ladies, with all other estates of what estate or degree they been of, that shall see and read in this said book and work, that they take the good and honest acts in their remembrance, and to follow the same. Wherein they shall find many joyous and pleasant histories of noble and renowned acts of humanity, gentleness, and chivalry. In the which may be seen noble chivalry, courtesy, humanity, friendliness, hardness, love, friendship, cowardice, murder, hate, virtue and sin. Do after the good, and leave the evil."

I cannot of course here re-tell the main incidents of the romance. The legend is far too long for that. Two episodes, however, upon which, in effect, the whole scheme of the poem turns, I may briefly indicate. The story of the "Founding of the Order of the Table Round," and "the Quest of the Sangreal," are not without their appropriate lesson even for our practical and apparently unheroic nineteenth century life.

I. In the legend of the Knights of the Round Table, we have symbolised, no doubt, the good work which was done for the world of the Middle Ages by the social institutions of feudalism.

It was to that system that we owe the recommencement of social life in Europe after the total breakdown of Roman civilisation under the repeated invasions of the Teutonic nations. For although feudalism was undoubtedly in its main feature antagonistic to one of the chief elements of social order, yet we cannot forget that as a first step out of barbarism, the spirit of war was necessary for the very establishment of that civilisation, whose chief aim ultimately it would be to make the appeal to that spirit unnecessary.

example, wars were not less, but perhaps more, frequent than usual, but then, for the first time in modern European history, they were wars undertaken upon, more or less, fixed principles, and with a direct end in view. They were no longer the wilful expeditions of a powerful ruler, prompted simply by the lust of conquest. They were the determined endeavour of one who thought he had the power to effect what he designed, to suppress, by the means which in those days were the most natural and the most effective, those elements of disorder which he recognised as fatal to the well being of society. His method was probably the only one by which in those days he could have accomplished his design, and certainly it bore the merit of success. By slow degrees the spirit of order makes itself felt throughout modern Europe. The Feudal system, which with all its faults had at least the supreme merit of being a system, gradually arose out of the bosom of barbarism. In many things, as I have said, it was undoubtedly hostile to social well being, but as being the first instance of a visible organization, it educated the individual in those ideas of loyalty, veracity, and justice, of union and confederation, in all those qualities, in fact, which we sum up in the one word "chivalry," which alone made the next step in civilisation possible.

This process of calling social order out of disorder, and the exhibition of the moral qualities which alone made that process possible, is very vividly pictured for us by Mr. Tennyson in the noble words which he puts into King Arthur's mouth when describing to Queen Guinevere the purpose of his life.

"For when the heroes left us, and their law
Relax'd its hold upon us, and the ways
Were filled with rapine, here and there a deed
Of prowess done redress'd a random wrong
But I was first of all the kings who drew
The knightlyhood grant of this realm and all Lies round us together under me, their hand,
In that fair order of my Table Round
A glorious company, the flower of men
To serve as model for the mighty world,
And be the fair beginning of a time
I made them lay their hands in mine and swear
To reverence the king, as if he were
Their conscience, and their conscience as their king,
To break the heathen and uphold the Chirist, to ride abroad redressing human wrongs,
To speak no slander, no nor listen to it,
To honour his own word as if his God's,
To lead sweet lives in purest chastity
To love one maiden only, cleave to her
And worship her by years of noble deed,
Until she should be, for indeed I knew
Of no noble master under heaven
Than she should be a passion for a maid,
Yet only leading down the bare in man,
But teach high thought, and amiable words
And courtesies, and the desire of laure,
And love of truth, and all that makes a man."

This ideal of noble manliness one is glad to think ■ not confined to any one age or time. True, the conditions of life in England have all changed since the days when Sir Thomas Malory drew his picture of the ideal Arthur, for the nobles and gentlemen of the court of Edward IV., or even since those later times when, "in the spacious days of Queen Elizabeth," the "Morte d'Arthur" nourished the souls of that brilliant and high-tempered generation, of which Raleigh and Sidney, and Howard and Grenville were the conspicuous types, in all chivalrous and gentle discipline.

And God fulfils himself in many ways."

The special age of chivalry has passed away, but chivalry itself has only changed the outward expression of ■ character. For the spirit ■ chivalry, for all those qualities of knightly character, for all the nobleness of nature, all the love of truth and honour, all the sympathy with human distress, all the eagerness to champion the just though weaker cause, all the gentle courtesy of disposition which ever graced a knight of old, there is still need to-day in England. A new order of knighthood, vowed like the knights of Arthur's table, would still have their work to-day in England. We may not have our enchanters, or giants, or dragons as of old, but our nineteenth-century world is not without its powers of evil quite as monstrous and devastating as any of those of the Middle Ages. For indeed, I trust, there are few men who would dare to say quite as boldly as did a leading parliamentary orator the other day, "England is not Utopia. The English are a practical people bound to look well after their own interests, who have no roving commission of knight-errantry 'to ride abroad redressing human wrongs.'" No! it is true that England may not be Utopia, but it is still truer that that will be an ill day for England when chivalry of spirit, that noble inheritance won for us by the knights of old, shall be smothered at without protest, as unworthy of the thoughts of practical Englishmen.

II. To return, however, to the Arthurian legend. In Malory's Epic, as in Mr. Tennyson's Idylls, the story of the Quest of the Sangreal is no doubt the central incident of the great romance. While the glory of Arthur ■ the chivalric ideal of kingliness is yet only in its early dawn, the King is warned by the seer Merlin, how in all the fair promise of his order there still lies the seeds of death. The heroes who as "earthly knights and lovers," in the fields of worldly chivalry have won for the most part victories both glorious and easy, fall lamentably when tried by other tests, as the struggle changes from an earthly to a spiritual combat, by which the coming kingdom of true chivalry can alone be established.

The Quest of the Sangreal brings about the final severance between good and evil. The Sangreal, or Holy Grail, according to the legend, is the dish which held the Pascal lamb at the Last Supper. Joseph of Arimathea, it was said, had gone into the house when the supper had been eaten, had taken away the dish, and in it, at the time of the crucifixion, had received the blood from the spear wound of Jesus. This dish, "with part of the blood of our Lord," he had brought with him to England, and deposited there in the abbey which he founded at Glastonbury. There for many years it had remained an object of pilgrimage and adoration. Finally, however, "for the evil of the times," it had been caught away into the heavens, and only appeared from time to time in vision to "virgin hearts ■ work and will."

The Quest in fact is achieved by the holy knights alone, one, Sir Galahad—

"The virgin knight in work and will Whose strength is as the strength of ten Because his heart is pure," alone attaining to the Perfect vision, — "and in the strength of this,

Shedding all evil customs everywhere."

Launcelot, after Arthur, the noblest character in the romance, pre-eminent among the knights, attains also to the vision, but on account of his one great sin, for him the holy vessel was veiled and covered, so that afterwards hardly will he believe he saw it—for, as he tells the king on his return,

"In me lived a sin
So strange, of such a kind, that all of pure,
Noble, and knightly in me twined and clung Round that one sin, as all the wholesome flower
And poisonous grew together, such as each Met to be plucked asunder.
... and what I saw was well'd
And cover'd; and this Quest was not for me!"

Such are Mr. Tennyson's words. These are Sir Thomas Malory's, which I am sure are not less worth quoting:—

"Then anon Sir Launcelot waked and got him up and bethought him what he had seen there, and whether it were dreams or not. Right so heard he a voice that said, 'Sir Launcelot, more harder than is the stone, and more bitter than is the wood, and more naked and bare than is the leaf of the fig tree, therefore go thou from hence, and withdraw thou from this holy place.' And when Sir Launcelot heard this he was passing heavy, and wist not what to do, and so departed, sore weeping, and cursed the time that he was born. For then he deemed never to have had worship more. For those words went to his heart till that he knew wherefore he was called so. Then Sir Lancelot went to the Cross, and found his helm, his sword taken away. And then he called himself a very wretch, and most unhappy of all knights, and then he said, 'My sin and my wickedness have brought me unto great dishonour. For when I sought worldly adventures for worldly desires I ever achieved them, I had the better in every place, and never was I discount in no quarrel, were it right or wrong. And now I take upon me the adventure of holy things, and now I see and understand that mine old sin hangeth me, and shameth me so that I had no power to stir nor to speak when the holy blood appeared before me.' So thus he sorrowed till it was day, and heard the fowls sing, then somewhat he was comforted. But when Sir Lancelot moved his horse and his harness then he wist well God was displeased with him. Then he departed from the Cross on foot into the forest, and so by prime he came to an high hill, and found an hermitage, and an hermit therein, which was g unto man. And then Lancelot knelt down and cried on our Lord mercy for his wicked works. So when mass was done Lancelot called him and prayed him for charity to hear his life. 'With a good will,' said the good man. 'Sir,' said he, 'be ye of King Arthur's court and of the fellowship of the Round Table?' 'Yea, forsooth, and my name is Sir Lancelot du Lake, that hath been right well said of, and now my good fortune is changed, for I am the most wretch of the world.' The hermit beheld him and had marvel how h was so abashed. 'Sir,' said the hermit, 'ye ought to thank God more than any knight living, for He hath caused you to have more worldly worship, say knight that now liveth. And for your presumption to take upon you in deadly sin for to be in His presence, where His flesh and His blood was, that caused you ye might not see it with worldly eyes, for He will not appear where such sinners be, but if it be unto their great hurt, and unto their great shame. And there is no knight now living that ought to give God so great thanks as ye, for He hath given you beauty and richness, and great strength above all other knights, and therefore ye are all the more beholding unto God than any other man to love Him and dread Him, for your strength and manhood will little avail you and God be against you.'"

Of the rest of the knights who went upon the Quest, the King was a true prophet when h said

"That most of them would follow wandering feet
Lost in h queaguers' lent to me h gown,
And left me gazing at a barren board,
And a lone Order—scarce return'd a title."

And what, we ask, is the interpretation of the parable? How was it that the Quest of the Holy Grail should have become "a sign to maim the order of the king?"

It has been suggested that in the Quest of the Sangreal is set forth the misleading power of superstition in contrast with the sober practical religion of Arthur himself. The knights who else might have fulfilled "the boundless purpose of the king" and saved the common weal "with crowning common sense," in the search for the Grail became slaves of illusion and seekers after mere fantastic shapes of superstition. I confess this does not seem to me quite the true drift of the parable.

In the Quest of the Grail I would rather see symbolised that enthusiastic longing for an ideal life, that craving for something beyond the mere material satisfaction of "earthly things" or of the purely personal interests which is never, probably, quite absent from any human soul, and which, after all, is the animating principle of all true religion.

That such a quest should, in the first instance h any rate, have a disintegrating effect on existing social conditions, is in accord with the experience of all history. It is but a commentary on the words of Christ himself. "Suppose ye that I am come to send peace on earth. I came not to send peace, but a sword." We acknowledge love, brotherhood, good will amongst men, to have been the master note of His gospel. We cannot, however, conceal from ourselves that one result of that message has often been dissipated households, broken friendships, religious hatred, discord, disunion, division of all kinds. Yet here we know the sword was the sign of peace. If the message of Christ divided men, it was at least a sign that some men were in earnest about it. If it brought division into a house, it also brought energy and activity, it put an end to the fatal lethargy, to the numbing stupor of indifference which was eating out the life of men's souls.

And so with the Quest of the Grail. Religious enthusiasm turning into nobleness the highest and purest natures, the Galahads and Percivales, is also, because of its effects on the meaner spirits, the Gareths and the Gawains, a disturbing influence in human affairs that no doubt is one chief lesson of the old romance. But the higher lesson still remains. For us, at any rate, in these modern days the Quest of the Holy Grail can only be another name for the Higher Life, the life of the soul, the perception of the reality of ideals and the value of enthusiasm. And indeed is not that the lesson we most need to learn just now? h it not with "the spirit of secularity," that especially our English Christianity needs to combat?

'We have been perhaps little aware of it'—I quote the words of a wise and eloquent writer—

"as one is usually little aware of the atmosphere one has long breathed. We have been aware only of energetic industrialism. We have been proud of our national 'self help,' of our industry and solvency, and have taken as but the due reward of these virtues our good fortune in politics and colonisation. We have even framed for ourselves a sort of Deuteronomic religion which as a great comfort to us, it teaches, because we are honest and peaceable and industrious, therefore our Jehovah gives us wealth in abundance, and our exports and imports swell and our debt diminishes, and our emigrants people half the globe. The creed is too primitive! Ought well-being to be so absolutely confounded with wealth? In life but livelihood? We may no doubt think ourselves happy in not being muled, like so many nations, by false ideals. On the other hand have we any ideal at all? Does not this eternal question of a livelihood keep us at a level from which no ideal is visible? In old biographies we read of high and generous feelings, the love of fame, the ambition of great achievements, not to speak of higher feelings yet. We neither have such feelings, nor yet any bitter regret to think that we cannot have them."

Alas! I fear that that is only too true a picture of one side of our English character. But, thank God, there is another side of which I am quite as untrue. We have still left among us something more than the memory of the old heroic blood. We need not go, as Professor Seeley says, to the old biographies to read of "high and generous feelings, the love of fame, the ambition of great achievements, not to speak of higher feelings yet." Who that has read lately the life of Lord Lawrence—to take an example from only the latest of English biographies—can doubt it? "Here lies Henry Lawrence who tried to do his duty"—"Here lies John Lawrence who did his duty to the last,"—are epitaphs—one, the actual words on the elder brother's simple grave in front of the Lucknow Residency, the other, words, not inappropriately suggested, for the younger brother's tomb in Westminster Abbey—which may surely serve to remind us, with all the memories they recall of heroic endeavour and knightly service, of loyal sense of honour and reverent protection of weakness, that we have still left among us salt enough of ardent and chivalric ideal to keep the national heart sound.

No! "God is still in the midst of us," God's Englishmen have not yet died out,

Not once or twice in our rough island story
Has paths of duty been the way to glory."

And for the rest may I not end with Mallory?

"Do after the good and leave the evil, and it shall bring you to good fame and renown. All is written for our doctrine, and for so beware that we fall not to vice nor sin, but to exercise and follow virtue, by the which we may come and attain to good fame and renown in this life, and after this short and transitory life to come unto everlasting bliss in heaven, the which He grant us that reigneth in heaven, the blessed Trinity—Amen."

A GOSSIP ABOUT ORCHIDS.

By DR. ANDREW WILSON

PROBABLY there are no readers to whom the look of an Orchid flower is entirely unfamiliar. The curious, and often weird shape of the flowers of some species, and the apparent dissimilarity which separates them from the common flowers which surround us, combine to render the orchids a literally marked race of plants. Now and then the outer world hears of a fabulous price being paid for a single specimen of a rare orchid, and with the ordinary failure of the uninterested mind to understand the attraction which a special study presents to the student of nature, remarks the reverse of complimentary are passed upon the folly of men "esteeming lilies better than gold." Orchid growing and orchid loving are, in fact, two specialized habits of botanical humanity. There can be no question, to the scientific mind at least, of the rich intellectual harvest—to say nothing of the reward in the shape of beauty—which awaits the student of this group of plants. Last of all, when we remember, that these plants formed a special study of the great master mind so lately removed from our midst, it is only necessary to mention the name of Charles Darwin and his labours to read the story the orchids tell, to insure the belief that the curious flowers before us present a group of no ordinary interest, alike to the botanist and to the earnest non-technical inquirer into the ways and works of living nature.

The curious appearance of many of the orchid flowers is a noteworthy fact. For example, we know of species which mimic flies in their outward aspect. Others resemble bees, the flower of one species is like the drone bee, and even the spiders are imitated by orchid blossoms. Nor is the long and varied list of mimetic resemblances thus ended. If we were to hunt through an orchid album, wherein the flowers were faithfully depicted, we should be able to see imitations of grasshoppers in the "columns" or flower centres of certain species, such as the Catasetum. In Trinidad we find a plant, which, long known as the "butterfly plant," from the obvious resemblance of its flowers to the familiar insects, proves to be an orchid—the Oncidium papilio of botanists. Even the birds find representatives in the curious forms and lines of orchid flowers. The swan is represented in the group Cynochloa, the dove may be detected in the shape of Peristeria elata, and the pelican flower, the "Flor de Pelicano" of native terminology, is another orchid (Cypripedium arapaeanum) belonging to the well-known "Ladies' Slipper" group. When we are further informed that even humanity's lineaments may be mimicked in the "Man Orchid" (Acoris anthropophora), we may well be tempted to re-echo Mr Darwin's words, when he says, "The flowers of orchids, in their strange and endless variety of shape, may be compared with the great vertebrate class of fish, or still more appropriately, with tropical Homopterous insects, which appear to us as if they had been modelled in the wildest caprice, but this is no doubt due to our ignorance of their requirements and conditions of life."

An understanding of the orchid flowers may be readily enough arrived at if we first glance at the structure of a common flower by way of instituting a plain comparison between things known and things unknown. In a buttercup, for example, we may see the parts of a flower in their simplest guise. The flower is a cup, into the formation of which four 'whorls, or circles of organs—"leaves," in reality—enter. Outside there is the calyx coloured green, and consisting of five leaves called sepals. Placed between and inside the sepals are five yellow leaves, known as petals, and which form the corolla. This latter 'whorl' forms, of course, the brightly coloured part of flowers, although occasionally the green calyx may, as in fuchsia and Indian cress, become coloured likewise. Inside the corolla we discover, in the buttercup, a large number of little yellow bodies, each like a pin, consisting of a stalk and head, and named a stamen. The head of the stamen is called the anther. It is hollow, and contains the yellow dust, or pollen, with which every one is familiar, as a product of flower life. This pollen is necessary for the fertilisation of the plant, as we shall presently see. The fourth and central part of the buttercup flower is the pistil. It consists, in the buttercup, of a large number of green bodies called carpels. In each carpel of the buttercup, we find a little round structure called an ovule, and when this ovule is fertilised by the pollen from the stamens it becomes a seed. The pistils and stamens of a flower are, therefore, its seed producing parts. "Fertilisation" is merely that process whereby the ovule is converted into the seed from which a new plant will spring, and thus being so, it follows that the essential parts of a flower are its stamens and pistil. The calyx and corolla are protective leaves, but the corolla, by its bright colour, serves to attract insects for the work of fertilisation. It is true that insect visitors may be "tempted by the tooth" to enter flowers, and may be drawn to their unconscious work of fertilisation by the store of honey which the flowers offer for their use and delectation. But leaving aside questions relating to the methods and modes of attraction, we know as a matter of fact that most flowers are visited by insects—some by one species of insects only—and that such visitation has become a necessity of plant existence.

Why this should be so finds a ready explanation in the researches of ordinary botany, following up the clue which the philosophy of that science afforded. When it was observed that insects industriously visited flowers, and carried pollen from one flower to another of the same, or a nearly related species, botanists were led to ask themselves why such an interchange of pollen was apparently desired and demanded by nature. Countless contrivances, simple and elaborate, exist in flowers for the clear purpose of securing that a flower shall not use its own pollen to fertilise its own ovules, and that, secondly, its pollen shall be conveyed by the wind or insects to other flowers, whilst it, in turn, will be fertilised by the pollen brought from a neighbour-flower of the same species. The reason for this "cross fertilisation" has been found in the proved fact that, as a rule, we obtain more seeds and healthier offspring from a cross fertilised flower than from one which is "self-fertilised." Mr Darwin's researches stand out prominently in this respect. He showed conclusively that with certain species of plants, this cross fertilisation, so far from being an occasional occurrence, was an absolute necessity for the production of seeds. Such a plant is the red clover, unless visited by certain insects—the humble bees—does not produce seed at all, so that the interchange of pollen between these clover plants is a necessity of their life and the continuance of the race. Fertilisation itself is a readily understood process. The pollen grains, placed on the top of the pistil (stigma), send out little root-like processes in the form of tubes. These pollen tubes burrow their way down the style or neck of the pistil, to the ovary below, in which the ovules are enclosed. Contact of the pollen tubes with the ovules now takes place, and the matter contained in the pollen grain is thus conveyed to the ovule. As the result of this contact, the ovule is "fertilised." It is no longer an ovule. It has become a "seed," and as such, when planted in the ground, contains all the potentialities and powers through which it will blossom forth, in due season, into the likeness of its parent.

Now, the preceding remarks, which are matter of ordinary botanical lore, such as may be found more fully detailed in a primer of the science, lead us towards the appreciation of orchid structure and life. All flowers are divided into two great classes, characterized by the number and arrangement of their flower-parts and leaves, as also by special features of their development. The "dicotyledons" are the higher plants, and are represented by all our familiar trees, shrubs, and flowers, from the oak to the buttercup. The "monocotyledons" are the bamboos, palms, lilies, grasses, crocuses, snowdrops, tulips, &c., and in this second group the orchids find a place. In this latter group we find, firstly, that the calyx and corolla are, as a rule, similar in appearance, a fact familiarly seen in the tulip, snow drop, or lily of the valley. There is not that distinction into the green calyx, and the coloured corolla, which we see in the higher group. Then the orchids and their allies have their flower parts arranged in threes, and not in fours or fives as in the higher plants. Whilst the leaves of the latter plants have a "net veined" structure—beautifully seen in skeleton leaves—the orchid leaves, like those of the grasses, tulips, &c., have their veins running parallel with one another. Lastly, when the young plant is being developed, we see only one "seed leaf" in the orchids, grasses, &c., whilst the higher plants show two "seed leaves" in the course of their early history—a feature which, indeed, has given them their name of "dicotyledons."

Turning now to the examination of our orchid flowers, and taking a common species as a type, we discover that the outer leaves which form the "flower" are developed in two circles or whorls, with three leaves in each whorl. But a curious modification is readily seen in the orchid flower, when its parts are even superficially examined. The upper or hinder flower leaf of the inner circle differs materially from the other leaves. It is frequently divided into distinct portions, and is known as the labellum. It forms the lower side of the flower, and, as Mr. Darwin remarks, forms an appropriate door-mat or landing-place for the insect visitors of the flower. Very frequently this labellum is prolonged below to form a long tubular appendage. This is the nectary, which secretes and contains the honey, for the sake of which, insects will visit the flower. The stamens vary from one to six in number, but three stamens form the common provision of the orchid group. The pistil unites with the stamens to form a single "column," and the arrangement of the heads of the stamens, as well as the form of the pollen grains, deserve special notice. In ordinary plants, the pollen grains exist separately, and the pollen in consequence appears as the fine yellow dust familiar to us. But in the orchids the pollen rarely exists as a powder. Its usual condition in the orchid family is that of association, the pollen grains adhe- ring to form firm, club-shaped masses, called pollinia by the botanist. Above the stigma of the pistil, which the pollen is applied in the work of fertilisation, there is a sticky disc, called the rostellum, and we shall presently note the important use which is subserved by this glutinous part of the flower.

Orchids, like other flowers, then, require that the ovules contained within their pistil should be fertilised by the pollen from their stamens. But it is in this group, with few exceptions, that the botanist discovers what may be called the acme of perfection in the work of "cross-fertilisation." There is no one group of flowers which has more completely pressed the insects into its service than that which forms the subject of remark. Indeed, the guiding clue to the mysteries, varieties, and oddities of orchid structure, will be found in the idea that all the peculiarities exhibited by these flowers are so many contrivances which render "self fertilisation" difficult or impossible, as they render "cross fertilisation" easy.

If we watch the process of fertilisation in a common orchid flower, we discover, firstly, that the bee, which acts the part of a friendly go-between, alights firstly on the labellum of the flower. In the Orchis mascula of damp meadow lands, for example, the process may be well and conveniently studied. Thus steadied on the flower lip, the bee pushes its head forward into the receptacle at the back of which lies the stigma. The bee's anxiety is, of course, to get at the honey contained in the nectary. Nature, however, may be regarded as being in the position of an expert, who demands on the part of the flower and from the unconscious insect a certain service, and who effects this end by causing the insect to perform the desired work as it troubles itself to reach the store of sweets offered by the flower. Thus the insect, in its endeavour to gain easy access to the nectary, pushes against the sticky "rostellum" already mentioned. The result of this action on the part of the bee is, that one or more of the pollen-masses will touch its head, and will be firmly glued thereto by the cement, which "sets" like artificial glues, and insures the firm adhesion of the pollen.

As the bee leaves the flower, we see the two pollen masses adherent to its head, and standing vertically, like two abnormal "horns" thereon. ■ we push a fine pointed pencil into the nectary of the orchis flower, so as to imitate the action of the bee, we may readily succeed, as Mr. Darwin showed, in detaching the pollen masses, and in bringing them off attached to the pencil, as, in nature, they adhere to the insect's head. The bee now leaves the orchis flower bent on a further mission of sweet-gathering. But now ensues a singular action on the part of the pollen masses. As the bee left the orchid, these masses stood straight and erect on its head. But in a little while—in about 30 seconds in Orchis mascula—through the contraction of the little adhesive disc of the pollen mass, that mass is seen to bend downwards and forwards, "through 90 degrees," ■ Mr. Darwin puts it, so as ■ cause each mass to lie forwards and to project almost horizontally on the insect's head.

What ■ the meaning, then, of this remarkable change of attitude? The reply becomes clear, when we give a moment's consideration to the position of the organs of the orchid flower. If we pushed our pencil, with its attached and erect pollen masses, into the flower—the pollen masses thus existing as they were first derived from the flower—we should tend simply to replace them in the niche whence they were taken, namely, amongst the masses which were left behind in the flower. But this is evidently a result for which nature does not bargain. Her design is that the pollen-masses shall be placed on the pistil of another orchis. Hence, by causing the droop and change of position of the pollen masses on the bee's head, she insures that as the bee enters another flower the pollen masses will "charge" the pistil of that flower, and be duly deposited thereon. And there ■ yet another important result obtained by this change of position of the pollen masses after an interval has elapsed. If the change took place immediately on the bee withdrawing its head from the flower, the insect would be liable to fertilise the pistil of some other flower of the same plant, which it would naturally visit next in order. But this result is exactly that against which nature is contending. She is, in other words, avoiding "self fertilisation," and securing "cross fertilisation." So long, therefore, as the pollen-mass remains erect (i.e. during the time the bee is occupied with the flowers of one and the same plant) there is no chance of self-fertilisation, whilst, on the contrary, by the time the insect arrives at the next plant the pollen mass will be ready to discharge its function. Robert Brown also pointed out that the whole of the pollen mass will not be pulled off the insect's head in the fertilisation of one flower. In other words, a single pollen mass may contain material enough for the impregnation of many pistils, and economy in the distribution of the pollen is thus secured.

Such is the ordinary course of things in common orchid existence. It will not be denied that these details are both curious and interesting. But remarkable as they are, they form a mere introduction to the veritable wonders of orchid life. Each species well nigh exhibits its own peculiar methods of securing cross fertilisation, and the contrivances which are known to the orchid grower are well nigh endless in variety and complexity. Take the curious case of a tropical orchid Coryanthes, for example. Here the labellum or flower lip forms a veritable bucket of water, which drips into it from two horns. When the bucket is half full, the water overflows by a spout, which exists at one side. The uncovered or dry part of the labellum rests on the bucket and forms a hollow cavity containing fleshy ridges inside, and forming two side doors. Well may Mr. Darwin tell us that "the most ingenious man, if he had not witnessed what takes place, could never have imagined what purpose all these parts serve."

Dr. Cruger, however, watching this orchid in its native haunts, saw crowds of bees visiting the large and showy blossoms of this species of orchid. Apparently the honey in the nectary was not the object of their search, for they entered the chamber which lies above the bucket, and gnawed the fleshy ridges ■ contains. As ■ a struggling mass of humanity who fight on the edge of a pond there would be frequent immersions, so Dr. Cruger saw the bees now and then fall into the bucket. Of all disasters to insect life, wet wings must prove the most serious. Unable to fly, the half-drowned bees crawled through the only passage open to them, namely the spout or overflow. "A continual procession" of the half-drowned insects was seen by Dr. Crüger passing out of the spout. But the passage in question is a very narrow one, and it is moreover covered by the "column" formed of the united pistil and stamens. The result is that the bee, forcing its passage out, first rubs its back against the sticky stigma whereon pollen is deposited, and then against the sticky masses of pollen. On the backs of the bees which first chance to escape after their bath, the pollen masses thus become glued. Visiting another Coryanthes plant, the pollen-laden bee is again immersed, but as it crawls forth through the passage of this second flower, the pollen-masses will first be touched by the sticky pistil, will adhere to it, and cross-fertilisation is thus secured. Anything more ingenious or complex than the series of arrangements thus detailed, could not well be imagined.

Equally curious is the case of the Catasetum, described by Mr. Darwin as belonging to a family which he considered "the most remarkable of all orchids." Here the stamens and pollen grains occur in one plant and the pistils on another plant (as in the willow); so that the conveyance of pollen from one plant to the other is absolutely necessary to insure the production of seeds. There is nothing attractive to insects in the pollen-chamber of the Catasetum; and moreover, the sticky disc, which would cause the pollen grain to adhere to the body of an insect, is so placed that the insect would not touch it, even if it entered the chamber. But Catasetum is endowed with a power which perfectly compensates for its lack of the characters of other orchids. The pollen masses possess each a blunt and sticky point. When the insect enters the flower it ruptures the edges of the disc by which the pollen masses adhered together. This action resembles the touch of a trigger; for, as the stalks of the pollen masses are fastened down in a curved position, and as they are suddenly liberated by the insect's act, they straighten with remarkable force, and like arrows may be projected to a distance of two or three feet. These pollen arrows of Catasetum may disturb the insect, which, flying to another and pistil-bearing plant with the pollen masses, leaves them on the pistil of the latter and thus fertilises it.

To enumerate in further detail the many interesting features which present themselves before the student of the orchid race, would be a task beyond our present purpose, as it is certainly rendered impossible by the plain considerations connected with limitation of space. Enough has perhaps been said to show the liberal mine of intellectual wealth which may reside within the limits of even a single family of living beings. The orchids form only one of countless groups of the plant world, an acquaintance with whose history will be found to constitute one of the highest delights and purest enjoyments of life. For unless there is something radically erroneous in man's natural disposition to love nature and knowledge for their own sakes, we are only re-echoing words of wisdom when we assert that the study of the living forms that surround us should form a part of the pleasures of us all. It is a poor heart which never rejoices; and this familiar expression may be paralleled by that which declares that it is a dull and abnormal comprehension which cannot arise from the study of living things without feeling the better and happier for the knowledge that our world contains so much that is beautiful and good.

IN MEMORIAM.

I HAVE no welcome for thee, smiling Spring!
 Thy smile is not for me; so let me go:
 We once were friends, and may be friends again:
 Thou canst not charm away my present pain:
 Alas, my wounded heart! too well we know
 The grief the living suffer from death's sting.

Now will I find me out some leafless tree,
 Standing, all smitten, 'midst the verdurous wood;
 And, crouching on the wither'd leaves it wore—
 The leaves so joyously it whilom wore—
 Maybe, I'll ease me of my mournful mood,
 When Nature thus shall sympathize with me.

The melancholy message of the morn,
 The answering echo of the aching eve,
 And all the tracery of the sunny shade—
 The writing by the leafy sunshine made,
 Remind me only of my cause to grieve
 Pass by, ye Days ! ye make me more forlorn.

Yet then thy voice the same sad story brings
 In muffled repetition, shrouded Night !
 Hush ! whispering winds come from yon sacred ground :
 Night's starry eyes gaze on that new-made mound
 And, thinking, thinking on the piteous sight,
 I would for me were spread the peace bird's 'lustrous wings !"

LIFE AND LETTERS BY THE SEA-SIDE.

By "SHIRLEY"

I.—THE FIRST SPRING MORNING.

MANY years ago I said somewhere—that was in the Cornhill, I fancy, in the great days when Thackeray was editor, and used to write his contributors those queer angular upside down little notes which one remembers so well—why don't we have an edition of his letters with his own illustrations?—there, or elsewhere, I said, a hundred years ago, that there was always one particular day in the year when the spring seems to me to awake—the first spring morning in fact, and not by the calendar. The snow has been gone for weeks, the sun has been shining briskly, the pear and the plum are white with blossom, yet the sky remains hard and stern, and the earth is black and inhospitable—as if the thought of winter still chilled her heart. But one morning we wake unwarned, and we have barely drawn aside the curtains ere we are aware that the bonds of death are loosed, that a new life has been born into the year, and that, like the eyes of a girl who has begun to love, the blue sky and the fleecy clouds have strangely softened since nightfall. Spring is abroad upon the mountains, and her maiden whisper thrills your pulse !

Ever since then—during the intervening hundred years or so—I have made a red cross in my journal on that particular day. The anniversary of the youthful year is emphatically a movable feast. It is as incalculable as the caprice of a coquette or the orbit of a political leader—a Disraeli or a Gladstone. Sometimes it comes in March, sometimes in April, sometimes in May. Once it surprised us in February, but it was leap year, and possibly the odd day had been overlooked. Once June was imminent, but that year there had been patches of snow in our deep glade till May, and poet and farmer alike had expostulated in vain. "O sweet new year delaying long, delaying long, delay no more." But it turned a deaf ear to our charming, and it was well on into August before the hawthorn was in blossom. The Tories, to be sure, were in power at the time, and we never can tell what the clerk of the weather will do when that happens.

Once more the blessed day has returned, and what can I do better this balmy morning than send a spring greeting to GOOD WORDS and its Editor? Many happy returns of this admirable number. Such an astonishing sixpennyworth—so much that is at once sound, healthy, and cheerful—it has not hitherto been my luck to meet. We have had a great deal of controversy lately on the condition of the people question,—whether life upon the whole is easier and sweeter for the great mass of our workers than it was forty years ago. We have been told much about the comparative values of bread, and butcher meat, and rents, and taxes, and so on, but not a word has been said about our cheap literature, and about the novel conditions which have made such a venture as GOOD WORDS possible, and, I hope, profitable. Man does not live by bread alone, and when balancing our gains and losses we should not fail to take into account the mental feast which the poorest artisan may now enjoy for a copper or two. Honour to whom honour is due; and those who cater in an honest and friendly spirit for the entertainment of the teeming masses of our great cities are among the true benefactors of the race.

Yet it makes one sad to think to how few of them, in their vast hives of industry, beneath their sable canopies of smoke and fog, is the message of the spring-time brought. "I saw," says Heine, "the young Spring God, large as life, standing on the summit of an Alp." It is not on the summit of an alp that I have met the youngster to-day, but in a deep glade, carpeted with cowslip and anemone, and vocal with woodland song. A great city lies on the other side of the hill—a hill famous in Scottish poetry—but to our secluded glen the smoke of the factory and the forge, and the thunder of their traffic, do not penetrate. Nature is hard at work to be sure,—but she works in silence; she is making a New World, but there is no sound of hammer or of axe. Fair and shapely, and fashioned by an instinct more inevitable than fashioned the Temples of Jerusalem or of Athens, this beautiful new world rises day by day before our eyes—how often unseen or unregarded!—until the forbidding blackness of the wintry earth is covered all over with summer greenery. Foolish people say that the age of miracles is past; how can that be when the unique miracle of spring is always with us? At a time when all the professions are overcrowded, I often wonder, with Mr. Gladstone, why some of us do not take to market gardening. A garden is one of the best teachers, as it is one of the greatest enjoyments, in life. For it brings us face to face with the wonderful processes of growth. That the earth this spring should be as able and willing as ever to produce green peas and young potatoes, and French beans (not to speak of subtler and more ethereal products), often touches me, in view of our own decay, with unspeakable astonishment. It is good for us, moreover, to make our hands familiar with the soil from which we have been taken, and to which we must return. ■ we come to love the earth, and to feel that kind, beneficent, and fruitful processes are at work among the sods, we shall banish a great deal of the foolish sentimental sadness about mortality which the Modern Muse affects. Perhaps indeed a disorderly bit of woodland like ours is even better and more instructive than a well-ordered garden or nursery,—we watch

Nature at work in her simplest moods and in her most rustic dress. Here, ■ anywhere, the solution of the mystery ■ to be reached. The miracle transacts itself, night and morning, before our eyes; and (assuming that ■ is capable of explanation) we have only our own obtuseness to thank if we remain as ignorant as before.

A charming little volume has been recently issued by Mr. Harrison Weir, the eminent artist and naturalist, which ought to be in the hands of every child, old and young, who wishes to keep a daily record of what is going on out of doors. ■ ■ called "Every Day in the Country;" and from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, there are regular entries of the "events" in the animal and vegetable world, as observed by the author, as well as characteristic illustrations of each. On the opposite page blank spaces are left where you record your own observations of the advent of bird and flower. Looking over the copy which has been assiduously posted up by deft little hands this year in our glen, we learn how much there is to see within a hundred yards of the dining-room windows—how many welcomes and farewells, how many comedies, how many tragedies even. The winter of 1883-4 was, as we all know, a mere pretence. We had a shower of snow once and again; but it melted before mid-day. So that we are not surprised to learn that on the First of the year a stray celandine and campion were visible; that on the Second the water-ousel (which, strange to say, Mr. Ruskin has never beheld) was singing; that on the Fifth there were no less than twelve flowers on the Gloire de Dijon; that on the Ninth, daisies, violets, and primroses were showing themselves in the garden borders; and that by the Eighteenth the woodland concert had begun in earnest. Already, this 26th of April, nearly all the frillings of the year have faded. The snowdrop, the crocus, the wood-anemone, the sweet violet, the winter aconite have come and gone. The wood sorrel and the cowslip, the periwinkle and the primrose are yet in bloom; the glen is still bright with yellow celandine and crimson campion; and in another day or two the woodland carpet will be blue all over—blue as the heaven—with hyacinth. In our chilly climate, as a rule, few of these events "come off" before May or June; but this season we are six weeks earlier than usual. Then the birds have been busy at their nests for months. There were eight or nine eggs in the water-ousel's nest beneath the waterfall before April had well begun, and, while her mate is still sitting on her first, the male water-hen is already occupied in building a second (A humorous battle between him and a water rat has this moment occurred, resulting in the complete discomfiture of the rat.) Last night the owl was hooting from a cognac of vantage above his nest in the ivy, and, if I am not mistaken, I have heard more than once the shrill complaint, the curious yep, yep of the young birds (As we have had a sharp frost lately, the little unsledged creatures possibly find it chilly.) The cuckoo has not yet returned from the Riviera, and only an occasional swallow has been seen, but otherwise the woodland season is at its briskest. The wagtail, the creeper, the wren, the robin, the thrush, the maske-thrush, the blackbird, the starling, the skylark, the yellow-hammer, the tit, the flycatcher, the chaffinch, the cushet, are in their best dresses, and hard at work from daybreak till dark. What with building of nests, and laying of eggs, and hunting of worms and grubs and larvae, and vigilant observation of magpies and carrion crows and water rats, and general conversation, and an occasional irrepressible outburst of joyful melody, not one of them has an idle moment. Where does this happiness come from? Who has put it into their hearts? There are no pessimistic philosophers among our birds,—merle and mavis are as happy and hopeful to day as when they sang in Eden, while we, who look before and after and sigh for what is not, are disquieted in vain. Behold, thou hast made my days as an hand-breadth, and mine age as as nothing before thee: verily man at his best state is altogether vanity. Surely every man walketh in a vain show: surely they are disquieted in vain: he heapeth up riches and knoweth not who shall gather them.

Yet after all I said, and in spite of the fall and the east wind, this England and Scotland of ours are very far and sweet in the spring time, and I do not wonder that even in Italy Robert Browning remembered the Hampshire downs and the Devonshire lanes—

"Oh to be in England,
Now that April is there
And whoever wakes in England
Sees some morning unaware
That the lowest boughs of the hawthorn bend
Round the elm tree bole are in tiny leaf,

While the chaffinch sings on the orchard bough,
In England—now!

It is thus, and in these manifold, mysterious beautiful ways, that the miracle of a New World repeats itself year by year. Were it not for this ever fresh childhood of the spring, the earth, I suppose, would grow old as the rest of us do. But, like the hero of the fairy story, it bathes itself in an enchanted fountain, and so renews its youth. Here as elsewhere, each of us makes his own choice, to see the opening of the flowers—to see the coming of the birds—is the special message on which you dwell. For my own part I do not think there is anything so exquisite and incredible in all this miraculous season as the rising and unfolding of the delicate frond of the fern. There are ferns here on every hand—brought from every quarter of Europe. Other travellers bring pictures or carvings or cameos to remind them of the pleasant places they have visited, I am content with a fern root or two, which may be carried quite safely in a spare sponge bag, and which to my mind are even more directly associative and suggestive. This delicate asplenium was gathered in the Val Anzasa in sight of Monte Rosa, that rare polypody is a native of Monte Cristallo in the Dolomites, this plant of holly was found on the summit of the Simplan half buried in the snow, that in the Fuschthal on the route across the Pfandscharte to the mighty Pasterze Glacier, from the cool depths of the well in the convent courtyard at Padua, where Giotto's frescoes are still dimly visible, came this tuft of fragile maiden hair—as old perhaps as the frescoes, the stately Osmunda is a relic of an forgotten visit to Mr. Froude and the Kerry coast, the oak and the beech, and the parsley and the hartstongue, and the hay-scented and the green asplenium marinum (which first saw the light in a cave at Colonsay) are reminiscences of English lake and Western Island. One or two of them are already perfectly developed—others have only begun to stir the soul above their heads. But in each and all an inscrutable and irresistible force is at work, a power so potent that even the hard trodden sod is moved aside by a slender needle-like shaft which the faintest breeze will bend. A miracle, indeed! before which science is mute.

The Banks of the Nile.

EGYPT AFTER THE WAR.

By LADY BRASSY, AUTHOR OF "A VOYAGE IN THE "SUNBEAM," ETC

115TH (AND CONCLUDING) PART

TUESDAY, February 20th.—We left Luxor at half-past five A.M., and ran aground soon after ten, in consequence of Iudros, with his usual perversity, having allowed the incompetent pilot, instead of the good one, to go on board the tug. The mistake was quickly rectified, and we reached Kenh soon after noon without further mishap, and without having caught sight of a crocodile, as we had rather hoped to do. Having hired some very wretched donkeys (all the best having been already secured by a party of American tourists), we rode into the town, which is situated between two and three miles from the banks of the river. It is a large and important place, with good bazaars and baths, but is chiefly celebrated for the fact that it contains a large colony of dancing girls, who go from here to various parts of Upper Egypt.

The ride to Denderah in the afternoon was through a fertile country. The temple itself is very fine, and its roof being still preserved, it is in some respects even more interesting than the other ruins we have already visited. But the smell of the bats by which it is now inhabited was quite overpowering. It made me feel sick and faint, and although there was much to detain us, we were only too glad to escape into the outer air as quickly as possible, and be able to breathe freely once more.

This temple of Denderah is of much later date than those at Thebes, having been built in the time of the Ptolemies in connection with the worship of Athor or Aphrodite, and completed by the Emperors Tiberius and Nero. In consequence, the architecture is not so imposing as that of the more ancient structures, but it is still very beautiful, and the hieroglyphics and paintings are remarkably clear and well preserved. Many of the names of the Roman Emperors, added at a still more recent date, can be traced, and there is said to be an excellent portrait of Cleopatra and Ptolemy Cæsarion, her son by Julius Cæsar. The whole building is enclosed by a high brick wall, so that nothing can be seen of it from the outside.

Wednesday, February 21st.—It is extraordinary how this life on the Nile grows upon one, and how soon it comes to be regarded as the most natural style of existence imaginable. I had always felt inclined to pity people whom I have heard of as passing weeks, or even months on board ad-habereah, and had feared that we should find our little expedition rather monotonous, especially as we were so small a party, but, on the contrary each day has been more enjoyable than the last, our only regret being that it has brought us, by twenty four hours, nearer to the time when we must bid adieu to our dear Gaselle. There is a subtle charm in the atmosphere of the valley of the Nile, which cannot be described, a spirit of enchantment, which still lingers where the great pulse of the world throbbed centuries and centuries ago, when the mighty builders of these glorious ruins were born, and lived, and died, and were buried.

We got under way this morning at half past five, but soon afterwards ran aground, the reason (as he always does when he thinks there is nobody up and about to look after him) having again sent the inferior pilot on board the steamer. I think he finds my unexpected appearance on deck at all sorts of hours rather disconcerting, and on the present occasion he lost no time in lowering the boat and rectifying his mistake directly he saw me emerge from the cabin. His obstinacy in this matter is most provoking. It is not only that the one man does not know the river, but he cannot apparently detect the superficial difference between deep water and shallow, and we frequently foresee, several minutes before the bump comes, that we must inevitably go aground.

We passed Ball anch without stopping to make our intended excursion to Abydos, which would have involved a wearisome ride to the edge of the desert. The grand old temple is similar in many respects to those we have already seen, its only great peculiarity being, that it is almost, if not quite, the only Egyptian temple in which there is anything like an arch. In every other case the roof rests upon immense blocks of stone, laid on the top of columns and pillars, the doorways and windows being formed in the same way. Everything is square shaped, or rather rectangular. Indeed, the total absence of curves may be said to be the most striking characteristic of ancient Egyptian architecture.

The strong north wind, against which we were being towed, was somewhat cold; but the current helped us briskly along, and we passed dirty Gurgeh, and landed at Elkhmeen early in the afternoon. The French Consul kindly lent me a beautiful white donkey, and we rode or walked all round this most characteristic of oriental towns. The bazaars, though large, are not particularly interesting, and our party excited so much curiosity, and was the object of such close attention, that we were glad to make our escape from the crowd we attracted. The more striking features of the town are the Coptic ruins and the remains of two large convents. Most of the inhabitants still profess to be Christians, though they do not differ in all in outward appearance from their Mahomedan brethren. The mushrabitis, or wooden window-lattices, are here most beautiful. I have not seen any so finely carved, even in the oldest part of Old Cairo. Almost every house has one or more of these graceful overhanging structures. Many a bared balcony, dirty and dusty as they all were, I should have liked to have transferred bodily to England, though how it would look in our wet foggy climate, without the sunshine and blue sky, and without the gay colours and bright eyes that peeped forth from behind, I scarcely know.

Thursday, February 22nd.—After anchoring for the night off Sohag, we resumed our voyage between five and six this morning, and were fortunate enough to reach Assiout at three o'clock, without having run aground.

The bazaars of Assiout are large and well stocked, for here the caravans arrive direct from the interior, laden with ivory, panther and leopard skins, horns, ostrich-feathers and eggs, and all the products of the desert, and take back in exchange cotton fabrics, Manchester goods, and Scotch woollen shawls. I am sorry to say that even the Bedouins are beginning to wear the latter, instead of enveloping their heads in the hoods of their white bournouses, or covering them with their bright-coloured striped keffiyehs. It is a deplorable exchange of the picturesque and beautiful for the commonplace but useful. From the bazaars we rode to see some curious tombs hewn out of the rocks among the hills near Assiout. They contain many interesting hieroglyphics, but I liked best the view which they command over the town and the fields and plains of what Dean Stanley has called "dazzling green." I can think of no other expression to convey the idea of the vivid colour of the wide expanse, which seemed to shine and shimmer like a mass of emeralds, as the wind swept refreshingly over and lightly stirred the blades of grass and corn. There was nothing to break what under ordinary circumstances would have been the monotony of the scene, save an occasional glimpse of the waters of the Nile, with here and there a white sail gliding over their surface, or of the roofs of an Arab village and the tops of a grove of palm trees. The view from this spot is said to be the prettiest in Egypt, and it is certainly quite unique in character. Dean Stanley, in describing it, says that the plain "stretches away for miles on either side, unbroken save for the mud villages which lie here and there in the midst of the verdure, like the marks of a soiled foot on a rich carpet." I do not quite agree with the justice of the last simile, for I think that the villages rather improve than mar the general beauty of the prospect.

Friday, February 23rd.—Iadros knocked at my door at half past five this morning, to inform me that Cook's agent had just arrived on board, with a telegram containing the unpleasant information that it would be utterly impossible for us to continue our voyage down the river below Minieh. The Marr, a large river-steamer, had run ashore three days ago, completely blocking the channel, and it seemed doubtful when she would be able to get off again, even if the whole of her cargo and coals were removed for the purpose of lightening her. This was a great disappointment to us, and the knowledge that our life on board the dahabeeah was thus to be brought to such an unexpectedly sudden conclusion gave a tinge of sadness to the day's proceedings.

We got under way again at the usual hour, and soon left behind us the domes and minarets of Assiout, which looked extremely picturesque in their green setting of palm-groves. The light of the slowly fading moon, and the pale pink blush in the east, heralding the swift approach of dawn, threw the most lovely tints on land and water, as we glided along on the bosom of the Nile. Not long afterwards we passed Maabdeh, where are the celebrated crocodile mummy pits, containing thousands of the embalmed and well-preserved bodies of those huge creatures. Some very richly gilt human mummies have also been found there, besides several interesting Greek manuscripts. The caverns are not difficult of access, I believe, but it was now very early in the morning, and after our recent experience of Denderah, we did not feel much inclined to penetrate into places that are said to be even still more infested with bats and which possess in addition the unenviable reputation of abounding with other odours of the most noxious description.

About three o'clock in the afternoon we saw the towers of Minieh rising in the distance, and an hour later, I cannot say that we had actually dropped our anchor, but we were moored hard and fast to the bank, and our delightful cruise was really at an end. Minieh is an important town, with many big sugar manufactories, and a vast palace belonging to the Khedive, which I believe he occasionally occupies in the summer-time. We landed and walked about through the bazaars, and went to see the rather picturesque old tomb of a sheykh whence we proceeded to the railway station to obtain some particulars about our journey to-morrow. The station master, though extremely polite, was unable to speak a single word of any language but his own, and the interview, having been conducted through the medium of Tadros, was somewhat tedious, especially as he (the station master) insisted on entertaining us with pipes and coffee.

Saturday, February 14th—At what hour Tadros would have considered it necessary to call us, had we been leaving by the eight o'clock train, I cannot imagine, for although we were not to start until past mid-day, he began to rout us out before six, and by eight o'clock he had got nearly everything packed up, leaving us in a more or less comfortable condition. In fact, it was only by peremptory insistence that I succeeded in returning my dressing bag, and a few writing materials, and a book. At eleven o'clock his anxiety on our behalf reached its climax, and he worried and fussed to such an extent that we were fairly driven off like a flock of sheep, after a somewhat hurried farewell to the dear Gazelle and all on board. The whole establishment came with us, except the old reeve, and the sailors, who expressed great regret at losing us, and said that they wished the voyage could have lasted three months instead of only three weeks. I think the occasional presents of lamb and other delicacies that had been given them, had possibly something to do with these sentiments, though I am sure they were sorry to lose the children, whose interest in their music and dancing they had highly appreciated. We brought away some of their quaint musical instruments with us, as parting gifts. The reeve of the steamer, on the other hand, looked even more gloomy and stately than usual (he was a Nubian from Assouan), probably because, on account of his inefficiency and obstinacy, I had declined to give him any thing beyond his bare pay.

On donkeys and on foot our little procession, the extent of which was due in great measure to the fact that every parcel or bag, whatever its size, had its own porter, and every box or larger package two (carts being scarce in these parts), wound its way through the streets and bazaars of the town to the railway station, which we reached quite an hour before the time fixed for the departure of the train, and where we were again regaled with coffee by the polite station master.

Mr. Cook had sent down a large carriage for us, the rain of yesterday had cooled the air, and had laid the dust somewhat, so that our journey was not altogether half so unpleasant as we had anticipated. We reached Boolak ed Dakroor at about half-past seven and found carriages awaiting us, and a quick cold drive of little more than half an hour brought us to our old quarters at Shephard's Hotel, where, although we found many new faces, there still remained several of our old friends to give us a warm welcome, and to make the after-dinner gathering in our little sitting-room very pleasant.

A Nubian

Sunday, February 25th — Waking early, I heard the wind howling and the leaves and twigs of the trees outside tapping against the window, on opening which the scene that presented itself reminded me of a March day in England. The dust was flying in clouds, and the few natives who were visible were so tied up in handkerchiefs and shawls, that they looked as if they feared that their heads might part company with their bodies. Going to church was really a matter of much difficulty, the gale by that time having increased considerably. Many were the hats we saw careering wildly about the streets, while a dense sand storm from the desert seemed to envelop the whole city in a sort of yellow cloud, almost like a November fog in London. Later on the wind subsided and the rain began to descend in torrents, laying the terrible clouds of dust, which made it almost impossible to breathe.

On Tuesday afternoon we called on the Vice reeve, who received us very pleasantly, and who appeared to be looking forward with considerable interest to the ball which was to be given on the following Thursday at the Opera House, on behalf of the European Relief Fund, established for the benefit of the poor of Alexandria. The apartments of the palace are lofty and handsome, but the furniture is stiff and formal looking, and at the time of our visit was covered with brown holland, which did not improve its appearance. The Vicereine, who is only twenty-five years old, is good looking though rather stout according to our European ideas of prettiness.

The following morning we went to breakfast with the Princess Mansour, the Khedive's sister, whose house I have already described. The meal was of a most elaborate description, consisting of many courses, and partaking more of the character of a dinner than of a breakfast or rather déjeuner. The dining-room was luxuriously furnished. In the centre was a large circular velvet carpet, embroidered with gold, on which stood an octagonal table, covered with an embroidered velvet cloth on which the breakfast service, including napkins worked with gold thread, was arranged in the European fashion, a vacant space being left in the middle for the silver plate-tray containing the successive courses. As affording some idea of the resources of Cairene culinary art, ■ may perhaps be mentioned that we were offered in the following order, soup, roast-turkey, calves'-head stuffed with forcemeat, pilau of rice and rusins, maccaroni cheese, kabobs of mutton on skewers, asparagus a l'huile, purées, cream-rice-tart, pastry and jam, milk-of-almonds in a bowl, with pistachio nuts, eaten with tortoiseshell spoons, and cheese, followed by dessert, with ices and little cakes, and ending with coffee, which was served in another room. On the table itself were several varieties of hors d'œuvre, such as anchovies, olives, potted meats, a sort of bitter white sauce, and clotted cream. Champagne and other wines were handed round. The party consisted of eight persons, and the entire meal was served within forty minutes—remarkably quick work, considering the length of the menu. Each guest was provided with a beautifully embroidered Turkish towel, and water was brought to us in large silver basins after dinner to wash our hands in. During our visit we had a short conversation with the Princess's husband, at his office in the city, by means of the telephone.

In the afternoon we drove to Abasseeyeh, to see the soldiers of the new Egyptian army being drilled, and thence to the village of Matareeyeh, near the entrance to which, at a short distance from the road, is what is called the "Virgin's Tree," a very old sycamore, beneath the shade of which the Holy Family are supposed ■ have rested after their flight into Egypt. It has been greatly hacked and disfigured by pilgrims and relic hunters, but is now protected by a fence. Whatever truth there may be in the legend attached to it, there can be no doubt of the great age of the tree, which is still alive, though gnarled and twisted.

We also visited the ostrich farm near the same village, and saw in the distance the far-famed solitary obelisk of Heliopolis, said to be the oldest in Egypt.

On Thursday, March 1st, we embarked at the Kasr en neel, at half-past nine, in one of Cook's steamers, hired for the occasion, and proceeded up the Nile to Bedreshayn, our party including Mr. Laurence Oliphant, Mr. Mackenzie Wallace, Mr. Stanley Poole, and Lady Wynford. We arrived at our destination about noon, and started at once on donkeys for the Apis Mausoleum, passing on our way the Step Pyramid—the largest of the eleven standing on the plain of Sakkarah—and dismounting at the house of the late

M. Mariette, by whom the discovery of the site of the Setapeum, or outer temple, which no longer exists, and the Apis Mausoleum, was made, more than twenty years ago. The entrance to the Mausoleum ■ by a long subterranean passage, on each side of which are chambers containing the sarcophagi of the sacred bulls that were buried there, the average size of a sarcophagus being 13 feet by 7½ feet, with a height of 11 feet, and the thickness of the granite of which they are composed from two ■ three feet. The Mausoleum, as discovered by M. Mariette, consisted of three parts, varying considerably in age, only the third of which, the largest and most magnificent, is now shown to visitors. We afterwards visited the tombs of Ith and of Ptah-hotep, situated respectively a short distance to the north and south of the Mausoleum.

The same evening the grand charity ball, in aid of the poor of Alexandria, to which I have already referred, took place, and was a most brilliant success. Everybody of importance in Cairo, whether native or European, was present, including the Khedive, who wore only one decoration, that of Knight Grand Commander of the Star of India, and who appeared to take great interest in the proceedings. The ball was opened by a court quadrille, in which Prince Osman, representing the Khedive, danced with Lady Dufferin, Lord Dufferin's partner being Madame de Martino, wife of the Agent and Consul-General for Italy. A Scotch reel, organized and led by Lady Alison, was one of the most picturesque and interesting features of the proceedings. All who took part in it, both ladies and gentlemen, were dressed in complete Highland costume, the music being performed by the pipers of the Black Watch, and the necessary space for the dance being kept by four stalwart sergeants of the same regiment. The Khedive watched the reel with the greatest interest, and personally congratulated Lady Alison upon the successful manner in which it had been performed.

The theatre was prettily decorated with crimson and gold cloth, and velvet and quantities of flowers, and was lighted partly by gas and partly by electricity. All the boxes, on the first tier, except that of the Khedive, were shut in with embroidered muslin screens, and were reserved for the ladies of the harem, who, themselves unseen, were thus enabled to witness, without taking an active part in, the festivities. The stage was arranged as a winter garden, and was profusely ornamented with exotic and greenhouse plants, the floor being covered with Persian, Syrian, and Turkish carpets, lent for the occasion. Altogether the ball was a complete success, which must have been very gratifying to Lady Dufferin, who had taken so kind an interest in it, and had done so much to secure so satisfactory a result. I do not know the exact amount realised, but it was estimated at the time that it would be possible to hand over something like £1,500 to the Alexandria Relief Fund Committee.

The following day (Friday, March 2nd) we witnessed a parade of General Graham's brigade, consisting of the three Highland regiments now in Cairo, and the 60th Rifles, in the square in front of the Abdeen Palace, and in the afternoon, after paying and receiving several farewell visits, we took the train to Alexandria, where we arrived and embarked on board the Sundermat eleven o'clock.

The attractions of the yacht, after our long absence, being so great, we were none of us in a hurry to start, in the afternoon of the following day, for the pleasant expedition to Ramleh, which Colonel John had kindly planned for us. Captain Fitzroy met us on shore, and we drove along the usual jolting Egyptian road to what was once the Khedive's palace at Ramleh, but now serves as barracks for the 42nd Regiment, the harem having been converted into a hospital for the use of the British troops stationed in Alexandria, who are not very numerous now. The General and Colonel John had kindly lent us some horses, so that we were all able to ride on reaching Ramleh. Our first step was to inspect the hospital in the old harem. I should think that sick English soldiers have rarely found themselves in such good quarters before. The rooms are large and lofty, and are better arranged, and not so cold as those at the Citadel Hospital in Cairo. All the patients, of whom there were a good many, were more or less convalescent, and looked bright and cheerful. The hospital faces the sea, and enjoys a delightful breeze and a great deal of sunshine. The patients have a nice long verandah to sit in or walk about on, and long covered passages in which to take exercise on wet days.

We had a very pleasant ride round Ramleh, which I had no idea was so large a place, or contained so many houses and pretty gardens, but they are just popped down anywhere in the sand, without any system or settled plan, and the absence of roads, by which to get from one villa to another, is a conspicuous feature of the place. A single line of railway runs right through the middle of the town, which is about two miles long. Most of the merchants in Alexandria live here, and even travel back and forth to breakfast at midday. Trains run every half hour in either direction, dropping the passengers almost at their own doors. Such a long, straggling, unprotected place, so easy to loot, I never saw. Situated as it is on the edge of the desert, I wonder the Bedouins did not take even greater advantage of the opportunities for pillage and murder than was actually the case. As a rule, people who stayed boldly in their houses lost nothing, while those who deserted them were robbed of everything. We saw the spots where the Guards, 46th, and other regiments were encamped, and were enabled to understand many of the incidents of the war, of which we had read at the time with interest, but also without thorough comprehension. It was not difficult to perceive, for instance, how young Du Chail had unconsciously wandered into the enemy's lines, by following the Damietta branch of the railway, instead of keeping straight along the main line, according to his instructions. Perhaps it may not have been quite clearly explained to him that the Ramleh railroad turns off a little to the left, while that to Damietta slightly inclines to the right. We had tea at the 46th mess in Ramleh palace, and I could not help thinking of the poor Vice Reine, and the questions she had asked me about Ramleh, and her horror at the idea of returning to it. She appeared to consider that she and her friends might all easily have been taken off in boats, and thus have been saved that terrible drive to Ras el un, which seems to have been the crowning misery to them all overlooking, however, the important point that her husband had refused to go on board the English ships for fear of being accused of deserting his country, that the soil was breaking heavily on the shallow shore, and that any boats attempting to land would have been exposed to the fire of the forts, and would probably have been destroyed.

Sunday, March 4th.—It was so delightful sitting on deck, that we all felt reluctant to start on our proposed expedition to the Meks forts, which Captain Fitzroy had kindly promised to show us. A sense of duty, however, ultimately prevailed over inclination. It would have been scarcely safe to go otherwise than in a large party among the Arabs and Bedouins, who are still very wild and turbulent. We drove through the town, past the Mosque and race-course, and the grandstand, where Lord Napier had distributed the medals to the 18th Royal Irish regiment, and then, by the worst and shakiest of shaly roads, through a few cultivated fields into the open desert traversed by a single line of rails running to the Meks quai, from which the stone used in the construction of the breakwater, forts and most of the modern buildings in Alexandria was obtained. The first fort we visited was originally constructed to protect Alexandria from the Bedouins, and to command the causeway leading away to the desert towards Tripoli. One of the guns is still lying on its back as it captured when Doctor Russell saw it fired at some Arabs on the causeway. Another was still pointed at one of the three forts, exactly at the end of the causeway, some of the officers who were with us tried to raise the breach piece, and an Arab brought a rammer to assist in the operation but fortunately they desisted on being told by Captain Lister that the gun was still loaded. Only a short stretch of desert intervenes between this fort and the next, which was terribly knocked to pieces and over the door of which are visible the effects of what is called the "Parson's Shot," it being reported that, during the bombardment a chaplain on board one of our men of war obtained permission to try a gun and did so with such good effect that the door of the fort was blown in. The real fort Meks—close to the edge of the sea—was in even worse condition, the walls, roofs, casemate and magazine having been penetrated by shot and shell in every direction. The water-tank in the centre was completely riddled, and one could not help thinking sadly of the sufferings from thirst that must have been endured by many of the poor wounded soldiers, lying under the burning rays of the Egyptian summer sun. The ground here was at one time covered with pointed Nordenfeldt bullets but as the price of these in Alexandria rose to ten shillings a piece after the war, the Arabs naturally collected all they could find, and these are therefore none to be seen now. On the other hand, there are plenty of large pieces of shell, and of whole shells that have not exploded, the number of the latter being somewhat remarkable. One of these was found after the bombardment on the top of a magazine containing three hundred and fifty tons of powder. If that had exploded, it is said that not one stone of Alexandria would have been left standing on another. The magazines of each fort were well stored with shot and shell of the most modern and approved kind.

We drove back by a road on the other side of the railway, scarcely better than the one by which we arrived, passing many Arabs with camels, and flocks, and herds, while here and there, close beside us lay shot and shell resting on the sand, as evidence of the former strife.

Monday, March 5th—At eleven o'clock we went on board the Mahroussa, the Khedive's yacht, which I had often seen before. The Captain, Hassan Bey, politely sent his second in command round with us, and offered us the usual coffee, cigarettes, and sherbet, besides ordering the band of forty performers to play for our edification. It must be fearfully expensive to keep up this yacht for so little purpose, and to maintain on board a crew of 350 men, and I do not know how many officers.

Notwithstanding the regret that we all felt at having to break up our pleasant little party of the last few days, and the fact that all our boxes were packed and that it was really to be our last night on board the yacht for some months to come, we contrived to spend a very cheery evening though sad thoughts would obtrude themselves at intervals.

The next morning (Tuesday, March 6th) we embarked on board the Messageries steamer Said and after a somewhat rough passage, arrived on the following Monday at Marseilles, and thence proceeded overland to London.

Read Psalm v and John v 33-v 41

THERE are speculative difficulties regarding prayer which would require volumes for their adequate treatment. It is best therefore, not ■ state them at length in a brief paper which ■ intended for practical help to those who believe in prayer. It may, however, be said, in passing, that the objections to prayer are of a kind which, if granted, only lead to still greater difficulties. Indeed there are few questions in natural or revealed religion which, if pushed to their ultimate conclusions, do not encounter some contradiction arising from an opposite line of reasoning. Thus the freedom of the will seems opposed to the sovereignty of God, the existence of evil appears to contradict His omnipotence and goodness, and the promises connected with prayer in like manner, apparently run counter to the conception of Him who knows all our wants without our telling them, and of that fixed order of the universe which cannot be affected by our supplications. But these seeming contradictions probably arise from our ignorance of the meeting point, where they are harmonized in a higher unity. Standing on one side of the circumference we imagine that the radius we perceive going ■ a certain direction must be opposed by that which comes from the other side. But our mistake arises from failure to see the great centre where they are all combined, and that through that combination of apparent opposites the vast circle of the universe is rendered harmonious and strong. With our present partial knowledge, what are we that we dare assert that either truth must ■ false because we cannot unite them in our petty reasoning? We know that we have freedom of choice, and we know that the Lord bringeth the counsel of His will to pass. We know that He understands all our wants before there ■ a word upon our tongue, and governs the universe by law and not by caprice, and we also know that "He is the hearer and answerer of prayer." Let us, then, leave alone the questions we cannot, with our present light, fully answer, and take the attitude of children towards our Heavenly Father, believing at once in His knowledge, love, and power, and that

He makes many of His highest blessings dependent on our asking them from Him.

To the believer in Christ the best answer to all such doubts is the example and teaching of the Master. There is not much told us in the Gospels of what we might term the private life of Christ and of those habits which were strictly personal. But His habit of prayer is an exception. We have repeated illusions to this, and to the many seasons He spent alone with the Father. ■ was ' while He was praying ' that the Holy Ghost descended at His baptism and His last word on the cross was a prayer. In the midst of the busiest hours of ministerial activity He used continually to retire to some quiet mountain or to the solitude of the desert for the refreshment of prayer. ' He went into a solitary place and there prayed,' ' He departed into a mountain to pray,' "as He was alone praying, are the notices which ever and anon occur in the narrative. We read of how He used thus to spend sometimes the whole night on the quiet summit of Olivet. And what temple could compare with that still oratory? It was once our privilege to pass a night there alone beneath the stars, and we can never forget the impression we then received. The paschal moon floated through the passing clouds as ■ had done on that other paschal week when Christ suffered, and when He had sought such a solitude as this to be alone with God. As light after light went out in the Holy City which lay beneath us, and ■ the sounds of busy life became still, we could without effort imagine the time when He had knelt there in prayer, gazed down on all those scenes which were so soon to be identified with His passion—Gethsemane, the house of Pilate, and Calvary—and where He "offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears." The intervening centuries seemed for the moment obliterated, and in the changeless quiet of earth and sky we almost beheld Him there, our great High Priest, kneeling in that Holy ■ Holies beneath the open heaven. We could also realize the beauty of the connection, when beholding the grandeur of the dawn as it flashed from the east and poured its splendour on the grey walls of Jerusalem, we read how, after the night of prayer on Olivet, Christ entered the Temple, and as the glory of the morning flashed on the marble pavements and gilded rafters, He said, "I am the light of the world, he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but have the light of life." The communion with God on the Mount, and thus light of God in the crowded Temple, went at one. It was the harmony of the peace of prayer with the purity and power of active life.

There never was a time when the influence of solitude and of private prayer was more needed than in this busy age, when "every hour must sweat its sixty minutes to the death," and when the noises of earth are so sure to absorb us, except we study to be ever and anon alone with God. In one sense, "to labour is to pray," for all work done unto God is worship. But such work is possible only when the motives are kept pure and fresh through the realisation of the divine Presence. If the stream of activity is to be preserved deep and constant it must be fed from the still lake of meditative devotion far removed from the din of worldly traffic, and holding in its surface the reflection of the wide heaven, whose glory it calms itself to contemplate.

Read Psalm 133:1-6

Prayer is the most sublime act in which any creature can be engaged, for he who prays truly, speaks to God. Any one who may have lifted his heart during this Lord's day in supplication can say, "I have thus truly been speaking to Almighty God." No subject, therefore, can be more useful than to consider how we may be taught to pray, and there are few things which ought to startle us more than the emptiness and aimlessness of a terribly large proportion of our prayers.

St. Peter gives a suggestive warning when he alludes to causes which may hinder prayer. "That your prayers," he says, "be not hindered, or 'cut off,' like an arrow which does not reach the mark. Many people, indeed, pray without expecting any other result than this inefficacious aimlessness. They regard prayers as 'a religious duty,' which takes end with its performance, and without ever thinking of any answer being possible. And yet how strange is such an attitude when we recall the greatness of the promises attached to true prayer, or the spirit in which the saints of God, the prophets and apostles, offered their prayers! Our prayers are, indeed, 'cut off,' as St. Peter says, from their true issue and purpose, and we may well ask whether this does not arise from "hindrances" created by ourselves.

1. The hindrance may lie in the spirit in which our prayers are offered. That we should never think of any answer being given to our prayers reveals the outset both in sincerity and unbelief. Our Lord says, "All things whatsoever ye ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." And St. John writes "If we know that He hear us," etc. if we are realising how God is listening to us, and ready to answer us, "we know that we have the petitions we desired of Him." The book of Psalms, which is a book of prayers, shows us the attitude of mind in which its writers uttered their supplications—"I wait for God, my soul doth wait, my hope is in His word." "In the morning will I direct my prayer unto Thee and will look up!" And so we find that they had constantly to record how He "had heard their voice and their supplication." These men were in earnest, and so their prayers were real prayers. But when there is the dead weight of unbelief we cannot expect an answer. The man who brought his demoniac child to Christ with doubt lurking in his appeal received a rebuke. "Lord, if thou canst, have mercy on us and heal my son." "Canst thou believe?" was the reply of Christ. As if He said, "The difficulty is not in me but in your own heart." The spirit in which he came thus hindered the prayer.

But not only do we often pray without expecting an answer, but, what is worse, we often pray without even wishing it. How often do people beseech God for the coming of His kingdom in power whether in their own hearts or in the world, when such a change is the very last thing they really desire! If men firmly believed in prayer being answered, how differently, perhaps how seldom, would they pray!

2. Again, our prayers may hinder themselves, by being for things which it is impossible for God to grant. Thus, to ask for the joy of God without seeking the God-like character, or for the rest and peace of Christ without the grace to take up His yoke and to learn His spirit, or for the sense of assurance without self-surrender—the will and love of God, is to beg for things which are not agreeable to His will. For as it is not the will of God that a man should enjoy a sense of health while he insists on keeping disease, so it is impossible for God to give the sweet experience of a pure conscience or the unspeakable joy of a heart filled with His love to any except those who are willing to

■ delivered from the evil of their ungodliness and to be led into sympathy with His own righteous and holy ways

3. There may also be hindrances to prayer arising from the character of our daily lives. It was in relation to this kind of hindrance that ■ Peter was writing when he spoke of prayer being "cut off." He therefore directs our attention to the sphere of common duty as presenting the chief difficulty ■ our receiving answers to prayer. And how true is this! We may in our better moments ask sincerely certain good things in prayer, but if, when we go back to our daily life, we make no attempt to realise what we have sought, but allow the evil conversation, or irritable temper, or selfish greed, or silly vanity to assert their dominion without a check, if there is no secret cry ■ God for help or any effort made to keep near Him in spirit, then we render our prayers so far ineffectual "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me." " whatsoever we ask we receive of Him because we keep His commandments and do those things that are pleasing in His sight." "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" We must make it possible for God ■ bless us. We can never abide in the light and peace of Christ without sharing His unflinching obedience to the will of the Father.

Read Daniel 12: 1-13 and John 11: 7-44

Among the many precepts and encouragements to prayer given by our Lord, He teaches us more than once the necessity for perseverance, confidence, and watchfulness.

(1.) In the parable of the friend at midnight seeking the loaves, and whose request was granted not because he was a friend but for his importunity, and in that other of the unjust judge who took up the cause of the poor widow, lest by her continual coming she should weary him, He put ■ in the strongest light the certainty with which God will hear our prayers if we are earnest. It ■ an argument from the lower to the higher. ■ importunity could gain so much from a man with whom friendship reckoned as nothing, or with a judge who was unjust and selfish, how much more will our loving Father hear the supplications of His children? The importunity is further illustrated by Him when He describes ■ as "asking," "seeking," "knocking"—each word suggesting increased anxiety and insistence in prayer.

And this importunity is but another term for earnestness. They who seek God with the intensity in which the helpless widow implored the judge to assist her, mean what they say, and with their whole hearts long for an answer. Their prayers cannot be formal. And this is in marked contrast ■ the manner in which we often make our requests. So little are we in earnest that we perhaps never give a thought afterwards to what we have been saying with our lips, and might be puzzled were He to question us, "What wouldest thou that I should do to thee?" If any beggar were to ask alms from us in a similarly careless spirit, repeating words of entreaty, but never waiting for any reply to his petition, we would at once regard him as an impostor.

(2.) Our Lord also teaches us confidence in prayer, and that very beautifully, when He says, "If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a scorpion? If ye, then, being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?" By thus appealing to the parental instinct which is in man He would make us realise the certainty of the care of God. He rebukes our doubt by the question "Do you think God worse than yourselves?" And the confidence which believes in our Heavenly Father being thus ready to bless us must also lead to confidence in His knowing best what are "the good things" which we require. There may ■ the greatest fatherly love in withholding from us what we ask in ignorance. Just as an earthly parent, because of his love, would not grant the request of the child who asked for a stone instead of bread, or for a serpent instead of fish, so God, who understands our necessities as we cannot understand them, may be giving the truest answer to our prayers when He refuses that which we ask in word. He may be granting us what our hearts really require, though the form of the answer, for a time, runs counter to our expectations. ■ was, thus, that Christ answered the prayer of her who said, "Grant that these my two sons may sit the one on Thy right hand and the other on the left in Thy kingdom." The prayer was in its form ignorant and foolish. But in its spirit, ■ was the expression of her earnest desire that her sons should be near Christ and share His glory. And that deeper desire He answered, though in a form widely different from her expectations. "Ye know not what ye ask. As ye abide ■ drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" Through the discipline of suffering and the education of their spirits they would be made partakers of the true glory of Christ, and be brought really near Him by fellowship with His experiences. This was an infinitely higher end than what she had dreamed of when she spoke of thrones and a kingdom. Afterwards she and her sons would understand it, and could thank Him that it was in His way not theirs, in the spirit of the prayer and not in the letter, that He granted the request once made in ignorance.

Lord Princes and St. Matt xxv. 30-45

Besides earnestness and confidence in prayer, our Lord frequently enforces the necessity of watchfulness, and He never did so with greater impressiveness than when He rose from Gethsemane and reproved the disciples, who, overcome by the weakness of the flesh, had fallen asleep at the very time when He needed most their sympathy. We can understand somewhat of the reason for His wish that they should have watched with Him in His agony. There are some sorrows which we cannot share with others, and which must be borne by ourselves alone, yet we know that there is unspeakable comfort in having near us even then those who love us, and who, if they can do no more, can, at least, watch with us. That Christ intensely craved for the sympathetic presence of His disciples is seen in the manner in which He went thrice to them. And how tender, and yet how faithful, was Christ's remonstrance with them when they failed in duty! "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation, the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak."

It is often said that our Lord in His great pity had framed an excuse for His disciples when He blamed the weakness of the flesh. Nay, that "the flesh is weak" is sometimes pleaded as an apology for worse faults than carelessness in prayer. But the weakness of the flesh is really not offered as an excuse by Christ. He does not say, "Because the flesh is weak I cannot blame you," but He teaches them that as a willing spirit is insufficient and the flesh weak they ought to have watched and prayed. So far from palliating the fault, He shows its source in the weakness of the flesh, and the remedy in earnestness, watchfulness, and prayer.

And there is something particularly tender as well as just in this. He would have utterly crushed the disciples if He had blamed them for want of love or loyalty. But He does full justice to their willingness, while He with perfect truthfulness corrects their fault.

Now this teaching is full of practical importance to us in many situations, when it is well for us to recognise the true source of our weakness and the remedy for it, lest we do injustice to ourselves, become discouraged, and so fail to obtain the victory over our faults.

1. In reading God's word or in private prayer we may often be shocked that even when we are most willing in spirit and anxious to get good, we discover our hearts filled in a minute or two with other interests and our thoughts scattered to the ends of the earth. Sometimes we are startled in the midst of our prayers by the humbling sense of frivolity and wandering of mind. The willing spirit has for that hour failed us, and it is strange if we are not tempted to blame other than the true cause for such failure. We may, perhaps, say that "there is no use in us trying to pray or to be religious," and fancy ourselves thereby excused. Or we may even go farther and imagine that there is some mysterious barrier between us and our God, that we would be His children, but that He will not have us.

2. Again there are seasons of affliction when the spirit is indeed willing but the flesh weak, and when, in spite of ourselves, natural affection turns us ever away from meek submission to the will of God into irrepressible longings for the lost. We feel as rebels rather than children. It is well if at such times we recognise the true source of the trial in the weakness of the flesh.

3. Still further—there are those who from constitutional temperament or bodily illness are much more liable than others to certain temptations. One has a tendency to despondency, which no reasoning can prevent; another is nervous and irritable, and thereby betrayed into inconsistencies which mar all peace; another is impulsive and full of instability. There are also trials to which old age is peculiarly open, and the increasing weakness of memory, the incapacity for fixed attention, and the failure of the powers often lead to great unhappiness and discouragement. The spirit may be willing but the flesh is weak. Such persons ought clearly to recognise the true source of their difficulties as being physical not spiritual, and ought the more earnestly to lay to heart our Lord's exhortation, "Watch and pray lest ye fall into temptation."

A very little carefulness would in all probability have prevented the disciples from falling asleep when Christ asked them to watch. Even so slight a matter as a change of position might have been enough. And ■ is marvellous how many ■ the evils I have alluded ■ as having their origin in the weakness of the flesh, may be avoided by the exercise of similar care regarding practical details.

We complain, for example, of wandering of thought in prayer. And yet how much might be accomplished by watchfulness in regard to such matters as taking the hour for prayer when we are freshest by studied reverence and attention when we approach Him, by using every means to preserve fixedness of thought, such as that of repeating audibly the words we use, or employing the aid of forms of prayer. What an example of effort is given us by Christ Himself! "Being in an agony, He prayed the more earnestly" that flesh was surely "weak" whose sweat was as great drops of blood. And yet there was no yielding, but the closer wrestling, until He arose in the calm of victory. The precise thing He thus prayed for was not indeed granted even to Him. "The cup" did not "pass from Him." But He received the grander gift of impregnable peace in the drinking of it. And so, too, when we feel the difficulties of prayer, let us pray the more earnestly—"Watching" while we pray. "In everything, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let us make our requests known unto God," and then, whether we get the very things we ask or not, we have this promise, "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, will keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."

A similar watchfulness over natural temperament—by avoiding those scenes and circumstances which tend to excite us, by guarding against any overtaxing of the mental and physical powers, and by attention to bodily health—would prevent many a spiritual failure. I am certain that not a few sad pages in what are called religious biographies would never have been written, and that many a bitter and discouraging experience in the lives of sincere Christians would never occur, if there had been only a wiser recognition of the weak flesh and greater common sense displayed in attending to such common details as we have alluded to. We must "watch" therefore in other matters as well as prayer, if we hope to gain real victories over self and sin.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

A Modern Romance

BY SARAH TYTLER, AUTHOR OF "CITROVINE JACQUELINE," "LADY BEIL," ETC

CHAPTER XXXI.—SHIFTING THE SCENES.

[RIS had gone to the Rectory, where she had sometimes taken refuge before when made to understand that her presence was not desired, in some specially troubled state of the Lambford atmosphere. She was always welcome, without a word asked, ■ the Rectory. ■ was a crowded, well worn house, where even necessary expenses had to be paid down, but a place for her had never been wanting. The Rector did consider her a pet lamb of his flock, though he was occasionally a little theatrical in implying the relation between them. There was no insincerity in his stagnancy. He was only somewhat flourishing and flowery in speech and action, by nature, which caused him to be one of the most popular preachers within a considerable area. Lucy was quite proud of his eloquence. ■ had a different effect on Ludovic, who could not escape the suspicion that his father was apt to be gran-diloquent, and that his pathos savoured now and then of bathos. He knit his brows sometimes—a strange exertion for King Lud when he was at home—and wished the governor could be curter and simpler in his speech. The Rector's loquacity helped to seal his son's lips—at the same time the young fellow knew his father too well not to be sensible, to his own great comfort, that his senior was single minded and whole-hearted in all the rhetoric he indulged in. Harassed little Mrs. Acton, born an anxious woman, and married on a small income, with a large family over which to spread the scanty supply, had no time, as she frequently said half-plaintively, half peevishly, for speechifying, but she still honoured and admired her husband for doing both what she could and could not do, and kept a corner in her crowded heart and mind for one who had grown up like a child of the family. This fact was not seriously impaired by the circumstance that Mrs. Acton—always under the necessity of looking at the pounds, shillings, and pence side of the question—had permitted certain worldly considerations to come in, where her regard for this only child of hers was concerned. Mrs. might prove a boon to her adopted brothers and sisters. Her antecedents were not all that could be desired. Lord and Lady Fermor had been a trial and care to the Rector throughout his incumbency, but they were a peer and peeress all the same, and Miss Compton, their granddaughter, would inherit a considerable fortune. No doubt she would marry suitably, whether her heart might or might not incline eventually to a distinguished naval officer, with whom she had been on intimate terms from childhood. Her early and constant association with the family of a clergyman, and a clergyman so much respected and admired as Mr. Acton was, afforded ample assurance that she had escaped any injury from having been brought up by her poor old grandmother and grandfather. It was not possible that Mrs. Compton could ever forget what she had owed to the Actons, or lose sight of the boys and girls of the Rectory, in after life.

Ludovic was thankful to get another and more disengaged lady to play his accompaniments. Lucy hailed gladly the advent of her friend, and could count on her sincere opinion with regard to the progress of the choir, and her interest and help in all the work of the parish which could fall to a clergywoman, in the little rubs with the curates, and in the Acton children's lessons.

Mrs., whose life was in the shade, would have sunned herself, as she had done formerly, in the light of such a welcome. Her spirits would have risen. She would have become the life of the Rectory while her visit lasted. But she had received a shock, and the news travelling fast had already reached the Rectory, and was disturbing it too, in a milder degree. There would have been some doubt and delicacy in discussing the topic of the hour before Mrs. Compton, if Lucy had not felt herself bound to come forward before her friend's arrival, and explain that Sir William's deplorable marriage could be nothing to Mrs., nothing in the world. Lucy just kept within the bounds of confidence in solemnly assuring her listeners, that she knew for certain that Mrs. would never have listened to Sir William Thwaite, whom, no doubt, Lady Fermor had favoured, though there had not been such a person as Honor Smith, or though she had never crossed the gentleman's path and he had stood firm, instead of tumbling headlong from the eminence to which he had been raised.

Thus Mrs. heard the general sentiment expressed, with no more reservation than was likely to be used in any of the country houses round. Everybody was holding up his or her hands for the moment, and crying, with Lady Thwaite, that misalliances were in the blood—as if family traits, like the best-regulated comets, were bound to return at stated intervals. The regret was general that the fellow had ever been taken up in the fashion he had been, though coming events neither did nor could cast their shadows before.

Mrs. Acton lamented the loss of Whitehills from a visiting list, which was inevitably short, for girls who could not go much from home, and yet ought to see a little society. She did not even think she could call there with her subscription-book, if the new Lady Thwaite proved the dreadful woman she was represented to be.

The Rector declared it was a highly unsuitable marriage, which did not recommend itself to him in any light. He had trusted that Sir William Thwaite was assuming his ancestral responsibilities, and preparing to discharge the obligations of his rank and position in a manner becoming him—well, he could not say his birth and education, but he might put it—with some regard to the influence of his wealth and rank in the county. Instead, there was this utterly unbecoming, rash, ill-omened step, which was calculated to bring contempt on his order, and at the same time to heighten, rather than to decrease, class antagonism.

"I am rather sorry for the poor beggar," said King Lud standing up for the assailed man, "though I do not believe he has any soul for music. You remember I could not agree with you on his waltzing, Miss Compton? Possibly the coming Lady Thwaite has never seen him waltz. I consider the loss is mutual—indeed, rather the greater on her side. She seems to be game all through—a splendid wife for the last of the great travellers, or the settler on the remotest verge of civilisation—she will be more lost at Whitehills than he can be, though he should fall back into his set."

"Don't talk nonsense, my dear boy," insisted Lucy. "He must be a horrible man to have known anything better, and then to select a wild woman, a heathen, for his wife. I don't suppose she was ever so much as taught her church catechism. I know both papa and Mr. Venables were refused admittance to the cottage at Hawley Scrub—at least they could never find anybody at home when they called, could you, papa?"

When Lucy was alone with her friend, then Lucy caught Iris's hands. "It seems almost wrong to congratulate you on the dreadful folly of another person, but oh, I do, my dear, I do wish you joy of such a wonderful escape. I know you never looked at him or thought of him for a second in such a light. Who has such good reason to know that as I? Iris, it is like a special interposition of Providence on your behalf."

Iris drew back with a little shiver, and grew very pale. What if it had been no special Providence, but simply her doing? His words were ringing in her ears—that she had sent him away from her with seven devils, instead of one, to bear him company.

Lucy entirely misinterpreted Iris's emotion. "It is hard for you at present, my love, for we all know Lady L'armor is rather a difficult person to deal with, but though old people do not like to be thwarted in what they have set their hearts upon, they soon forget, and she will speedily recognise that you have been very fortunate, and will be thankful for it in her own way."

"It is not that," said Iris, twisting and untwisting her slim fingers, "it is not grand manner, though of course I am very sorry for having vexed her. But what if I drove him to it? It seems a very vain thing for me to say," added Iris, blushing deeply, "but I believe he cared for me a great deal more than I deserve. He was terribly put out in the hay field."

"You could not help that, Iris," said Lucy promptly.

"No, but all of you, except perhaps your brother, speak of her as if she were some shameful creature whom you can hardly bring yourselves to mention. And I am afraid," continued Iris, with her eyes growing moist and her lips quivering, "when I first heard the story I did the same. I thought I was doubly distressed by being brought into association with such a woman as Honor Smith. She was only a little less despicable than he was, because she did not know any better, and it did not appear to signify what became of her."

"No, not that exactly," denied Lucy.

"I had forgotten the foul-smelling child, the warm-hearted girl who used to bring me from her wanderings in the woods and the downs, any thing she thought I might like, and was so pleased to have it to give to me," said Iris piteously. "Indeed, Lucy, though she has the misfortune not to be taught or confirmed—though she has not availed herself of the privilege of coming to church—though she is wild, she is not bad, apart from such lawlessness as her father and brothers may have taught her. Now what will become of her—of them both? Everybody will turn against them. She will be separated from the few friends of her own she has ever had, and if even ■■■ does not care for her, and they are both miserable, I am to blame for it all," cried Iris, with her hazel eyes opening wide and her lips falling apart in the extremity of her distress.

"My dear child, you are a great deal too tender-hearted and scrupulous," Lucy told her decidedly. "It is no business of yours, you ought only to be thankful for your own escape."

"But I was never in any danger," persisted Iris, "and I am only one rescued to two ruined."

"Such a one to such a pair!" Lucy exclaimed indignantly.

Iris's next words sounded as if they were in answer to the scornful objection, though she had neither heard nor heeded it. "There is something fine in him. He is not mercenary. He has stood by his promise to his friend to drink nothing save water, and she—she is not wholly bad. Oh! far from that, when one thinks how she has been brought up. She might have had the making of a grand woman in her. And who made any of us to differ, Lucy, that we should condemn instead of being sorry for them?"

"But they are not sorry for themselves, and it is their look out," protested Lucy with good-humoured impatience. "Leave them to take care of themselves and of each other. If there be any good in them—I confess it is not very conspicuous to me—there is no reason why it should not come out. My dear, forgive me for laughing and scolding you a little, but I am so happy on your account. Lud talked some nonsense about her being a splendid wife for a traveller or settler, but that is because men think it necessary to praise courage and daring wherever they meet them—even King Lud falls into the affection—while they don't hesitate to prefer timidity and humility in any woman with whom they themselves have to do. Who prevented Honor Smith from being taught and confirmed, and from coming to church? I am certain she had every opportunity, but she chose to be a heathen. I dare say she will continue so after she is Lady Thwaite—a fine example for his household! I don't know whether even the Bishop, dear old soul, could confirm her privately. Iris, how can you call her good?"

"Everybody who is confirmed and comes to church is not good," Iris defended herself.

"Certainly not, but at least they put themselves in the way of becoming better. The last time I heard you speak of Sir William, when I was over at Lambford, you never hinted at reserves of nobility and virtue in his character. Nobility and virtue in a man who, after the company he has kept for the last five or six months, sinks himself and destroys his usefulness for the rest of his days by marrying the daughter of his under-keeper—a girl like Honor Smith! Don't preach the reverse to me. The man must always have had low tastes, which is not at all to be wondered at, and he had never got quit of them—you may spare yourself your self-reproaches. Iris, I am surprised that you can find any pity to waste upon him. Take my advice and don't do it, dear, be wiser and harder-hearted, lest people, who do not know you, take it upon them to say you cared a little for him, and are disappointed by his horrid conduct."

"I don't think you quite understand, Lucy," said Iris, in a low, slightly hurt tone. She was not in a mood to mind what people said of her, but it pained her to find that her friend could not sympathise with her in her tenderest feelings. "It is not that I think he need have cared much or that I am any great loss."

"My darling, don't say that—I never thought so," Lucy interrupted her affectionately. "The loss of every hope of you might well be the greatest earthly loss, all but enough for a man to break his heart about. For you know papa does not consider—and I agree with him, that a Christian ought to break his heart, quite, about any merely earthly good. But then this man has shamed himself and shown that he was a world inferior to you, not capable of valuing you. I know you are not vain, the last girl in the world to be vain, but I think you exaggerate unconsciously here."

On the following day there was some calming down, except in one gentle heart and sensitive conscience, of the excitement over the great event of the week, which as far transcended the long talked of cotillon ball, or the Whitehills hay making, as a murder surpasses in grim interest a cricket-match or a flower-show. Lucy and Iris strolled together to a nook which they were pleased to call their own, in the overgrown Rectory shrubberies.

Iris was trying to enjoy, as she had been wont to do, a piece of work and a book with Lucy, feeling all the more bound to be happy, because hard working Lucy was making an hour and a half's leisure, on purpose to spend it in congenial pursuits with her friend. Only Iris could have got rid, on the first of the golden autumnal days, of that doleful burden of two lives wrecked inadvertently by her means. Lucy might tell her she was contented to think so, but Iris could not cast off the impression. Poor Sir William! Poor Honor! Looking at their marriage in every light, Iris could not believe that there was any chance of its turning out well.

While the girls sat and worked and read, with the undercurrent of troubled dreaming on one side, Lady Thwaite, the coming dowager, had called at the Rectory. It was a P.P.C. call. She wished to see the girls, and preferred going out to them, to having them sent for to come in to her. Mrs. Acton accompanied her, and the group stood for a few minutes, talking idle nothings among the box and laurel bushes.

Then there was a summons for Mrs. Acton to return to the house, and she made a sign to Lucy to accompany her. "Lady Thwaite has something to say to Iris, and we had better leave them to themselves, the little woman said somewhat fussily to her daughter, when they were a few paces off."

Lady Thwaite suddenly stopped the well bred nothings. "Do you know what I am going to do, Iris?" she inquired directly.

"No," said Iris, a little bewildered and alarmed. "I thought there was nothing that could be done. What can you do?"

"For him—nothing, but for myself, I hope, a good deal, answered the lady hastily. "I am starting to-morrow morning for Switzerland, where I shall pass the rest of the summer. In the autumn I shall either go to Italy or return as far as Paris, and spend the winter there."

"You have planned the trip since I saw you," remarked Iris awkwardly, not knowing very well what to say.

"Of course. Should you have liked to have gone with me? But you would have been dreadfully hurried in your preparations. Besides, there would have been no use in proposing it, for I am convinced Lady Fermor would never have given her consent. She has quarrelled with the whole world, including myself, on account of Sir William's insane behaviour. We are all alike in her black books, as if we would not—some of us at least—have done our very best to prevent the catastrophe."

All the time Lady Thwaite was speaking she was thinking of herself, "It is the nice thing to say to Mrs Compton, and I might have been glad of her company in a way. Her French has not got the time to rust that mine has had. But she has shown herself in unpractical girl. Above all, I might meet people who would know her name, and have heard of the Fermors. There might be revivals of scandal and unpleasant reminiscences. I have done my duty all my life, why am I to pay the penalty of other people's iniquities? She has been a fool for herself and others, and done a great deal of mischief all round, with her child's face and her goodness. I am not sure that she is not such an idiot as to repent, and, what is still worse, to show her repentance when it is too late, for she looks dreadfully distressed, and is changing colour every minute."

But Mrs had some spirit left. "Thank you, Lady Thwaite, I should not like to go from home just now, even though grand mamma wished it. It would seem as if I were running away, either from something I had done, or from something that was going to happen," she finished a little vaguely, but she held up her head, and there was a fine colour in her cheeks while she spoke.

"You are perfectly right. I am glad that you see it in that light," said Lady Thwaite approvingly. "The little gossip which mixes your name with the affair will soon die out. I wish the misfortune might end there."

"But is it not possible for everybody to live it down," said Mrs bravely. "Must you go, Lady Thwaite?"

"Yes, indeed. I have had a long trip to the Continent in my mind ever since Sir John's death. I was only once abroad, and that was for my honeymoon. But Sir John caught cold the second week, and was not able for sight-seeing, and could not be induced to believe that he would be comfortable or could get well till he was at Whitehills again. Oh, yes, I intended to go, but I did not imagine that I should be driven off in this fashion! How I wish that I had started at once for a change, and moved on as I felt inclined."

"But could you not help them," interposed Mrs anxiously, "Sir William and his wife? they will have nobody to stand by them. You are connected with him, you have influence in society."

"Mrs Compton, have you lost your senses? what can you mean?" protested Lady Thwaite indignantly. "It is bad enough to think of such a woman in my place. It is forcing me away from my home and my friends, but for you to suggest that I should countenance her!"

"I don't know why you all cry out so against her," burst from Mrs. "It is not fair, and it is merciless. If she is wild she is not faster in her rank than Lord Eastbury's family have glories in being in theirs. Maudie and Nanny Hollis have done as many things to make people stare, without a particle of the excuse that Honor Smith could plead. You have countenanced Sir William, yet one would have thought that harder to do."

"It was hard," said Lady Thwaite ruefully, "to acknowledge a rude lout in my husband's and boy's place, and to defer to him. But I did it, nobody could say I failed. Oh, Mrs, if you had played your part, how much harm and sorrow would have been spared!"

The reproach, however unmerited, fell in with Mrs's equally gratuitous compunction and stung her sharply, so sharply that it helped the inconsistency of human nature to assert itself proudly.

"How can you speak so to me, Lady Thwaite? was I this man's keeper? He was something to you, he could be nothing to me."

"Very well, Mrs, let us drop the subject," said Lady Thwaite, continuing it all the same, while she composed her ruffled plumes. "It is true I have no call to blame you, but neither should you be so foolish and childish as to suggest that I ought to adopt this ill-matched couple. The thing is not to be thought of for an instant. It would be improper—wrong. It was quite different in Sir William's case. He came here a single man and we might have made something of him amongst us all, we might have trimmed and polished him by judicious management. Don't put up your lip, you little goose," Lady Thwaite was provoked to add, though she was no longer out of temper, and was speaking more in sorrow dashed with playfulness, than in anger. "You will know some day that men have to be managed for their own good, as well as for a quiet life and an honourable position, where women are concerned. But if I were to attempt to take this Honor Smith up, it would be for no good either to her or any one else. A woman like her is beyond being subdued and cultivated. And for whom should I make the sacrifice—a Sir William, a distant, unacknowledged kinsman of my late husband, and his low born, ill-conditioned wife, with her doubtful reputation—however you may explain it away and defend her?" Lady Thwaite was silent once more, and then finished with a touch of natural pathos, "If it had been my boy grown to be a man, and I had negotiated his marriage like a proud mother who would not have counted the best match in the country, or the most beautiful, amiable girl, too good for her son, and if ■ had turned against me, against all his wisest advisers, though I cannot imagine it of Johnnie, supposing he had lived ■ become strong and grown a man, still, if he had chosen the worst instead of the best match, I might have tried ■ make the most of it and risked something, or even lost all for him. But that ■ a mother's heart, no other heart can be like a mother's."

Iris might have answered, none save the heart of that most perfect type of womanhood in which motherliness is the central human principle from the beginning ■ may be seen in the little girl who "mothers" in succession her doll, her kitten, her dog, her thoughtless schoolboy brother, her selfish grown-up sister, her exacting, unconscionable lover, her grumpy husband—until the long roll at last reaches her first bonnie baby. It may be seen in the aged woman whose last conscious thought is to give others pleasure and save them trouble. But Iris remained silent.

"I shall not see you for some time, my dear girl," said Lady Thwaite, in her most caressing tones. "I hope—nay, I have not the slightest doubt—that any little misunderstanding or difference of opinion we may have had will be entirely forgotten before then. In the meantime I shall look forward to our next meeting. We part friends, don't we, Iris?"

Iris clasped her hands and asked herself, "Why cannot I believe her? She blames me, ■ be sure, but even she does not refuse to admit that I was free to act as I chose. Lucy—everybody agrees in that, except grand-mamma, and I can make allowance for her liking for Sir William and her wish to get an establishment for me. Oh! I don't want an establishment, and it is most humiliating to have one sought out and planned for on my account. He did not think of things in that light. However unreasonable and unsuitable, he sought me for myself, and implored me ■ take him—not Whitehills. Has he got over it already? ■ that that he has done getting over it, or will worse come of it, with two ungovernable, reckless spirits in collision—not in union? Lady Thwaite fears it, and so she has taken herself away not to be tortured or shocked by the tragedy."

Iris set herself to brood on all the most horrible tragedies—the unhappy memories of which lingered in a remote, primitive county like Eastwich. There were disappointed lovers who had shot themselves, dying with the strain of their life-blood upon their hands. There were neglected, ill-used women who had sought the oblivion of strong drink, or worked themselves into frenzied madness under the contemplation of their wrongs. There were hapless little children who grew up uncared for and forlorn, bones of contention instead of links of love between their miserable fathers and mothers. And who was it that had first used the defence which Iris had made so glibly ■ Lady Thwaite? Cain, who slew his brother Abel. She must have dismissed Sir William, but could she not have done it so gently, with such humility instead of pride, with such sympathy and sorrow, that she would have retained him as her friend? She might have helped to win him to what was good and right, in place of sending him ■ his destruction.

One of poor Honor's grave offences, in the eyes of the Rectory especially, was that she had not been in the habit of coming to church. But Sir William had always marched there, taken his seat in the Whitehills pew, and joined in the service according to military usage. From the first day that the banns were published, he marched Honor to church in his company, on the ground that they would do nothing in the dark, and they were not ashamed of their purpose, which they were bringing to its legitimate issue. He did not ask her to sit with him in the Whitehills pew, he descended the gallery stairs, and sat by her in one of the humble free seats near the door, which she had been wont to occupy on the rare occasions when she had been seen at church.

He did not enter any protest against her dress, possibly ■ did not notice it in the pitch of furious reaction and defiance which he had reached, though he knew that she had refused all gifts from him till she was his wife. Thus she wore nothing better than the last rusty of her black gowns, with one of her gaudy coloured neckerchiefs, and the concession of a hat over her rough brown hair. In this guise she still appeared a handsome, striking looking woman, and there was no denying that the discharged soldier and the poaching scoundrel's daughter formed a comely, stalwart couple.

The sensation which the pair excited was beyond what would have been produced by the entrance of the Queen and every member of the royal family into the country church, though Eastwick was not behind other English shores in loyalty. The Rector had difficulty in keeping his place and countenance, and reading with his usual solemn dramatic effect. If Lady Fermor had been in her pew she would almost certainly have spoken out her disapproval, ■ the scandal of the community, but the old lady was absent, for which more than one person felt devoutly thankful.

Iris saw the two from the Rectory pew, and after one startled, wistful glance, in which she failed to meet the eye of either, a certain peace stole over her little face. They were all together in the house of God, they were equal in His sight. Would not He make everything right and bring good out of evil?

There was one person who ventured to greet the tabooed bride and bridegroom, from whom others separated themselves and scattered, as if the couple were uncanny, or carried about with them the seeds of a pestilence. The daring individual was, of all people, that modest fellow, King Lud. He went out of his way to intercept and address Sir William, a piece of attention which met with no encouragement from its object, and drew down censure upon the bestower.

"My dear Ludovic," Mrs Acton remonstrated with her son afterwards, "what could induce you to come prominently forward and speak to Sir William Thwaite to-day? You were not so intimate with him as to warrant that. It would have been no credit to you if you had been friends, but, I believe, you were on little more than speaking terms. This was such a conspicuous, unnecessary step on your part, my dear boy, and it looked—it really looked ■ if you were lending your countenance to a disgraceful proceeding which has grieved your father and me very much. ■ was affording a bad example on your part, also, Ludovic."

"My dear mother!"—Ludovic took the reprimand with perfect good humour—"I could not cut the fellow as I saw other people do, because he was going to marry any woman in the world he chose to marry. But before you allow your serenity to be disturbed remember I have no countenance to lend. I am a poor beggar of a naval lieutenant, a complete nobody, except in your partial estimation. And as to a bad example, I hope I may never supply a worse. I must say, if the governor has no more evil deed than this to cut him up, he is uncommonly well off, which, I am willing to add in the most filial spirit, he deserves to be. King Cophe-tua may still marry the beggar-maid, I hope."

Iris looked round at Ludovic Acton with eager pleasure, and she was so soft and kind to him for the next few days, that if ever there were danger of friendship passing into love this was the time.

Sir William Thwaite and Honor Smith were married, without more trouble, or without any demonstration of public dissatisfaction, on the day they had fixed. They went on no marriage tour, but repared to Whitehills, which was likely ■ afford them as entire retirement as they could desire or hope ■ procure elsewhere.

Iris Compton returned ■ Lambford about the same time. For some weeks her grandmother shunned her systematically, but, beyond the fact of the shunning, the only sign of Lady Fermor's displeasure was the angry light in her eyes and the snarling abruptness of her tones, when she was forced to speak to Iris. As the inevitable intercourse of daily life gradually relaxed Lady Fermor's avoidance of her grand-daughter, the old lady began to let out more of her feelings. But as yet it was no worse than the first scratches inflicted by the envenomed talons, and Iris had known so little of the soft pats of the velvet paws which frequently preceded such attacks, that she could bear them without outcry, only with a little inward moan.

CHAPTER XVIII.—A RUDE IDYL.

By the time the names had been read for the third time, and the marriage of Sir William Thwaite celebrated, September and St. Partridge's day had arrived, which proved a boon to the newly married couple, and a reprieve from that repenting at leisure which is apt to follow marrying in haste. The Thwaites were as solitary ■ any boycotted household in the wilds of Western Ireland, and no doubt considerably safer. The very household at Whitehills had shrunk in the blight of the alliance which its master had formed. Mrs Cray had fled from the first unmistakable tokens of the advent of such a mistress. Mr Cumberbatch, who knew a good place when he was in it, and had contracted a certain amount of attachment to Sir William, in spite ■ his water-drinking and the great difference between him and the Dean, lingered on till he heard his mistress allude to him as an old humbug and block-head, and was directly addressed by her with primitive playfulness as "White Choker" and "Shiny Boots." Freedom from control, much time to himself, and all sorts of perquisites could not atone for such gross liberties. So Cumberbatch departed also.

Bill Rogers, with considerable shyness and doubt as to his powers, was promoted to "wait" in the butler's place. Whatever blunders he committed, Sir William made no sign, and Lady Thwaite was satisfied. Bill did not care a straw about his own dignity, though Lady Thwaite would call him "Bill," as she called her husband. "Will," and stop him in his duties to recall some story of their old experience, or to tell him news of their common acquaintances. But however led on or laughed at by her, he never would forget her title, or speak to her as she spoke to him, and he persisted in behaving to Sir William with double respect and deference.

Sir William, like Mr. Burchell, blurted out an equivalent for "fudge" and turned away, half in restlessness, half in pain, but the young groom was staunch in maintaining his tender discretion and faithful devotion.

Those of the womankind who had not given in their "warnings" like a flock of sheep, after Mrs. Gray's great example, turned out sufficient for the contracting needs of the household. Lady Thwaite did not take much notice of them or interfere with them, and while they made a great many remarks upon her, she inspired them with a mixture of wonder and awe, not altogether unlike what might have happened if she had been a great lady.

Lady Honor Thwaite's first impression of Whitehills, seen near at hand and familiarly, was slightly disparaging, as was that of her husband when he was introduced to it by Mr. Mills. Not even the library shook Lady Thwaite's conviction. It was not true that she could neither read nor write, as had been said at the time of her marriage, but though she could spell through a line of print, and sign her name in rustic letters, BELLE'S LETTERS had not the smallest attraction for her. "What a great musty, poky hole! What an 'orrid' smell the leather of them books have! Why don't you turn 'em all out, and find room for 'em in the garret, or kindle a bonfire 'neath 'em, Will? I'm certain nobody will ever open them mouldy boards."

In the drawing room, which the Dowager Lady Thwaite had lately envied, which Lady Fernor had contemplated with pride as that new-fangled and of which Iris herself had owned the simple, stately charm, there was still in the new Lady Thwaite's mind the same surprised contempt, not unmarred with exultation over those better things that the Squire's wife had all ways enjoyed while she had been but the daughter of a disreputable keeper. "My sakes! it is the hemptiest, dingiest place I ever sold for a room in a great house! Is this what you call a fine drawing-room?" She pulled open the piano and banged the keys. "The birds in the scrub do a heap better than that without teaching or pay. She walked up to one of the Sir Joshua's. 'What queer washer-out madam is that, with a muck-sake fit for a child in her hand? She looks haythenish—she ain't dressed for her work!'"

"Would you like some new stuff of furniture, Honor?" asked her husband, only the more willing to humour her, because she had come to him at his bidding as she stood. "You know there's a balance at the banker's for us to get rid of."

"Oh, speaking for myself, I ain't pertickler about furniture, as you can tell, lad, and what with the keep of father and the gifts you have insisted on sending to Ted and young Abe, we'll make a hole in the balance. But I've been thinking if any of my friends, my mother's folk, have heard I'm a squire's lady, would care to come over, I'd not like to put them off with a fided shabby place like this here for a drawing-room. They would expect to see something tasty and bright and rich. A cart load or two of satins and velvets all the colours of the rainbow, might make a difference," considered Honor reflectively. For such ideas as she had were sumptuous.

"All right," acquiesced Sir William. "Write down or tell me what you want, and I'll send the list to the first upholsterer in Birkett or Caversham."

"Better say 'Lon'on when you're at it, and the man in the shop he can tell, a deal cleverer than me, what's like to be wanted. You'll just say fine furniture of all kinds for a seedy drawing room."

The roving order was given, and the transformation which Iris had once imagined as Sir William's doing, became an accomplished fact. The upholsterer, quick to take a hint, made a considerable clearance of the older-fashioned stupendous lacquer and gorgeousness, together with all the hideous fantastic and incongruity which were yet to be found in his shop. The fine, dainty old room at Whitehills became a brand new, more expensive, and meretricious copy of the drawing-room ■ Lambford. Sir William never put his foot in it if he could help it.

Lady Thwaite said this new state of things was more like the real article. But she did not really care for the grandeur she had evoked, and she could not put up with the trouble of inhabiting several rooms when one or at most two would serve her. She fell back on a dull morning room which had been converted into a smoking-room, where she said she and Will might be tolerably snug when they were by themselves and happened to be in the house. Bill Rogers might bring them their meals there without any to do when they wanted them.

At first Lady Thwaite changed her black gowns for something she held ■ be more in keeping with the station to which she had risen. Her choice of dress was not happier than her selection of furniture. Stuffs, patterns, dress makers were ■ fixed upon at haphazard, on no conceivable principle except that notion of sumptuousness which she had not been able to indulge hitherto, and the scrap of fondness for "a high light" in a bit of brilliant colour, which had already existed in Honor Smith's red, orange, and sky-blue neckerchiefs. Imposed upon here also by the specious vendors of the wares, with her gaudy finery ill put on, and so badly treated that she never wore a gown three days without looking a full blown shatter as well as an outrageous vulgarian, Lady Thwaite's dress offended even her husband's half dormant taste and eye. Fortunately she soon grew tired of her gay clothes also and found them highly inconvenient. She replaced them by adaptations of her old rusty black "frocks" in purples, bronze, brown, green, and slate colours, with the bright neckerchiefs in some silken stuff, as a relief to the prevailing sombreness of the attire. Thus clad she had the gratification to receive her husband's congratulations on looking more like her former self.

Old Abe occasionally invaded the honeymoon privacy of the young couple, but nobody else came, with one striking exception. Mrs. Hollis declared that she had visited so many squires' wives exactly alike that an entirely new variety ought to be refreshing, and ■ would be hard for her to miss the much wanted refreshment. The present Lady Thwaite might prove a great acquisition in this way, and might be trotted out with the utmost benefit ■ her neighbours. Mrs. Hollis assured "Peter," truly enough, that the young woman had not been a bad character, only a little wild according ■ her station in life. Luckily for the peace of one corner of Eastwich, the Thwaites were literally not at home when Mrs. Hollis left her own and her husband's card for them. In return she had a singular scrawl written by Lady Thwaite on her own responsibility. She was much beholden to Madam Hollis for her bits of pasteboard. In the meantime, during the shooting season, she and Sir William had not a moment to spare, but later on if they should ■ passing I horn brake they would look in.

Mrs. Hollis called the note delicious, showed ■ off to her Eastwich relations, and exhibited ■ generally, but nothing came of it. Sir William and his lady were never at leisure, or they never happened to be passing I horn brake.

One other visitor, a brave and gentle one in this case, would fain have entered the Whitehills gates again, held out the right hand of fellowship, and done what she could to bring order out of chaos. But Iris had no more power to refrain from abandoning the couple to their fate, than she had possessed power to use her hold on the gratitude of the girl Honor in order to win her to for sale "the broad way and the green."

That season's shooting at Whitehills was on the whole a prolonged, innocent, healthy, and happy saturnalia. Honor went out every day with her husband and brought down as many birds as he did, though he had shot bigger animals. Old Abe was almost always in attendance, full of solemn importance and cunning delight. Waterpark, like the other higher functionaries at Whitehills, had thrown up his commission in disgust. It was characteristic of Abe that though he boasted continually he was now free of every covert, water-meadow, turnip or stubble field on the property, in the right of his daughter, and could fire his gun where and when he chose, and dispose of the products as ■ liked, at his own table or in the game shops in the next town, he stole and snared and helped others to poach of nights as much as ever.

Bill Rogers completed the party. No additional men were wanted for the dogs, guns, or game bags. Abe and Honor knew the dogs, and could control them. Each "gun" carried his or her weapon and bag, seeking no relief, scouting the bare suggestion of it. Honor pelted her husband with ridicule when he proposed to carry her gun and bag, and it was with some difficulty that the wilful woman was kept from constituting herself a beast of burden to the whole party by slinging all their bags round her neck, and piling their guns on her shoulder, in order to parade the strength of which she was so proud. She had found or fancied that her battered straw hat interfered with her aim, and had replaced it sometimes by a cap of her husband's, sometimes by one of her gipsy handkerchiefs.

The whole party lunched, or rather dined, together afield, on the most free and easy terms, but for Bill Rogers, who would always be minding his manners. However, a meal à fresco is not like a meal within doors, and Sir William winced less often abroad than at home at words Lady Thwaite spoke and acts she committed. Here it seemed no more than natural that she should loll against a tree stem or by a hedge, and smoke her pipe with the others, for Honor possessed the accomplishment of smoking in its unvarnished form, unlike the fine ladies who nibble cigarettes and ape, in what they are pleased to consider a dainty fashion, the habits—not to say vices—of men. Poor Lady Thwaite was more honest, she smoked a short clay pipe coolly, in the frankest manner, exactly as men did for a physical solace after labour. The blue smoke curling from her full red lips and rising above her brown face, as she sat with her head flung back or resting on her hand, perfectly at her ease, did not seem so out of place when the green earth was around her, and the fleecy clouds just tempering the sun in its zenith overhead.

The little party pursued their game till night fall, and trudged home all but dead beat, still hale and cheery, content with their exploits hopeful of what to-morrow held in its lap. It did not matter much whether the weather were good or bad, to this hardy company that could face soaking wet and defy the elements with marvellous equanimity.

Seen at a little distance, Sir William's shooting party was unquestionably grotesque, and excited no end of sarcasm and laughter, yet it is doubtful whether any other shooting party in the neighbourhood got as much pleasure out of their more civilised sport, and had as good a time of it.

Sometimes Sir William and Lady Thwaite varied their occupation by a day's fishing, but here, though she was still more his equal and busked his flies and baited his line as well as her own, and softly stroked the water far more unweariedly, the close companionship proved less successful. The two were performing a duet, and the discordant notes, which would mar the harmony in the end, could be more plainly heard already. But it was Honor who fields with a passionate fondness which would last to the day of his death.

— Sir William to love his own woods and

It was an evil time for the husband and wife when even the last days of the pheasant shooting waned and the chill end of October gave place to a bleak November, which began with early black frosts that threatened to mar the prospects of the hunting field. At their best they were the Thwaites a poor substitute for the shooting. A meet and a run could hardly be conducted in a homely family fashion. There were 300 man farmers in the field, no doubt, but the mass of the riders were Sir William's fellow squires, who, though they had not objected to his subscription to the hunt, now showed generally as great a disposition to drop him, as they had ever displayed an inclination to take him up. Even if they had done other wise he would have resented their overtures, for he had passed from neutrality in politics to bitter radicalism. But it was not pleasant to encounter old acquaintances and be dismissed with compassionate nods, or to see them turn their heads in other directions.

Sir William could ride, but Lady Thwaite could not. She had never been on an animal more dignified than a donkey in her life. The redoubtable champion of Amazonian feats on foot among the beasts of the field and the birds of the air, the fine figure of a woman walking in her half-gipsy guise, was reduced to helplessness and sat like a sack of corn in the saddle. She was not too proud to conquer her deficiencies, she had courage enough to surmount any difficulty, but she showed herself too impatient to learn slowly and surely. After one or two premature extraordinary appearances in the hunting field, and "spills" which made the M. F. H.'s hair stand on end, Sir William withdrew on his own account, and induced Honor to absent herself from the diversion of the season.

Lady Thwaite detested driving. She took half-a-dozen trials of her carriage, and then said it made her sick. She had employed it in order to go to church in state. It served as a sorry excuse for abstaining, that she could not ride the distance. She went without saying that she could walk the distance half-a-dozen times any day, and would have indignantly rebutted the statement that she might suffer fatigue by the exertion.

With the falling leaves, the dank mists which are so conspicuous a feature of Fast week, and the shortening days, the newly wedded pair found their open-air resources largely gone, and were driven within doors. It was as if the wailing utterances of the prophet were sounding afresh, "The summer is past, the harvest is ended, and ye are not saved."

Long before his marriage had left him undone, Sir William had awakened from his fit of rage and despair, as he had awakened many a time from the madness of drink, to be sensible that Honor Smith was no wife for him. He knew that he had better cut off his right hand or pluck out his right eye than wed her, that such wedlock would certainly be his, probably her ruin.

But he had also said to himself that it was too late to repent, that he could not leave a woman who had trusted him in the lurch, that they must go on and take their chance, and God have mercy upon them both.

It was incredible at first, besides being extremely vexatious and humiliating to Sir William, to find that in so short a time he had acquired something of the tone of the class he had renounced and detested. He did his best to hide the unwished for acquisition and crush it out of him, but it rose from its ashes and forced him to own that, be his principles what they might, he could never be again what he had been, before he entered on his inebriate career, and moved for a brief space on terms of equality in more intelligent and cultivated circles. He might be a social outcast, doubly repudiated, but he could not return to his original obscurity and live and die the common working man he had started in life, with his great succession no better than a wild dream.

When Sir William went back to his books, to tide over the dull, dark, winter days, he tried to take Honor with him. He would read to her what she might care to hear, as he had read the racing calendar and the details of the last murder to old Lady Fernor.

But Honor could not abide books, whatever the subject. The very sight of print was disagreeable to her. She would not have listened even could Sir William have hit on registers recording the experience of mighty hunters and great sportsmen, or the nature-art of those word painters of the woods and fields, with their teeny life, in which she had lived. She cared for the things themselves, but not for the finest reflections of them. The bare obstacles of his measured voice, and a style of expression less homely than she had been accustomed to, would have been enough to deprive her of all sympathy with the reader.

Lady Thwaite could hardly work unless in the coarsest make-shift for sewing, and she hated such woman's work next to listening to sermons, with which she always confounded listening to reading.

She moped and wandered about restlessly and aimlessly, went constantly to her father's at Hawley Scrub, at the most ill-timed seasons, and took to visiting her mother's kindred at the Quarries to pass the time.

Sir William began by accommodating himself to his wife's wild habits, for a longer time than could have been looked for from him. He had never shirked acknowledging his father-in-law or even his connections by marriage at the Quarries. What had he been that he should treat the roughest fellows as his inferiors, or behave as if he were ashamed to be seen in their company? He went with Lady Thwaite both in broad day and under cloud of night, when the fancy took her, to Hawley Scrub. He showed no provocation, which was, doubtless, because he cared too little for his privileges, on seeing, as he could not fail to see, that old Abe's ways were unchanged. Lady Thwaite was more aggrieved than Sir William, and went so far as to rate her father soundly for trenching on "the rights of things." "These birds and hares are Will's and mine, father. You are welcome to a share—your share of them, but you ought to be content with that. It ain't serving us fair to make them public property, or to put them away on the sly to fill your pocket when you've everything you could wish and nought stunted to you, and Will do have come down handsome to the boys." At other times she took the matter as an excellent joke, and laughed long and loud at the contradiction. For Abe himself, he was always complacent, cunning, and a tittle cringing.

Neither did Sir William decline to accompany his wife to the Quarries, or to be present when the Quarry gossips, men and women, came to Whitehills, to join in the family meals, to marvel at the splendour of Honor's drawing-room, and to soil its flaunting finery with their hob-nailed boots and smutty or greasy fingers. Sir William had returned to the ranks of the people, and he must accept his natural associates. So far as they were concerned, any momentary sense of feeling abashed, by finding themselves among surroundings so different from their own, vanished rapidly before their engrained brainless stupidity.

■ was in connection with the Quarry folk that the smouldering discord in the situation took shape, and threatened to burst into a blaze. These natives of Eastwich were a specially uncouth, violent, debauched set of people. They had no modesty, else they would have held back a little even from Lady Thwaite's boisterous, lavish invitations, and Sir William's grave endorsement of the same. The Quarry men and women had no respect for themselves or for others, otherwise they would have let the master of the house alone in his peculiarities. He did not impose the restraint he put on himself on any of them. He did not even restrict the mistress of the house, when, knowing what her guests liked best, she caused ale and gin, rum and brandy to flow freely. The mirth grew fast and furious in consequence, the talkers shouted, quarrelled, and had occasionally to be dragged asunder, as they were about to close in hand-to-hand fights. Never had Whitehills beheld grosser scenes, even in the drunken days of the Restoration, or the rude revels of Mediæval times. But Sir William was well enough acquainted with such brawls, though he had never before known how brutal and sickening they could present themselves to a sane onlooker, who endured them while he sought to keep the peace.

Nevertheless the detachments of Quarry men were by no means satisfied with being left to follow their debased inclinations. They felt affronted with their host or guest, as it might be, spoiling all true fellowship by not affording a good example in drinking deeply and steadily. They were secretly enraged with the man and inclined to vow vengeance upon him, when with his conscience tormenting him and all the higher qualities he possessed reproaching him, he still doggedly indulged them ■ the top of their bent.

The women—the greatest gadders from house ■ house, the biggest scolds, the most ragged slatterns, and in self-defence, perhaps, the most frequent drunkards of all the working women far and near—turned, too, upon the man who, though he had a whole cellar full of drink at his disposal, was not enticing their men by his abuse of it to spend their children's bread ■ the alehouse. What business had Honor Smith with a husband who was not only a titled squire and had made her Lady Thwaite, but who could not take a glass like his neighbours? For a young unmarried woman, she had not been so far behind her matronly friends. ■ was not one glass or two either that would go to Honor's head; she need not try to make a fool of them by coming over them with a pretence of growing proper all of a sudden.

It would have been the last thought which would have entered Lady Thwaite's mind to pretend to be other than the wild reckless woman she was. She did not require the goading and taunting which met her on all sides from her coarse, stupid, envious cronies, to display herself in her worst colours, to defy all implied opposition, including her husband's.

If these riotous tempters had known it, they had a powerful ally in Lady Thwaite's breast. She was not dull as they were; she was not book-learned, but she had plenty of mother wit, as well as an overweening pride and a passionate temper. She had been accustomed, in the days which seemed far off now, when she had sprung up from a neglected little girl into a strong, capable woman, to be a person of importance in her family and circle. She had not thought often of Sir William's condescending to marry her. Since he had told her his story on the evening of the hay-making, her thought had been to stand by him and atone to him for the injustice which had been done to him. Her heart had grown soft to him; she had been very happy in those September and October days in the woods and fields.

But for that very reason Honor had been quick to detect the slightest sign of what she must regard as recantation and rue on his side. She had been galled by the faintest token of disapprobation and disappointment from her husband. In place of seeking to submit to his judgment and ■ suit herself to his tastes, she flourished her independence and opposition in his face and in the faces of her friends.

He remonstrated with a reservation, because he knew in his heart what she suspected, while the suspicion was driving her mad, that he had no true love and fond admiration for her, such as might have caused him to overlook her faults, or to win her from them, by patient devotion. Her conduct was offending and incensing him, and the more he grew offended and incensed the more contumacious and audacious she became.

The couple took ■ going their different ways—rather Sir William stalked and sat alone in his topsy-turvy, disorderly house of Whitehills, while Lady Thwaite roamed abroad and pursued her vagaries wherever the vagabond impulse of the moment drove her. The result was that she was from home at all hours, and was frequently to be found ■ any company to which he had an objection. When called in question for her behaviour, she either asserted her right to do as she chose, or made a feint of deceiving her husband.

But she did the last with so brazen a face and so carelessly, that it looked and sounded as if she either told falsehoods and cheated for the mere pleasure of the thing, or sought to put a fresh insult on Sir William.

The roar and surge of domestic discord rising and swelling filled the ears of the principals in the strife, even of the minor performers in the household contest, so that they could not distinguish the loud, vehement condemnation of the world without.

Old Abe remonstrated anxiously, "Lass, what are you about? Be you going to spoil your luck and waste your fine fortune? Is there an evil spirit in you? No man born will long stand the treatment you are giving he. I have seed a man take a stick or a poker to his wife, and break her head or go nigh to brim her, for a deal less."

"Never mind, father, Sir William will not break my head or brain me. I can take care of myself, and I'll do what I like. Maybe there is a devil in me—leastways I'll not stand his cold looks and sour fault-findings. Who axed him to leave the fine cattle he consorted with? Let him go back to them, if he will have them and their ways."

The crisis could not be long deferred, when a house only built the other day was already shaking to its sandy foundation.

CHAPTER XXIV—THE BEAST WALLOWS IN THE MIRE.

LADY THWAITE's last transgression had been to walk over to Hawley Scrub, before the wintry daybreak, to meet and warn a brother of the dead Hughie Guild, whom even the shuffling Abe did not countenance, and whom Sir William had been roused to threaten he would hunt out of his plantations and bring before the justices.

Hughie Guild had perished in his comparatively innocent youth, or he might have been the best of his race—anyhow the remaining Guilds were well known to be the worst livers in the parish, women as well as men of them were abandoned to shameless vice. ■ was only lately that Lady Thwaite had renewed her acquaintance with the Guilds, and Sir William had sworn she should not enter their house, or he would know what to do. Lady Thwaite, after she had got Zachary Guild out of danger, denied that she had been near the Guilds' house, and announced her intention of visiting her most intimate friend at the Quarries, where Sir William no longer offered to accompany her.

When there she was plied with jeers and sneers at Sir William as a pattern-card, a great hulking reformed water-drinker, and she was taunted with her subjection ■ him.

She defended him hotly for a time. "You are not to say ill of my man Sir William. He's a deal too good for you and the likes of you. You are not fit, the best of you, to hold a candle to him. He have come of gentle folks, and ■ was hand and glove with gentlefolks so long as he chose, but he liked his freedom and he liked me."

She did not care that anybody should blame him save herself, she only changed her tone when some persons hunted broadly that he must have altered his mind, and could not think very much of her after all. She was to be pitied, with a husband at once a squire, and not a roystering squire, but a nonsuch. Whatever their men were—poor quarrymen, never out of the ale house—at least they were no better than their wives, and could not indulge in despising them.

Honor cried out she was as good as Will Thwaite any day, she was no man's slave, and she began to drink and shout, gossip and sing snatches of songs. When she returned to Whitehills it was with an unsteady step, a blanching face, and clouded eyes.

Sir William sat waiting for her in the comfortable room, without the vestige of a woman's presence in it—not a bit of darning, or an ironing blanket, or a screen hung over with white clothes, such as had marked his sister Jen's home. He had discovered by this time that though Honor had not been at the Guilds' house, she had gone out at break of day to keep an appointment with the scoundrel Zachary Guild.

The husband was at his post in a white heat of fury, meaning to charge her with a violation of all duty to him, an utter disregard of his credit and her own. But the sight of her, ■ she stumbled into the room, gazed at him with half blank eyes, and broke into senseless laughter, stopped him. He stared at her in return with such a look of wild despair as to penetrate even her dazed faculties, then she made some foolish excuse and left him.

When Sir William Thwaite was by himself he clenched his fists and rose to his feet, quivering with passion. "It is all over," he said aloud, "peace and credit are both done for. I did not mean it when I said I would return to the ranks of working men, and when I married that woman I thought she was true as steel, and would help to keep me true to myself and her. But ■ have seen ■ coming, and now there is not a grain of hope left. If you were here, Jen, you would release me from my word, and pray to God to forgive me, for now, as I am a sinner and mated to a sinner, there is nought remaining to me but ■ drown care, and drink myself blind and deaf and dead to what I have made of my life."

He staggered to the door as if he were drunk already, went out into the darkness, walked to the nearest ale-house, which was shut up for the night, thundered at the door there till the amazed and alarmed landlord granted him admittance. Then, against law and gospel and Will Thwaite's word to his dead sister, he sat pouring out and emptying glass after glass of fiery spirits faster than he had ever done in his wild youth, till he was past thinking, past feeling.

Before the week was over the hue and cry rose that Sir William Thwaite, who had disappeared from church and market, was never out of one ale-house or another, that he was drinking himself into a lunatic asylum or the grave, in the lowest company, that he had become a common brawler, with whom the police would soon be compelled to interfere. This was what had come of his not being able ■ drink his glass of port like a Christian gentleman and squire. Many people had pointed out what such unbecoming extravagant abstinence portended, what had been its origin and what would be its end. It was but an interlude between a drunken scamp's fits of debauchery. After the low marriage he had tumbled into, what further chance was there of his keeping his pledge, or promise, or whatever it might be?

Lady Thwaite was subdued for a time. "What's come over you, Will?" she asked almost timidly, 'you who would not taste drink, to take to it all of a sudden, and like a fish. But you needn't ■ to them ale-houses and taverns where you are a marked man. Have your liquor here, where nobody has any right ■ forbid you, and you'll have nobody to quarrel with in your cups."

"What! you don't think I should quarrel with you, my lady, not though we were two at a trade?" ■ said savagely. "Ah, you don't know me yet. Besides, I prefer taking my speeces on my own account, and not at home. We have not pulled so well together of late that we should risk keeping company when wit ■ out. I am not come to the lowest pass that I should sit in my own house of Whitehills—the old Thwaite's house, confound them, and drink in company with my wife till we quarrel, and fight, and agree again like the vilest wretches in the barracks."

"It was only once Will" she said with strange humility for her. "Did you ever hear of me or know me as a drunken drab—am I like it?"

But he broke away from her, and she desisted from all further expostulation with him. Nay, in place of seeking to reclaim and ■ strain him, it appeared as if she were thenceforth set on goading him on and exasperating him to the utmost pitch. She pursued her own course not only without hesitation, she threw herself in his way, crossed his path, and defied him when he was more like a mad animal than a sane human creature.

But Sir William was not left altogether undefended and uncared for. Go when and where he liked, to ale house or tavern, when he stumbled out of it, he never failed ■ find one faithful friend, whether the miserable fellow knew it or not. Bill Rogers was a sober lad, though he could indulge at a time in a single glass or a couple of glasses, but nothing on earth would induce him to drink with his master. He turned away his eyes from Sir William's debasement. He never spoke of it voluntarily. When assailed with gibes and mockery, he said stoutly and loyally all that could be urged in defence of a lapsed sinner. Bill was constantly hovering shamefacedly in Sir William's neighbourhood, ready to offer him his servant's arm if the Squire would accept it, wary to follow and keep him in sight, if he waxed furious at being what he called tracked and spied upon, to prevent his slipping into pond or ditch, or lying down in the frost or the wet, on the withered or sodden grass, and dying a dog's death.

It was in vain that Sir William stormed and threatened, "Do you think I wish you to be ruined as fast and sure as myself, Bill? Ain't you a precious sight better chap than your master? Don't he know it to his cost? But he ain't such a selfish brute as to wish you to pay the piper, and to have your destruction to answer for, in addition to his own and that of a few more fools. Come along, Bill Rogers, and I'll stand you a treat. Well swallow something hot and strong. I'll tip you an old soldier's song, and we'll have a rare blow out, and make a night of it. No, you won't? Then I'll be hanged if you shall play the flying scout at my expense. I give you your leave, lad, from this day, with a month's wages. Who sends you on your dashed prying errands at my heels? Not Honor? Much right she has to meddle. Or is it somebody else whose name I'll never speak again with my polluted lips? She was No, no. That is false as the place I'm bound for. She was as innocent as the babe unborn, only she could not touch pitch and be defiled. It was I who was the beast I have always been."

One day about this time, Sir William was walking down the middle of Knotley High Street, as if challenging any man to say his gait was disorderly, and his dress slovenly, when he felt a clap on his shoulder.

"Hallo! Thwaite," cried the insolent voice of Major Pollock. "I hear you have come out of your shell, shipped your cable or your moorings, or what shall we call it? since I saw you last. My dear fellow, I like you a thousand times better for it. I have only one crow to pluck with you. Why will you descend to the gutter, and not go to the bad in good company—that of gentlemen like you—a hem! forefathers? I assure you that you would find it more agreeable, if you would only try us, and we should make you heartily welcome. Come to my den and have a game at billiards and a glass of beer or grog, if wine don't suit your stomach."

But Sir William shook him off. "I'll see you far enough first, Major Pollock. If I'm going to destruction, and I ain't the one to deny it, it shall be with humble folk, who are as low as I ever was, it shan't be for the entertainment and profit of them that calls themselves gentlemen. Whatever I am or may sink to, me and my mates don't care to earn a penny, with our tongues in our cheeks, from our neighbour's sin and shame."

There was another incident in Sir William Thwaite's history which belonged to this period. Parliament was dissolved, and a general election ensued, bringing political agents and men from a distance, to town and borough, to contest interests keenly, and canvass hotly for votes in houses which the visitors would not otherwise have entered. By one of those angular chances, which happen at least as frequently in real life as in novels, Will Thwaite's old commanding officer, Colonel Bell, who had returned from India, was nearly related to one of the candidates for the favour of this section of Eastwich, and came down with him to Knotley to help his cause.

In examining the lists of voters, the name of Sir William Thwaite, of Whitehills, soon turned up. Colonel Bell immediately recognised it, and, upon a few inquiries, found that the later career of the young man had been very much what might have been expected from certain early passages in his life.

the baronet in his chrysalis condition, and went on to admit that in fact, he was the colonel who had given Sir William Thwaite his discharge from her Majesty's service. But being the soul of honour, and a man who did not care to present himself in an undignified light, the gentleman kept to himself the offence and the impending punishment which had immediately preceded the discharge. The inevitable result of his reticence was that he found himself pressed to accompany the candidate, and use the officer's supposed influence with Sir William, who was understood to be indifferent to politics, to vote for the right man.

Colonel Bell yuckled against his judgment to the pressure put upon him, and drove in a carriage full of ardent electors, who would take no refusal, to Whitehills.

The visitors experienced more regret for the deterioration of the fine old place than for the degradation of the new squire. There were traces of changed days as the party drew near the house. Of course, Sir William's dissipation had been of a cheap and mean order compared with that of some of his predecessors. He had still an ample supply of ready money to squander and work mischief with, none of the grand old trees had been felled, the park had not been used for grazing purposes, and sufficient time had not elapsed for very conspicuous signs of downfall in other respects. No gate was off its hinges, no fence was full of holes, no path positively overgrown. But the exquisite dainty trimness of an English gentleman's place, which had been conspicuous in the late Sir John's day, was wanting. Weeds were cropping up, borders left ragged, branches broken and untrimmed. Some cottages which the young squire had begun to build, in which he had taken an interest, stood half built, as the masons had left them on the first of the winter frosts. In the meantime the builder had come to grief, and failed to fulfil his contract. But no fresh contract had been entered into, and the uncompleted houses, like unfulfilled promises, appealed mournfully to the passer by. There had been an old fashioned lamp, since the days of links and their extinguishers, which, though seldom used, was left to hang in its place above the principal gate it was supposed to grace. Its thick, dim glass had been smashed recently, and remained in a few jagged fragments in the metal framework. A baker's van, which ought to have been taken round to the back of the house, had boldly driven up to the front entrance and stopped the way, as if there were no chance of a dispute with a vehicle of higher estate. The thin wedge of neglect and aggression was introduced, and the rest would follow, until the house became as great a wreck as its master.

Lady Thwaite was broad, ■ usual, and, if she returned in time, did not show her face amidst the tawdry splendour of her drawing room.

Colonel Bell did not think the haggard-faced man in the rumpled, mud bespattered clothes, in which he might have slept for a week, who reluctantly came in answer to their summons, was an improvement on his young sergeant. The latter, in spite of his fits of excess, had been wont ■ turn out on parade scrupulously neat and smart, as became a gallant soldier.

"How are you, Thwaite? You see I have looked you up when I am in the country," stammered Colonel Bell a little nervously. "I have come to ask a favour from you in renewing our acquaintance. Will you, if you have no objection, lend your support to my friend on the hustings and at the polling booth next week?"

Sir William did not take the hand held out. He stood still, and glared with his blood shot eyes at the speaker.

"It wasn't I who ever asked any favour of you, Colonel Bell, that you should seek a return from me," he said in a thick, altered voice. "You have forgotten, sir, or your wits are wool gathering. It was my poor sister Jen. Do you remember her, or was she too humble a lot to stick in your memory? I was told that she went down on her marrow bones to you, though she was a proud woman in her way, was Jen, if you had knowed it, but you pushed her away, and said discipline could not be set aside, not though a woman's heart were to break—as hers was broken by that date—or a young rascal ■ doomed to the gallows, since there was nothing else he could hope for after that morning's work."

He stopped speaking to a dumbfounded company, while Colonel Bell, with a face as red as fire, or his old must, muttered—

"I thought it had been made up, and the past forgotten," and began to back to the door.

But Sir William arrested him. "When it comes to that, you did your duty, old Bell—we're meeting as equals to-day, ain't we? which is more than I ever did. I can't ask you or your friends to eat or drink with me, for though we're social equals, you and I know that would not be fitting. But you're welcome to my vote, though, bless you! my presence on the hustings would be no credit to your man. I can sink up with the ruck to the booth, and give you what Jen herself, had she been here and a voter, would have given you freely, man. For though you were hard we always held you honest, and though you helped to do for me—that's neither here nor there, I was going to the dogs anyway, and would have reached them in the long run without your aid, I take it. I have that faith in you and your choice that I believe it will be the country's own fault—as ■ was mine—if ■ don't do as well as ■ deserves under the rule of the likes of you, old Bell!"

"What a strange character!" "Who was Jen?" "What on earth had you ■ do with him besides giving him his discharge, Colonel?" "At least we've got his vote, which was what we wanted," was chorused round the officer when the party had reached their carriage.

"Yes, yes, you've got his vote, and I really believe you've me ■ thank for it," said the Colonel, wiping his forehead, "but I'll be shot if I undertake such another encounter on your account, Charlie. That fellow Thwaite must have been as mad as a hatter from the beginning. Scrapes? oh! of course, a fellow like him was safe to be in a thousand scrapes."

Some of the stories with which the country was ringing reached Lady Fermor. Then she assailed her grand daughter in the privacy of the old lady's dressing room. "Have you heard the news, Iris? Sir William Thwaite has broken out, and sits drinking himself to death with carters and quarrymen, and tramps, for anything I can tell. The speaker fixed her hollow, gleaming eyes on Iris's face, and spoke with deliberate calmness. "He and his beggar wife are at daggers drawing, so it is feared murder may be committed and some body hung for it. What do you think of that for your work, girl? We have all got our sins to answer for, but I should say that was something to have on one's conscience."

"It is not my work, and it need not lie heavy on my conscience," protested Iris, with her whitening face. But though she knew she spoke the truth, and would not be silent, because she was not afraid ■ maintain her innocence in such hearing, when she got to her room she shed bitter tears. "Grandmamma accuses me, and Lucy bids me rejoice in having escaped such a miserable fate, and I—what can I do but cry to God to have mercy on His lost sheep, His lost children?"

CHAPTER XLIV.—"BY A CORN-FIELD SIDE, A-FLUTTER WITH POPPIES."

*"A nature of endowment with opposites Making a self alternate, where each hour
Was critic of the last, each mood too strong
For tolerance of its fellow in close yoke."
GEOFFREY CHAUCER: *The Speman's Gylep.

IF the corn in the fields be ever so scant, there is a little gladness about the harvest-time, a little mirth, much picturesqueness, an odour of old associations. In some of these far-away northern districts the reapers yet reap with sickles, as they did in the days of Boaz; and the maidens follow after the reapers as the maidens were following when Ruth came timidly into the barley-field; and when,

*"Sick for home,
She stood in tears amid the sheaf corn."*

Dorothy Craven's barley-field at Netherbank had been partly cut; the reapers were still at work at the upper end of the field, though the sun was already dropping over the edge of Langbarugh Moor. The young men and maidens moved in front of the tall barley that was yet standing, waving its pale gold against the dark tones of the upland. Bessy Skirlaugh, in a scarlet shawl that glowed in the last amber ray, was turning the corn lightly on to the bands that her seven-years-old Hannah was twisting; two young men were tying; Mark Ossett and his boy Willie were setting up the sheaves, "stooking" was the word they used; and seeing that the little lad was hardly equal to the task, Mr. Bartholomew came out from his cottage and helped for an hour or two from sundown till after the moon was up. Genevieve with a light rake helped Miss Craven gather up the stray ears from the stubble.

"This is idyllic, if you will," said Genevieve, resting on her rake, and pushing her wide-brimmed hat away from her forehead.

"It is the best thing left on this earth," replied the overtaken artist. "If I had my life to begin again, I would live it out of doors, let the cost be what it might."

Presently the harvesters went home; the men with the reaping-hooks over their shoulders, the women with cans, baskets, babies, bottles, all made up into bundles together. They stopped a little by the stile to gossip; then a woman came up out of the lane in the moonlight, and along the field-path where Genevieve and her father were still sauntering to and fro.

XXV—30

"You won't know me. I'm Margaret Sharpe," she said in a pleasant and rather refined voice, "Ambrose Sharpe's wife. And my husband's working at Yarell Croft. He took the picture home yesterday morning all right; and Mr. Richmond said 'at Ambrose was to tell you 'at he liked it very much.'"

"Oh, thank you!" said Mr. Bartholomew, concealing his amusement, "thank you. I hope you haven't had to come up from the village on purpose to bring the message?"

"No, sir, no, I haven't. But I told Ambrose I'd let you know; so as he mightn't have to come up here after his day's work. Good night, sir. . . . There's no message to take back?"

"No, none, thank you. Good night."

A bat came fluttering insanely over the sloping barley-stooks; a late bird flew by on its frightened wing as Mrs. Sharpe went hurrying into the shade.

"This is new experience for you, my father," Genevieve said, having humour in her tone.

"It is, child. But—pardon me—I think we had better not talk of it. I cannot trust myself to talk of it, not even to you. It is amusing; and some day I may laugh at it all. But I do not think I shall. I have a curious feeling about it—it is like the oppression that is in the air before a thunderstorm."

"But after the thunderstorm how good it is!"

"Yes, it is good for the man who escapes the lightning stroke."

What was she dreading? Genevieve wondered. Was his poverty a greater trouble to him than she knew? She thought she knew the worst. Only that morning, giving her a small sum for Keturah's wages, he had smiled and said gravely that his purse was like the widow's cruse, in that it never quite failed; but she knew that more than once it had all but failed; and, sadder still, she also remembered that more than once she had missed small treasures from the studio; and had guessed how they had been packed up and sent away in her absence. It was a terrible strait—its full terribleness being something not to be openly acknowledged even between themselves. It would have been an added pang had they known that it was much more openly spoken of in Murk-Marishes, and the hamlets beyond. Keturah's friends made no mystery of the growing narrowness and straitness of things at Netherbank, and the neighbourhood was curious about the smallest matters that happened there now. It was interesting to see a stately princess with a fine smile, with golden hair, and cashmere dresses, and Gainsborough hats, and to be impelled to wonder how long it was since she had had a good dinner.

The message brought by Mrs Sharpe had its depressing as well as its amusing side. It was evident that Noel Bartholomew that he need expect no other message, and therefore no payment, until the second picture was finished and sent home. He would take care about sending this one home. There should be no invitation to Mr. Richmond to come and approve of his work this time. All the same, Bartholomew said to himself, that so far as his best skill could insure his success, there should be no room for disapproval. He knew himself to be working with more heart at this second picture. It was promising better, and it offered more scope for imaginative work. George Kirkoswald seeing it, expressed positive delight, and he was not given to idle exuberance of admiration.

It was not quite a week after the view of Yarell Croft had been sent home when George came down. He had not heard of its removal, and nothing was told even to him of the manner in which Bartholomew's three letters had been responded to at last.

The garden scene was on the easel. The ancient archway was completed. The ivy that covered the pillars threw out wild, careless sprays, the clematis on the trellis was in its summer stage of creamy, profuse blossoming. Beyond the archway there was the old fountain, the interwoven rose-sprays, some tall, waving grasses. The whole space of the foreground in front of the gateway, with the exception of the path, was one mass of graceful, luxuriant, many tinted flowers. Some of these Bartholomew had painted on the spot, choosing the few weeks during which Miss Richmond had been at Danesborough, to make his excursions to Yarell, otherwise he had intended to make an autumn scene. He was glad now of the summer flowers, the white Madonna lilies, the crimson Martagon lilies, the great Auratum and Japanese lilies. On the left, some late purple and amber roses stood among the broad green leaves, the tall pale-blue larkspur—Yarell Croft was famous for larkspur—stood towering against creamy bushes of syringa. There were poppies here, foxgloves there, with quaint campanulas, and tufted meadow sweet. Some of these were only indicated as yet, and closer examination showed that the leafier portion of the work needed many a long hour of patient labour.

"You ought certainly to send this to the Academy," George said. "There is an originality about it that could not fail to make its mark."

"Perhaps Mr. Richmond may choose to send it," replied the artist, turning to his work again, and beginning, with a careful hand, to touch some of the iris leaves with sunlight. Genevieve was working at her embroidery, trying to copy some of the poppies in the painting on to a panel that she was embroidering for a screen. "It is like having perpetual summer beside one," she said, looking up at the canvas with unaffected pride. "If ever I give a commission for a picture it shall certainly be for a garden of summer flowers."

Kirkoswald was making a mental note of the remark when there came a tapping at the studio door, Keturah thrusting in her head at the same moment—

"It's Miss Richmond again," she said in a breathless confidential whisper to Genevieve, "I showed her into the sitting-room, and I told her you'd be coming in a minute, and I didn't tell her that Mr. Kirkoswald was here."

Genevieve smiled, but she also blushed quickly. Why did Keturah think that it mattered about Miss Richmond knowing who was there? She saw that George had heard. There was a change on his face, a tightening of the muscles about his mouth.

"I will go up with you, if I may," he said. "I think it will be better." And Bartholomew hastened to add that he would follow immediately. Of course Miss Richmond had come to pay for the picture that had been sent home, or in any rate to arrange about the payment. The idea struck him with a sudden shame even as it occurred to him. Was this the lesson that poverty was teaching him—this low care, this unworthy eagerness? Had he declined so far in so short a time? He felt with bitterness that the sense of unexpected relief was almost an agitation to him.

Miss Richmond was sitting on the little chintz-covered sofa when Genevieve went with George Kirkoswald. She had arranged six cushions about her, placed her feet on a footstool, and she sat there holding out a white, languid hand, hardly moving her coral-red lips in answer to Genevieve's greeting. She looked at George Kirkoswald with a quite inscrutable look in her eyes, even he could not discern its hidden meaning.

She sat in the same unresponsive manner when Bartholomew went in a moment or two later. It was as if she had come expecting to ■■■ entertained, to have only to sit and watch, sit and listen, sit and judge.

"I expected to find you here," she said to Kirkoswald, with intension in her tone. "That was partly why I came. I have not seen you since that day in Soulgif Bight, when you disappeared so suddenly. . . How was it?"

"How was it that I disappeared? I think it was because I had to see Smartt again," Kirkoswald replied curtly.

"How inconvenient of Smartt! It must have spoilt your day,—your great day," said Diana with mild superciliousness. "Think of having to do without your luncheon, the clin ax, as it were! It fell very flat, I assure you,—if that is a consolation. Didn't you consider the luncheon a very flat affair, Miss Bartholomew?"

"It was not lively," Genevieve said. "But for me it was not the great event of the day, that had come before."

"Of course for you—you are alluding to the Canon's speech?" Miss Richmond said. "It was beautiful. It comes back to me like an echo every now and then—always just when I can't listen. Then I seem to hate the sound of it, to wish that I had never heard one word that the Canon said. As a rule, I don't remember such things very long. But I remember that. It is curious, isn't it, to remember words like those quite distinctly, and to feel that they have no power over you?"

"I should say that the mere fact of your remembering them proves that they have power," said Bartholomew.

"Should you?" said Miss Richmond, looking into his grey, weary face with curiosity. How old the man was seeming! and how shabby and strange he looked! A contemptuous reply had been on her lips, but for once she held herself in check. Was Bartholomew ill? Had some new mental suffering fallen upon him? It was impossible that her small experiment could have anything to do with the change in him—it had been so very small, and besides, it was over. Some conflict was going on, even now, so it seemed to Miss Richmond, as she sat holding stronger emotions in restraint than anybody dreamed, stronger and stranger. Did she know herself which was hatred that stirred within her, and which was love? She felt isolated as she sat there in the middle of the little group, isolated and defrauded. She told herself that she was not misled by the dark look of pain that was upon Kirkoswald's great, square forehead, and in his deep-set eyes. He was happy enough, confident enough, self-satisfied enough. And the pale, yellow haired girl beside him—what need had she to be so pale, to sit there with that look of sadness and patience about her mouth? They had all they wanted, these two. That letter of hers had had no real effect beyond making them keep their engagement secret for a while. That was something, but it was not enough, not enough for a wronged and despised woman. She could do more yet,—she would do more, she told herself as she sat silently there, resting her chin upon her white, beautiful hand, and looking out with a placid smile. In striking any one of the three she would strike them all, this she knew certainly, and more modes than one of striking were within her reach now.

All this, and more than this, passed with the swift indefiniteness of thought across her brain. There had been no long pause when she spoke again, turning to George Kirkoswald.—"Do you know I was reading a volume of your poems yesterday?" she said, speaking in her usual deliberate and expressive way, a way that made her lightest word seem important.

George started visibly, as if he had been stung. "I am sorry you had no more interesting book," he replied, trying to seem as unconcerned as might be under this unexpected attack, for such he felt it to be.

"I could have had no book more interesting to me," Diana said. "I had half-forgotten it. I had entirely forgotten some of the poems. They seemed to strike me in quite a new light—especially some of your ballads, those written in imitation of the ancient ballads. Of course, you remember them all? What a wonderful one that long one is, The Doom of the Ruine Knight. It made my blood run quite chill."

"It makes some run chill to think of having written it," said George, smiling extenuatingly, "I was only eighteen years old when I wrote it, if that is any excuse."

"Eighteen! Really! What an interesting boy you must have been," said Miss Richmond, with a smile that, taken together with the words, roused Genevieve's indignation to the utmost. "I should like to have known you then,—at the time when you were writing such poems as those about false knights, and unconquered lovers imprisoned in moated castles, and forsaken maidens pining in lofty towers. I am sure you were more interesting then than you were later when I knew you better."

Almost George Kirkoswald wished, as he sat there enduring with all the patience he had, that Miss Richmond would as a matter of mercy do the worst that it was in her power to do, then and there.

Unfortunately it had occurred to Diana also that there might be mercy in such a course, other things occurred to her, and she was in no mood to be merciful. She was decidedly sorry when George Kirkoswald suddenly rose and prepared to depart.

"Ah! that is to escape my criticisms," she said, putting out her hand with the old, fine, graceful gesture that he knew. "If you had remained I had some passages ready to be quoted, and also a few that seem to me to need elucidation. Never mind I shall make you explain them to me another time.

Good-bye. They say authors are never appreciated among their own people, but don't forget that you have one appreciative reader."

The look of annoyance on Kirkoswald's face as he went out was almost amusingly unmistakable.

"I used to think that George was not of what I have heard him term the genus scriptabile," said Miss Richmond, using the Christian name with even more than her ordinary deliberateness.

"I am afraid that all people who produce anything—that is, any really creative work—are more or less sensitive about it," replied Noel Bartholomew.

A pause followed. It was inevitable that Bartholomew should wonder what judgment Diana Richmond had pronounced upon his work, and whether she was about to give expression to her judgment now. Quite unintentionally he had made an opening for her to do so, yet he shrank from her opinion as a man whose eyes have been hurt shrinks from the flare of gaslight. Still, he waited for it.

And Diana knew that he was waiting for it. It was a little power in her hand, and with the quick instinct that the people who always have who find pleasure in criticism, she divined instantly that the highest refinement of pun would be an absolute silence on the subject. If he spoke, she was prepared, if he did not, she was prepared also. No adverse criticism of hers could fly so straight to its mark as a dead silence. She gave emphasis to it by leaning back a little on the sofa where she sat, and by slowly turning the rings that were upon her hands, as some women do when they sit alone and forget themselves in thought. Was she hesitating because of Genevieve's presence there? The thought struck the girl suddenly, and she felt a little sorry that she came so late.

"You will excuse me?" she said, turning gracefully to Miss Richmond. "I will look after some tea. Our small handmaiden is not always to be trusted to remember."

Then she went out, and still Miss Richmond sat silently among the cushions, silently turning the turquoises to the pearls. She was perhaps unaware of the smile that was creeping over her face. It was not an encouraging smile. Bartholomew felt that it would be impossible now for him to make any allusion to his own work. He might have asked Miss Richmond to go down to the studio, and see the garden scene, but consideration restrained him from doing that. It was not finished, and he knew too well the unfavourable impression often produced upon an undiscerning eye by an uncompleted painting. No, he would be patient and silent—silent on that subject, at least, courtesy required that he should try some other. But Miss Richmond anticipated him, speaking as if she had been pondering all the while over his last remark, and was only now ready to reply to it.

"I suppose it is so," she said, "I suppose that people who do what is called imaginative work do get over sensitive. I think they always have miserable lives. Years ago, when I used to read, I often read biographies, and things of that kind. I did it to please another, and it was a kind of task, but I did my task, and I have my reward now, in feeling that I am a little less stupid than I should have been. Still, I am stupid, I

But are clever people happier for being so? Are you happy, for instance?"

The question was like a shock, it came with so much force, so strong an undertone of feeling. Nothing but a simple, straightforward answer was possible to Bartholomew.

"No," he said plainly, "no, I am not happy."

Miss Richmond was looking at him now with the look that had been on her face that day when she had come down to the studio, a look from which all superciliousness, all hardness, all defiance was gone, a look that might have been on the face of any tender, loving, suffering woman that Bartholomew had ever seen. Again he moved him to emotion, and again his emotion had something in it that was akin to dread.

"Neither am I happy," she said, speaking slowly, yet with agitation. "I am not happy, and I am not good. I might be both, it is yet possible to me to be both. I feel that.

And oh, how I long for these things—for both these things! Can you believe me when I say so? It is true, I feel that it is true. I know surely that if I were simply happy, with a simple, common kind of happiness such as others have, then I might be simply good . . . And I could do good, too. I could make others happier; I should desire to do that, and I should have some heart in doing it . . . You cannot tell how different it would be if I had hope of some day being a little less weary, a little less lonely, a little less unhappy than I have been—than I am."

"But, surely, in your position," began the grey, work-worn, care-stricken artist—"surely in your position it is not difficult to be happy! You speak of doing good, it is in your power to do almost limitless good. You know that as well, or perhaps better, than I know it, and you must also know the happiness that comes of making others happy. It is a platitude I am saying, perhaps . . ."

"It is a platitude, it is worse, it is a delusion," said Miss Richmond. "And I was not speaking of generalities; you knew that. If I used vague terms I had a definite meaning, and you knew that too. But you chose to ignore it . . . You say you are not happy, yet you put happiness away from yourself as if it were not worth having even when it is held out to you."

There was a pause, a little clatter of teacups outside the door, then Keturah came in, round-eyed, smiling, bringing relief on a teatray. But Miss Richmond would not stay for tea. Genevieve came into the room, Bartholomew went out to see if the carriage was there, and then Diana went away, silently, gracefully, magnificently, as she had come.

And she left silence behind her; but it was a loving, understanding silence. She left disappointment also, to be taken with the dinner of herbs next day, and for many days, but it was not an uncheerful disappointment. And he had his lesson. The teaching of that time bore fruits of insight and sympathy after many days. *

CHAPTER XLV—SHALL LIFE SUCCEED IN THAT IT SEEMS TO FAIL?

"Oh! lift me as a wave a leaf, a cloud!
I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!
DUST-FLY! Only to the West Wind!"

Less than a week after Miss Richmond and George Kirkoswald had met at Netherbank, George received a telegram from York. It was from Mrs. Warburton, the wife of his friend. Her husband had been suddenly taken ill in London. He was there alone, at a strange hotel; and she herself was too ill to go to him. Within an hour after the receipt of this message George was on his way across the moor to Gorthwaite Station, a small station on a new branch line running direct to Market Studley. He had written a note which old Charlock was to take to Netherbank.

It was a sunny November morning when the note came down. The harvest was gathered at last, all save a few acres of beans that stood blackening on the upland slope here and there. The leafless twigs awayed lightly in the breeze, a few dull gold leaves were on the beeches, the scarlet rose-hips brightened the hedgerows, great white whorls of yarrow flowered in the waste places. It was winter, but winter at its best and mildest.

Noel Bartholomew read the note aloud, and he could not but see the change on his daughter's face, the fading colour, the look that was half disappointment, half some keener pain. He worked on a little quite silently, touching the anthers of a white lily with crumbling red gold, then, at last, he spoke.

"If there was anything that you could tell me, Genevieve, my child, you would tell me without hesitation?" he asked gently.

The quick colour came to the girl's face. She had been standing near the window, looking out over the hedge of bright green holly, where the red berries were clustering and ripening among the leaves. She turned when her father spoke, and came near to where he sat. Her face was full of perplexity, but she raised her eyes unshrinkingly to his.

"You are meaning with regard to Mr. Kirkoswald?" she said. "If you ask me to tell you, father, I will tell you all that there is to be told."

"But you would rather I did not ask?"

The girl hesitated.

"You know that silence is not congenial to me?" she said, looking into his face rather pleadingly. "That is, silence between you and me. I have never kept anything from you before, you believe that?"

"I believe that—nay, more than that, I believe that it is a pain to you now. I am certain there is pain somewhere, I want to save you from it, that is all."

"But if I would rather endure it, if I have a strong reason for wishing to endure it a little longer, you will not be angry?"

"No, I will not be angry."

There was a mildness about this reply that had a meaning of its own, a meaning that had ■ be suffered.

"I hardly meant that, father," Genevieve said presently. "How could I, since you have never been angry with me in my life? . . . I meant, will you still trust me?"

"Of course, my child, I trust you. And what ■ equally to the point, I trust Kirkoswald also," said the artist, speaking with some fervency.

The girl rose, and bent over the grey wan face that was so intent upon the white lilies. Was there a tear behind the kiss that she gave?

"You may trust him, my father, you may trust him. I have promised to trust him always . . . There, that ■ a confession. It is all I have to confess."

"Not quite all, little one," the artist said with a quiver in his voice. "Not quite all. He cares for you, that I know, that I have seen—he cares intensely. And you care for him that also, I think I have perceived. But I want to know one thing, I will ask only one, do you care enough for him to feel that he can make you happy?"

"If he cannot, then I cannot be made happy. If this world holds any happiness for me apart from the happiness you make for me, then he has the key of it. I care so much as that, will that content you?"

"If you are contented, my darling, if I know that I may leave you contented and happy when I go, then I shall live out my own few days the more happily for knowing it . . . Kiss me again, child. I shall do some good work to-day."

Was Genevieve a little relieved also? Canon Gabriel, going over after luncheon with Mr. Severne, found a lightness in the atmosphere that he had not expected to find. Rumours of Bartholomew's unprosperousness had reached him, and pained him, exaggerated stories of the Yarrell Croft pictures had flashed out of a seeming darkness. Then when he had questioned Mr. Severne he had found the curate unwilling to answer, unwilling rather than unable, and this evasiveness had been more suggestive than any disclosures that he could have made.

"I think myself that Mr. Bartholomew is not doing well," the young man had said with a new gravity in his round blue eyes. But he would not say what made him think so. He was more observant than people knew, and it was not to be expected that his powers of observation should fail him when he went to Netherbank. He had understood the meaning of the few small changes that had been made in the hospitalities of the little household far better than George Kirkoswald had understood them; indeed it could hardly be said that the latter had noticed them in any particular degree. He was not naturally curious, and being a little beyond the reach of Rumour with her hard eye and malevolent tongue, he had not been aroused to any suspicion. And indeed it would have taken a good deal to awaken him to any fear as ■ Bartholomew's well-being. The man's name had been more or less before the world for so many years, and had been so invariably associated with the production of some worthy piece of work, that it would have been almost impossible to imagine him in any strait, unless that strait had been brought about by some unexcusable waste or extravagance, and thus he knew well had not been the case. When Kirkoswald had thought of Noel Bartholomew's affairs at all, his thought had mainly taken the shape of wonder at the man's present eccentricity in choosing to live in a thatched cottage with one inadequate maid-servant, and the word "eccentricity" had covered all the rest, so far as Kirkoswald was concerned.

In excuse for him—if he need excuse—it may be said that there had been very little at Netherbank to awaken suspicions unawakened elsewhere. One year had not wrought any noticeable change in the dainty arrangements of the little sitting-room, the fresh flowers, or green, graceful leaves were always there, there was no sadness in the canary's song, and the little place bore the searching rays of the afternoon sunshine far better than any of the dusty, shabby rooms at Usselby could bear it. George Kirkoswald had missed nothing from the accustomed brightness and freshness that ■ appreciated so keenly, and it need hardly be said that he had missed nothing of brightness or freshness in Genevieve herself. She had been a little extra careful in her daintiness, that was all. The cream coloured laces that she wore had been washed and ironed (by her own hands) a little more frequently, if she had a shabby gown she wore a pretty muslin apron with knots of ribbon all about it, and when the feathers in her hat lost its curl, she filled the brim with scarlet rowan-berries and fronds of fern.

Thus afternoon she had put on a pretty white muslin cap of her own making, fastening a knot of rose-buds and ■ bit of green myrtle in the front of it. Another knot of red berries adorned the front of her dress, which was of white blanket-serge. She had taken a little extra pains because of the happiness that seemed to be floating about the studio since that conversation in the morning; and her father had given her an extra kiss for her care. Nevertheless she was a little conscious of her rustic decorations when the Canon went in.

"Altogether, I feel to-day as if old Winter were trying to persuade me that he is as charming as any spring," the Canon said, being careful not to make his compliment too personal. He was relieved; and relief is a thing very apt to effervesce and overflow the cup of satisfaction.

Mr. Severne was admiring the garden-scene, which Genevieve was explaining to him. Bartholomew had done painting for the day, the light of the November afternoon no longer serving his purpose. And he was glad to rest, glad to sit and talk with a friend awhile. It was the best thing that could come to him in life now. If any change came to him, if, for instance, Genevieve should leave him, then he would go and live a little nearer to Thurkel Abbas, so that he could drop in at the Rectory whenever the loveliness that would come upon him should turn to heartache. He had said this to himself before; and he thought of it again now as he drew a wide arm-chair to the fire for the old man and stired the coal into a blaze. The flames went up, crackling, rejoicing. The warmth spread outward, mingling with fine sympathies, quiet, strong yearnings, low-toned utterance of the ebb and flow of thought.

The conversation came round to the artist's own affairs presently, but the Canon only touched lightly upon them, seeing it was not required of him that he should do more. "And it is all mistaken, this rumour, this gossip?" the old man said. "I am glad of it, more glad than I can tell you."

"I do not know all that has been said, of course," Bartholomew replied. "But there is no truth in this that you tell me you have heard, none at all. The young man was thoughtless, careless, forgetful, anything you will, and perhaps rather wanting in courtesy at the last. But there was nothing dishonourable, nothing. I have told you all. And it is all over now. I am working at the second picture with rather more zeal for my work than I have had for some time. I hope I shall be able to keep him up through the winter, till I get some of these other things finished. If I can do that then life will go a little easier than it has done of late."

There was a brief pause. Genevieve seemed to be instructing Sir Galahad, having a book of biographical sketches adorned with engravings for a text.

"His life used to have quite a fascination for me when I was a child," she was saying. "It was so full of suffering, and he seemed to bear it so bravely. Now I do not like to read it at all, because I cannot help seeing that he did so much to bring his suffering upon himself."

Bartholomew smiled, and looked at the Canon as if struck by some apponiteness in his daughter's words.

"Sometimes it seems as if we all of us brought our suffering upon ourselves," he said, speaking in a lower voice than before. "It is so easy to say, 'Had I not done this; had I only done that!' But which of us knows what the end of that different event would have been? And small events widen to such appalling results. I once threw a stone into the middle of the harbour at Deephaven, it is a wide harbour, and I stood and watched the circles increasing till they touched the houses on either side. I never forgot that. Sometimes in reading biography the analogy has seemed to me absolutely perfect."

"Yes; that is one reason why biography is so interesting," replied the Canon, "and often, at the same time, so intensely saddening. One can trace cause and effect so clearly, and there is indescribable pathos in the idea that perhaps the man himself who was tossed in the widening circles of event was perhaps unaware that any stone had been dropped into his fate at all. I often think of some of our popular contemporaries, and wonder if any of them have any dread of the inevitable biography. Surely all lives are not suited to disclosure, not even when it is a friend who does the anatomising!"

"Some of them may dread the truth being known," said Bartholomew. "But for myself I have more pity for those of whom the truth never can be told in its integrity, and who know that I never can. They live marred lives; and the world looks on disapprovingly, not knowing what it is that maims and hinders, and perhaps inventing some stupid, blind theory to account for what it cannot comprehend. . . . I wished once to take the biographer's pen in hand myself—that was years ago. I had a strong desire to tell the story of a friend of mine, a young artist named David Elseker."

"Elseker! I know the name," said Canon Gabriel; "and I think I know where there are two or three small pictures of his—landscapes. 'Tis the best of my belief they hang at Kingsworth Hall, near Bristol. They used to interest me; and I have wondered that so little should be known of the artist."

"Nothing more will ever be known of him now," said Bartholomew. "It is fifteen years since ■ died; he died at the age of thirty-four; and his death depressed me for weeks, it was so very like a murder to me. People said he died of consumption; but I had my own opinion about that. I had watched him from the time ■ was twenty years old. He was a clerk then in the custom-house at Deephaven—perhaps it might be speaking of Deephaven just now that made me think of him; his father was in the same office, so that between the two they managed to make a very fair income for people of their position. But they lived up to it; and Mrs. Elseker was not a managing woman; I could see that, though I knew so little of them. I only went to Deephaven now and again for a few weeks' sketching. That was how I got to know David. Morn, noon, or night, one never met him without his sketch-book. I have been told that he used to take it to the office with him, and keep it under his desk, so that he might look at ■ now and then if he could do nothing else. Art was really an enthusiasm with him. I saw that the first time I met him. He could talk of nothing else; but he talked truly and earnestly of it, and one never wearied. I tried hard ■ persuade him to stick to the desk, but it was quite in vain. He used to look at me with his quiet blue eyes as if I had struck him an undeserved blow. When he did burn his ships and come to London, I tried to help him as a matter of course, but he needed very little help of mine. He lived in a garret, and he painted in a garret, for a time; but it was not for a long time. He soon made what was considered to be an artistic success. It was a small picture, a landscape—he never painted anything but landscapes; and by an unusual piece of justice it got hung on the line at the Academy. I think I see it now, a bit of fuzzy common, a reedy pool, a straggling, white-flowered elder-brake in the mid-distance, and a soft, creamy, fleecy sky overhead, seeming as if ■ were actually sweeping over the canvas just with the sweep of the cumulus on a summer noon. Small and unimportant as it was I have repeatedly seen a crowd of connoisseurs round it. ■ was curious that it didn't sell; but I was told that he had put too high a price upon it. That was rather like him at first. It wasn't that he cared for money for its own sake, though he needed it so much; but for Art's sake ■ didn't wish to sell a picture like that for the price he might have got for a pot-boiler.

"By that time he had taken a small house with a studio out Chelsea way; and he had written for one of his younger sisters to come and keep house for him. That was the beginning of his troubles. I am telling David's story, not Miss Olive Elseker's, so I will only say that the girl drove him nearly mad by force of sheer perversity and unmanageableness. He was attempting to persuade her to return to Deephaven when the news came that his father had died quite suddenly. . . . I did not see him for a long time after that; and when I did see him again I hardly knew him, he was so shattered, so care-worn, so utterly broken. But all the old fire was there, burning away ■ his keen blue eyes as fast as ever, consuming him, one might say, and say it without exaggeration. He had given up his London studio. He had gone back to Deephaven, and he was working there, endeavouring, as an artist and as a teacher of drawing, to support a household of six persons, his mother, his three sisters, himself, and a servant. He was only seven-and-twenty then; but he looked at least ten years older, and no wonder. I wondered at nothing after I had been a month ■ Deephaven; that was a few years after his father's death. I went there for a little change, choosing Deephaven because David was there, and because he offered to let me have lodgings in his mother's house. I believe he repented of the latter step; I know I did; and I was glad when my month was over. But it qualified me to write David Elseker's biography if I had had the trick of writing.

"It is of David I am speaking, not of his family; but since his career as an artist, his fame, his very life was sacrificed to them, I cannot ignore them. They must have been utterly blind to their own interests. But it was wilful blindness, since I attempted myself with all the strength I had to open their eyes; to show them that if they would but bear even a little less hardly upon David's strength he would have some chance of rising. I told them plainly that he might rise to almost any height he chose in his own line; and that whatever that height might be they would—as a matter of course—share the material advantages of it. But it was no use. David might paint pot boilers, or he might paint masterpieces, it was nothing to them; but not an hour's peace should be secured to him by any effort of theirs, nor one bull the less handed over to him to be paid, though all the while his very soul sickened at the sight of the worthless work ■ had to go on producing in shame and silence year after year, and though everybody who had ever heard of him was wondering at his wasted life, his wasted strength, his wasted talent. It was another case of 'promise' without performance, they said, another instance of mistaken ambition, of an over vain self estimate. All this David knew, and felt and writhed under. More than once he made a desperate effort, beginning a picture into which he meant to put his best, but each time some fresh blow came before he was half-way through, and the picture had to be abandoned in order that some miserable piece of commonplace might be produced on the instant for instant needs . . . Telling the story in this crude way it seems like nothing, but an intense sadness underlies it for me. The young fellow was so keen, so eager, so persistent, and yet he was so patient in his long suffering. . . . I can't tell you about the end . . . I was glad when I heard of it, knowing certainly that David would be glad. But I have often wished that the world could have known but a little of the truth, the world that misjudged him, that slandered him when his heart was aching within him, that crushed him with its hardness while he was bearing burdens too heavy to be borne, that turned a cold face toward him because of his apparent failure while he was suffering something that was almost martyrdom in his craving for a chance of achievement. . . . That is David's story ■ would stand for the experience of many another, doubtless, and you will agree with me in saying that the truth, if it could be spoken, would have but little terror for such as he."

There was a pause while the Canon reflected

"No," he said presently, "no, your friend would probably not have feared the truth, but I think he would have been one of those meant by a recent writer, 'those whose tongues have often faltered and been dumb from very eagerness of passion, and dread lest any words, even the best, should spoil their story.' You seem to regret your inability to write out fully and plainly all that you discerned. Believe me, it is better un written. It would not interest. Men as a rule shun the records of failure, while no book is so popular as the book that tells of a great success in life. But the little you have said is hardly more than a side-light flashed upon your friend's fate. You have spoken of his broken career rather than of himself."

"I have nothing to say of myself. I did not know him. He was hidden under the clouds, one always felt that. Sometimes I could not help speculating on what ■ might have been. It is certain that he would have been kindly, human, helpful, patient, since he managed to be these at the worst. Under other circumstances it is probable that he might have had distinction among men, that he might have talked brilliantly, for instance, or acted effectively, or lived his life with a certain éclat, as some of our modern Art-princes are doing now . . . I know what you would say, these things are not the highest. That is true, and he did not aim at them, not for a moment, of that I am certain. He aimed ■ nothing save the doing of the work that ■ was in him to do. The rest might have followed, or it might not, it would not have mattered, so that his life-work was done. Still from the highest standpoint all might be better as it was. It might be well that he should fail, well that he should die. That was all that was said of him, that ■ had failed, and died of his failure. There was a time when I wished myself to have the French epitaph graven on his tombstone —

"Nâtre, souffrir, mourir, c'est tout mon histoire."

"Not all his history," said the Canon, "not all, only to the end of the first chapter."

There was a deeper glow on Sir Galahad's face when the two who sat by the fire turned to the table. He had not been listening to the story of David Elseker, that was evident. "I have been listening to Mist Bartholomew," he said, speaking as if he were saying something that he had determined not ■ conceal. "I have been listening to her all the while, and I could go on listening. I did not dream ■ was so late." When he shook hands with Genevieve at parting, he said quite audibly, "I—I shall come again soon. May I come in the morning next time, before luncheon? It gets dark ■ soon, doesn't it? It's nearly dark now, you know. . . . You will let me come in the forenoon when I come again?"

enough, nor round enough. . . . George, if you were here now I would speak, at ■ risks I would speak, and I would compel you to speak. And you should know that my love is great enough, great enough for love's greatest destiny—a perfect sacrifice. There are times when I feel that it is written, and I love you enough to know that I can read the writing when ■ is held down to me . . . ■ I read it I shall obey it, I shall not fail."

A ray of sun shone out between the clouds, a kind, good face, all smiles and premature blushes, passed the window in haste. It was Mr. Severne, and Genevieve was smiling in response even as he entered the room.

"I—I asked you if I might come in the forenoon, you know," he said, speaking even more nervously than usual. "I know you are always busy, but you didn't say I mightn't come. . . . Is Mr. Bartholomew out this fine morning?"

"No, he is in the studio. We will go to him. But is it a fine morning? I thought ■ was so cold, so dull till just now?"

"Yes, till just now. The sun shone out exactly as I was getting over the stile, and I took it for a good sign. I couldn't help doing that, you know. I always like the sun to shine out like that when—well, when I am doing anything important."

"Is it an important thing to make a call at Netherbank?" Genevieve asked. She was already feeling brighter, more genial, because of this genial face and voice that she had come to like so much. She was trying to stir the fire into an appearance of greater hospitality. Perhaps it would be better not to disturb her father in the middle of his morning's work. Mr. Severne was talking, meanwhile, rather glad of the note that Genevieve was compelled to make.

"Yes," he said, "it has always been an important thing to me to come to Netherbank. I remember the first time that I came, I was awfully nervous about it. And you were good! I was laughing away like anything in about two minutes, and had forgotten all about my dread. I never met anybody who had the art of putting people at their ease as you have."

"I thank you," said Genevieve, smiling. "Then, will you be quite at ease now? Will you sit there, please? I am going to work at my embroidery a little, since you are here to talk to me, or read to me, or sing to me. I never touch my needle now when I am alone. I am not happy enough for that."

Mr. Severne laughed. "Well, that is puzzling!" ■ said.

"Is it? ■ need not be. Needlework doesn't occupy one's brain in the least; it leaves one at liberty ■ brood over all manner of things. I always think the women who can sit and sew quite contentedly for hours together, with no one to speak to, must ■ delightfully happy women."

The curate kept silence for a little while, blushing, thinking, looking up now and then with a pained, perturbed look that Genevieve could not understand.

"Do you know I've been more than ever afraid lately that you weren't happy?" he said in a low voice that seemed ■ be broken by its own weight of sympathy. "And it has made me unhappy to think of it. I couldn't have borne ■ think of it at all if I hadn't wished—if I hadn't hoped that, perhaps—perhaps—something might come to make you happier. . . . I have thought of it almost always lately, almost ceaselessly It seems too much to hope. It is too much; but I couldn't help it, I couldn't put the hope away, not till I asked you, not till you had said yourself that it couldn't be. . . . Must you say that, do you think? Is it impossible that I should ever make you happier? Is it . . ."

It was only a little exclamation from Genevieve that had stopped him, a little cry of surprise, and pain, and self-reproach.

"Oh, Mr. Severne!" she said, her eyes wide with distress, her lips tremulous. "Have I been so stupid? so cruel? Believe that I did not know, that I did not see. How could I—how could I know or dream of it? . . . I am afraid that I was caring—that I was thinking only of some one else. . . . But, oh, I am sorry—you will believe that I am sorry?"

There was silence again in the little room—a long silence. There was no blush on Mr. Severne's face when he spoke again.

"I know you did not see," he said, speaking quite calmly, quite strongly, and with a greater self-possession than had ever been his before—"I know that you did not dream of it. And so far from being cruel, your kindness has been so great, so beautiful, that I have wondered at it always. It has been the greatest joy that I have ever known . . . It will always be that. . . . I know I hardly need ask you—you will be just the same to me? This—the mistake that I have made will not come between us? You will not blame me, nor be cold ■ me?"

"It shall never come between us!" said Genevieve, holding out her hand. It was trembling, her eyes were full of tears. "If it make any change it will be a change toward greater friendliness, a better understanding. And I think—let me say it, though it may seem harsh just now—I think that you will understand yourself better. You will find that it is a sister's love you want from me, a sister's care, a sister's friendliness. You miss these, I have always felt that—that you were missing your home sympathies. Then try ■ think that this is home. Come more often, and talk more freely on any subject you will. ■ will be better so, we shall forget this sooner."

"But I shall not want to forget," said Mr Severne, lifting his grave blue eyes, and Genevieve saw that there was a new light in them, a new power. Whatever pain had struck him, the force of it had turned to spiritual strength even as it fell. "I shall not want to forget. There will be no sorrow in it by and by, that is, not much, not if you will be just the same to me, and try to care for me, as you say, as a sister would care. . . I shall be very happy. . . But I should like to know that you were a little happier too."

"And I shall be, believe that. I am no so—so self-sufficing as I used to be," said Genevieve, remembering and growing sadder. "Only this morning when you came I was feeling lonely, and I was glad to see you—very glad."

"Were you?—were you really?" . . . But I can't be of any use," said Mr Severne, his voice dropping to a more despondent tone. He could not help having his own thoughts about things. If Mr Kurkoswald were at the root of Miss Bartholomew's unhappiness, he could have no hope of being helpful in such a matter as that. He could only stand ready—a little on one side, but always so that he could be ready when the moment came. He had an instinctive feeling that the moment would come—the moment when he might be of use, when he could put all that pure, unselfish love of his into some small act that nobody would notice. Perhaps Genevieve might notice it. If she did, she would offer him thanks—sweet thanks, with sweet smiles, but she would never know. No, she would never know all that her words of that day had meant to him. All the way as he went home with his heartache and his sense of failure he was picturing to himself his future life, his future work, his future silence. There would be silence all the way quite on to the end, but there would be peace underlying it. Even now he was not what people call wretched—not utterly wretched. His sorrow would remain, but it would pass onward and upward into joy. ■ was as if he stood by a newly made grave, thinking of the flowers that would grow there when the time ■ flowers had come—passion flowers of faith and prayer, with chanted praise instead of songs of birds—music that should pass the night till the breaking of another and a fairer morning.

CHAP. XLVII.—THE SONG THAT ENID SANG.

We shall part no more in the wind and the rain
Where thy last farewell was said
But perhaps I shall meet them and know thee again
When the sun grows up her dead.

JEAN INGLETON

THE hoarse thunder of the winter wind came nearer and louder, the dead leaves went by sweeping and whirling into the upper air, the desolate roar of the sea at the foot of the cliffs came ever and ever more distinctly to the heart that listened and was sad.

Noel Bartholomew sat before his easel, working mechanically, all through the storm. He might not stay to feel the depression upon his spirit, he might not stay for the winter darkness that seemed to bring an unwillingness and unfitness of its own, he might not stay for a nerveless hand, nor for a brain weighed upon, oppressed with dread, overwrought with anxiety.

Genevieve sat beside him all through the day, and more than once half through the long, chill November night. She was working at her embroidery, and with a purpose in her working now. There had been a little scene, half sad, half amusing, one morning. The postman had brought a cheque representing the three panels for the screen that Genevieve had been embroidering all through the summer.

"You have sold them!" Mr Bartholomew exclaimed, surprised, pained, incredulous.

"Yes, my father, I have sold them. What will Mrs. Caton say?"

"It will hardly matter about Mrs. Caton," the artist replied bitterly. "Then he tried to recover himself, or to seem as if he did."

"Does Mrs. Caton represent the world for you now?" he asked, speaking in a gentler and more natural way.

"Yes, to a certain extent. She seems to have her hand on the pulse of it very finely. But since she interprets it, it cannot after all be such a very evil world. ■ she knew that I had sold my lily panel, and had received something like fourpence farthing an hour for my work, with the materials thrown in, she would begin to be good to me from that very moment."

"You think she would pity you?"

"There is a pity which is akin to love!"

"And there is a pity which is akin to contempt."

"So there is, father, and happy are the people who need no pity at all," Genevieve said, trying bravely to keep the sadness out of her face. "Perhaps we shall not need it always, and if we should, we will try to bear it. . . . Shall I sing to you a little while you sit there?" she continued, placing a chair for him by the fire, and opening the piano. "Shall I sing you the song that Knud sang in the day of her broken fortunes? I will be Knud, and you shall be Earl Yngel."

"Turn, Fortune, turn thy wheel with smile or frown,
With that wild wheel we go not up or down
Our heart is little, but our hearts are great."

"Smile and we smile, the lords of many lands,
Frown and we smile, the lords of our own hands,
For man is man and master of his fate."

Genevieve sang on to the end of the song resolutely, but she was grieved for the expression of her father's face, for the quiver of his lip. She had not known that he had looked at the cheque, knowing that he looked upon an answer to a passionate, half-despairing prayer, prayed in the night while she was sleeping. It was an answer—an answer granted with a special and unlooked-for trial in the very granting. Such answers come to us all at times, baffling the heart that years only to be grateful, to understand its own gratitude. Like other trials, it is a trial of faith, and needs to be met with non-reasoning steadfastness of trust as in a wise and wide-seeing Father. The trial passes, peace comes, and perhaps light with the peace. It is then that one has grief if faith has failed in the hour pre-arranged for its testing.

Noel Bartholomew's faith had all but failed him, though he had striven manfully to support it. But such strife is hard when the pulse beats low with failing strength, and when the soul is left to wrestle alone, unministered to by any man or angel. The angels do not always come. Sometimes they come, but unawares, and we know them only when they have departed.

Out of this root of pain Bartholomew's faith grew again. Though the relief that had come to him was very far from being full relief, it was sufficient to deliver him for a time from the haunting dread of actual want that had been present with him so continuously of late. He could bear to feel himself growing weaker, sadder, more and more unhelpful, but he could not bear to see the thinner oval of his daughter's face, nor to see the wan whiteness that was stealing upon her lip and cheek. Now he had hope that such changes as these would at least be arrested.

The storm went on, and the days went on, until at last the garden-picture was completed. Bartholomew was not satisfied with it, but it was less unsatisfactory to him than the other had been. The Canon and Mr. Severne came in just after it had been placed in its frame. It stood there, a great glow of summer light, summer feeling, summer colour.

"I like it here," the Canon said, "and I should probably like it on the walls of the Academy, but I have some doubt about its looking well at Yarell Croft. There will be nothing dark enough, sober enough, to throw it up. Don't you feel concerned about the effect of it there?"

"Yes, I am concerned enough," the poor artist said, feeling that his unprofitable anxiety on that head was a very small thing beside the other anxieties that he had. He could hardly care much about the effect of his work with Genevieve sitting there so pale and wearied looking. She was sitting near the table, helping Mr. Severne to write out a programme for the concert. It only wanted ten days now to the twenty-third.

"And you think Mr. Kirkoswald will be home by that time?" Sir Galahad was saying, looking up with the wistful light that had never gone from his face since "that day," as he called it in his own mind. He had not spoken of it—he would never speak of it. Genevieve had no fear, she had only a little sorrow, only a great regard. Nay, it was more than regard, it was love, and he knew that it was love. Some day perhaps it would satisfy him. Meantime if he were not satisfied, then neither was he sorrowful. The peace that had always been visible in him, visible through all his blushes and mistakes, his smiles, his hesitations, his awkwardnesses, was more than ever visible now, and the old man seemed to watch his face with a great tenderness. He knew what had happened, and Noel Bartholomew knew it too, but it was Sir Galahad himself who turned all regret, all embarrassment into simple, quiet, open acquiescence.

"It is good that you let me come, and to be so kind to me," he said to Mr. Bartholomew, as he shook hands and went out into the dull wintry weather that was upon land and sea.

The picture was sent home that same evening. Sharpe took it, with Leturah's brother, Johnny Glead, to help him. Very little emotion went with this second and larger work. There could be no pleasure connected with it, with the idea of its reception, its appreciation.

"■ seems almost amazing when you think of it," Genevieve said, "that one man should work for another, think so much of his thought for another, give so much of his life, and yet make so little impression upon that other's mind."

"It ■ strange," said Bartholomew, "and it is only painters and sculptors who know how strange it is. ■ must be quite different with authors. They have their personal friends, their critics, and their public to think of, to write up to, or down to; while an artist who has a commission has only the one man to think of, and every touch being made, more or less, with a view to that man's taste, he cannot help thinking of him, though all the while the patron may hardly even remember the painter's name."

The inevitable exhaustion followed upon the completion of the work. There was nothing to ■ done but some patient waiting, which is often the hardest task a human being can have. It was very hard in this instance, so hard that the father and daughter began to count the hours of every day almost as anxiously as they counted the few shillings that were left to them. No word passed the lip of either concerning the master of Yarrall Croft. He had again sent a message—a message precisely similar to the one he had sent before. "Mr. Richmond said I was to tell you that he liked the picture very well." That was all. Bartholomew looked into his daughter's face when he heard it, with a look that was curiously mingled and confused. There was wonder in it, and amusement, with a little disdain, and not a little hopelessness. The girl's lip quivered.

"We shall always know better now how it ■ with the poor, father," she said with a faint pain in her tone.

Bartholomew paused awhile before he replied, then he said—

"Yes, when it is all over I may perhaps be grateful to Mr. Richmond for having opened my eyes. I feel as if I had lived a blinded life till now, blinded ■ all real suffering, real pressure of anxiety, to the existence of such a thing as actual oppression."

A few more days went on. A little more hunger, a little more need of the common necessities of life had to be endured, and was endured bravely. The fire was carefully kept low, though the weather was chill and windy. Keturah was considerably kept patient, but ■ was not difficult to keep her patient. She moved about with a new quietness, as if the sorrow and strain that was in the house were a kind of sickness. And she knew as well as any one knew that the next moment that came might put an end to this strange trial. There was something almost pathetic in the way she sat or stood with her eyes fixed on a certain point of the edge of the moor. If Mr. Richmond came over that way she could see him pass between the two stunted trees that grew one on either side of the path, and it would be something delightful to have ■ run down ■ the studio, or into the little sitting-room, with the news that Deliverance, as represented by Cecil Richmond, was coming through the whinn and heather of Langbarugh Moor. The watching was weary work, but she would have her reward if she might watch to any such good purpose as this.

But in the event there came a morning when the last shilling had to be sent to Thirkeld Abbas for bread. Keturah went down to buy it, and as soon as she had gone Bartholomew sat down with a white resolute face to his daughter's writing-table.

"Must you do it?" Genevieve said, stooping to kiss the lined, troubled forehead.

"Yes," he replied, "yes, I must do it. I must write to Mr. Richmond . . . You see the alternative would not fall upon myself alone."

When the afternoon came Bartholomew consented to go out of doors. He would go anywhere now, he would do anything. Of course he would go down to Soulgnif Bight if his daughter wanted to go there. Perhaps the sea breeze would lift the pressure from his brain a little. Something was weighing there very heavily. It almost seemed as if the dull wind-swept sky itself had a ponderousness that could be felt. The air was heavy and chill, the dead grasses that were whitening in the hedgerows bent and shivered to the breeze, the great grey sea swept across the bay from point to point in wild ceaseless unrest. The day seemed full of sadness, of unhelpfulness, and the harsh boding scream of the sea gulls wheeling beyond the edge of the cliffs struck cruelly upon the ear when the hands were stretched out supplicatingly to Nature for a little comfort, a little soothing, a little promise for the days ■ be.

There were only a few people about in the Bight. One or two were looking out anxiously over the rocky beach to the north. The tide was rising. Right across where the white edges of the waves gleamed against the dark cliffs there was a solitary figure, a woman's figure apparently. "Were they watching her? Was there any fear?" Bartholomew asked of an ancient man who was leaning over the edge of the quay.

"Noo, sir, there's naught to be feared," said the man, "not unless she worsens on t' Ya'll be knawin' whea it is? Ya'll ken it's Ailsie Diewe?"

"Ailsie!—It is Ailsie!" Genevieve exclaimed, then she hesitated, fearing to ask the question that was upon her lip. But the old man needed no questioning. He had all the eagerness of his class to be the first to tell a tale of sadness. This was sad enough, and it was also a little strange. "It is like as if we'd all on us expected it," the old man said, 'knawin' 'at Ailsie was expectin' it neet an' daay, an' leuked out for t' poastman ivery mornin', storm or no storm, wiv a face as white as driven snow. She niver kind o' settled to naught till t' poastman had turned his back to goa up t' bank yonder. An' then ten daays agoon she had a dream. She says it warn't no dream, but she were wakened out of her sleep wiv a plash o' water, an' a great sudden light 'at she said was no shine o' the sun, nor o' the moon, but waen a great sea shine, an' a boat far out upon it w' little Davy an' his father makkin' for some hills 'at were all aglow w' the light 'at struck up aboot o' the sea. Ah say mysel' 'at it would ha' been better if she'd niver heard naught mo' more. She were calm an' quiet all that daay, as calm as if she'd been lift up to heaven a bit, an' let doon agen."

"But 'twas all ower next daay. A letter com' fr' the ownerst—there was a little book in it—in' the letter told how Davy had had a desper't fight for his life. The ship had stuck on a reef, somewheres oot foreign, an' the little fellow had knocked aboot all neet among the breakers in a stool chest, but t' chest were empty when it washed up t' the mornin'. . . 'Twas ower much for poor Ailsie, that was. Mr Stuart, him up at the readin' room yonder, read the letter for her, an' she sat still as a steane when he read it, an' she niver shed no tear. She's niver shed nought yet, so they say. But ivery tide, day-leet or dark, she walks out there, up an' doon among the rocks leakin' for the little lad. . . She's leuking now. Ah reckon she'll be goin' o' leukin'."

The dull grey sky was growing greyer, the chill wind more chill than before, the sea gulls came flapping overhead, crying with hoarse cries. Yet still the dark figure wandered up and down among the rocks where the cruel sea was crawling to the cliffs beyond. Noel Bartholomew and his daughter went on over the wreck strewn sands—the wide house mourning that Nature offered the bereaved woman for her use, veiling her light meanwhile, and draping the dark cliffs in purple shadow.

There was almost a smile on the mother's wan face, in the grey dreamy eyes—dreamy with looking out over unseen distances. She had made no attempt to provide herself with any change of dress. Her plaid shawl was over her head, her coloured print gown fluttered in the wind.

"Ya'll be come for the little book," she said, speaking in a tone that was milder and more gentle than she was wont to use. "I've left it at home, but Ah'll get it for you next time you come if t' tide be up. Ah'll be sure to get it. 'Twas so said t' the letter 'at the lady was to hev it. . . Davy had said that, an' they put it t' the letter."

"Perhaps you would like to keep it?" Genevieve began, speaking sympathetically, but Ailsie quickly interrupted her.

"Keep it! Oh, whisht, miss, whisht! Ah'd niver keep it. Davy'll ask aboot it—he's sure to ask when Ah find him. An' Ah'm boun' to find him. The sea's boun' to give up her dead. It gave Davy up before, you know, an' then he came back to life. An' Ah'd like to be here when he's given up again. So Ah can't goa an' get the little book now you see, miss—not till t' tide's over t' Kirkmister's stean yonder. Then Ah'll goa."

And all the while the great white waves were sweeping upward, always upward, leaping and dashing hungrily upon the big brown boulders that stood together in stern resistance at the foot of Soulsgrif Ness.

Genevieve tried to comfort the poor woman a little, but she seemed as one who did not need comfort, as if she did not even hear it. She went on talking herself, sottily, wearily, and in a very little time it seemed as if she had always talked so, always looked out over the sea with eyes that had no vision in them.

Leaving her there, a solitary figure watching and waiting among the dark rocks where the white sea was rushing and sweeping, they went up to the reading room. There was warmth there and rest and cheeriness. Some half dozen men and lads of the place were enjoying the unwonted luxury of pictorial newspapers. One or two were deep in unlikely books. Wilfrid Stuart was arranging the platform for the coming concert—it was to be on the next evening but one. There was a decided change in the appearance of the violinist of the cottage-door. He came quickly forward, moving with the help of a stick. There was a smile on his face, the wildness had all but gone from his eyes. It was easy to see that reconciliation had at least begun.

"Mr. Kirkoswald asked me to come in and see how you were getting on," Bartholomew said, "but I suppose you will have heard from himself by this time?"

"Yes, I have heard," said the young man. "I had a letter this morning with a parcel of books and magazines. I am glad that Mr. Kirkoswald will be here for the concert . . . Would you like to see the ivy-wreaths that my mother is making?"

CHAPTER XLVIII.—"TURN THY WILD WHEEL THRO' SUNSHINE, STORM, AND CLOUD"

'Round me too the night
Is weaving circles woven her shade
I feel her draw soft across the day,
I feel her slowly smiling breath invade
The cheeks grow thus, the brown hair spent with grey,
I feel her eager light
Laid peacefully upon life's handling train—
The foot less prompt to meet the morning dew,
I feel her less bounding, once upon new
And hope, once could I quick to spring again."

MATTHEW ARNOLD

WHEN Genevieve came down from her little room under the thatch on the morning of the concert-day her eyes were alight with a new anticipation. It was not the evening's success for which she was so eager, but the morning's pleasure. There was a hoar frost upon the land.

A cup of tea, some dry toast was waiting. "They've only looked at the tray," Keturah said. ■ herself a few minutes later, when she saw her master and mistress going out arm-in-arm, stepping from a cottage door into a wide, still realm of perfect and unearthly-seeming beauty. The trees stood as if moved to a conscious calmness by their own exceeding loveliness, every bough, every twig made you feel as if you had never in your lifetime noticed the perfectness of form and curve displayed by a branching tree. The rime was everywhere, on the tiniest point of the tiniest briar-leaf, and the undertones of colour struck through the thin diamond encrustation with an altogether new and delicate tenderness of tint and tone.

They went down ■ the studio by the grassy orchard ways, brushing sparkling crystals from the undergrowth at every step. Genevieve's white pigeons were wheeling up against the blue-grey monotone ■ the sky. All else was motionless. The studio was full of a steady and admirable light for painting. It had to ■ concentrated a little on the spot where the easel stood with the "Sir Galahad" upon it. It was many weeks since Bartholomew had touched the fine spiritual-looking head before him. He was a little surprised by it; more than a little glad. Yet it seemed like another man's work—something with which he had no right to trifle.

Genevieve watched his face as he stood looking into the soft, blue, upturned eyes on the canvas. Her hand was still within her father's arm, when she saw that he was glad she let her cheek rest affectionately upon his shoulder.

"The morning rime is good," she said with an apparent irrelevance.

"All beauty is good," replied the artist. "I wonder when man will surprise the last secret of beauty. We are far from it yet—the best of us."

"But ■ is something to be seeking."

"Yes, ■ is something. It is much to the man who has found the right clue. Till now I have been wandering on without a clue. Yet even in wandering I trust I did what it was given to me to do."

Genevieve stood silent a moment, her heart was beating a little, as if she herself was, on the verge of discovery of some larger law. . . . Then there came a sound into the silence.

"There—run, dear—that is the postman's horn," said Bartholomew, with a sudden grey-ness passing across his face.

Genevieve came back in a minute or two smiling, almost breathless, holding a letter aloft.

"Here is the Richmond crest!" she said. "A cross patens, azure, between four estodes, and the Richmond motto—Fides prestantior auro." Let me be mercenary, and hope that the Richmond cheque is equally imposing!"

Bartholomew's hand trembled in a very evident manner as he took the note. There was no responsive smile at his grey face, no sign of relief. ■ was characteristic of him that he looked about for a paper-knife, and cut the envelope with an unusual deliberateness. He read the note silently. Then he sat down, not lifting his eyes to his daughter's face.

"Don't say this! the cheque is not there, father!" Genevieve said, coming round to where he sat, and stroking his thin grey hair in a tender, loving way.

"Read the note, little one!" the father said, handing it to her. ■ was a very brief note. If it were cruel, ■ was not elaborate cruelty. If it were hard and unscrupulous, the hardness was not prolonged. ■ it struck like a blow, the blow was quickly dealt.

"I have received your letter," Mr. Richmond wrote. "The pictures are very good, but the price is more than I expected. Will you take them back? I think you would be able to dispose of them."

Genevieve put her arm round her father's neck, and drew his face to hers and kissed him.

The worst of the sickening shock was over when they began to speak of it.

"You will have noticed that Mr. Richmond has not mentioned his sister's name," Bartholomew said.

"Yes," replied Genevieve, "and I also remember that Miss Richmond did not allude to the pictures that day when she met Mr. Kirkoswald here. I do not think that she has alluded to them at all."

"What inference do you draw?"

"That there is not perfect confidence in this matter between the brother and sister."

"So I think, and so I fear."

"You fear?"

"Yes. Miss Richmond's pride alone would have saved us such a stroke as this."

In writing Cecil Richmond Bartholomew had, of course, mentioned the price of the pictures. The view of Yarell Croft was to be fifty guineas, the garden scene seventy.

"But it is so little!" Genevieve had said.

"You would have put double that price upon them if you had sent them to London."

This was true, and the knowledge that it was true did much to relieve the keenness of the overwhelming blow that had fallen, and it did something toward raising a suspicion of complications underneath the affair that neither Noel Bartholomew nor his daughter might do more than suspect. Yet, as was natural, the man wearied himself with trying to arrive at some solution of this strange turn of events. He was altogether weary and nervous.

"I am quite incapable of discerning what I will be wiser to do now," he said. "I have never before had to contend with circumstances like this, with a nature like this. I am baffled utterly."

In the end he wrote again to Mr. Richmond, simply explaining that he could not expect to find a purchaser for pictures that were so entirely of the nature of portraiture. Few men would care to buy a matter-of-fact representation of another man's house, another man's grounds. He was sorry to seem disobliging, but he could not do this thing that was asked of him. Then, with a painful effort, he added, "My present circumstances do not permit of it. And as to reducing the price of the pictures, that would be virtually to admit that I had valued them too highly at first. You are probably aware how far this is from being the fact."

That was all. The letter was sent to the post, and then again Bartholomew and his daughter set themselves to wait with patience. A new quietness, a new yieldingness seemed to have come down upon the poor fate-torn artist. When the evening came he consented, without hesitation, to go down with his daughter to the music room.

"I would go if it were only as a matter of gratitude, dear," he said, speaking as lightly and gaily as he might do. "Think of it—if I had been alone through all this! What should I have done?"

"I don't know what you would have done," replied Genevieve, stroking the thin nervous hand she held, and speaking with a responsive gaiety; "I don't know what you would have done, since you are a man. A woman would have opened her piano, and would have sung 'Thy wheel and thee we neither love nor hate.'"

"And all the while her heart would have been breaking."

"Sir Walter Scott says that 'a woman's heart takes a long time o' breaking.'"

"So he does, but he is careful to make the addition, 'That's according to the stuff they're made o', sir.'"

"Then since mine is made of very strong stuff I will go and dress. . . I shall be ready in ten minutes, my father."

The wreaths were all in their places—ivy for friendship, laurel for ambition, with here and there a glowing red chrysanthemum, blushing because it must always say, "I love." There was some dark yew there also, and a spray or two of cypress. The soft lamplight had been streaming down some time when Noel Bartholomew and his daughter went into the music room. Mrs. Caton was arranging the girls on the platform. She had taken the children under her especial protection, and had provided each little girl with a warm dark-red frock for the winter concert-evenings, whereupon Mrs. Damer had said that Mrs. Caton was growing quite sensible, and Miss Standen had added that she hoped sensibleness was like charity, and began at home.

These small amenities of speech in no wise interfered with the amenity of the general effect of things. Two or three more young ladies had been invited, who could sing pretty songs and wear pretty dresses. One of them looked like a tall straight daffodil, with its petals arranged as multitudinous frills. A little stout lady beside her had the appearance of a toilet pincushion, with her deep white flounce and underskirt of pale pink. Mrs.

Caton had besought everybody to look up their old evening dresses, and ■ put them on when they came to sing. She was quite sure the fisher-folk of Soulagnif Bight would take it as a compliment. A belief in pleasing and effective colour was one of the chief articles of her social creed. It was an insult to your neighbourhood to wear a gown that the eye could not rest upon with pleasure, or soothing, or satisfaction. And Mrs. Caton was a consistent woman.

Genevieve went smiling ■ to the platform in her white serge dress. She had a double band of plain black velvet round her head, confining her yellow rippling hair after the manner seen on Greek coins. Mr. Severne had offered her his arm, and he went with her across the back of the platform to where George Kirkoswald stood talking to Wilfrid Stuart about some violin music. George did not know that Genevieve had come. He was intending to walk a little way up the Bank when this last arrangement was made, and now here was a clear penetrating voice close beside him, saying, with a little quiver in it, "How do you do, Mr. Kirkoswald?"

He started visibly as he turned. "I have only been home two hours," he said, taking Genevieve's hand in his for a moment. He said the words as if he meant them for an apology, but none was needed now that he was there, looking into her eyes alone, trying ■ read at a glance the history of the days. There was nothing that was difficult of interpretation. Love can always be read, and faith, and joy—these being simple things and good. It is sorrow that is complex, and mean motive, and evil will.

The concert began with a duo, Mrs. Caton and Miss Damer at the piano, while Wilfrid Stuart played the violin. It was some music of Donizetti's—the overture to Lucia di Lammermoor—and it was being played very effectively, so the people thought who were listening, and who were capable of judging. They were not all listening. Genevieve was sitting on a chair, half hidden by the piano, thinking what a curious meeting it had been, meeting hands and meeting glances on a raised platform, with pink lights shining down, and green wreaths whispering fidelity. Agatha Damer was sitting on the other side of her, in a dress of willow green embroidered with white silk daisies. George Kirkoswald stood behind, between the two chairs, carried away on the quivering notes of the violin, lifted into realms of resolute hoping, determined defying. Quite unknown to himself his hand had grasped the back of Genevieve's chair—he was grasping it as if he had caught and conquered his life's greatest enemy, overcome his last and most invincible difficulty.

The moment of imagined victory is often the moment of real defeat. George was still in the height of his rapt mood when the door of the music room turned on its hinge ■ was Miss Richmond who entered, moving gracefully forward to the concluding strains of the overture. There was no vacant seat in front, but Noel Bartholomew rose from his instantly. Felicie, who accompanied her mistress, retired to the farther end of the room.

There was no one there but was wondering what strange vagary had possessed Miss Richmond to come down from Yarell Croft on a midwinter evening in order ■ be present at an entertainment which hardly pretended to be above the "penny reading" class. She was dressed from head to foot in rich, costly furs, but the room being warm she threw her mantle aside, displaying a handsome violet tinted dress adorned with lace and ribbons. Yet it was not her dress, but herself, that made a presence in the room—an oppressive presence for some, though she sat so quietly, and listened so attentively, resting her chin on her white hand, as she did everywhere, and leaning forward, with an apparent unconsciousness of herself, of her beauty, of her dress, that made her seem to be the most absolutely picturesque woman that ever breathed. Even Noel Bartholomew standing there at a little distance, said to himself, "If I could paint Miss Richmond as she sits at the present moment, I should win the applause of the world for the production of a new type of feminine beauty and character."

Doubtless such a picture would have been in a measure new. It is seldom that a woman is at once so beautiful, so strong, so valiant, so capable of evil, so desirous of good, as Diana Richmond appeared to be as she sat there, listening to Mr. Severne as he sang The Last Chord, to Agatha Damer when she sang Requies and Forget to Genevieve, who sang Schubert's Adieu. Wilfrid Stuart came in between with his violin, and Mrs. Caton swept the keys of the pianoforte with quite new force of execution since Miss Richmond was there to listen. It was well known in the neighbourhood that Miss Richmond was no musician, and say that how you will, you speak of the absence of a power not always fully understood. That the music in you is quite mute is much as if you said, "I have not learnt to speak the thing I should like to utter."

All the evening George Kirkoswald remained on the platform; he would not again desert his post, be the post ever so trifling. He stood with folded arms between the piano and the screen of red-berried holly, tall, erect, seeming as if he frowned more in thoughtfulness than in sadness, or perplexity. More than once he looked towards where Miss Richmond sat with her beautiful upturned face, and her white eyelids dropping over dark, inscrutable eyes. He felt that he had more strength within himself than he had had when ■ met those eyes before.

The concert came to an end at last, though the programme had not been a brief one. Noel Bartholomew came forward and shook hands with Miss Richmond, who thanked him with a quiet and intent graciousness for giving up his seat. That was the mood she was in—a quiet, graceful, courteous mood, that seemed all the quieter because no one could help divining the strong meanings and yearnings that were deliberately subdued and hidden underneath. They were only half hidden. Every glance and gesture betrayed them. If she turned her head it was as if she cried out for sympathy.

The people were going out. Genevieve went with Mrs. Caton into the inner room to put on her hat and cloak. When George Kirkoswald came up to where Bartholomew stood listening to Miss Richmond, she was saying, "I am waiting for your daughter. She will accept a seat in the carriage this evening, it is so cold." Then she turned to George, holding out her pretty hand, "You will persuade Miss Bartholomew, will you not? Though it is so moonlight and so lovely the air is very chill."

Genevieve did not need much persuasion. There was a little of the old authoritative in George's glance. "You will accept Miss Richmond's kindness," he said, with quiet emphasis.

He went with them to the carriage. Felice was there with rugs and shawls. The moon was shining down with its fullest, frostiest shining. Genevieve had taken her seat, Miss Richmond stood hesitating, with one foot on the step. She was looking upward, the soft light was on her face and in her wistful eyes.

"I had something to say," she began, speaking gently and slowly. "What was it? Why should people always have to put things into words? I wish one might be understood without words!"

"I wonder if I do understand?" Kirkoswald said. He could not speak plainly, and Miss Richmond knew that ■ could not. Yet he felt her mood through his own. She was changing, relenting. She wished him to be happy, she wished to try to offer him recompense for the long, dull, aching misery that she had caused him. All this passed through his mind in a single flash of thought, but he could not utter it. Miss Richmond was getting into the carriage without making any sign that he could interpret. "I shall come over to Yarell," he said. "I shall come purposely to see if you have remembered what it was that you wanted to say to me to-night."

The carriage went slowly up the cliff side. Bartholomew and Kirkoswald followed, talking, as men will talk, of anything and everything so that it be not the thing nearest to them at the moment. Bartholomew could not help feeling both perplexed and disappointed. He had been so certain that the coming of Miss Richmond to Soulegrif Dight had in some way been connected with the circumstances that were pressing so heavily upon himself. She had come to disclaim any influence over her brother—to decline to be responsible for him or for his actions. There were many wide-motives that she might have had. It was not uncharacteristic of her to choose a place and time so singular for any communication that she might have to make. But when opportunity came she had taken no advantage of it. And Bartholomew knew that it was not for him to do so. Diana Richmond had had nothing to do with the transactions between her brother and himself.

And Miss Richmond made no mention of the matter during the drive home. Genevieve waited expectantly; she spoke of her father, of his work, but she did not succeed in eliciting any response that would have made it easy for her to go at once to the heart of this strange involution of things that was testing her father's strength so far. But before the carriage stopped ■ Netherbank, Genevieve was certain that Diana Richmond's impassiveness in the matter was a conscious and deliberate impassiveness.

"Miss Richmond knows ■ all," she said to her father next morning, as he sat there with the clear light shining down upon him, and upon the work that he could not touch. "There is something behind that we cannot see. But we shall see if we wait."

"Do you know what waiting means, child?"

"Yes, at least I think I do. And by way of preparing for the worst I have given Ke ■ a week's holiday."

There was no exclamation, no expostulatory remark. Bartholomew had arrived at the point when a man becomes aware that expostulation is idle, and exclamation frivolous. He accepted, with a keen pang, the idea that his daughter must light his kitchen fire, prepare his dinner, and sweep his room. The only thing that made the idea supportable was the thought of compensation. He had a theory that a time of sadness and trial is usually followed by a time of peace and satisfaction.

"I have only to think of George Herbert when I am trying to handle Keturah's broom in the morning," Genevieve said. They were sitting in the firelight. The day had gone, and after much persuasion Keturah had gone too, but not without tears and protestations.

"You are thinking of Herbert's poem?" Bartholomew asked.

"Yes."

*'Who sweeps a room as for Thy law,
Meets that and the other too.'*

So I shall sweep conscientiously, and if I am awkward I shall think of Natalie Nanshkin."

"And it will not be for long, dear."

"But you are not thinking that I am speaking of it because I mind it, father? In deed you should know me better than that. No one enjoys new experiences and experiments more than I do, I enjoy them for their own sake. And there is more behind this," Genevieve added, with a change of tone.

"Yes, there is more behind," Bartholomew replied. "Through all this trial I have felt that it was a permission to taste a little of the cup of pain as it is mixed for others. Think of the people who all their life long live as we are living now—in fear, in uncertainty, and on the very verge of want. One finds the secret of such sorrow. It is not hunger, nor the dread of death by hunger. It is the continued mental anxiety, never lifted, never relaxed. . . . May God help but one such sufferer for my suffering and my prayer to-night," he added reverently, as a fresh gust of wind dashed a shower of slaty hail upon the window pane.

It was not the delicate, rarely-seen rime that whitened and brightened the world next morning, but the effect of the light shower of snow that had fallen during the stormy night was almost equally beautiful. If it were less mystic, more pronounced, it was also less evanescent.

Genevieve dressed herself in the chill twilight with a decided feeling of novelty and content. She would have no part to take for her father's cheering and sympathy. An old tennis apron was carefully pinned on. "I think I shall carry a duster in the pocket permanently," she said to herself, with a smile. Then, in a graver mood, she sat down to glance for a few moments over the pages of a book that was lying on the table.—

"O righteous Father, and ever be praised, the hour is come that Thy servant is to be proved."

"O beloved Father, meet and right it is that in this hour Thy servant should suffer something for Thy sake."

"Father, evermore to be honoured, the hour is come which from all eternity Thou didst foreknow should come, that for a short time Thy servant should outwardly be oppressed, but inwardly should ever live with Thee."

How small everything seemed when it was set in such a light! How trivial these crosses and labours were! She could only go down-stairs yearning to put her best strength into each moment as it came, to do whatever her hand found to do with all the might that was in her.

These were the words that went on echoing, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do." They seemed to be in the frosty air that was coming in at the open door. It was the orchard-door. Her father had gone down to the studio then! She would follow him at once. Doubtless he was attempting some deed that she must swallow—lighting the studio fire, perhaps, or cleaning the grate.

All the way down under the rugged snow-laden apple trees Genevieve went, smiling and prematurely scolding. A young spruce-thr threw its strong, snowy arms across the doorway, yet Genevieve could see that the door was open. There was a little porch of trellis work, with some dark, bright ivy clustering about it, and underneath . . . what was the meaning of the thing that she saw underneath?

What might it mean to see standing there, leaning back against the little porch, two large pictures in handsome brightly gilded frames? One on either side they stood, only half under cover.

At the first glance Genevieve saw that they were the Yarell Croft pictures.

At the second glance she saw the hand that had painted them lying outstretched across the floor, the grey head that had concurred them lying upon the fallen arm. The face was downward . . . the dark, prostrate figure sterile . . .

But one cry—but one great, piercing cry went up through the silence—

"My father! my father! my father! Would God I had died for that!"

"And it will not be for long."

AMONG THE PEEBLESSHIRE HILLS.

By THE EDITOR.

WE have all heard the saying of the man of Peebles, "I ha'e been to Paris, and I ken Peebles, and it's Peebles for pleeshure!" This verdict is somewhat different from that of Lord Cockburn, "As quiet as Peebles or the grave!" We agree with both conclusions. We can well understand the preference for Peebles over Paris entertained by the wearied soul on his return after an "excursion" to the brilliant French city. How utterly confounded must he have felt when he found himself launched into the whirl of "doing" endless galleries, churches, boulevards, museums, within the prescribed three days! What a night-mare impression must he have carried back of gilded restaurants with their crowd of garçons with cropped hair, and unintelligible jabber, of café chantants, and of the ceaseless loss of money in an unknown courage! And we can also understand Lord Cockburn's sense of the stupidity of the slumberous little town, in whose daily annals the chasing of a cat by a dog used to form an event.

But it is not of Peebles, but of the solitary Highlands of Peeblesshire that we mean to write, and we assert that for a nerve bracing holiday, and for such enjoyment as springs from an abounding sense of renewed vigour in the new and new, there is nothing better than the wide freedom of such a pastoral region as is to be found there. It is no small advantage for one whose daily lot lies, as ours does, within the smoky atmosphere of Glasgow, to exchange the roar of commerce, by means of a two hours' journey by rail, for the bleat of sheep and the scream of the curlew, and to breathe an atmosphere purified to an altitude of eight hundred feet above the sea. There is much "pleeshure" in this alone. People in London can doubtless enjoy exquisite excursions into the umbrageous quiet of Kent, or have a bath in fresh sea-air or sea-water at Brighton or Hastings. But such changes are not to be compared to the swift passage from the din of streets to those solitary sheep walks. Not only do you look out on the ancient peace of "nature undefiled," but you have also the advantage of getting among people who are living in a world whose interests are as different from yours as those of the dwellers in Shetland or the Faroe Islands. For we require change of mental as well as physical surroundings, and the stalwart shepherd tending his "hazel" or working his sagacious collics on the hill-side has nothing in common with merchant or manufacturer.

This region has another advantage. It is almost unknown to tourists, and there is as yet scarcely "a villa" erected for summer visitors.

I let it from me to give these Southern Highlands of Scotland any preference over the Northern, or, indeed, over any true mountain-land. It is only as humble, though respectable, members of the great confraternity which embraces the Alps and Himalayas, Ben Nevis and Snowdon, that I would claim some recognition for Broad Law and Culter Fell. It is in that part of Peeblesshire, where I assert the greatest amount of "pleeshure" can be had, that the chain of hills stretching across Scotland from St Abb's Head to the sea-wall of Galloway attains its greatest altitude. There Broad Law, Dollar Law, and Culter Fell rise to heights of from 2,400 to 2,700 feet, and look down on green pastoral glens, watered by the upper reaches and tributaries of the Tweed and here and there edged with farm lands.

The Southern Highlands are, indeed, quite different from our own Highlands, where Gaelic and Grandeur reign supreme. Here there is no varying outline of shattered peak and gloomy scarp, no jagged sky-line, no rocky precipice. The hills swell into bulky forms, majestic in their wavy massiveness. They are strong and dignified, with their broad folds sweeping up in graceful lines, like the billows of a mighty sea, but they are wanting in that rugged splendour of rock and corry which especially characterizes the Western Highlands. They accordingly present a tamer surface for the play of light and shade. The passing shadow, or spear-like shaft of sunlight, may wander across "Hope" or "Fell," and fine effects are produced by the changing tints of bracken or heather, but there is little of that wondrous intricacy and subtlety of colour which make Ben Venue and Glen Coe a study for the artist. Here every tuft of heather fringing the projecting boulders becomes a lurking-place for delicate tints, each rocky face presents an edge to catch a clearer warmth, or to shelter a deeper shadow. The burns and glens of the two regions are also different. A true Highland burn runs in ceaseless waterfalls along a course sunk deep under overhanging cliffs and thickets of haze.

and birch To climb its bed is ■ vast hiding places of untold beauty, where ferns and mosses and grey roots and soft mosses, dappled with lights breaking through the roof of copse, surround the pools, into which the stream tumbles in foam. The burns in Peeblesshire, on the contrary, run in rapids, but have scarcely ever a fall. They are open streams with grassy banks. You can trace their "wan water" for miles without a break.

There is, indeed, something characteristic of the difference between Celt and Lowlander to be discovered in the contrasts which their respective hill countries present. The north has all the strong mobility of feeling, the quick passion, "the love of loves, the hate of hates" which belong to its people. The ceaseless variety, the grace as well as stormy wildness of the Celtic mountains are wanting in the southern. There is a respectable but prosaic monotony of bigness about the latter not unlike the cautious nature of its people. Mr. Buckle could find here an illustration of his historical theory. The calculating manner in which the burns manage to get along without a tumble, the utilitarianism in which the hills lend their lower ground to turnips and potatoes, while they grow upon their slopes no useless brushwood nor exquisite clusters of natural bush or ancient pine, but are patched and blistered over with walled plantations of spindly larch, soon to be sold as railway sleepers—all this is in marked contrast to Highland habits of hill and glen. There is a chivalrous passion in the rapid rush with which the northern mountains on sudden dress themselves in all the colours of the tartan, and as suddenly gloom into storm. There is nothing "douce" or staid about them. They share the sentiments of Rob Roy rather than Bailie Nicol Jarvie as to the nature of trade value.

Yet the hills of Peeblesshire have their own grandeur, and the people have their own great merits. But these merits or demerits are not the merits or demerits of the Celt. There is an honest independence and a sturdy determination among them which if put to proof reveals the fire of the old Border spirit. I have also seldom met more intelligent and thoughtful men than some of the labourers and shepherds among these hills. But you can scarcely rouse the man of Peeblesshire into the use of any strong expression of emotion as you can rouse the Highlander. Describe to him the most grievous murder, and he will reply, "That was surely no vera wise like!" If it is raining in torrents, he will tell you "It's rather milt." Contrast this with an actual scene in an Highland steamer. As she approaches a certain pier a shock-headed drover rushes up to the bridge in violent haste and pushing himself on to the utmost verge of the paddle box, which rises and falls with the lift of the sea, he shouts in Gaelic against the wind, and apparently addressing at large the audience ashore, "Is Red Murdoch there?" There is no answer, and he again yells, "Is Red Murrachy not there?" "No," replies a cautious voice, "Red Murdoch went away an hour ago." "Every curse be on Red Murrachy!" In an instant the shouters had subsided, and, on inquiry, the cause of the outburst was found to be disappointment in not getting a "lift" home in Red Murrachy's cart! A respected minister, who is also a Peeblesshire laird, told me the following story illustrative of the matter-of-fact manner of the people. There was an old invalid man on Tweedside who was tended by a faithful Abigail. Like many frail persons he was always anticipating his own speedy demise. "I'm thinkin', Nancy," he said one day, "that it canna be lang noo I feel as if this verri nicht the end wud cam." "Indeed, laird," said the attendant, "if it were the Lord's will it wud be real convenient, for the coo's gaen to calve, and I dinna weel see hoo I am to tend on ye baith!" This, however, can be matched, I am bound to say, by another story lately told to me, the scene of which lay in the Perthshire Highlands. The minister had gone to see a dying parishioner, and when he reached the cottage he found the family bathed in tears. "Is he worse?" he asked. "Oh, sir, he's just deen!" was the reply given in an agony of sorrow. Looking towards the "box bed" where the sufferer lay, he was astonished to see two men bending over it. "What are they doing there?" "Eh, sir, they're just shaving him!" "Shaving him!" said the minister in amazement, "can they not let the poor man die in peace?" "It's far eavier noo!" was the strange answer which mingled with the sobbing.

What days of joy are these when the first escape is made from town and when on the bright May-day we can fill our lungs with such air "as angels breathe," and when the first long stretch is taken up some of the great brown hills! The young lambs are then frisking over the close-nibbled grasses on the lea, and the glossy crows flash their wings as they tug some muscular worm from his lair. The Scotch fir, their branches glowing with a metallic lustre, stand grandly out against the blue sky, as we pass on to the higher slopes where the brackens are beginning to unfold the green fronds from their curled and shaggy stalks. And now we are joined by the screaming "whaup," as the curlew is here called, and by the plover, who sweeps down in circles to avert us from intruding on the brooding mate. Higher up, among the heather—still black as winter—we stir the "whirring gor cock" into flight, and higher still we go, till the summit is reached, with only peat-bags, and stiff bent, bleached with storm. Then how glorious is the view over the wide sea of hills, each one recalling some memory of former summers! There is Cardon, on whose crest we gathered bunches of coral scarlet cloudberry, and there the long sweep of Broad Law, from whose kingly crest, carpeted with thick mosses of grey-green such as "High Art" might long to imitate, we had looked down on St. Mary's Loch, and across to Eitrick Forest, and to the Minchmure (sacred to dear Dr. John Brown) and to the twin Eildons which gaze on Abbotsford. And there beside Broad Law towers that other height that overlooks Manor Water, with Sir Gordian's Kirk, and where nestles the venerable cottage of "The Black Dwarf." "He was a queer cross body," said an old gentleman who knew him when a boy, "and many a fight he gave me."

These scenes are ever varying in beauty with the change of season. For in autumn these same hill-sides become a sea of blooming heather, which at every plange of the foot sends up a honey-scented cloud of flower dust. And still later, then glory is not lessened when the first touch of frost has tinted the brackens into russet and yellow, which, mingled with the brown of the heath and the green of the rushes, produce effects rich as the colouring of a pheasant's breast. Then the rowans, too, are in their splendour, their scarlet clusters being even eclipsed by the marvellous hues of their leafage. Each tree becomes then a "burning bush" of pale flame and fiery red.

The charm of Tweedside is, however, the human interest which clings to every hill and glen. Poetry and prose, legend and history, lie scattered along its course. It is in some respects the home of the romance and chivalry of Scotland. We are carried a long way back as we look out on these heights, now clothed with heather, and recall the time when they formed part of the great Caledonian Forest and were the haunts of the deer and wild boar. If such authorities as Mr. Skene and Professor Vetch are to be followed we are at the very centre of many of the Arthurian legends. Here the Cymri had urged their failing strength against Pict and Angle and Saxon. The Cymric names which still survive speak of the time when Welsh was the native language, and the "rings" or circular camps formed on the high places by the glens, bring us back to the period when the early Britons who had once felt the length of the Roman sword, watched the signals which betokened the approach of their new foes. Down there at Drummelzier, "where Powisail joins the Tweed," is the traditional grave of the wizard Merlin. Amid the tangled forests on these hills had he wandered half crazed and half inspired. And near this same Powisail had he met Kentigern—a marvellous meeting—the last of the old heathen prophets and the first preacher of the new faith.

The district is also thickly strewn with the ruins of a later but not less romantic time, when every little "laird" set up as a chief, and had his "Peel," or fortalice, from which he waged incessant warfare with his neighbours. In spite of the chivalry which romance rightly attributes to these daring Borderers, we cannot be too thankful for the exchange from feudal heroism to the rule of county police. Life must have been intolerable in those "good old" times. Standing near Merlin's grave we can count, within a radius of about two miles, the ruins of eight Peels, which were little better than nests of robbers. Drummelzier Castle, the nearest of them all, was the home of a family of the name of Tweedie, which spent its existence assailing its neighbours. The Records of the Privy Council contain repeated complaints against them, for "dinging with grievous strokes" this man, and "for cutting off the lugges" of that other. Indeed, the whole country side seems to have been alive with quarrel. Life in these square little towers must have been also as uncomfortable as it was insecure. Poets may draw fascinating pictures of the dining-halls, where the wassail bowl was passed and the smoking venison was carved, but only persons who were all day in the open air, and who were blessed with nerveless frames, could have endured the close and foul atmosphere that must have prevailed in these small thick-walled and ill-lit chambers, their floors strewn with damp rushes, huge dogs growling and gnawing the bones that had been pitched to them, while master and servant, huntsman and cow-herd all gathered at the same long table, and let loose their ravenous appetites.

A walk up Tweedside from Drummelzier to Tweedsmuir, and then by Tala and Meggat Water to St. Mary's Loch, embraces some of the best scenery and the most interesting places in this part of the county, and we cannot do better than take it. The Tweed, more of a stream than a river, lies quite open throughout its course from Drummelzier to the mossy well, where it rises among the green hills above Moffat Dale. Scarcely a bush fringes its banks to catch the line of the angler. The hills that immediately enclose the valley are not always picturesque in colour or in form. The finest "bits" are to be found in the glens which open eastwards, and the grandest walks are to be enjoyed by penetrating these, and reaching along from ridge to ridge behind the wall of hill that looks down on Tweed. Yet it is the Tweed that carries with it the story of the land and its people. There is scarcely a glen or ancient house which has not its old ballad or story. As we pass Mossfennan we seem to hear the old story how—"The king rode round the Moreclough Road

With spotted hounds and speckled hives,
Then lighted down at Mossfennan yet,
A little below the Logan Lee."

On the other side of the stream opens the picturesque Stanhope Glen, near whose head can be traced part of the "Catrail," or great dyke, built by the Picts as a defence against the Cymri of Strathclyde. About a mile farther up three trees on a flat field near the river

Burns evidently knew the locality, for there is the "Logan Water," a trickling rivulet falling into Tweed from the fine open Logan
Lea on the opposite side

Another couple of miles brings us—past the spot where stood Chapel Kingledoon, built by the early missionary St. Cuthbert—to Polmood. The new house stands on the site of the famous old mansion of the Hunters.
The ancient yew trees in front are now the only survivors of that past—commemorated in the ballad of "Young Polmood," and which Hogg has made the subject of one of his Border Tales—when the Scottish king came from Meggat Forest to hunt by Tweed.

These yews are of an age which makes it possible that the handle of many a battle axe may have been taken from them. They must also have seen the gathering of the horsemen in the early morning of June, when Murray, Prince Charlie's secretary, was arrested, as he was taking shelter in Polmood, whose mistress was his own sister. Murray, himself a Peeblesshire laird, is no honour to his county. No name became more execrated by the Jacobites than his, who saved his life by turning informer. The weird ballad "Murray and Cumberland's Descent into Hell," displays the intensity of this hatred.

Another turn of the road brings us to the Crook Inn, the little hostelry where William Black ends 'The Adventures of a Phaeton' with the climax of all good novels—an avowal of love and a happy engagement.

And now the upper reaches of the Tweed assume a new character. The heather disappears from the hills, and all is green and soft, fold behind fold and intensely pastoral.
In the middle-foreground, not far from where the keep of the ancient Frasers or Frasers of Oliver stood, there rises from the summit of a wooded knoll the pretty spire of the parish church of Tweedsmuir. ■ was a delight to worship there in the warm days of summer, when the stalwart shepherds, in rough, homespun clothes, with plaids on shoulder and crook in hand, gathered ■ the "kirk yett," waiting till the last tinkle of the bell put an end to the "craik," shepherd greeting shepherd coming from distant cots in lonely glens. A more intelligent or sturdier congregation ■ would be difficult ■ find. Here they have given up the old custom of lugging their colliers with them ■ church, as is still done in many similar parishes. Strange stories are told of the scenes which occur on such occasions in some of the churches among the Cheviots ■ is related that when the late Principal Lee was preaching in a pastoral district he was surprised that none of his congregation rose when he pronounced the benediction. When he asked the reason he was informed that it was "tae cheat the dowry, for when we used to stan' they made us a yaff-yaffin' at the thoct that they were to get oot that we never stan' noo, just to keep them quate." Another story is related of how an old minister in the Cheviots used, when excited in the pulpit, to raise his voice to a loud half whimper, half whine. One day a shepherd had brought with him a young collier, who became so thrilled by the high note of the preacher that he also broke out in a quaver so like the other that the minister stopped short. "Put out that collier!" he said angrily. The shepherd, equally angry, seized the animal by the neck and, as he dragged him down the passage, sent back the growling retort at the pulpit, "It was yerse! begoud (began) it!"

There is in the churchyard a stone with a touching inscription commemorating the death of one of the many Covenanters who belonged to this region. He was escaping from Claverhouse's dragoons, and flying for his life up a pass which leads out of the deep gorge a few miles off, called the "Devil's Beef Tub." When he reached the Col, being of weak chest, he became utterly exhausted and begged his companion to push on. In a few moments the dragoons had overtaken him and he was a dead man!

Here leaving Tweed, wandering up among the green hills, we turn aside up Tala Water, —to reach Meggat and so on to St. Mary's Loch. Tala, with its tributary the Gameshope, ■ perhaps the wildest and most picturesque of all the Peeblesshire glens. The sketch which is given, in our full-page picture, is taken near the opening of the true glen. The finer scenery is farther on, where the hills rise on the steepest angle at which it seems possible for soil to rest or sheep to graze, and where they consequently present a surface ■ wrinkled with sheep tracks as to resemble the wavelets, each following each, on a summer sea. At the head of the glen, where Tala Linn tumbles from rock to rock and from basin to basin for about 250 feet, the Gameshope joins it, rising in its loch—

"The mist-filled air that shimmering lies,
Dark grey amid the moors."

And here too the rough track winds up across the Col to the head of Meggat Water, that stretches down for some seven miles, wide, green, solitary, to Henderland and the quiet sheet of ■ Mary's Loch. This was one of the royal forests, to which the kindly Stewart, used to come to hunt, staying at their lodge of Cramalt—that square tower still standing in its strength half-way down the glen. "Forest" was probably a true description of what the country then was. That ■ was full of game is witnessed by the record how James V., accompanied by many gentlemen, went "to Meggatland, in the quilk bounds was slain at that tyme aughtine score of deer." Now it is one of the greenest and loneliest of valleys. The quiet of its hills is disturbed by no sound save the bleat of the sheep and the song of the stream. It is touched throughout with that feeling so marvellously expressed by Wordsworth in lines which give the very soul of the Border glens.—

"Milk-loveliness in founts then spread,
A vision, still and holy,
The grove of forest charming decayed,
And pastoral melancholy."

Let no one pass through these glens without making the acquaintance of the shepherds. The herds' houses that are pressed here and there, near the roaring burns, may seem humble enough, and the rosy barns, that rush out at the doors amid the cackle of disturbed poultry, may be as shy as wild deer, but there is a hospitable frankness in the gude-wife, and when his natural reserve is overcome, there is a reflective intelligence discovered ■ the shepherd which makes it worth while knowing him. Never, except among the Bedouin tribes to the east of the Dead Sea, have ■ seen such specimens of open-air vigour as some of these shepherds present. Look at that tall fellow, supple and straight, his naturally sand-coloured hair and beard bleached into paler shades by exposure to wind and storm. Every lock is curled and knotted by the crisp breezes. Watch him as ■ strides up the hill with long steady pace, or bends over the scythe, and with mighty sweep mows the rushy meadows, and tell me if you do not envy that magnificent physique.

At the foot of Meggat, near the modern farmhouse of Henderland, there is a round plantation, which marks the site of Cockburn's

Castle. In the middle of the wood stands an old grave-stone, on which is engraven a sword, and, round the edge, the inscription runs, "Here lyes Perys Cockburn and his wife Marjorie." Let historical criticism say what it may, I prefer the traditional belief that this is the grave of that brave Borderer Cockburn whom the king hung, not without decent, over the gate of his own castle. The most touching of all ballads is that which commemorates the sorrow of the widow when all alone she buried her lord and master.

"I wad hae about, making my mane;
I watch'd his corpse, myself alive;
I watch'd his body night and day;
No living creature came that way.
I took his body on my back,
And whiles I gaed and whiles I sat;
I digg'd a grave, and laid him in,
And hagg'd him in the sod and green.
But think na ye my heart was sair,
When I laid in the mou? his yellow hair;
O think na ye my heart was wae
When I turned about away to gae?
Nae luv'n' man I'll love again,
Since that my lovely knight is slain;
Wi' ae lock o' his yellow hair,
I'll chain my heart for ever there."

And now our walk, as far as Peeblesshire is concerned, must end, for we here cross into Selkirkshire, and there is St. Mary's Loch and Yarrow, and the Loch o' the Lowes—centres all of poetry and song, which would require a volume to describe. The first time we took this walk we entred the day at the famous hostelry of Tibbie Shiels, the "howf" of Christopher North and Walter Scott and Lockhart, and the immortal Ettrick Shepherd. Tibbie was then alive, and, though blind with age, was full of intelligence. It was curious to see how her mind moved more in that old past than the present. We were speaking to her about the Ettrick Shepherd's family, whom we had lately seen. "Ay," she replied, "young Maister Hogg sent me a copy o' his father's works, and I thoct it real kind in him. Had it been James himself I wadna hae thoct sae muckle about it, for I kent him that weel, but he was uncommon kind o' Maister Hogg."

IN THE GLEN.

THE fairy folk had frosted o'er the glen,
And set with jewels ev'ry blade of grass;
The snow lay drifted in the niches, when
A glory rarefied the crystal pass.
"Two ice-ds that clung together by a pool,
Ice-bound were held apart, estranged and cool;
"How weak together!" said I, and my heart
Thought its own thought, and sighed, "How weak apart!"

HERMIONE.

MOHAMMEDAN MAHDIS.

By PROFESSOR W. ROBERTSON SMITH, LL.D.

FIRST PAPER.

DURING the last few months every one has been speaking of the Mahdi, but comparatively few, it is safe to say, have connected any precise idea with the title assumed by Sheikh Mohammed of Dongola, or have had before their minds in using that title the remarkable passages in the past history of Islam, which the name of Mahdi calls up to the Oriental student. And, singularly enough, uncertainty as to the true meaning of a word which is far from uncommon in Arabic authors has not been confined to persons ignorant of Arabic. For as the name of the Mahdi is written in ordinary Arabic books, that is without the points marking the vowels, it is possible to read and explain it in more than one way. A writer in the Times, who may be safely identified with an Arabic scholar of most distinguished eminence, has recently proposed to speak, not of the Mahdi, but of the Muhdi, and interprets the word as meaning "the guide," the spiritual and inspired guide, that is, of the followers of Islam. It is well therefore to observe at the outset that it can be shown conclusively that this view, though supported by an eminent scholar, is certainly wrong. Without going into questions of grammar enough to say that the decision between the current pronunciation and that proposed in the Times can be made at once, if the word is found in verse, by the simple process of scansion. Now there are abundance of verses in which the Mahdi is spoken of, and they prove that the current pronunciation is correct.* They prove, also, that the word is the passive participle of a verb meaning ■ guide, and the Mahdi therefore is not the guide of the faithful, but he who is himself guided by divine grace and inspiration. The simple meaning of the word being thus fixed, let us proceed to ask what history has to tell regarding the ideas which Moslems connect with the notion of the divinely-guided chief, and the influence which these ideas have long exercised on the populations of the Mohammedan world.

The notion of the Mahdi ■ no part of the original scheme of Mohammedanism. According to Mohammedan language, in which the guidance is a synonym for the revelation embodied in the Koran, the name of the rightly-guided ought strictly to mean one who is guided by the heavenly book. ■ might, therefore, be applied ■ any prophet, for the eternal and uncreated Koran, the Word of God in heaven, was the source from which all the prophets from Adam to Mohammed derived their revelation. Before Mohammed the number of prophets was enormous, Moslem tradition generally reckons them at 124,000. But none of these had any function that is not covered by the function of Mohammed, or anything to tell which is not summed up in the final and complete revelation given to him. Mohammed ■ the seal of the prophets, and his Koran is identified with the archetypal heavenly book, which was the source of all earlier revelation, and can never need to be supplemented by a new prophecy. According to Mohammedan doctrine, in its strictly orthodox form, the man who seeks divine guidance must look for it in the Koran. From the death of Mohammed onward to the day of judgment the God of Islam is as remote from contact with man as the god of philosophical deism, but while the deist seeks his knowledge of the distant God from reason the Moslem seeks it from the Koran.

Mohammed took his view of revelation from a very superficial acquaintance with Judaism and Christianity. The possession of sacred books appeared to him to be the characteristic advantage over paganism which these faiths possessed, and he desired to give to his own followers a revelation which should be to them what the Old and New Testaments were to the followers of Moses and Jesus. These books were the monuments of the work of the old prophets, and it never occurred to him that a new prophet could have any other function than to frame a new book. He knew too little to understand that neither the seers of the Old Testament nor Jesus—for to Mohammed Jesus, too, is simply one of the prophets—had ever conceived their function ■ be ■ give ■ their followers such a code of faith and life ■ Islam has in the Koran. The prophets of the Old Testament looked on themselves as parts of a continual series of messengers from God to man, the relation of Israel ■ Jehovah did not depend on a finished book, but was an unbroken living and personal relation. When prophecy had ceased Israel began ■ live by a written code, the Pentateuchal law, but even under the law the Jews looked forward to a renewal of the prophetic succession, or to the coming of a Messianic age governed by a king inspired by the divine Spirit. And so, too, in Christianity, the gospel is a final revelation, not in the sense that ■ makes further intercourse between God and man unnecessary, but only because it raises that intercourse to its final and satisfactory form. The doctrine of the continual presence of the Spirit in the Church is as necessary a part of Christianity as the doctrine of the finished work of the Redeemer.

Thus when Mohammed copied from Judaism and Christianity the idea of a book, and thought that this book supplied all that religion required, he omitted the very elements in the earlier religions which gave them their enduring power to quicken and sustain the hearts of men. So long as Mohammed himself was in the midst of the Moslems, and God could be directly approached through him, the qualities of a living faith were present in Islam, and the baldness of its theoretical deism was not felt. When the prophet died the Moslems were left with an authoritative exposition of doctrine and of law, with a strong conviction of the truth of their religion and of its victorious destiny, but the living cord which connected the community of faith with its divine Sovereign had been snapped asunder, and was never to be renewed. The Moslems could neither look, like the Jews, for a continuance or a revival of prophecy, nor, like the Christians, could they feel that through the indwelling of the Spirit heaven still stood in personal contact with earth. A religion of this kind, in which God has departed from among men, and has only left His law behind, in which the supreme object of faith stands so far aloof that even the prayers addressed to Him are little more than formal praises, leaves one whole side of man's religious wants untouched, and the historian may safely predict that if it lives and spreads over any great society ■ man, ■ will do so only by taking up elements that really belong to very different systems of faith.

The absence of any way of personal access to and contact with God, which makes Mohammedanism the barest and coldest of all religions, was not very much felt at first. On the one hand, the true Arab ■ singularly lacking in religious sensibility. No race of men, above the rank of savages, appears to feel the need for a religion so little as the Bedouins. The ultimate success of Mohammed himself had been much more political than religious. He was most truly a prophet before the flight to Medina; and then, when ■ spoke only in the power of his faith, from an intense conviction of the one moral government of the world and of the supreme reality of the day of judgment, he found few followers. At Medina a new sphere opened itself to him. He was called to speak in the name of God as a judge in the affairs of daily life. The lawless Arabs, too proud to yield to a human authority, were willing to submit to a divine sentence, which laid them under no humiliating sense of subjection to a brother man. The need for some supreme authority was clamant; yet no authority of merely human sanction could have secured obedience. Mohammed's enthusiasm was but one side of his character—the other, which became year by year the most prominent side, was a great practical shrewdness and much tact in dealing with men. Without these gifts the name of prophet would have served him little, with them it made him in a few years the real king of Arabia, with every regal power, but without the name and state of a king, which the Arabs had never long consented to endure. The success of the Moslem state created a faith and an enthusiasm which no spiritual arguments could have produced. Few men had believed in the preacher of Mecca, but all Arabia gathered round the Lord of Medina, and that not wholly by force or from fear, but in part at least in genuine conviction that a religion must be true which had produced such palpable and solid results.

The death of Mohammed imperilled for a moment the State, and therefore also the Faith of Islam. But the Moslem leaders were strong men, and held their course victoriously against ■ rebellion before which weaker chieftains would have sunk. And very soon the conquest of Syria, of Africa, and of Irak, the spoils of the Greeks and the Persians, the elevation of the Arab nation into the greatest conquering power ■ the world, ■ asipated the last doubts of the half-converted tribes ■ to the truth of a religion which had given them even in this life rewards which their wildest imaginations had never pictured.

The period of prosperous conquest that followed on the death of Mohammed so fully satisfied every aspiration of the Arabs that it left them little time or inclination to think about the shortcomings of their new religion, even if they had had more disposition than they really possessed for looking seriously ■ the spiritual problems of life. A religion excellent for the battle-field Mohammed had certainly given them. Fatalism, which in a decaying state of society saps all effort, and produces a deathlike inactivity, has always proved a stimulus to the vigour of an active and warlike race. Great soldiers have commonly something of the fatalist. And in Mohammedanism fatalism was associated with the persuasion that death on the battle-field in the cause of Islam was the sure way of entrance to a heaven which embraced in its delights precisely the same sensual enjoyments as reward the victorious soldier after a successful campaign. To this it must be added that the religious observances of the Koran are closely allied to the forms of military discipline. They have the same precision, regularity, and simplicity as the rules of a camp. The armies of Islam then had little occasion to doubt that the prophet had given to them a true and perfect religion.

But the very successes of Islam soon exposed the new religion to fresh and more trying tests. The vast conquests of the Arabs had to be organized; the Arabs themselves, loaded with wealth beyond the dreams of avarice, raised in a short generation from the narrow life of the desert to dominion over the fairest regions of the East, had to learn the laws and habits of a wholly new life. The great Caliph Omar, who did so much for the consolidation of the new empire, strove hard to preserve among the conquerors the simple type of martial life which was most easily reconciled with the institutions he accepted as divine. But it was impossible in the long run to make the Moslems a mere army, or to preserve the primitive system which divided the rewards of victory between all soldiers of the true faith, and forbade the individual Moslem to acquire landed property in the conquered regions. The growth of a great empire brought with it the growth of social inequalities, the conflict of private interests, the struggles of private ambition. Very soon the Moslem world ceased to present the spectacle of united and disciplined devotion to a great cause, of the equality of all the faithful under a divine law. There was no thing religious about the dominion of Islam except the enthusiasm which carried the Arabs on to victory or death, the empire, once conquered, became a prey to the most ordinary human ambition, not rendered more respectable by a hypocritical assumption of religious zeal. Old tribal feuds burned as fiercely as in the days of ignorance, the ancestral authority of ancient families proved stronger than the authority of religion, the lands of Islam were ravaged by contending factions, the kingdom of Allah and his prophet became the heritage of men who might claim indeed to be the successors of Mohammed, but were really sovereigns of the familiar and unchanging type of Eastern despotism. To the religious mind—and there were religious minds even among the Arabs—it was no longer possible to dwell with complacency on a society which professed to be the community of the true faith, but was really no more than a new oriental kingdom of the most worldly type.

One of the most interesting points in the history of early Mohammedanism is the rise of the Khawārij or Nonconformists, soldiers of the faith who felt that the new empire was forsaking the paths of a religious kingdom, who refused to be the subjects of a state religious only in name, and who strove with all the constancy and all the vehemence of English Puritanism to adhere to the ideal of the first days of militant Islam.

But if the Islam of the Caliphate was felt to be a failure even by Arabs, much less could it satisfy the ideals and aspirations of the subject races who were not themselves of Arab blood. The religion of the conquerors was accepted by vast numbers of the conquered, not only in the Semitic lands, where the process of fusion with the victorious race was comparatively easy, but in Africa and Persia, among races all whose ideas were diametrically opposed to those of Arabia, and whom the true born Arabs despised and treated as slaves. The old faiths of these races had not strength enough to stand up against the enormous moral weight that was given by the first victories of Islam, and yet, though they accepted the Prophet and the Koran, it was quite impossible that these foreign and subject peoples should become in point of religion homogeneous with their conquerors. Orthodox Islam was a very different religion ■ the men whom it had made masters, and ■ the men whom it had made slaves. The latter had become Mohammedans under the overpowering practical proofs that God was with the armies of Islam, but the Islam which they adopted perforce from their conquerors was not the same thing to them as to their victors. Their conversion might insure their admission to Paradise, but ■ did not make their lot upon earth less intolerable.

The oppressed nations, then, demanded something more from their religion than a law book whose precepts were daily set at naught, and a day of judgment which lay on the other side of the grave. If God has given his law upon earth, His surely means ■ to be executed on earth. The princes and rulers who neglect that law cannot be governors of God's appointment. And yet in the divine plan a righteous king is surely the necessary complement of a righteous law. Can the God who has given the one, have wholly neglected to provide the other?

Arguments such as these could not fail to suggest themselves to many who groaned under the reign of universal violence, and their natural outcome was the expectation of a Messiah to cure the corruptions of Islam. The doctrine of the Messiah among the Jews had, in fact, taken shape under very similar conditions. I here speak, let me explain, not of Messianic hopes in the larger sense, but of that very definite picture of a righteous and victorious king, reigning on earth, but reigning with divine might and wisdom, which is so fully drawn in the Jewish Apocalyptic literature. The Messianic hopes of the Jews in this limitation took form under the domination of Pharisaism, the religious system most closely allied to that of Mohammed. ■ was, indeed, from Pharisaism, and not from the Old Testament, that Mohammed took his notion of revelation, and probably also his doctrine of the resurrection and last judgment. In both systems there was the same attempt to build a living religion on a mere code of law, and both systems, therefore, were exposed ■ the same failure as soon as it became plain that the heads and rulers of the commonwealth cared nothing for the divine law. ■ was the failure of the Hasmonean princes to rule as servants of God and his Torah that threw back the Jews on the old prophetic ideal of the true king, and led them to reshape that ideal ■ a picture of the righteous and all conquering Messiah. The failure of the Caliphs to reign as the true successors of the Prophet made room in like manner for the rise of Messianic ideas in Islam, but while the Jews found the materials an justification for these ideas in their sacred books, the Moslem Messiah had borrowed from alien faiths, partly from Islam, partly from the old ideas of the Aryan race. The oldest and simplest form of Messianic hope appears to have been expectation of the return of the Prophet Mohammed, which was preached in Egypt by a man of Jewish origin, Abdallah ibn Saba, as early as the Caliphate of Othman. Another old form of the doctrine, which an undoubtedly spurious tradition sought to base upon an utterance of Mohammed himself, accepted Jesus as the Messiah who should appear before the day of judgment to convert the Christians to Islam, destroy the Antichrist, and bring in a reign of universal prosperity. A minaret of the great mosque of Damascus has for many centuries been pointed out as the place where "Jesus the son of Mary" shall descend at the end of the world.

But the chief home of Messianic ideas was in Persia. Among the ancient Persians something of divinity had always attached to the person of the king, in fact they went so far as to hold an incarnation of the Godhead in the person of the reigning prince. To men trained in these ideas, the prophet king of Medina was intelligible enough, but that he should die and leave only a law behind him, to be administered by sovereigns who were men like any other, was a view with which they could not fall in. The Persians, moreover, were strict legitimists, their king must reign in right of descent, and so in accepting the Prophet they not only demanded as the head of their religion a man of like prerogatives to Mohammed, but claimed that he must be of Mohammed's family, or at least of the house of Ali, the lieutenant of the Prophet's own choice. These views received a definite direction from the tragical fate of Mohammed's son-in-law Ali, and his grand son Hosein. The life of Ali was little fitted to make him a national idol, but his death was more thought of than his life, and the Shi'a, or "party" of Ali, became the national party of the Persian race. According to the Shites, the dignity of Imam, or head of the true faith, was inherent in the house of the Prophet and the line of Ali. Opinions differed as to the exact line of succession, as to which living member of that house was at any moment the true Imam and spiritual head of all Moslems, but in all branches of the Shia, the fundamental principle was the same, and in all there was a disposition, carried out in varying degrees to elevate

Ali himself and the Imams, his successors, to more than human dignity, and to regard them as equipped with miraculous powers and as veritable representatives of God on earth.

The descendants of Ali were not unwilling to lend themselves to this belief whenever it seemed possible to aim, by the aid of Persian fanaticism, at overthrowing their rivals and seating themselves on the throne of empire. Countless rebellions took place in this way, and the descendants of the Prophet became a source of continual danger to the Omayyad and even to the Abbasid Caliphs. The natural result of this was that they were constantly suspected and often cruelly persecuted. Their sufferings served their cause better than any virtues could have done, and exalted them in the popular mind to the rank of saintly martyrs of supernatural merit. Their influence depended but little on their personal qualities. To the Persians the sheikhs of the house of Ali were the representatives of an idea which made hundreds of thousands of the warriors of Khorasan ready to shed their blood for a foreigner whom they had never seen.

Nay, such was the strength of this idea that at length it did not even require a real living person to attach itself to. It was not always possible to find an actual member of the house of Ali to represent the perilous dignity of the Imam. But the enthusiastic faith of the Persians was persuaded that the true Imam could never cease to exist, though he might be concealed from the eyes of men. In the darkest times God's sovereignty on earth was represented by the Hidden Imam, who in due time would appear to conduct his followers to victory and fill the world with righteousness.

The Hidden Imam of the Shia is the Shiite Mahdi, and both ideas appear for the first time in connection with a son of Ali, younger than the famous Hasan and Hosein, and known in history as Mohummud ibn al Hanafiya, or son of the Hanafite mother, to distinguish him from his brothers, the sons of Fatima, daughter of the Prophet. Like so many more of the Shiite heroes Mohammed, the son of Ali, plays but a small part in actual history. He is described as a man of amiable but retiring character, beloved by the people, but little inclined to make political capital of his birth and reputation. But for a short time he was brought forward as the nominal head of the Shia movement by the ferocious and ambitious Mokhtar, one of the stormiest characters in the stormy period that lies between the death of Moawiya and the re-establishment of the unity of the empire by Abdalmelik. Mokhtar, who had tried all parties, finally professed Shiite principles as those most likely to serve his ambition, proclaimed himself the avenger of the blood of Ali, and, by a combination of warlike ability and impudent jugglery addressed to the superstitions of his party, was for a short time the head of a very formidable faction in Irak. It suited his schemes to proclaim Mohammed as prince of the faithful and to describe himself as his lieutenant, and the throne name which he chose for his puppet was that of the Mahdi. Mohammed seems never to have much liked his association with Mokhtar, and on the fall of the latter he sank quietly into private life in the Hijaz, far from the battle-ground of his party. But many Shites continued to hold that he alone knew and had handed down to his successors the true doctrine of the Imamate, while others refused to believe in his death and taught that he had only withdrawn to Mt Radhwa, near Mecca, where he still lived, like Fredenc Baibarossa in the German legend, guarded by a lion and a tiger, nourished by two springs flowing with water and honey, and biding the time when he should reappear to fill the world with righteousness.

The title of Al Mahdi, given by Mokhtar to Mohammed ibn Hanafiya, appears to have been quite new, and it is very doubtful whether, on using it, he meant to ascribe to his puppet Imam the supernatural character which, in its later usage, the name implies. The poets of the Omayyad period seem to use the word as an epithet of the very worldly Caliphs of the time, who certainly put forth no pretensions analogous to those of the Shiite Imam. The executive head of a state, which professed to be guarded by the divine word embodied in the Koran might quite well be called "the divinely guided prince." It was presumably the growth of the legends about Mohammed ibn al Hanafiya that made the term Mahdi acquire a distinctly Messianic sense. In this sense it could hardly be used by any one save a pronounced Shiite. When the third Caliph of the house of Abbas took Al Madhi as his throne-name, he was probably influenced by the Shiite connections of his family, which was supposed to have inherited by testament the rights of Ibn Hanafiya and leaned for a time to Shia views, but to the more orthodox Mohammedans this throne name can only have appeared a plain title expressive of his submission to the divine law.

Among the Shites themselves the doctrine of the Hidden Imam could not for some time become so long as there was a living a pro-man of the house of Ali to look up to as true Imam kept out of his rights as a false Caliph. We have seen that the Shites were not always at one as to the descent of the true Imam. But before the close of the ninth century all the leading divisions of the party had ceased to be able to point to a living and visible head, and the opinion of the great mass of Shites in the present day is that the last true Imam was the twelfth in number, by name Mohammed, who disappeared mysteriously in the year 899. From this time the doctrine of the Hidden Imam became a necessary part of the Shiite faith, without which the sect could no longer continue to exist. Accordingly the Shites who acknowledge twelve Imams give the name of Mahdi to the last of these, who according to the Persians is the Mohammed just mentioned, and it is he whom they look for to reappear as their Messiah.

Labavagant as the Shiite doctrine of the Imamate and the Mahdi must appear to a Western mind, we see clearly enough that, like all religious ideas which have played a considerable part in the world's history, it derived its strength from the fact that it did in its own fantastic way appeal to a real religious need of the human soul. In demanding a divine leader as well as a divine book the Shites hit the weak point of Mohammed's system, a weak point which he himself had overlooked, and which indeed was not prominent so long as Islam had a living prophet as well as a sacred book. The cry for a divine leader was but one expression of the cry for a God nearer to man than the deism of Mohammed allowed. In one way or other the mass of Moslem populations have always striven to break through the rigid barrier which Mohammed set up between the human and the divine. It is this effort which on the one hand has filled Islam with magical superstitions and reintroduced something very like polytheism in the honours paid to saints, and on the other hand has based on the bare system of the Koran a totally incongruous structure of pantheistic mysticism such as we find among the Sufis.

Without some modification or some foreign supplement Mohammedanism seems scarcely able to exist, unless perhaps during a period of incessant holy wars. This is well seen in the example of the Wahhaby reformation, which was a serious and for a time most suc-

and attempt to restore the original Inca-own & pure Moslem deam. So long as it to militant system, with the sword ever in Judah, Wahhabism did wonders. But it Peysed away into a wretched and hypo that tyranny as soon as its warlike career checked. Its influence has scarcely endured for a century, and it never had a real hold on any but its own soldiers.

Having thus traced the growth of the doctrine of the Mahdi as it forms part of the official theology of the Persian Shia, we must reserve for another month some account of the part which the same idea has played in the Western parts of Islam. We shall then be introduced to historical events of much more stirring kind than anything in the present paper.

THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

Some Account of what has been done in Liverpool

By J. F. COLLIER.

THERE are no means of comparing the charities of one great town with those of another, and therefore, in saying a few words about Liverpool charities in general, before referring to the special subject of this article, I am instituting no comparisons. But the Liverpool charities are numerous and well organized. To prevent waste in the cost of collection, the greater part of them allow their funds to be collected by the Central Relief Society. From the returns of this Society, it appears that it collects and distributes subscriptions to seventy seven different charities, the amount being of late years in round numbers about £22,000 a year, of these seventy-seven charities, twenty were devoted entirely to children, including an infirmary, a convalescent home, orphanages, day nurseries, training ships, and other charities of a less important kind which are intended to smooth the lives of poor children and to make them better members of society. A great number of children of the poor in Liverpool are in fact taken charge of by societies of one sort or another, from the moment they are born in the lying-in hospital, to the time they leave the board or other schools and get employment for themselves.

The compulsory powers of the Education Act are in force in Liverpool, and therefore every child is supposed to go to school for some part of each day. These powers were strictly carried into effect, it is difficult to believe that the condition of the miserable ill fed and filthy half-naked children which now swarm in some of the streets could be as bad as it is. They could not be received into any school in that condition, and, if sent, inquiries would be made, and publicity would shame the parents in most cases into better treatment. It is a matter of common observation to people who have to do with elementary schools that the fact of sending a child to school has a good moral effect upon the parents, they do not like exposure, they do not like to see their children looking worse than those of their neighbours, and they make an effort where it is possible to do so, even at some sacrifice to themselves, to send their children better clothed and more cleanly than they would have been if they had simply remained in the street. But there is a class of men and women in all large towns, and notably in Liverpool, who cannot be reached by the school board, or, indeed, by any other beneficial agency. Their children's names are indeed generally on the roll of some school, but it is a mere matter of form. They cannot all be sent to trust schools, and owing to the objection to board schools by some religious denominations, the schools of those denominations become too full, and they are obliged to rely on a percentage of the scholars staying away, in order to keep the schools going at all, thus large numbers of children may be seen in the courts, alleys, and gutters of large towns whose parents are able to defy the school board.

Many of those parents have the vices of civilization grafted on the habits of savages. Order, regularity, and cleanliness are odious to them, they believe in nothing but force, nothing but the policeman and the prospect of the prison influences them. They quarrel and fight amongst themselves, almost invariably drunk, and spend their lives in alternate bouts of violent excitement and the lassitude consequent on it. Steady work is impossible under such circumstances, and indeed steady work, or steadiness of any kind, is most repugnant to their feelings. The children of such people are of course neglected, and the temptation to make something out of them is overpowering. It is the children of such parents, for the most part, who are found begging, selling matches, and screaming newspapers at night. The attention of charitable people has long been called to these wretched wails, whose condition on cold and wet winter nights is enough to move strong men to tears, and some efforts have been made in various ways to improve their position in life, but it requires great courage to interfere between parent and child in this country, and probably no belief is more rooted among the lower classes than that their children are their own to do what they like with, to beat, so that they do not overdo it and bring the police on them, and to clothe and feed as they think proper. And there is some warrant both in law and custom for this belief, for the law allows a parent to correct his child in a reasonable manner for faults, the parent being of necessity the sole judge of the fault, and until recent years, when men's manners have become softer, it was a maxim that sparing the rod was an injury to the child, a maxim which was relied upon and practised, as many biographies will show, in families of the middle and even upper classes. As to wages as the child is not emancipated until he is twenty-one years of age, and as the parent is bound to maintain him, any earnings the child may make naturally belong to the parent, and the universal practice is that the parent takes possession of them. With respect to clothing, sumptuary laws cannot be laid down. Parents cannot go beyond their means in clothing children, and where there is a family of seven or eight and £1 a week wages or less, the children must be poorly clad. Law and custom, and the necessities of their position in the social scale, being thus very much on the side of the parents, it is hardly to be wondered at if philanthropists hesitated at interference between parent and child.

But Liverpool has men of courage as well as of philanthropy. The condition of hundreds, nay thousands of children was seen to be such that there was no escaping the conclusion that they were the subjects of terrible cruelty—cruelty from blows, cruelty from neglect, cruelty from greed, apart altogether from any necessity. So about April, 1883, a number of influential people formed themselves into a society for the prevention of cruelty to children, and on 31st March, 1884, they had their first annual meeting and issued their annual report. The extreme difficulties in the way of the Society, the liability to err on the one side by meddlingness, and on the other by relieving parents of their duties, the courage as well as tact required in intervening between parent and child, the difficulty of defining where cruelty begins, particularly in cases of neglect, looking to the condition of some poor families in great towns where there is, for example, a sick wife or husband, render the proceedings of this society of great interest, and there cannot be a doubt that its success or failure is of great social importance. The method of procedure of the Society cannot be properly understood without a study of its "objects and rules" which compose its informal charter. There is not space in this article for the whole of the rules, but the statement which I wish to put before our readers cannot be appreciated without setting out the objects of the Society and the scope of work which is proposed for itself, and to do this it is necessary to quote the rules themselves.

1 The object of the Society is the Prevention of Cruelty to Children

2 The term children shall be taken to mean boys and girls of tender age, but may in case of need be extended to include all young persons who are unable to protect themselves

3 Prevention shall include—

- (a) Inquiry into the causes which produce suffering and distress among children and a high state of mental morality—will present efforts to mitigate or to remove such causes
- (b) The utmost publicity as regards the results of such inquiry, and of all action which it may be necessary to take
- (c) The clear ascertainment of existing laws relating to the welfare, protection, or condition of children
- (d) The direction of public attention to such laws, with every possible inducement to their fulfilment
- (e) The enforcement of such laws where thought advisable, when remittance and other similar expedients fail
- (f) The promotion of such legislation in the laws affecting children as experience may prove necessary or desirable
- (g) The accumulation, publication, and circulation of such information, and the encouragement of such literature as may remove ignorance concerning the needs or management of children, or create an increased interest in their welfare, and the discouragement of such literature as is calculated to injure them

4 Cruelty shall include—

- (a) All treatment or conduct by which physical pain is wrongfully, needlessly, or excessively inflicted, or
- (b) By which life or limb or health is wrongfully endangered or sacrificed, or

- (c) By which morals are imperilled or depraved.
- All neglect to provide such reasonable food, clothing, shelter, protection, and care as the life and well-being of a child require.
- (e) The exposure of children during unreasonable hours or inclement weather, as pedlars or hawkers, or otherwise.
- (f) Their employment in unwholesome, degrading, unlawful, or immoral callings.
- (g) Or any employment by which the powers of children are overtaxed, or their hours of labour unreasonably prolonged, and
- (h) The employment of children as mendicants, or the failure to restrain them from vagrancy or begging.

From the above quotation it will be seen that the definitions of "children," "prevention," and "cruelty" are sufficiently elastic. I have words probably have never received such wide interpretations before. But although the Society has shown a boldness in its definitions which savours of aggressiveness, its proceedings, according to the report, have been tempered by a sagacious consideration of what is practical, and of the special circumstances of each case which has come under its notice.

One of the first things the Society did was to establish a Shelter, to which children could come or be brought at any time of the day or night. The place was intended only to be a temporary shelter, where the children could be washed, have clean clothes, and have food and warmth, while their cases are being inquired into. But it appears that in some cases children have stayed there as long as a fortnight. This Shelter is managed by ladies, and is altogether admirable, what has been done in it for miserable children will never be known, and can never be rewarded in this world, but the kind hearts which manage it want no reward and no publicity, to them it is enough that they can lighten the burden of life to some of the poor little wufs and strays of the dismal streets.

Before proceeding to the report it is right to mention that the Society has the support and co-operation of very powerful bodies. The City Council has passed the following bye laws—

1. No child under the age of nine years, shall sell or offer for sale, any article whatsoever in any of the streets, market places, or other public places in the City of Liverpool.

2. No child under the age of thirteen years, shall sell or offer for sale, any article whatsoever in any of the streets, market places, or other public places in the City of Liverpool, during the times following, that is to say—between nine o'clock in the evening and sunrise the following morning, from the first day of April to the thirtieth day of September, between seven o'clock in the evening and sunrise the following morning, from the first day of October to the thirtieth day of March.

3. No person shall employ a child to sell or offer for sale, any article whatsoever in contravention of either of the two preceding Bye-Laws, and a parent of a child who permits such child to sell, or offer for sale, any article whatsoever, in contravention of either of the preceding Bye-Laws, shall be deemed for the purposes of this Bye-Law, to employ such child in contravention of this Bye-Law.

4. Any person offending against any of the foregoing Bye-Laws shall be liable to a penalty of Forty Shillings, which penalty may be reduced at the discretion of any Court having jurisdiction in the matter.

The school board, the police, and the magistrates all lend a hand to the Society. The Society is, indeed, to a great extent detective (not to use the word offensively). It finds out when children have been cruelly assaulted, and procures the intervention of the police and the magistrate. It finds out cases where the powers of the school board can be brought to bear, and the school board intervenes, but its operations are by no means limited to such cases, it brings gentle influences to bear on parents, which apparently bear fruit, and when such influences fail, it does its best to remove the child to some happier sphere of life.

To come now to the report, a better idea of the work of the Society cannot be given than by quoting a few passages from it.

The Liverpool Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children was formed at a Town's Meeting, held on April 19th, 1873, the Mayor, William H. Adolph, Esq., presiding, and on October 2nd his Worship formally opened the Shelter at 6, Nile Street.

During the short time that it has elapsed since the Society began active operations it has dealt with 218 complaints of cruelty to children, involving the welfare of no fewer than 378 children.

The complaints have been mainly of four kinds—

1. Aggravated assault or bodily injury.
2. Neglect.
3. Flogging, whipping, and exposure.
4. Immorality.

The cases of assault included threatening with a knife, beating, beating, wounding and striking with the fist—by the last means a woman broke the nose of a child nine years old, her own daughter. Some parents seem to imagine that, short of actual murder, they may do what they please to their own children.

Neglect included both complete and partial starvation, resulting in several instances in death, in others in permanent injury, worse neglected still they have been women, omission to provide sufficient clothing, uncleanness in gross that the clothes worn by some of the children brought to the Shelter were fit for nothing but to be burnt, hair so matted and filthy that it has had to be all cut off, eyes and other members so inflamed as to require prompt medical treatment.

Beatings, whippings, and exposure have, even in the short experience of the Society, brought about several deaths, and are exposing numbers of children to certain injury. Parents causing as much as 25s. a-week have sent out their children to beg, while able-bodied men and women are to be found neglecting all work and compelling their children to support them by begging. In many cases the children are kept out till after midnight, their parents have learned that the later the hour and the worse the weather, the larger the alms. Investigation has happily brought to light some cases of real distress in which it was possible to afford relief, but the greatest difficulty is experienced in cases of fraudulent and professional begging.

Appended to the report are a number of "specimen cases," illustrating the working of the Society, a few are quoted, as they bring home to the mind the real state of things the Society has met, and their mode of dealing with it, better than anything else.

CASE 19. A little lad of seven was subjected to various forms of ill-usage from his father, the mother being in prison for stealing, in this dealing she was associated with one of her sons, now committed to a Reformatory. This little fellow of seven would dare the dangers of sleeping out of doors rather than go home to such a father. The boy came to the Shelter swearing with verbiage, and almost crazed from ill-treatment, and when, after a time, he was taken back to his father by the Superintendent, the father refused to receive him, using at the same time very violent and blasphemous language. For this desertion the Guardians, the investigation of the Society, prosecuted, and the man was sent to hard labour for fourteen days, but upon coming out of prison he kicked the boy from the workhouse and told him to go and beg his own bit. The child did beg, but the Superintendent discovered him, brought him before the magistrate, and the boy is now committed to St Anne's Industrial School.

CASE 22. Boy of eight habitually taking papers at 10 to 11 and later. Visitation proved the case to be one of poverty, as the mother was a widow in bad health, with only four from the parish, and left with five children to support. The girls are fourteen, nine, eight, and twin boys. Being the widow of a seaman, application was made for help to the Seamen's Orphanage. The application resulted in a grant of 20s per month. The gentleman who reported this case was so gratified with results that he became a subscriber, and promises to look after the boy.

CASE 23. A girl of nine was sent out with a stunted baby, of eighteen months. Beg. The case was reported by us to the parish, with a view to prosecution, and was also visited personally. The parish would not prosecute, but our persistent efforts put a stop to the exposure of the child, and we were able to give the address of school board officers, who were wanting the people for payment of the girl's board at Park Lane Day Industrial School. The wretched, drunken mother, deaf to all our entreaties, persisted in sending this girl out to beg the wherewithal for drink. The girl and a companion attempted to rob a till at a public-house, both were charged before the magistrate, and both were committed to St Anne's Industrial School, until sixteen years of age. The case will follow up by the Ladies' Temperance Association.

CASE 24. Girl of nine, wild, uncared for, and untaught, came begging to the Shelter, case was visited and mother cautioned over and over again, but to no purpose. From the dangerous practice of begging at night near the Salvor's Home the poor girl took to stealing, was caught in the act, and our evidence, confirmed by the school board, being satisfactory to the magistrate, her career was stopped by commitment to St Anne's Industrial School. The squalor and drunkenness by which the case was surrounded was pitiable in the extreme.

CASE 24. A complete gutter child of seven was brought at midnight. She was frightened when put into a bath, and very much astonished to see her had black hands become white under the influence of soap and water. Her mother was dead, her father had deserted her, her sisters and brothers had drifted away, and she just dropped into the houses of neighbours for her bite of food. If a neighbour would let her lie on the floor, well and good, if not, closets or cellars had to do. She was admitted to Shaw Street Emigration Home.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the Society is earnest and active in its work, that it has important co operators, and that in a great many cases it has been instrumental in removing children from horrible surroundings and lives of pain, dirt, and hopelessness, to the better atmosphere of "Homes," and schools and emigration, but that is not the only way in which it has worked. The very fact that their way of life and their mode of treating their families is looked into has a great moral effect upon the thriftless poor. Where apparent neglect is only the result of poverty they get sympathy and assistance from kind people, who are only too glad to do a little which will break down the barrier between the well-to-do and the poor. It is quite touching to hear of the patience with which the interference and remonstrances of the Society are in most cases received. Poor people with a number of children lead very helpless, hopeless, bewildered lives, they live from day to day, illness or the caprice of an employer may bring them almost starvation any day. They are glad of any sympathy, and when they see a well-dressed lady or man at their door they know it means help in some shape.

What may be the result of the Society's work in the future, what is to be done when Reformatories and industrial schools are full, whether the people will consent to be taxed because parents will not do their duty, whether this Society's proceedings form a step towards socialism—these are considerations which I will not deal with now. If the Society goes on in the way in which it has begun it can hardly fail to bring comparative happiness to many a miserable child, and do a public service by assisting the wild young outcasts of our streets to become better members of the community.

THE SALMON.

Its Natural and Economic History

By JAMES G. HIRSHMAN, AUTHOR OF THE "HALLIST OF THE 91," ETC.

FIRST PAPER

NO fish has bulked so largely in literature or law as the salmon. At least one substantial volume, many pamphlets, several Acts of Parliament, and a hundred Blue books have been devoted to "the venison of the waters." As for papers in magazines treating of fish of the salmon kind, their name is legion, while in the newspapers of the period, for one article devoted to the herring—important as it is from a commercial and scientific point of view—at least a dozen have been devoted to the salmon. The reason of this, as it has been often explained, is that, according to the popular saying, what is the property of everybody belongs in reality to nobody. The herring is so plentiful that we can at all times procure one for a penny, and occasionally even for less. But the salmon is a fish of value. Taking the marketable stock overhead, each individual salmon requires a pound to purchase, while in seasons of scarcity it costs about five times that sum. A fine clean run Salmo salar, pound weight for pound weight, is worth more money than a prime South Down sheep. It is not long since a choice salmon of the river Tay, weighing 63 lbs., was sold by a London fish salesman, for his Perthshire customer, at three shillings per pound weight. That, let it be noted, was the wholesale price and gave a good return. By way of comparison, it may here be stated, that for the nine guineas obtained for that fish, three most excellent sheep might have been purchased, which when ready for sale would have yielded about 200 lbs. of excellent mutton. At the retail prices charged by fish merchants in London, the salmon under notice would probably be sold at not less than five shillings a pound weight.

For more than sixty years the salmon has formed a never ceasing theme of controversy. Constantly watched from its cradle to its grave, every step in its adventurous life has been carefully noted and chronicled. The ova have been again and again nursed into life under the observant eyes of persons accustomed to the solution of problems in natural history. The "par" controversy has been settled to the satisfaction of all but a few persons who are determined neither to believe what they might any day see with their own eyes, or through the eyes of people not less observant, and probably more intelligent, than themselves. The little par—now known to be the young of the Salmo salar—was at one time thought by many persons to be a distinct fish. That idea has been difficult to uproot, although Mr Shaw, a gamekeeper in the employment of the Duke of Buccleuch, long ago demonstrated the problem from both ends of the question, by some ingenious experiments. First of all he showed that pars were young salmon, but that fact being hotly disputed, he then proved his case in another way by showing that the salmon was the parent of the par. In spite, however, of the labours of Mr Shaw, a good many stubborn people would not be convinced, and declined to believe that a par becomes a smolt, and that a smolt grows into a salmon.

The par controversy, whilst it raged, possessed many features of interest. It seemed passing strange that the par, which was thought to be an inhabitant of our salmon streams all the year round, should ever attain the dimensions of a salmon. "It is impossible," was the general chorus, "because any fish which becomes a salmon must, first of all, visit the sea." The smolt, it was freely admitted, becomes "a fish"—to use a Tweedside definition—as it is furnished with scales, and is known to possess that instinct which leads it to the sea, but the par, being without scales, and never being known (so it was supposed) to quit the quiet waters in which it had been nursed into life, was dogmatically claimed to be a par, and nothing but a par. When, however, the facts of par life were mastered, and it had been demonstrated that the tiny fish in question ultimately became transformed, that the marks it bore came in due time to be covered with scales, and was just then as good a smolt as any other in the water, some persons who wisely accepted the discovery wondered how it was they had previously failed to notice the fact, whilst others shook their wiser heads and declared it was not so, and could never be so, and that a par was nothing but a par, and would certainly remain a par for all time to come.

It was not till a salmon nursery had been set a-going at Stormontfield, on the river Tay, which is par excellence the salmon river week have sent out their children to beg, while able-bodied men and women are to be found neglecting all work and compelling their children to support them by begging. In many cases the children are kept out till after midnight, as their parents have learned that the later the hour and the worse the weather, the larger the alms. Investigation has happily brought to light some cases of real distress in which it was possible to afford relief, but the greatest difficulty is experienced in cases of fraudulent and professional begging.

Appended to the report are a number of "specimen cases," illustrating the working of the Society, a few are quoted, as they bring home to the mind the real state of things the Society has met, and their mode of dealing with it, better than anything else.

CASE 19. A little lad of seven was subjected to various forms of ill usage from his father, the mother being in prison for stealing, in this state she was acquainted with one of her sons, now committed to a Reformatory. This little fellow of seven would dare the dangers of sleeping out of doors rather than go home to such a father. The boy came to the Shelter swarming with vermin, and almost unimpeded from ill-treatment, and when after a time, he was taken back to his father by the Superintendent, the father refused to receive him, using at the same time very violent and blasphemous language. For this devotion the Guardians, at the instigation of the Society, prosecuted, and the man was sent to hard labour for fourteen days, but upon coming out of prison he fetched the boy from the workhouse and told him to go and beg his own bit. The child did beg, but the Guardians did not discover him, brought him before the magistrate, and the boy is now committed to London Industrial School.

CASE 22. A boy of eight habitually selling pipes at 10 to 30 at night and later. Visitation proved the case to be one of poverty, the mother was a widow in bad health, with only 4s. from the parish, and left with five children to support. The father, fourteen, nine, eight, and twins four. Being the widow of a seaman's apprentice the application resulted in a grant of 50s. per month. The gentleman who reported this case was so gratified with results that he became a subscriber, and promises to look after the boy.

CASE 21. A girl of nine was sent out with a starved baby, of eighteen months, to beg. The case was reported by us to the parish, with a view to prosecution, and was also visited personally. The parish could not prosecute, but our persistent efforts put a stop to the exposure of the child, and we were able to give the address of school board officers, who were writing the people for payment of the girl's board at Park Lane Day Industrial School. The wretched, drunken mother, deaf to all our entreaties, persisted in sending this girl out to beg the wherewithal for drink. The girl and a companion attempted to rob a till at a public-house, both were charged before the magistrate, and both were committed to Anne's Industrial School, until sixteen years of age. The case is still followed up by the Ladies' Temperance Association.

CASE 29. Girl of nine wild, uncared for, and untaught, came begging to the Shelter, case was visited and mother cautioned over and over again, but to no purpose. From the dangerous practice of begging at night near the Sailors' Home the poor girl took to standing, was caught in the act, and our evidence, confirmed by the school board, being satisfactory to the magistrate, her career was stopped by commitment to St. Anne's Industrial School. The squalor and drudgery by which the case was surrounded was patchable in the extreme.

CASE 34. A complete gutter child of seven was brought at midnight. She was frightened when put into a bath, and very much astonished to see her head black hands become white under the influence of soap and water. Her mother was dead, her father had deserted her, her sisters and brothers had drifted away, and she just dropped into the house of neighbours for her bite of food. A neighbour would let her lie on the floor, well and good, if not cloths or eelers had to do. She was admitted to St. Anne's Industrial Home.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the Society is earnest and active in its work, that it has important co-operators, and that in a great many cases it has been instrumental in removing children from horrible surroundings and lives of pain, dirt, and hopelessness, to the better atmosphere of "Homes," and schools and emigration, but that is not the only way in which it has worked. It is quite touching to hear of the patience with which the interference and remonstrances of the Society are in most cases received. Poor people with a number of children lead very helpless, hopeless, bewildered lives, they live from day to day, illness or the caprice of an employer may bring them almost to starvation any day. The "par" controversy has been settled to the satisfaction of a few persons who are determined to believe what they might any day see with their own eyes, or through the eyes not less observant, and probably more intelligent, than themselves. The little par—now known to be the young of the Salmo salar—was at one time thought by many persons to be a distinct fish. That idea has been difficult to uproot, although Mr Shaw, a gamekeeper in the employment of the Duke of Buccleuch, long ago demonstrated the problem from both ends of the question, by some ingenious experiments. First of all he showed that par were young salmon, but that fact being hotly disputed, he then proved his case in another way by showing that the salmon was the parent of the par. In spite, however, of the labours of Mr Shaw, a good many stubborn people would not be convinced, and declined to believe that a par becomes a smolt, and that a smolt grows into a salmon.

The par controversy, whilst it lasted, possessed many features of interest. It seemed passing strange that the par, which was thought to be an indelutant of our salmon streams all the year round, should ever attain the dimensions of a salmon. "It is impossible," was the general chorus, "because any fish which becomes a salmon must, first of all, visit the sea." The smolt, it was freely admitted, becomes "a fish"—to use a Tweedside distinction—as it is furnished with scales, and is known to possess that instinct which leads it to the sea, but the par, being without scales, and never being known (so it was supposed) to quit the quiet waters in which it had been nursed into life, was dogmatically claimed to be a par, and nothing but a par. When, however, the facts of par life were mastered, and it had been demonstrated that the tiny fish in question ultimately became transformed, that the marks it bore came in due time to be covered with scales, and was just then as good a smolt as any other in the water, some persons who wisely accepted the discovery wondered how it was they had previously failed to notice the fact, whilst others shook their wiser heads and declared it was not so, and could never be so, and that a par was nothing but a par, and would certainly remain a par for all time to come.

It was not till a salmon nursery had been set a going at Stornoway, on the river Tay, which is the cradle of the salmon river week have sent out their children to beg, while able-bodied men and women are to be found neglecting all work and compelling their children to support them by begging. In many cases the children are kept out till after midnight, as their parents have learned that the later the hour and the worse the weather, the larger the alms. Investigation has happily brought to light some cases of real distress in which it was possible to afford relief, but the greatest difficulty is experienced in cases of fraudulent and professional begging.

Appended to the report are a number of 'specimen cases,' illustrating the working of the Society, a few are quoted, as they bring home to the mind the real state of things the Society has met, and their mode of dealing with it, better than anything else.

CASE 19 A little lad of seven was subjected to various forms of ill-treatment from his father, the mother being in prison for stealing, so that stealing she was associated with one of her sons, now committed to a Reformatory. This little fellow of seven would dare the dangers of sleeping out of doors rather than go home to such a father. He came to the Shelter wearing with vermin, and almost stripped from all treatment, and when after a time he was taken back to his father by the Superintendent, the latter refused to receive him, saying at the same time very violent and blasphemous language. For this desertion the Guardians at the invitation of the Society, prosecuted, and the man was sent to prison for fourteen days, but upon coming out of prison he fetched the boy in the world as he had told him to go and beg. He can beg. The child had beg but the Guardians did not receive him, because he was before the magistrates, and the boy is now committed to the London Industrial School.

CASE 23 Boy of eight habitually selling papers at 10.30 at night and later. Was too poor to be one of poverty, his mother was a widow in bad health with only 4s. from the parish, and left with five children to support. The father is fourteen, blind, eight, and twins four. Being the widow of a seaman, application was made for help to the Seamen's Orphanage. The application resulted in a grant of 20s. per month. The gentleman who reported this case was so gratified with results that he became a subscriber, and promises to look after the boy.

CASE 28 A girl of nine was sent out with a starved baby, of eighteen months, to beg. The case was reported by us to the parish, with a view to prosecution, and was also visited personally. The parish would not prosecute, but our persistent efforts put a stop to the exposure of the child, and we were able to give the address to school board officers, who were waiting the people for payment of the girl's board at Park Lane Day Industrial School. The wretched, drunken mother, deaf to all our entreaties, persisted in sending this girl out to beg the whistles for drink. The girl and a companion attempted to rob a till at a public-house, both were charged before the magistrate, and both were committed to the London Industrial School, until sixteen years of age. The case is still followed up by the Ladies' Temperance Association.

CASE 29 Girl of nine wild, untaught, and untaught, came begging to the Shelter, case was visited and mother cautioned over and over again, but to no purpose. From the dangerous practice of begging at night near the Sailors' Home the poor girl took to stealing, was caught in the act, and on evidence, confirmed by the school board, being sent to the magistrate, her career was stopped by commitment to St. Anne's Industrial School. The squallor and demoralization by which the case was surrounded was pitiable in the extreme.

CASE 34 A complete gutter child of seven was brought at midnight. She was frightened when put into a bath, and very much astonished to see her head black hands become white under the influence of soap and water. Her mother was dead, her father had deserted her, her sisters and brothers had died of starvation, and she just dropped into the house of neighbours for her bit of food. A neighbour would let her lie on the floor, wall and good, if not clean, or often had to do. She was admitted to the Industrial Home.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the Society is earnest and active in its work, that it has important co-operators, and that in a great many cases it has been instrumental in removing children from horrible surroundings and lives of pain, dirt, and hopelessness, to the better atmosphere of 'Home' and 'school' and emigration, but that is not the only way in which it has worked. The very fact that their way of life and their mode of treating their families is looked into has a great moral effect upon the thither poor. Where apparent neglect is only the result of poverty they get sympathy and assistance from kind people, who are only too glad to do a little which will break down the barrier between the well-to-do and the poor. It is quite touching to hear of the patience with which the intemperance and remonstrances of the Society are in most cases received. Poor people with a number of children lead very helpless, hopeless, bewildered lives, they live from day to day, illness or the caprice of an employer may bring them almost to starvation any day. They are glad of any sympathy, and when they see a well-dressed lady or man at their door they know it means help in some shape.

What may be the result of the Society's work in the future, what is to be done when Reformatories and industrial schools are full, whether the people will consent to be taxed because parents will not do their duty, whether the Society's proceedings form a step towards socialism—these are considerations which I will not deal with now. If the Society goes on in the way in which it has begun it can hardly fail to bring comparative happiness to many a miserable child, and do a public service by assisting the wild young outcasts of our streets to become better members of the community.

NO fish has bulked so large in literature or law as the salmon. At least one substantial volume, many pamphlets, several Acts of Parliament, and a hundred Blue books have been devoted to "the venison of the waters." As for papers in magazines treating of fish of the salmon kind, their name is legion, while in the newspapers of the period, for one article devoted to the herring—important as it is from a commercial and scientific point of view—at least a dozen have been devoted to the salmon. The reason of this, as it has been often explained, is that, according to the popular saying, what is the property of everybody belongs in reality to nobody. The herring is so plentiful that we can at all times procure one for a penny, and occasionally even for less. But the salmon is a fish of value. Taking the marketable stock overhead, each individual salmon requires a pound to purchase, while in seasons of scarcity it costs about five times that sum. A fine clean run Salmo salar, pound weight for pound weight, is worth more money than a prime South Down sheep. It is not long since a choice salmon of the river Tay, weighing 63 lbs., was sold by a London fish salesman, for his Perthshire customer, at three shillings per pound weight. This, it is noted, was the wholesale price and gave a good return. By way of comparison, it may be stated, that for the nine guineas obtained for three most excellent sheep purchased, which would have yielded about 200 lb. of mutton. At the retail price fish merchants in London for notice would probably be given for three shillings a pound. For more than sixty years the salmon has never ceasing theme of constantly watched from its capture, every step in its adventures has been carefully noted and chronicled. Its Natural and Economic History

By JAMES H. BIRRAM, AUTHOR OF THE HAIWEY OF THE SEA, &c.

FIRST LAFVI

NO fish has bulked so large in literature or law as the salmon. At least one substantial volume, many pamphlets, several Acts of Parliament, and a hundred Blue books have been devoted to "the venison of the waters." As for papers in magazines treating of fish of the salmon kind, their name is legion, while in the newspapers of the period, for one article devoted to the herring—important as it is from a commercial and scientific point of view—at least a dozen have been devoted to the salmon. The reason of this as it has been often explained is that according to the popular saying, what is the property of everybody belongs in reality to nobody. The herring is so plentiful that we can at all times procure one for a penny, and occasionally even for less. But the salmon is a fish of value. In the market the stock overland, each individual salmon requires a pound to purchase, while in seasons of scarcity it costs about five times that sum. A fine clean run Salmo salar, pound weight for pound weight, is worth more money than a prime South Down sheep. It is a long since a choice salmon of the market, weighing 63 lbs was sold by a London fish salesman, for his Peithshire customer five shillings per pound weight—that, let me say, at the wholesale price and gave. By way of comparison, it may be stated, that for the nine guineas ob- tained for three most excellent sheep purchased which when sold would have yielded about 200 shillings. At the retail price fish merchants in London for notice would probably be given more than fifty shillings a pound. For more than sixty years the salmon has never ceasing theme of the most intently watched from the cradle, every step in its adven- ture has been carefully noted and chronicled, and have been again and again re- lived under the observant eyes of the ac- customed the solution of problems in natural history. The "par" controversy has been settled to the satisfaction of few persons who are determined to believe what they might any day see with their own eyes, or through the eyes of not less observant, and probably more intel- ligent than themselves. The little par—now known to be the young of the Salmo salar—was at one time thought by many persons to be a distinct fish. That idea has been difficult to uproot, although Mr. Shaw, gamekeeper in the employment of the Duke of Buccleuch, long ago demonstrated the problem from both ends of the question by some ingenious experiments. First of all he showed that they were young salmon, but that fact being hotly disputed he then proved his case in another way by showing that the salmon was the parent of the par. In spite, however, of the liboms of Mr. Shaw, a good many stubborn people would not be convinced and declined to believe that a par becomes a smolt, and that a smolt grows into a salmon.

The par controversy, while it lasted, pos- sessed many features of interest. It seemed passing strange that the par, which was thought to be an initial stage of our salmon, retains all the year round, should ever attain the dimensions of a salmon. It is impossible was the general chorus, "because any fish which becomes a salmon must, first of all, visit the sea." The smolt, it was freely admitted becomes "a fish"—to use a facetious definition—as it is furnished with scales, and is known to pos- sess that instinct which leads it to the sea, but the par, being without scales, and never being known (so it was supposed) to quit the quiet waters in which it had been nursed into life, was dogmatically claimed to be a par, and nothing but a par. When, however, the facts of par life were mastered and it had been demonstrated that the tiny fish in question ultimately became transformed, that the marks it bore came in due time to be covered with scales, and was just then as good a smolt as any other in the water, some persons who wisely accepted the discovery wondered how it was they had previously failed to notice the fact, whilst others shook their wiser heads and declared it was not so, and could never be so, and that a par was nothing but a par, and would certainly re- main a par for all time to come.

It was not till a salmon nursery had been set a-going at Stornoway, on the river Try, which is par excellence the salmon river of Scotland, that the par problem was, day by day, solved before all the world. ■ is a somewhat interesting feature of the natural history of most fishes that it is possible to breed them under artificial conditions. What has been designated by the French "pisciculture" is an art as ancient as civilisation. In China, thousands of years ago, the ova of different fishes were collected from the streams of that country and laid carefully in ponds and other places ■ hatch and grow, till the fish became ■ for use as food. This practice still continues. In these latter days the eggs of fish have been directly exuded from the animals, and have been nursed into life with the most complete success. Nothing is easier. Let a female salmon be captured just as she is on the eve of spawning, and let her be deprived of her ova by a slight pressure: let a male fish be taken under similar circumstances and be similarly treated; let its milt be then carefully mixed with the eggs of the female. After all this has been accomplished let the fecundated ova be placed in some gently moving water well protected from their numerous enemies, and the result will be that in about a hundred and twenty days, according to temperature, the young salmon will burst the fragile walls of their prison and grow into table-fish, should they have the chance given them of so long life.

The salmon nursery at Stormonthfield—which, by the way, is now being discontinued in favour of another place—was not, however, instituted for the precise purpose of solving the problems by which the natural history of the salmon was beset, but rather with the intention of adding to the powers of production of the great stream. How far it has aided in the way of increasing the salmon population of the Tay has never been exactly determined. For a period of a quarter of a century thousands of well-grown smolts have been annually reared at Stormonthfield, while the rental of the river has in that time grown apace, but whether from the wise legislation which now governs the salmon rivers or the aid afforded by the nursery at Stormonthfield we cannot say. The rental of the stream has, however, so increased that ■ is now more than double what it was at the beginning of the experiment.

At the Stormonthfield salmon nursery the old question of whether or not a par was in reality a smolt in the first phase of its growth, was speedily settled in the affirmative. Not only so, but other discoveries of equal importance in the earlier stages of the natural history of the fish were made. It was found, for instance, that one half only of a brood of young salmon became smolts ■ the end of one year from the date at which they were hatched, the other moiety of the brood remaining in the condition of par for another year! This is ■ feature of salmon growth of which no explanation can be offered. That ■ certainly is so, is about all we can say. The two divisions of fish are in no way different from each other, they consist of males and females indiscriminately. Nor has this curious system of migration any connection with the size of the fish which have been artificially spawned for behoof of the nursery. It may, however, render the progress of the par plainer to the reader if we indicate the dates ■ which the various changes take place. Say, then, that the fecundated ova are laid down in the boxes at Stormonthfield about the beginning of December; the eggs will be hatched before the middle of March, and the young fish will be known as par, and all of them will remain in the par stage of their life for a period of twelve months. By the end of that time one half of the brood will have become covered with scales and imbued with the migratory instinct. Day after day they will exhibit their eagerness to visit the salt-water by leaping out of the ponds; the other moiety of the brood will, however, evince no desire for any change, but remain quietly in the par stage for another year. Meantime we shall assume that the smolts have been liberated and allowed to find their way to "ocean's green domain," in which ■ ■ said they grow with such rapidity as to become gillie of large dimensions before their remaining brothers and sisters have yet been invested with that armour of scales which is held to be the insignia of the smolt.

In 1863 what appeared to be careful experiments were made in order to ascertain the ratio of salmon growth. During the course of the inquiry some extraordinary results were arrived at, and, as the fish were marked by careful men, there ■ no reason to throw doubt on the facts then reported by Mr. Robert Buist, the superintendent of the Tay fisheries, and Peter Marshall, the intendant of the ponds. These facts were, that a marked smolt about the size of a man's finger had between the 24th of May and the 16th of August attained to a weight of 9 lbs.; other fish weighing respectively 5 lbs., 3½ lbs., and 7 lbs. were also taken. These salmon were without the dead fin, of which the smolts taken for experiment had been deprived, so that when captured they might be readily identified. The number of smolts marked, however, was only sixty-four, a very small number indeed when the mortality which attends salmon life comes to be considered. Those who have studied the salmon as an object of natural history are inclined to throw doubt on these experiments, just because they think it an impossibility that so many as four fish out of the sixty-four which were marked could be captured, "that number means about seven in the hundred," they say, "and no such percentage of young salmon ever live to revisit their native waters." The mortality attendant on salmon-life, especially in the case of the young fish, has always been understood to be very high, some experts, indeed, have calculated it at a rate which does not give more than 2 per cent of surviving marketable fish, and in view of such calculations the results of Mr. Bust's experiments seem not a little remarkable. They are not, however, without corroboration for others who have made experiments in salmon growth have obtained similar evidence of the rapid rate at which the smolt increases in size and weight. The growth of the grilse and the salmon have, also, at various times been tested by various intelligent persons, and the bulk of evidence tends to show that all these fish grow at a very rapid rate.

It is difficult to determine the age of any particular salmon. As has already been related, one half of a brood does not commence to grow till they are two years old, at which time, the other half of the same hatching, and from the same parents, may be salmon of goodly size, and of considerable money value. Various estimates have been made of the ages of salmon, but taking the mean weights of the experiments, in which we have the greatest confidence, we are inclined to set down the average rate of growth as being not less than 11 lbs. per annum, and in rivers which are not overcrowded, and in which food is plentiful, it may be two or three pounds more. One fact of salmon economy should always be kept in mind, viz. that a given expanse of water will only feed and breed a given number of fish. When there are too many they will be light and lean, when too few, they will become large and heavy. The salmon, as well as most other fish, are wonderfully fruitful, and have been endowed with the power of multiplying their kind by tens of thousands. In the case of the salmon (Salmo salar) a female weighing 25 lbs. will probably yield as many as 20,000 eggs. Few of these eggs yield fish, and of the fish that do see the light of day only a very small percentage ever become productive, eggs and young being constantly preyed upon by a legion of enemies.

PRINCESS ALICE.

By PROFESSOR TAYLOR, D.D., ONE OF HER MAJESTY'S CHAPLAINS

IN its English garb, this book* is a tribute of affection to the memory of a sister, by the illustrious Lady, the translator of the Memoir which gives narrative connection to the letters. It is also, on the part of the Queen, one of many proofs of confidence in the loyalty and attachment of her people, and affords an additional and welcome insight into the attractions and charm of the domestic life, of which the Prince Consort was so much the centre and source. It justly counts on the deep and lasting affection in which the memory of the Princess is held by all classes of her countrymen. Although many years have since elapsed, it is remembered how she stood by the Queen in her bereavement, and how almost everything was then due to the extraordinary fortitude and devotion of the girl Princess.

The letters, which are thus given to the English speaking world, were written after her marriage to His Royal Highness, Prince Louis of Hesse, and date from her adopted country.

Her establishment at Darmstadt was arranged on an unpretending scale. The house itself was inconveniently small. But it was with the resolution to make light of difficulties, and to adapt herself cheerfully to her surroundings, that the Princess entered her new home. Early hours, method, and strict economy prevailed from the outset. "We get up at seven, with candles, every morning." In summer, the hour was six. Breakfast followed at eight, luncheon at twelve, and dinner at four, the intervals being so occupied that not a moment of the day was wasted. Soon, a larger house was felt to be necessary, and was built, as much as possible, in accordance with English ideas. Her English house, as it was affectionately regarded, continued to be her home during the subsequent years of her too brief career. It was a source of much comfort, and the occasion of great additional labour and anxiety, for with enlarged accommodation, social duties hitherto impossible became imperative, and entailed increased expenditure.

* "Alice, Grand Duchess of Hesse, Princess of Great Britain and Ireland" (London: John Murray)

Frank disclosures show that the family life bore a strong resemblance, in its thrifty ways and expedients, and also in its embarrassments and restraints, to that of other well regulated households of lower degree. These discomforts, however, were borne with alacrity, and without detracting from her ideal of life. It was part of that ideal, that her home ways should be entirely free from various petty deceptions of which society is tolerant, and that she should be true woman and mother, irrespective of all considerations of rank and conventional usage. Reality, simplicity, and naturalness were, accordingly, characteristics of her domestic rule. What was itself right, wise, loving to do, she strove to do, it might be, to take her children out for a walk, to give them lessons, to make their dresses, or, at a pinch, to act as nurse. "You will be amused when I tell you that old Amelung is coming to sleep with baby, and take charge of him, but she is too old and out of practice to be able to wash and dress him, morning and evening besides, so I do that, and it is of course a great assistance to all my being able to do it, and I don't mind the trouble." She was sustained in this course by the counsel and loving gifts that continued to reach her, from her old home. Frequent visits to it, on the invitation of the Queen, were, indeed, a much-needed restorative, and were hailed with inexpressible delight. She loved Germany, was proud of its people, and appreciated their noble qualities, but the home to which her heart instinctively and with ever increasing fondness turned, was the "dear, dear home" of her childhood and youth. There was always a touch of home sickness "after dear England, Balmoral, and all at home."

Her independence was an application of principles, which she had acquired in youth, and which told her that social distinctions had no intrinsic merit. She considered the lot of private individuals to be, on the whole, the best. She was not enamoured of what she terms "the cold circle of court people," and was thankful that her husband did not wear a crown. "I feel so entirely as you do, on the difference of rank, and how all important it is for princes and princesses to know that they are nothing better nor above others, save through their own merit." In this spirit she sought to educate her children. "I strive to bring them up totally free from pride of their position, which is nothing save what their personal worth can make it." What she dreaded most for them was, not physical, but moral evil. Her constant endeavour was that they should "take nothing but the recollection of love and happiness from their home with them into the world's fight," and in the close, personal relations in which she stood to her children, she realised the important fact, that children educate their parents. Owing to the same truthfulness and breadth of nature, her relation also to her servants was marked by an entire absence of superciliousness. She was altogether so just, as to be true alike to their common humanity and the difference in their position. They were treated at all times with unaffected consideration, as friends, if worthy of friendship, and in the event of sickness or distress, with heartfelt solicitude. They and their children, some fifty in all, were annually assembled to share with the royal children the gifts of the Christmas tree, on that brightest of German festivals, and poor Jagur, who fell ill and died in the service, had a tree to himself, in his own room, shortly before his death. The faithful servant was regarded as in reality a friend, and the loss of such an one was more felt than that of many a relation who was scarcely known.

Noted in childhood for her quick sympathy and considerateness, she had grown into a woman, capable of extraordinary self denial and devotion to duty, with many resources of organisation. These qualities were, for the first time, fully developed by the events of the wars of 1866, and 1870-1, which subjected her somewhat anxious and nervous temperament to the severest strain. To one constituted as the Princess was, beneficent action was a necessity. As became her youth and inexperience, her first efforts were tentative. But within little more than a year after her marriage, she visited the Town Hospital, with a settled purpose in view, and had become patroness of a ladies' institution, which had for its object to lend out linen to poor, respectable women, during their confinement. How deep her interest was in its success, her account of a visit to one of these poor women will show. "At length, through a dirty court-yard, up a dark ladder into one little room, where lay in one bed the poor woman and her baby, in the room four other children, the husband, two other beds, and a stove. But it did not smell bad, nor was it dirty. I sent Christa down with the children, then with the husband cooked something for the woman, arranged her bed a little, took the baby for her, brushed its eyes for they were so bad, poor little thing!—and did odds and ends for her.”

Another year had barely elapsed, before she had put herself at the head of a movement to provide a special asylum for idiots. The money difficulty in the way was formidable, but was surmounted by the introduction of the peculiarly English expedient of a bazaar, which, thanks to the Princess's personal influence and tact, turned out to be a success, on what was probably uncongenial soil

The internecine character of the war of 1866 between Prussia and the States of the German Confederation, made itself fully felt in the Grand Ducal family circle—Prince Louis and his brother, Prince Henry, being engaged on opposite sides. While it was still impending the Princess records, with a fitful gleam of playfulness, which her fears beclouded, how she bought a travelling bag for her husband, on the principle that to carry an umbrella will keep off the rain! In spite of the precaution, midsummer found her in the midst of preparations, almost distracted by the character of the conflict, “brother against brother, and friend against friend,” and the endless demands for linen, rags, lint, and other necessities of sanguinary strife. How nearly it touched herself, personally, may be understood from the fact, that three days after the birth of one of her children, her husband had gone into action at Aschaffenburg, on the Main, whence the guns could be heard ■ Darmstadt. One result of the war was the formation of the "Ladies' Union," with the Princess as President. Its main object was to train nurses, and to supply them, wherever nursing was required, among all classes during peace, and to the army in war. The membership rose in two years to 2,500. It was characteristic of the Princess, that in this case, ■ in that of the Asylum for Idiots, membership was quite irrespective of creed. Her belief was, that the impulses and principles which are common ■ mankind, constituted the right basis of societies which were formed for the service of humanity, in the widest sense, and in this belief she persevered. About the same time, she initiated an important movement for the encouragement of female industry, with the result that a salesroom, "The Alice Bazaar," for the sale of articles of needlework, &c., became a permanent institution.

Preparations for the Franco-German war of 1870—1 only partially suspended these efforts, which by that time had borne fruit, that was gratefully appreciated, in the trained nurses who were available when the war broke out. The times were such as taxed her strength to the utmost, while they wrung her feelings, by a constant sense of dread and a succession of indescribably painful scenes. She was aware that her husband, and many other much-loved relatives and friends were constantly under fire, in the tremendous battles by which the war was signalised, and she describes herself as living, "in fear and trembling, from one battle to another." In reality, her energy and fortitude, as well ■ public spirit and devotion, were almost incredible. Day after day, trains were bringing up their freight of disabled soldiery. The hospitals and ambulances were crowded, and the very air smelt of wounds. Muffled drums, accompanying the dead to their last resting places, filled the night with dismal sounds. Privation and heart-rending sorrow and distress abounded. Wounded soldiers, despairing widows, destitute wives and orphans seemed ■ increase without end, and appealed for help. Throughout the whole of this terrible time, her hand and presence were everywhere, excusing and superintending means of relief. She visited the hospitals daily, made her palace the headquarters of committees of aid, and converted part of it into a depot of necessities for the sick and wounded. But bravely as she bore up under all, the miseries of war had entered into her soul. Pronouncing it to be "the greatest scourge this world knows," her prayer was that she might not live to see such a war again. Determined, doubtless, by the dire effects and course of this war, her powers of organization took practical shape, in three distinct institutions: the "Alice Hospital," a training school and home for nurses, the "Alice Society for the Education and Employment of Women," supplemented temporarily by the "Alice Lyceum," which attempted, chiefly by means of lectures, to give a scientific culture to women, and an "Orphan Asylum." The alleviation of suffering of all kinds, to which she seemed, by a signal providence, from an early age, to be specially destined, and the improvement of the condition of the poor were now, and continued to be, the main object for which she lived.

Within the space of six years she had lived through two wars, in which all the interests most dear to her were deeply involved. During the whole of that period her family circle had remained intact. In 1873, the first break took place, in the innermost circle of her love, when little Prince Fritz, while playing almost in his mother's sight and presence, fell out of window, and was killed. The trials through which she passed in 1878 are in the recollection of all, when her husband and five of her children were laid down with diphtheria, and when she herself, after nursing all, and losing one, succumbed to the same fatal malady. With so chequered an experience, it is not surprising that she had learned to look with a chastened spirit on all that this life has to offer. Intensely happy in her home life, there was a vein of pensiveness in her happiness. As time advanced, her estimate of life grew more and more serious, until she habitually regarded it as a short and solemn space of time, meant for work and not for pleasure, where labours and duties were ever to be kept in view. Her language on this point is often very striking, lofty and earnest in tone, and betokening intense conviction. And yet, as a life of incessant, practical goodness and usefulness proves, there was, in this view, nothing morbid.

The key to her character and the nature of her work and history are really to be found, in the strength of the personal ties that bound her, in filial affection, to the Prince Consort, her father. The impression made by his death was indelible. Nothing can be more touching than the constant, tender, almost passionate love, with which she turns in these letters, to her surviving parent, now seeming to cling to her for protection and rest, and again, ■ be herself exerting strength, to comfort and sustain the widowed Mother and Queen. But in respect of the Prince Consort, her filial love had been transfigured by death, and was become a kind of governing, spiritual force. The 14th December, 1861, became the central date in her history, just as he himself had become almost the central fact of her existence. ■ formed the watershed of her experience. The "good old times" ran down from this point on the further side, while on this side, the current of life had ever since been overshadowed by that first and greatest sorrow. Nor did the anniversary of the day ever return without awakening the deepest emotions. Her yearning for him was akin to home-sickness. With him, everything came to be associated. Her ideal of his life, as a sacrifice to duty, was the example which she strove, through daily tasks and trials, to follow. She had no stronger aspiration than to be worthy such a father, and the older she grew, the more perfect became his image. In the moment of dissolution his was her latest thought, his name, "Papa," the last word on her lips. He was thus a sacred presence seldom absent from her thoughts, whom any one of a thousand circumstances, a picture or a piece of music could recall, the guide and protector of her career, whose influence was the stimulus ■ noble effort, and incentive ■ duty. He was, in reality, the living impulse in her education, ■ her sense of duty, and, next to her faith in Christ, even in her religion, for in him she comprehended how to die was gain, how it was gain for one so pure and good to be taken away from witnessing evil. Thus, her intellectual development proceeded largely from moral and emotional sources — the strongest root of all being this personal tie or attachment. She whom great public sacrifices, such ■ were incurred in the Crimean war, moved only as others, was almost transformed into another being, by the loss of One whose personality had become an essential part, indeed the centre, of her life. Nor was this all. He was for her, a real link with the spiritual world, between the present and the future, practically a pledge of a future, a mighty support ■ faith, and a substantial guarantee for religion itself. Once, indeed, she essayed, it would appear, a purely intellectual excursion into the domains of speculative theology, under the direction of Strauss, the celebrated neologian and litterateur. But the agnostic fabric which she reared in the course of it, was shattered by the first great reality of experience with which it came into collision — the mysterious instincts of the mother in her own heart, brooding over the untimely death of her son. It was probably the only instance in which she was untrue to that practical side of her nature, where her chief strength lay. It was merely an incident, however, and was succeeded by a stiller, deeper and stronger faith — the faith of her childhood, if possible more childlike, simple, and full of trust, as the fruit of trial and inward struggle.

As time went on, the future became more intensely real. It rendered the sorrow and struggle of life endurable. Natural laws and phenomena suggested its brighter skies, and inculcated contentment and hope. "The future world seems so like a real home, for there are so many dear ones to meet again." "Each year brings us nearer to the Wiederschen (reunion with the dead)." A living trust in God was, indeed, the stay and strength of her life.

The book eschews politics. It was perhaps unavoidable that ■ should be pervaded by an undertone of sadness. The turning point in the Princess's life was a great sorrow and irreparable loss. Earnestness itself, she lived through great and critical times, and had her full share of trial and bereavements.

It deals mainly with the practical and domestic side of her life. There were, however, other aspects. Its contents show that her feeling for nature was true and keen, that she delighted in art, and that her taste for reading was always kept up. Lectures, concerts, and dramatic representations profitably beguiled the evenings of anxious and laborious day. Altogether it presents us with the picture of a noble-minded, brave-hearted woman, who knew how to combine naturalness, simplicity, and true human feeling with princely station, and who performed its arduous duties, under trying circumstances, with infinite grace, courage, and self denial.

II—SUMMER VIEWS

DO not think we can do any very good work—work involving really hard thinking—during summer. There is a bucolic lassitude that affects the mind as well as the body in the leafy month of June. June and December, to be sure, have been very much alike of late years—any balance for the better being perhaps in favour of the latter. But what I mean is that when the thermometer is over 70° intellectual labour becomes a burden, and the result is not for edification. Nothing worth preserving has been written anywhere. ■ After that I know of. Has any magnum opus been produced in the vicinity of the Equator? The great religions no doubt have been brought to us from the East, but fervent heat is not incompatible with a certain mystical fervour. ■ Islamism and Buddhism are like ostrich eyes, which the sun and the desert sand hatch between them. The temperate zone, in short, has been the mother of whatever is immortal in mind. We say that one race has richer intellectual endowments than another, what we really mean is that it belongs to a latitude and longitude where mental exercise is possible, and perhaps enjoyable. To speak of exertion, indeed, under any circumstances as being enjoyable, opens up, however, another burning question. Some of us, I am afraid, incline to believe that indolence is natural to men, and that it was the normal condition of our race in that golden age ■ which we look back with regret. The hurry slurry of our present life is certainly forced and unnatural To the Englishman to whom Sport, whether on the cricket ground or in the hunting field among the Alps or along the river bank, has become a second nature, the unreasonableness of violent exertion is not so immediately apparent as it is to the Italian or the Frenchman "The mysteries of woods and rivers—which our ancestors meant all that a deer forest, a grouse moor, a salmon pool, or a sea-trout loch means to us—appeared the Teutonic imagination with peculiar force. The Saxon passion for the chase is possibly indeed to be attributed to the exacting conditions of a northern climate, where cold and darkness must be defied, and the stock of caloric needed for comfort requires to be constantly replenished. But that labour as such has any thing to commend it is a quite obvious misunderstanding. The old Psalmist of olden times was full of it, from which our first parents were driven into a world against which the curse of labour had been pronounced—In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground. And a place of rest likewise is the Paradise to which each of us looks for reward.

Thou shalt eat of the fruit of the tree of life, and shalt reign for ever.
A little had I sought for me, for the people of God.

as Robert Browning sings

These are the sort of reflections that naturally occur to a writer of books in the warm July weather which we are now enjoying, for a brief spell after a sad month of wind and rain. The portable easy-chair has been placed under the spreading branches of a walnut tree which has stood where it stands for the last three hundred years. A pile of books are scattered about on the grass, and a bulky manuscript lies upon the gypsy table. But it is no good—we resolutely refuse to put the pen in the ink bottle.

A few weeks ago the inquiries we are making into the character and motives of one of the few really great men of whom no special biography has been written, were full of interest, somehow, since the thermometer approached 80° in the shade the virtue has gone out of them. What's Hecuba to us, or we? Hecuba?

Let me alone, I am done, I am done, I am done,
And a little while ago I was dumb,
I am done alone! What pleasure can we have To be with evil? In their any place
To ever climb up the climbing ways.

It is a matter of immense moment to retain as we grow old a varied hold upon life. When we have entered the fifties we get as it were, a new horizon. The comparative values are so completely altered that a fresh currency is needed. What used to seem solid ground becomes phantasmal—the stuff of which dreams are made.

The uprooting of old associations and early limitations is often a perilous process. "Vanitas vanitatum, omnia vanitas." If we would not lapse into sheer cynicism it is very necessary that we should keep some of our illusions. When we find the walls of the universe as we esteemed them, melting into thin air at every turn a sense of immense uncertainty and insecurity assails us. Our confidence is shaken—as in a city riddled by earthquake. Whether it is better for us or worse (as creatures accountable to a Supreme Judge whose verdict will be given hereafter—under quite other conditions) I do not stay to inquire, I am looking at the matter only from the homely standpoint of the merely mundane critic. But there can be no doubt that the man of fifty or sixty, whose attention is concentrated with eager curiosity upon any inquiry, however microscopical or whimsical is the man who, during what remains of life, will extract most positive good out of it. He has been said that whoever has no knowledge of what is laying up for himself a miserable old age. This is only putting the fact with a somewhat truculent directness. The man who allows his interests to drop away from him when he begins to feel that he has taken the downward turn (which leads inevitably to—what we know) will be in very much the same predicament as the man who allowed his friends ■ drop away from him when he fancied that he would not need them any more. We can hardly make new friends after middle life, nor can we strike out new lines of work or enjoyment. There are elderly people I meet every day who excite a gentle ripple of laughter among the younger members of our society when they begin ■ discourse upon what is known as their favourite fad. For my own part (though some of them are ten years older than I am) I cannot look at them with out envy. These hale old gentlemen are so fresh!—age does not wither them nor custom stale. Unfortunately the rest of the quotation ■ inapplicable—their “infinite variety” being confined to one feeble apiece. Jones’s craze (as the youngsters irreverently term it) is genealogy;—there is only one break in the chain which takes his family back in a direct line ■ an early Welsh king, and this he is always on the very point of supplying. Poor old fellow, he will go down to his grave without finding the missing link, and probably without learning that it is well for him that he does not find it. His occupation gone, life would become utterly colourless. Brown has no personal ambition ■ gratify, but he cherishes a highly abstract theory about the necessary connection between a comes and a comitatus, and he has gone through half the manuscripts in the Register House and the British Museum ■ prove that the single adverse decision (it is unfortunately dead against him) might be explained away if we could only recover certain documents which were certainly destroyed (if they ever existed) not less than three centuries ago. These are our genealogists, but we have our archaeologists, our ornithologists, our entomologists, our horticulturists—all as brisk and cheery as boys. Ever to seek, and never to find—the quest still retaining its attraction—that, I take it, is about as good a definition of human happiness as it is possible to hazard. Dear, dusty, dried up mummies! I figure you to myself sometimes under the multitude of the lusty lover on Keats’s unpublishable urn—

Thou’st winning near the goal—yet do not grieve,
She cannot find, tho’ thou hast lost thy bliss,
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!”

I trust, therefore, that my unconquerable disinclination to proceed with my own special piece of work at this moment ■ be attributed only to the heat, and not to any permanent alienation. It will all come right by-and-by, let us hope—with the fall of the leaf, and the first snug blive in the parlour of a frosty evening, though, to be sure, a scrap of fire in the grate, summer and winter all the year round, never comes amiss now. Are the summers really colder, or is it only that as we grow old we need more warmth to drive the chill out of our bones? There are some men whose conversation as surely drifts to a fixed point as the needle turns to the pole. The roads may vary, but the goal is still the same—the attraction which forces them to repeat once more that anecdote which we know by heart, or to fight that battle over again which has been fought so often before, being apparently irresistible. We may we ruefully at the Doctor's threadbare times, fancy that the conventional associations with the seasons are curiously misplaced. There is something unsensual about the yearning glare of summer. It is like the fierce light which beats about the throne, striking pitilessly into the dark corners and obscure recesses of the conscience. Hence saw the young Spring God—I quoted the passage the other day—radiant, adorable standing summit of an Alp.

A lovely picture! Yet many of us who will not own that we are cursed by any over morbid sensibilities, find ourselves willing, nay, eager, to delay his coming. One would put a drag on every month of the winning year if one could. Winter may be grim and inclement, but it does not take us to task, does not require us to examine ourselves, does not mark a new departure as the spring does. The opening buds are the saddest moralists the severest critics. To the very young, indeed, they may whisper of a good time coming, but to the old they speak of the departed year. The 25th of March used to be the first day of the year, and it had a real and not a merely arbitrary claim to the distinction. The old year had truly passed away, and a new one was being ushered in. Under our present classification there is an awkward mingling. The old year dies in December, but the new year makes no sign till long after the 1st of January. That is why the spring is sad. It is a time Anniversary, reminding us with painful distinctness of duties unfulfilled, of work unfinished, of ambitions more or less modest ungratified. The 25th of March is the great annual Day of Reckoning, when we are called before the inner tribunal to render our account up to date. We speak of the way sad flowers of our love and to the fading leaves

Such feelings as these, it may be said, are out of place at this happy and peaceful season. It may be so, but I some-of our ambition. So Mr. Kunkin says. For the russet leaves of autumn I would, for my part, be inclined to substitute the firstlings of the spring—the violet, the wood-violet, the anemone. Here is another year visibly dead and gone, and we are no farther on than we were at its birth. It is no wonder that a sort of hopelessness should take possession of the man who feels at fifty that he can do no better than he has done, and that every new year now must diminish the vigour of mind and body.

If we had done the best possible—had written prose like Thackeray, poetry like Tennyson, had been as brilliant as Huxley or as profound as Hamilton—I am not sure that the feelings with which we should regard our past life would be sensibly different. With the exception of one or two complacent Philistines, there are few men, however nominally successful, who do not feel that they have failed. It is not success that makes the retrospect tolerable; it is sympathy, charity, love—call it what we choose—the sentiment that has raised us above ourselves, and enabled us now and again to sink the “Ego” out of sight. Absolute success, in a world such as ours, is not within the reach of any one; the Lord Chancellor has come no nearer to it than you or I. He may have earned a bigger wage; but that is all—with a little trumpety notoriety thrown in, by way of seasoning. The something in the world amiss, which we hope will be righted by-and-by, curses all our efforts after completeness. The material on which we work is faulty. But, as I have said, the nearest approach to success (in the sense in which I use the word) is attained by him who, in the lines of Coleridge, “loveth best all things both great and small.” The feeble apiece, patient sympathy, is able to pierce irreverently of the shy creatures of the only one break has gained—I don’t say unmy back in but—a more intimate mingling, and this solid and durable in the of supplying. great scholar, the great his grave philosopher, to say nothing, and poet and the flashy rhetorician, all for him sure thus gathered is not participation been laid away where moth and rust corrupt, and thieves do not break open, steal; and if, like Rossetti’s Bless the thy ing it shows at every turn a deep and penetrating insight into actual life.

When simplicity and duty tender it,” is one of those sweet and noble sentences which are so entirely characteristic of the sweet and noble and liberal minded Shakespeare. Dutiful, simple, and unselfish service—the service of the humblest love—shines out of the past as nothing else shines. All else passes away, but this grows brighter and brighter as the years slip past us into the irrevocable past. I remember an old Highland lady, very plain in her looks, very provincial in her manners, very shabby in her dress, very narrow and obsolete in her religious fashions, but now around file ruefully at memory an aureole gleams, in Millers, or attitude of Saint or Madonne, exulting chargepleness of love. She was Charles; but hoan old retainer of the house, of us begun to fiat he had had little or no we too are gas just his mistress's marrow into the rut! simple, as intrinsically loyal. thoughts to-stares, absurd little tricks of as on matatic theology, are clean wiped other day retrospect; but this unselfish try as hard tender faithfulness is indehble. I. an to raber, I dare say, our brilliant Lady one weak beautiful as the day, as clever and on-rull tur adelacion cher file worms of as for breathid, yet because she was entirely and constitutionally self-seeking, the mere memory of her already grows fainter than a dream. For the one ■ pinch-back, the other true metal, which time cannot corrode.

The day is nearly over, and the birds in our narrow glen are singing their Evensong. The Woodland Vespers are as pure as any that ascend to heaven, and I should feel it a greater complement to be on good terms with these feathered minstrels than with a good many of my fellow-creatures. The exquisite croon of the wood-pigeon is better than the best of old ballads. It is a note that must have been learnt before envy, hatred, malice, and uncharitableness first visited our planet. The pitiful plaint of the curlew is the wail of a lost spirit; but the coo of the cushat, ■ its pure and confident tenderness, is even yet not unmeet for Paradise. Then there are two or three timid water-hens among the sedges by the burn-side, who are now nearly tame, and with whom I hope to cultivate a still closer intimacy when they have got their little ones fairly started in life. They have had a up ■ far. There — downy little brats, black as coal, with great patches of red on their prodigious bills. They insisted on leaving the nest before they were well out of the shell, and got stuck in holes and washed away by spates, so that their numbers were quickly reduced. To see the old ones rushing into the water, fishing up weeds and insects, and feeding the little mites on the bank, was one of the prettiest sights imaginable. And to add ■ his worries, the male bird had forthwith to begin the construction in mid-stream of a new nest for the reception of the youngsters — a work which ought to have been completed at an earlier date, I suspect, and before the little ones had been allowed to get scattered about a bad world where unmerciful rats and felonious magpies abound. Now the owl begins to declaim from the ivy (the poet must have had a singularly un-musical ear who first formulated that weird expostulation into the conventional "Tuwht, tuwahoo") — why or wherefore who can tell? Does he hoot the impostor and the charlatan, or, like our popular assemblies, is his unmusical protest directed against those who are honest enough to speak the truth? "What song the Sirens sang, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women, though puzzling questions, are not beyond all conjecture." But the Bohemia of the woods and fields is still almost a terra incognita ■ us, and we have as little real communion with these "poor relations" who have been placed on our own special planet as if they occupied Arcturus or Orion. There must be a mistake somewhere.

Read Proverbs vii. 22, to end. St. John xiv. 23, to end

WE have been taught since childhood to express our belief not only in God the Father Almighty and in Jesus Christ His only begotten Son, our Lord, but also in the Holy Ghost. Nevertheless, there is perhaps no truth of equal importance which is so commonly overlooked as that we are now living under the dispensation of the Holy Spirit. The Fatherhood of God and the redemption by Christ occupy central places in the teaching of the Church and in the conscious apprehension of Christian people, but there is not an equally vivid realization of the presence and power of the Holy Ghost.

This may appear the more wonderful when we recall the position which the gift of the Holy Spirit occupies in Scripture. For the outpouring of the Holy Ghost was the subject of prophecy in the Old Testament, and that He would baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire, was the distinctive feature of the ministry of Christ, as proclaimed by John the Baptist. ■ valuable was this gift of the Holy Ghost that our Lord said it was expedient that He Himself should depart in order that the Comforter might come. The coming of the Holy Ghost was at once the sign and the result of His own ascension and glorification. The Acts of the Apostles may be regarded as the very gospel of the Holy Ghost, for it is the glowing narrative of His power and presence in the Church. The Apostolic Church was recognised as being the Temple of the Holy Ghost. Through the acknowledged influence of the Spirit were the varied ministries of the Church appointed, and the apostles were sent forth to one country and forbidden of the Holy Ghost to enter another. The graces and gifts of the Spirit were the visible adornment of all believers. The all-conquering force, the sanctity and enthusiasm which possessed these men and women, and made them mighty to the pulling down of strongholds, proceeded from the indwelling of the Holy Ghost. This was "the unspeakable gift" for which they rendered continual thanksgiving. The gospel which was preached was effectual because it was preached "with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven," and "in demonstration of the Spirit and in power." When we thus touch, however, briefly, on some of the salient features of the New Testament dispensation, we must acknowledge that the abiding presence and influence of the Holy Ghost were recognised, honoured, and depended upon in an infinitely greater degree than we find them in the Church of the present day. The confession, "I believe in the Holy Ghost," which has frequently such little practical meaning for us, was then a central and vitalising truth. It inspired faith, hope, courage, and was the rich treasury from which the believers were furnished with all good thoughts, words, and works.

So great is the contrast between the faith of the early and modern Church that many Christian people now scarcely believe that as the Father is a Person and the Son is a Person so the Holy Ghost is a Person. There are, indeed, many passages in Scripture where the phrase, "Spirit" or "Spirit of God," signifies little more than an element of character. As we speak of the spirit of meekness or the spirit of freedom or of science, so in such cases the term "Spirit of God" or "Spirit of Christ" may be justly interpreted as meaning the character of God or of Christ as reflected in the human soul. There are also many metaphorical passages in which the spirit of wisdom is pictured as "crying aloud," and as "being from everlasting," or where love is set forth as acting or suffering, rejoicing or sorrowing. And founding on such usages some persons practically deny the personality of the Holy Ghost, and understand by the Spirit of God or of Christ no more than the influences of the divine character in man.

But we cannot read the New Testament or study the history of the Church of God without feeling that this is a most dangerous misunderstanding. There we find the Holy Ghost set forth, not as an effect but as an agent, not as kind of character, but as He Who produces the character. So markedly is this the case that mistake seems impossible. ■ was thus that in the most solemn hour of His life, during His last words to His disciples, Christ spoke not of spiritual qualities, but of One whom He would send from the Father, Who was ■ receive from Christ and give to them, Who was ■ abide with them; Who was to be a convicer, not a conviction, a quickener, and not a life. So was it that we find His promise historically fulfilled. The works and teaching of Christ's life were completed when the disciples met in the upper room in Jerusalem on the morning of Pentecost. Whatever moral influence His truth or His life might of themselves convey, was already present. Yet for many days subsequent to the ascension of Christ the disciples waited without either preaching or labouring. The world required the proclamation of the good news. Why did they remain idle? They had all the information they required, and yet not one of them broke the silence which had been imposed on them. They were tarrying for the promised outpouring of the Holy Ghost, and as if for ever to confound the error of those who might deny His distinct agency and personality, suddenly He came, and eye and ear and spiritual changes of the most graphic and decided nature witnessed to the power of this living and divine Agent. It came, like the rushing of a mighty wind, loud and strong, while no tempest blew, till the room was filled with sound, and then the eye beheld the visible image of His presence on every disciple, and lo! all of them were changed men. Here was surely more than the waking of a new affection. It was the presence and power of Him who is the Lord and Giver of light, life, and conviction.

We are also possessed of evidence which is earlier than any gospel or epistle. The Sacrament of Baptism is older than either, and the Formula of Baptism which has come from the lips of Christ, and has been in use probably since Pentecost, so conjoins the Holy Ghost with the Father and Son, that into Him as into the Father and Son, every believer is baptized.

We cannot enlarge further on the grounds on which our faith in the personality of the Holy Ghost rests. We but touch on the evidence in order to enforce the practical conclusion that we should pray for the Holy Ghost, realise more constantly His presence and power in the Church, and rejoice in the infinite possibilities of all victory and sanctity for ourselves and for all men, of which His presence is the pledge.

Read John i. 23 to end, Acts i. 2-4.

We touched last Lord's Day on the question of the personality of the Holy Ghost, and alluded to the marvellous occurrence at Pentecost, when the disciples received "the unspeakable gift" which had been promised by Christ. "Ye shall receive power." He promised, a new truth or new information, but such power as would give life, light, and sanctity, with all the consequent energy and influence which marked the change from what the disciples had been before Pentecost, as mere scholars and timid followers, into what they became afterwards, as the heroic apostles of the faith.

They had previously possessed all that we might have thought necessary for their mission. They had been with Christ during His whole ministry. Their ears had listened to His parables, and had caught each accent, as truth after truth fell freshly from His lips. Their eyes had beheld Him in many scenes of humiliation and of glory. They had seen "His agony and bloody sweat, His Cross and passion." They had been witnesses of His resurrection and ascension. They had learned from His own lips the meaning of His sufferings, for had not their "hearts burned within them as He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself?" They had been the subjects of His personal training. He had checked the fiery zeal of St. James and St. John, had taught the rash St. Peter his own weakness, and had delivered the hesitating St. Thomas from his doubts. What did they require more? They believed in Christ, they loved Christ, and were intimately acquainted with all the facts and doctrines of His life, death, and resurrection. What lacked they yet?

They needed power. The comparison has more than once been made to the change which takes place when the spark of fire develops the power that thunders from the gun. The black powder seems harmless as common dust, and the iron cannon and bolt of steel are in themselves silent and cold. But the touch of fire develops that mysterious element we call "power," so that earth and heaven are shaken by its discharge. So, too, was it at Pentecost. All the materials were there prepared, the work of Christ was finished, and the truth, and the men to proclaim the truth, were ready. But it required the baptism of fire to develop power, and to change these weak men into the unpassioned and victorious evangelists who were to convert the world. Whatever marvellous signs may have accompanied that outpouring of the Spirit, whatever exceptional gifts, like those of speaking with tongues or the working of miracles, may have been vouchsafed, yet the central and characteristic endowment was spiritual power—embracing the life, conviction, might, and enthusiasm which trans-

And ■ ■ this gift of spiritual power through the Holy Ghost that the Church requires now above all other gifts It is not so much increased instruction that is needed as new life, not new dogmas, but deeper conviction No Church system can itself supply our wants We have been long enough engaged in disputes as to the best ecclesiastical machinery or the most authoritative form of government and of worship These disputes have helped us but little in the stric against the evil of the world and of our own hearts When all is done that dogma or ecclesiasticism can of themselves accomplish we are made only the more conscious of the need of what no external arrangements can secure—the power of the Holy Ghost, to flash conviction, to inspire devotion, to elevate and sanctify the aims, and to give us living men who shall be witnesses everywhere for the love and self sacrifice of their Lord It is this gift of power which we also need chiefly for our own hearts, so that the good seed which has been sown there since childhood may take root and grow, and that convictions which are now feeble may become all mastering Christian service can be a joy only when it is the effect of a love that has been vitalised into supremacy over the lower affections and passions

And if the gift of the Spirit is our great need, so is the power of the Holy Ghost our great hope When all seems cold, dead, and ineffectual, when much seems doing and but little accomplished, when Churches appear moving in an orbit which touches not the actual wants and sufferings of society, when missionary progress looks slow and hesitating, then how good is it simply to look up to God and to pray for the Holy Ghost What happened at Pentecost can be repeated even now, and through the inspiration of divine life a new era may dawn on the world The breath of life which changes barren winter into spring, and thrills all nature with a pulse of fruitful energy, is but a type of that higher life which He promises to bestow on them who seek Him ■ is well that we should be taught our own weakness if it leads us the more completely ■ wait upon Him who is the Giver of all life and power and victory

Read Psalm xlviii and 1 Cor ii

It is the office of the Holy Spirit to impart spiritual life We are all familiar with the manner in which our Lord describes this as a new birth, or a being "born from above" This new life brings with it admission into a range of higher affinities and interests than belong to the natural life of man Our Lord distinguishes the natural and spiritual when He says, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit" And St Paul lays such emphasis on ■ that he draws a striking parallel For even as the lower animals are excluded by their nature from entering into the kingdom of human interest, with its intellectual and moral enjoyments, and must possess the nature of man before they can understand "the things of a man," so he asserts there is no entrance into the kingdom of God except through the Spirit of God It was thus that Christ met the question of Nicodemus The kingdom of God was there incarnated in what Christ was But to enter into that mind of Christ, so ■ to understand His glory, Nicodemus must share the life of Christ He must be "born from above"

The teaching of Scripture on this subject is consistent and unhesitating The higher life cannot be attained by any culture of the natural life, or evolved out of merely human elements It is imparted, not developed As all physical life ■ derived from life, so the life of God cannot be produced from the natural life of man It is "from above"

Our own experience may teach us the same truth For if to enter the kingdom of God is to come under the influence of "the things of God," to appreciate their glory and share their power, if ■ is to see sin ■ some degree as God sees it, to love as He loves, and, in short, ■ be in fellowship with His mind, then no one who knows society will for a moment assert that this is common or natural A brief acquaintance with human beings will satisfy the most sceptical that while every man ought to be in sympathy with the right, and to love and obey God, very few are convinced either of sin or of righteousness "We ought to love the highest when we see it," but we do not love God And when we turn our examination in upon our selves we find further confirmation of what Scripture declares We cannot by any effort of will reach the life of love and holiness as it is in Christ If any one doubts this, the best proof will be discovered in making a practical attempt To all such I would reply, "Try it Try to love God with all your heart, and your neighbour as yourself, and to attain to that ideal which was in Christ!" The endeavour will teach you as nothing else can, your need of that mysterious gift of life.

I will not, however, enlarge on this doctrine I would rather seek to remove some misunderstandings regarding it.

There is a way, not uncommon, of representing this truth, which makes ■ repulsive, invests it with terror, and is often associated with much fanaticism. The glorious saying of Christ, "Ye must ■ born from above," instead of being regarded as the very hope of humanity, is then degraded into a threat, and made even an instrument of despair. The infinite good-will of God is converted into a shocking and arbitrary fatalism.

(1.) There are those who so teach this doctrine as to destroy human responsibility—leading to the objection that ■ this life is the gift of God no one can ■ blamed for not possessing it. To this it may ■ replied, that while mystery surrounds the beginning of all life, and while there is a sense in which in every instance, physical as well as moral, life may be regarded as the gift of God, yet there are conditions on which it depends both for its commencement and growth, which are within our power. The farmer who casts seed into the ground has no power to quicken that seed. He but submits the seed to the conditions under which God's law promises to bestow life, and leaves it there. The husbandman who grafts the branch into the tree conforms to the conditions necessary for the reproduction of life in a new form. It is similar in things spiritual. We can never get spiritual life by arguing or thinking about it. But in this, as in the instances quoted, we must be "fellow-workers together with God." So it was that when Nicodemus asked Christ, "How can these things be?" He did not proceed to a disquisition on regeneration, but preached the gospel of God's love. In other words, He brought Nicodemus under those influences through which spiritual life ■ imparted. It is parallel ■ that other statement, "To them that received Him, to them gave He power ■ become sons of God." We must get into the right soil, be willing ■ come out of the darkness into the light, and yield ourselves to the love and grace of God. These are the conditions of spiritual life and growth. There never yet was an instance of a man being condemned for not having life, who was willing to receive that life. For God is far more anxious to bless us than we are to be blessed. His spirit is daily striving with us. But "this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil." "Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life."

(2.) We must also separate this truth from the fanatical use made of ■ by those who insist on every regenerate person knowing the day or hour when they were changed, or who require that a certain experience be passed through before true life can ■ reached. This is foolish. A man may be conscious that he is alive, though he cannot tell either the date or manner of his birth. And the one question of importance is, whether we are alive or dead to the love and claims of God. If I have a firm belief in the reality of sudden conversion, I have as firm a belief in spiritual life being in many cases imperceptible in its commencement. Christian baptism is a witness to this.

(3.) Others object to the whole doctrine of regeneration as casting dishonour on human nature. No doubt there have been those who have indulged in most exaggerated and false representations of the "natural man," founded generally on a misuse of some of St. Paul's arguments. We must recognise every good gift of human love and genius as from God. But it appears to me that the most encouraging of all statements and the most ennobling hope of humanity is that word of Christ, "Ye must be born from above." It would be a lowering of our humanity had He said, "God has no higher purpose for you than that you should remain as you are. Your destiny can never go beyond the culture of your present powers. Be happy, and congratulate yourselves on the high platform of intelligence you have reached!" It seems surely to be infinitely more hopeful and a greater honouring of humanity ■ say, "You must share the very life of God, and advance for ever in likeness to the All-Holy One. I insist on your becoming like myself, and entering into fellowship with the Divine." A boundless possibility of growth is thus opened up when God is made the "all in all" of our future. And we must remember that the "must be" from the lips of Christ includes a "may be" to every man. He would not reveal the law except it were possible to obey it. For every command of God is practically a promise. And when He says, "Ye must be born again," He implicitly assumes that one and all of those for whom He died may be "born from above," and share for ever the life of the spirits of the just made perfect, yea, the very life of Christ.

AUGUST 24TH.

Read Isaiah vi., and 1 Peter i. 13, to end

The result of spiritual life and light upon character is holiness. Holiness is more than morality. Every holy man is moral, but the moral man is not necessarily a holy man. There is implied in holiness the knowledge and love of God, and thereby conformity to what God is. The seraphim who cry, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty!" are filled with adoring wonder as they gaze on the glory of Him with Whom there is no darkness. Through that adoring gaze they themselves become holy, and all creatures who spiritually apprehend what God is, and enter into fellowship with Him, rise into a higher range than is embraced by the term morality. They become God-like. And so it is that the measure of spiritual attainment is Divine perfection. "Be ye holy, for I am holy" "Be ye perfect, as your Father which is in heaven is perfect"

Holiness is thus the great end and purpose of redemption, for it is the restoration of man to God.

That is a narrow and ignorant representation of the truth which regards holiness as being merely an evidence of our justification. It is rather the very purpose of justification. Mental and bodily activity are undoubtedly a sign of life, but they are worth more than that. They are of the nature of life. And this reducing of holiness to an evidence of salvation is one of those evil fruits of that selfish theology which makes personal security the chief blessing of religion. True religion, like sound health, should make us forget self and the signs and symptoms of our being spiritually alive. Holiness, as springing from the love of God and conformity to His character, must be always more occupied with God than with its own feelings about Him.

And it is our spiritual blindness which prevents us seeing the grandeur of the divine purpose that is involved in the statement, "This is the will of God, even your sanctification." When we consider it thoughtfully we shall perceive that if holiness is the very glory of God, then the most loving purpose of God towards humanity is that we should become like Himself. When we gaze on the material world we discover nothing which is not perfect, according to its place and order. The starry heavens in their majestic obedience to law, the lily of the field more splendid than Solomon, every season fulfilling its functions; every organism in its marvellous mechanism—all are perfect of their kind. Can we then imagine that the will of God in reference to the greatest of all His creatures should be imperfection? Is it possible that while order reigns in the physical universe, it should be God's will that confusion should be the destiny of the moral world? We should therefore rejoice in finding that not only is perfection put before us in Scripture, but that the standard which is set forth for man as redeemed in Christ, is God Himself. We may say it with all reverence that it is like Him whose name is love, to insist on nothing less than that we should be like Himself, holy as He is holy. And there is something, also, indicative of the greatness of man in the possible fulfilment of such a purpose. For while all material things attain their perfection in unconscious obedience to laws that have been imposed from without, it is not so with man. An appeal is made to his will, and the end involved in his sanctification is the free choice of the good for its own sake, and the sharing of the very thoughts and joy of Him who is the Alpha and Omega of all perfection.

But the very greatness of such a destiny may seem discouraging to us who are conscious of nothing but imperfection. Such ends may well appear too high for their attainment by men encompassed as we are by failure and weakness. We must not, however, forget that there are degrees of perfection, and that while we shall never reach that height of divine glory which must for all eternity be the subject of our aspiration, that yet there is such a thing as perfect seeking as well as perfect achievement. There is a perfection for the germ as well as for the mature tree, for the bud as well as for the fruit. Between the dead and the living there is a difference of kind, but between childhood and age there is but a difference of growth. There may be a perfect meeting of the mind of God in the first cry, "Have mercy upon me, a sinner," as well as in the triumphant note of victory, "I have finished my course." St. Paul says, "as many of you as be perfect be of this mind," when he had been describing how, although he had not attained nor was already perfect, that one thing he did, "leaving the things that are behind," he pressed towards the mark. And St. John could say, "Now are we the sons of God," although he was compelled to add, "it doth not yet appear what we shall be."

realising that "it is the will of God" that we should be holy. For then in all our desires after better things and in all our struggles against evil we are in harmony with His will. We are on His side, as it were, and He is on ours. We may, therefore, have confidence that He who thus wills our good is able to sustain us in our endeavour after its attainment.

ALGIVE JUST

To those who deal merely with the letter of the New Testament, without actually living the Christian life, there must often appear considerable confusion, if not contradiction of statement. At one time we are represented as saved by faith without works, and again told that faith without works is dead, now it is as if we could do nothing, and again as if all depended on our selves, now it would appear as if we were already saved, again as if we had to work out our own salvation. But in real life both aspects of these different truths are harmonised.

Any one accustomed to the language of grace might meet ■ Paul's exhortation to "work out our own salvation" with the assertion that salvation has been already finished in Christ. And in one sense it has, for in His life and death we have the ground and substance of salvation. In Him we have complete forgiveness, and in His mind and spirit we have that kind of life in the attaining of which lies life eternal. Nothing can be added by us to either of these. And yet it is equally true that we have to "work out our own salvation." For he who apprehends the grace of Christ finds that it is but the first touching of the "unsearchable riches" which must become his. He is like the Israelites who, when they had gained the Land of Promise, had yet "to arise and possess themselves of it in its length and breadth." With the liveliest apprehension of the glory and fulness of Christ there must also come the lowliest sense of personal imperfection, and the necessity for anxiety and watchful progress.

But St. Paul does more than exhort us to work out our own salvation. He gives us a reason for our doing so, which apparently runs counter to the idea ■ it being our work at all when he tells us that it is "God that worketh in us to will and to do of His good pleasure." He speaks very boldly, there is no fine fencing of the case as between God's sovereignty and the freedom of man's will. While one school of theology would put emphasis on the one clause which speaks of God, and another school on the clause which speaks of man, ■ Paul unites them both, making the power of God the very reason for the earnest acting of man.

(1) He thus gives us a lesson in humility, inculcating that sense of dependence which is the true source of strength. "When I am weak, then am I strong," was his own experience. When he was most cast upon God he gained his greatest triumph. Self will be found weakness, while in the obedience which follows rather than leads he discovered guidance to duty and power to fulfil it.

(2) He also gives us infinite encouragement amid many perplexities. There are two spheres of Christian duty—an inner and an outer. The one refers to will, the other to action, and the former is more difficult than the latter. "To do" is comparatively easy. We can "give our goods to feed the poor, and our body to be burned," and yet may all the while be conscious of the contrast between the external act and that inner world of motive which we cannot by any volition bring into harmony with the love and will of God. The hardest of all questions is how this unseen world of personal feeling ■ to be put right. Now, St. Paul meets this difficulty when he tells us that God works in us to will aright as well as to act aright, and that we need not therefore be discouraged as if everything lay upon ourselves alone. And when he adds that God does this of "His good pleasure," he does not mean caprice. There can be no thing arbitrary with God, who is the author of law and order. It is not as if it were said, "Work as you may, it will only come ■ be in the end as ■ was first ordained of God," thus making us mere things instead of voluntary beings. Quite otherwise is the encouraging truth here given us. For ■ is God's good pleasure that we should be saved—and it ■ His desire to "perfect that which concerns us." Everything ■ thus put on a firm foundation. For no command could be more disheartening than ■ be told to work out our salvation for ourselves. All is changed when we know that God works in us and with us. It ■ with the knowledge that God works with him that the husbandman casts his seed into the ground and waits with confidence for the harvest. And it is not as being alone but as fellow workers together with God, that we can give ourselves to the greater task of our own salvation, and feel strong even when facing the terrible problems of our inner life, when we are assured that it is His good pleasure to work in us to will as well as to do. We may thus possess the right motives for which we long, while we fulfil the outward actions to which duty directs us.

By SARAH TYLER, AUTHOR OF "CITIZENNE JACQUELINE" "LADY BELL" ETC

CHAP. XXV.—LADY THWAITE'S LAST FRANK

SPRING had come, with violets and daffodils adorning the anniversary of the time when Sir William Thwaite had taken possession of Whitehills.

Iris Compton had been spending the morning with Lucy Acton at the Rectory, had remained to luncheon, and was walking back alone to Lambford. She had always been fond of country walks, like most healthy, happy English girls, but after she had grown up Lady Farmer had certain restrictions on her granddaughter. Unless she had Lucy Acton or some other companion with her, Iris must be content to confine her excursions to the park, or the Lambford woods, or the home farm.

Latterly Iris had been only too willing to comply with the obligation. The truth was she had an almost morbid terror of meeting Sir William or Lady Thwaite, as she heard of them now, when they had become the scandal of the parish. "I should feel as if I must die of shame if I saw him as they say he is often to be seen now. And what if she were to come up and speak to me? I could not refuse an answer, and what should I say?"

This day showed an exception to Iris's usual habits, for Lucy Acton had been unexpectedly prevented from bearing her friend company on the road between the Rectory and Lambford. However, the way did not lead past any of the Whitehills gates, and the afternoon was perhaps the least likely time for awkward encounters. Still Iris quickened her pace in the slight spring mist which was beginning to descend upon the pastures, with their daisies and marigolds, their colts and lambs. But though the mist might strike human beings as lending a touch of dimness and sadness to the spring landscape, it did not so much as subdue the larks carolling in the hazy air, or the rooks hovering over the equally hazy earth.

Iris started a little, scolding herself for her folly, when she saw a man's figure turn the corner of the hedge-row—on which, as in autumn, thousands of floating gossamers were softening the sharp outlines of the houghs. The man was walking steadily along on his proper business, no doubt. He was a bigish fellow, young and active by his gait, carrying nothing save a whip in his hand, with which he was carelessly cutting at the hedge. As he drew near Iris, she recognised that he was a groom from some of the neighbouring country houses, apparently going an errand on foot.

Iris did not look at the man again till he left the footpath to make way for her. Then some intangible peculiarity in the air and gait of the young man in buskins, with the dark frock-coat and the cockade on his hat, caused her to look up suddenly in his face, while her heart began to throb violently.

The man was seeking to push past Iris, while at the same time he pulled out a handkerchief, and buried his face in it, as if in preparation for a sneeze or cough. The movement did not conceal the poppy red which rose and burnt through the brown skin of the cheeks up to the rim of the hat, or stifle a noise of sobbing, or giggling, or both, that had become audible.

Iris had not a moment left to think that one of the meetings she dreaded had come to pass, but so oddly and incomprehensibly that natural instinct got the victory. She caught the retreating figure by the arm and clutched it. If the person thus stopped had exerted any force, the interruption could have easily been brought to an end, but something stayed the strong, rough arm, and after the slightest struggle its owner stood motionless, while Iris cried out in her trouble, "Honor! Lady Thwaite! why are you in this absurd dress? What are you going to do? Surely this is the height of indiscretion."

"What do I matter to you how I dress, Miss Compton?" Honor tried to answer with hard defiance. "You ain't a friend of mine. You would not own me or come nigh me. What does it signify to you whether I'm mad or not? Let me go."

' Surely this is the height of indecency

"No, since we have met, not till you tell me where you are going in this outrageous guise, whether Sir William—your husband knows," gasped Iris.

"What business have you or any other woman ■ come 'atween me and my husband? to seek to know our affairs? No, miss, I'm obliged to you for desiring to satisfy your curiosity, but if you don't take off your hand I'll be forced to fire myself, and I don't want to hurt you."

"I know you don't," said Iris, pressing close to the desperate woman, instead of drawing away from her. "You were fond of me, long ago. We were both fond of each other, if we had been suffered to grow up friends. You came to me with your little presents—I was thinking of one last night, bunches of dry sea-grapes, that I might put them into my fire and hear them go off like a succession of small shots—don't you remember? They were all given for such a little service. I, a child, was amazed ■ your generosity. Oh! Lady Thwaite, it is not curiosity; ■ is not even a spirit of interference, but, indeed, you don't know, you can't guess, what people will think and say if they see you like this."

"I don't care what they say; let 'em. I am sorry—a little—that you should think bad of me, but for the rest of the world they may think and say what they please," said

Honor scornfully, in spite of a little softening to begin with, as she switched the hedge with the whip in her disengaged hand.

"But Sir William will care. Men—the best of them—cannot stand harm said of the women who are near and dear to them," pleaded Iris.

"You seem to know," said Lady Thwaite, taking refuge in insolence, and tossing her head till she had nearly lost her chimney-pot hat. "But I've always said I ain't any man's slave, and what is more, I ain't going to be. I don't believe he minds; and what right have he to meddle when I don't set eyes upon him for nigh a week at a time, because he is living in one ale-house or another, sitting swilling ale or brandy with all the low ruff he can find to drink with him at his expense, making a sot of himself worth than a brute beast? What do you think of that, Miss Compton, in a man who boasted of your acquaintance once on a day?"

"I think it is the saddest, most terrible story I have ever known," said Iris, with a shudder and eyes full of grief and horror. "But will you mend the wrong for you to be so reckless?"

"I ain't doing anything to mend," asserted Lady Thwaite sullenly; "I have only helped myself to Bill Rogers's best suit for a change and a bit of a lark in my dull life. Being a lady—even when a woman can do as she likes, and ain't yoked to a gentleman, or bothered by gentlefolk's malice—don't turn out the fun it promised. Life at Hawley Scrub were a deal livelier and fuller of things happening. Bill won't heed my making free with his clothes—even his best groom's suit; he ain't an unfriendly chap, except that he's stuck up with solemn notions of duty, and full of starch of manners, and nonsense. If I had been anybody save you, miss, I would have challenged him or her to deny that I set off a groom's livery," insisted Lady Thwaite, with a jaunty pose of her fine figure and handsome face. "I'm cock-sure you never would have knowed me from a man, if summat had not possessed you to stare right into my face. I ain't the first time I've gained in men's clothes, though I did it for a purpose then, and I did not try it on in broad daylight before. Women has done it sometimes, Miss Compton, you know, and run off to sea or to the wars before the trick was discovered; but there ain't no such luck in store for me, and this ain't the right rig, or a very good fit neither. Bill ain't my build, I'm nearer Will's."

ning on in suppliant chatter, while Iris stood looking at her in piteous wonder. Now when the truant turned her head aside, Iris spoke again still more firmly. "I believe you are wearing this coat to-day for a purpose, Lady Thwaite. I cannot be a good purpose. I beseech you to stop before it is too late."

"There ain't no use in stopping," said Honor doggedly. "You cannot prevent me doing my will. But I'll tell you the truth of my own accord, since you seem to care what becomes of me, which others as might, don't no longer. He's been at home and asleep all the morning, and he'll get up as cross as a bear afore he goes off again. But I've stole a march upon him," with a shade of triumph and cunning in her tone. "He forgot himself the last time we had words—which were no farther gone than late last night, and says he would look me up if I went to Guild's folk again. I were Satan reproving, and the company he has been keepin'. I will see every Guildsman and woman. I like, for the sake of one as bore the name and worshipped the ground I trod on, instead of taking me up and casting me down, and being ashamed of me like a stuck-up fine gentleman, for all he pretended to be one of the people. I was afeard he might be about by this time and see me from his window, or the terrace, and give chase, and demean himself to lift his hand to a woman, though I were take no pride in belonging to the weaker sex. I ain't entitled to. I'm as strong as most men, but Will's more than my match. So I borrowed Bill's toggery without leave, and now I am bound either for Guild's cottage, where they'll take me in however I like to come, and make me as bad as themselves I dare say—but they will not look down on me; or maybe I'll go to Hawley Scrub, as the fancy takes me. I were always a fanciful lass, if you'll believe me. Father's from home over at Burkett; but the pond's there where Will and me first set eyes on each other, after I had drawn him out. I will take me too, never fear, and make no words about it, and there will be none to pull me out. What do you say to that, Miss Compton?" with a more desperate gleam in her grey eyes.

"I say 'never,' Honor," cried Iris, tightening her clasp on the woman with the heaving breast under the man's coat. "What! you have still some feeling for your husband, I believe you love him your inmost soul, and you would lay that on him—his and your share with a sensation worse than you were dead? Or you would fling your death at his door and bring the crime of murder to sit on his pillow. I would rather suffer the cruellest injury, I would sooner die a thousand innocent deaths in obedience to God's summons, than rush into His presence uncalled for and unprepared. Oh! woman, how could you think for an instant of doing such wrong?"

Honor flinched at the cry, her flashing eyes fell, her hand shook, she writhed uneasily in Iris's hold. "Don't be so hard on me, Miss Compton," she protested, "I ain't given to thinking I was wild with him and myself, and I just did the first thing that came into my head. But I didn't mean to hurt him like that. What can I do? It is past help now," she said with returning recklessness. "I'll go my ways where nobody will ever find me, and nobody will know whether I'm dead or alive, and, what's more, nobody will care, unless it may be father, in a sort."

"That is not true," said Iris. "I should care, Sir William would care most of all. He did care for you and chose you and went out of his place to marry you. I need not fear to offend you by saying it, for everybody knows it, you among the rest, and it should soften instead of hardening your heart, and make you proud instead of angry. I dare say you have tried him, though you might not always know it or mean it, and he has tried you. But though there is strife between you and miserable wrong and trouble, there is not the worst so that neither can forgive and forget—so that you may not go back to him and both think better of it and be happy yet," pleaded Iris, with the great tenderness and charity which have in them something of the divine.

Lady Thwaite's heart melted in its perversity, and it was with a groan she said, flinging down the whip and striking her hands together, "I can't—I can't. Happiness ain't for him and me. I don't face him like this, he's mad now when he's roused. I put on Bill Rogers's clothes half for a lark, half to finish our misery somehow. You do good and kind, but I have seen how you looked when you knowed me. You belong to the gentlefolks, and Will is part gentleman in spite of himself. I can tell now how he'll take it. I'll not witness his hate and disgust—that is what he has come to—neither will I ask him to forgive me, he ain't me. I can't go back."

"Yes, you can, for his sake if not for your own. It is his and your last chance; I am sure of it. I will go back with you. I am not frightened for his anger. We are not far from Whitehills, and I shall still get home to Lambford without keeping grandmamma waiting."

The brave soul made a hasty little practical calculation, which was by no means uncalled for.

Lady Thwaite was still more shaken in her mind by Miss Compton's magnanimous offer. Little as Honor knew, she was sensible, not only that Iris Compton was in the deepest earnest, but that she must feel convinced the fate, for life and death, of two of her fellow mortals hung in the balance, before she made the proposal.

"It would make a sight of difference," Honor allowed hesitatingly, "if the likes of you showed you didn't mind being seen with me, in what was either a poor bit of a role, or a fit of moon-struck madness, I can't rightly tell which it were myself. You did me the honour—I know it is an honour, though I ben't mannerly—of bearing me company, and calling at Whitehills, he might change his tune, for I know he thought a deal of you, though you gave him the sack—served him right," exclaimed Honor hotly. "What call had he to even himself to you, who weren't his price at no hand? He were like me and my folk—he could tell that when he came to his senses, and he never let your name pass his lips save once after he drew up with me. But it do seem mean like to let you, as is a real lady, lower yourself for them that ain't worth it."

Lady Thwaite still hung back, her better nature reasserting itself.

"Never mind me, I am not lowering myself, and you are worth—every human creature is worth, oh! how infinitely more in God's sight!" urged Iris, fearing the loss of the advantage she had gained. "Come, Lady Thwaite," she went on, as if she were impatient to go, "we have no time to spare. You can understand that I must not keep Lady Fermor waiting dinner."

"And you are in a mighty haste in case anybody should come along the road and light on we two, and me in a man's clothes," said Lady Thwaite a little sarcastically, even while she turned and walked with a curious mixture of affront, humility, and pettishness beside Iris.

"I confess I am," said Iris frankly, and her candour was another point in favour of her suit.

"I'll tell you what we'll do, miss," said Lady Thwaite more briskly, when they had gone a little way. "If my master ain't about, we'll go round by one of them side doors, or by one of them ground-floor winders, as is often left open handy, and I'll slip in, and nobody will be the wiser. ■ Bill have missed his best clothes, he won't peach on me, I know, and I'll promise you afore we part, Miss Compton, ■ not go a-larking no more. ■ try, ■ sure as death I'll try, to stay more at home, though a great empty house, and a man brought home like a log or a bull of Bashan, ain't much of an inducement to keep house, which I weren't used to, and didn't pretend to; and he knowed it before he married me. But I'll not provoke him more than I can help, and maybe he'll grow steadier with the summer, and the fishing, and the shooting season all coming on."

"I hope ■ with all my heart," said Iris fervently; but she stopped short at the same time, and stood with her fine little head held up. "If I go with you, Lady Thwaite, you shan't steal into your husband's house, by a back door or an open window, like a thief or a dog. You'll go in by the principal entrance and the hall, in the most open way; and you'll walk straight ■ Sir William if he is at home. I shall be at your elbow to bear you out in your tale, or to speak for you, if you won't or can't do it for yourself. It is not much you will have ■ say. 'I went out on a foolish frolic because I was very unhappy, too unhappy to know well what I was about; but I soon found how silly and wrong I had been. I have come back at once to tell you all about it, if you will listen to me, and to ask you to pardon me, for we all need pardon, erring as we do every hour of our lives.' Surely that ■ not very hard to say?"

Honor bit her lips, and plucked at the buttons on her coat, but she made no farther opposition.

The strange couple walked quickly in the direction of Whitehills. They were fortunate in meeting few wayfarers; none recognised Lady Thwaite in her masquerade. Of those who guessed Iris's identity nobody was disengaged or sharp enough to think it odd that Miss Compton should walk with a groom behind her. For Honor fell a pace or two back when the first two-legged animal came in sight, and determinedly kept the second rank till they both reached their destination.

CHAPTER XXVI.—BEAUTY AT THE FEET OF THE BEAST.

It was thus that Iris entered the great gates of Whitehills again. She was under too severe a strain, too far carried out of herself, to notice, as Colonel Bell and his companions had been quick to observe, the gradual but sure growth of dilapidation, of indifference and neglect, which would soon amount to declared war against every manifestation of the orderly and beautiful. In the whole history of Whitehills, stretching back to the Norman invasion, a more apparently ill-matched pair never drew near the manor-house—the slender gentlewoman with the child-like, flower-like face, in her quiet grey serge walking-dress, the vision of whom, including her perfect womanly kindness, had once burst like a revelation on Sir William, and the groom, who looked so odd and incongruous from the moment he drew back and drooped his head with something of a hang-dog air.

The hall door stood open, Iris went in and paused for her companion ■ take the lead. "You must show the way in your own house, Lady Thwaite."

Thus spurred on, however gently, Honor started forward with a muttered, "As I'm in for it, the sooner it's over the better." She made a dash through a side passage and turned the handle of a closed door. It was that of the comfortless, unhomely room which she had made the living room of herself and her husband.

Iris had no time or power to make comparisons. Yet she received a general impression of the shabbiness and sluttishness of the room, contrasted as it was in the background of her imagination with the spacious width and gentle breeding of the entrance hall, the library, and the drawing-room with its broad and deep lights and shadows, its Sir Joshua, its Flemish carved chimney-piece.

Sir William was sitting loling and smoking over the unremoved relics of a meal which had been breakfast and dinner in one. His features were swollen and blurred, his fine eyes like burnt-out fires; yet he did not look so much bloated, as ghastly with the fierce pursuit of fiery oblivion and an untimely end. He stared in a puzzled, stupid way at the semblance of Bill Rogers, who was not Bill; but who else he was Sir William could not ■ the moment tell; and when he looked past the groom and recognised Iris Compton standing there, he started to his feet, pulled the pipe from his mouth and stared wildly, with a recoil like that of a man who sees a visitant from another world and cannot bear the unnatural contact, but is ready to cry as of old, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man."

Then Iris spoke for Lady Thwaite almost word for word as she had dictated, except that she had to say one sentence on her own behalf, to account for her presence there "I have come with Lady Thwaite, Sir William, I trust you will forgive the intrusion," as she spoke she caught Honor again by the sleeve and, letting her hand slip down, clasped in her slim white fingers the brown fist already clenched in swelling mortification and rising wrath.

His brow grew black, as full intelligence returned to him "Did she—that creature aping a man—dare to ask you to plead for her?" ■ growled out

"No, Sir William I met your wife by chance, I knew her even in that absurd dress and hailed her. She and I were old friends I begged her ■ give up a foolish, it might ■ a fatal, adventure—I offered to go back with her and speak to you. ■ was all my doing," said Iris steadily

"Then, Miss Compton," ■ cried, flinging out his hand as if to part the two, "you are nigh as idiotic ■ she is. Why don't Lady Kermor take care of you, since you can't look after yourself? Do you know what that woman there has been doing, and what sort she is, when you stand there clasp ing hands with her? Do you know what this house has grown to? What I am? What I was before I ever saw you? a low dog of a drunken, riotous soldier under sentence of the law like the brute I was and am Iris became ■ pale as death, but she did not move. It was Lady Thwaite who snatched her hand away and darted forward, crying out, "Will, you shall never belie and shame yourself in my hearing, and I not contradict you, look on me as you may. What although the pig headed fools wanted to lash you, it was them as were the brutes and not you." She was without her hat, and her abundant hair, which had been tucked up in its crown, had fallen down, her cheeks were flushed, her eyes sparkling, her white teeth showing. She looked no longer like the mockery of a man, but like a beautiful wild Amazon. Before he knew what she was about, she had thrown herself upon his neck and dragged down his collar. "See, Miss Compton, if that isn't the scar of a brave soldier as fought his country's battles, and deserved more from her than he ever got. And there is the mark of a bullet wound in his breast as took a close shave of his lungs, and of another sword-cut across his arm which he had when he was carrying out wounded men under fire. Though the authorities had done what they wanted, and scored his young back with base lashes, I know you'll never think they could have scored out them honourable marks, as he'll bear to the day of his death"

"Hold off, Honor—shut up, woman, what have you to do with me and my scratches?" said Sir William hoarsely as ■ shook himself free, but the voice was less strident, the action less violent. There was relenting in his impatience and confusion in his face

"Yes, I know," said Iris, and though her voice shook the tone was yet clear and sweet "Whatever you two have come through, or done, however low you have been brought, he has been a gallant soldier, a brave and true man, and you are a generous woman. Oh! then, then, why will you die?" she broke down a little, and in spite of herself the tears began to stream from her eyes, so that she put up her hands to hide them

"Don't, miss, don't," implored Lady Thwaite.

"For mercy's sake don't, Miss Compton," besought Sir William. "She ought not to have brought you here. She does not always know what she is doing, poor wretch, any more than I do myself. We must get you out of this here at once. Don't cry for the like of us"

"And what though I cried my eyes out?" protested Iris indignantly and despairingly, letting her hands fall from her wet face "What would it matter? a poor, weak, selfish girl like me? Do you not believe I would do anything—anything in the world, that I would kneel down to you and beg you to suffer yourselves to be saved, if that would do any good? But to think that the wisdom of all the ages has come down to enlighten us, and the blood of the Holiest has been shed to purify us, and we may have God if we will and heaven for the asking, and we will not! We may rise above our dull, miserable selves, and our evil companions and sin-stained dwellings to the home and the company of our Maker and Father and Saviour, and of the angels and all the just and gentle who ever breathed and struggled and conquered before us. But we turn our backs and choose to sink into even deeper defilement, ■ we perish here, whatever divine pity may do for us yonder. Oh! it is pitiable, terrible! God have mercy on our horrible ingratitude, stubbornness, and unbelief" She stood wringing her hands in the bitterness of her heart, associating herself with her hearers, reproaching herself as if she were the greatest sinner of all.

Lady Thwaite drew aside, touched, tamed, trembling a little as if she were under the influence of a half-comprehended spell. But Sir William was shaken to the very centre of his mortal being. He too stood silent for a few seconds opposite Iris, with his head bent, his arms hanging down and the sweat drops gathering on his forehead. Then he spoke low but distinctly in spite of the thrill and vibration of great agitation.

"Miss Compton, I gave a promise to my sister Jen, the bravest, faithfullest woman that ever lived, save one like her. My sister was but a poor woman who had done for me all my life. She was lying on her dying bed, dying of her last hard fight to serve me. She asked but one favour which I was fain to grant, that I should never again touch the drink which took away my wits. You know what my word has been worth, but if you will take it at its lowest value, I'll give it once more, and God help me to keep it. I am aware of what I am saying and doing, and I know that I have fallen back to the mouth of the pit, that I have raised anew a devil and clothed it with my very flesh so that it can thirst and crave, and madden and sicken me, to loose my grip. But if there is any of the man left in me, if God has not forsaken me utterly, I'll rise and throttle my enemy, thinking of your tears and prayers."

"I think of something a whole earth and heaven higher," she cried, "think of Him on the blood-stained cross, and of the God-Man on the great white throne."

"I was taught the story when I was a little chap by Jen," he said. "I was not bled an ignorant heathen, the more guilt and shame to me. But, Miss Compton, a saint may help a sinner to read between the lines of his Bible and understand his Maker's ways, so the thought of you may help me. As for poor Honor there, she was never a woman given over to drink as I have been. If I led you to think it of her I deceived you unknowingly. My head is in a whirl and I was never a speechifier—not great at words even when my heart was in my mouth. I want you to hear me say before her that I believe I have had little patience with her from the beginning. I am sure I was mortal hard upon her after I took to drink again."

"That's enough, Will, more than enough," cried Honor passionately. "I hate to hear you accusing of yourself—I won't have it—you may do it to me but not to another, and you know I ain't all that I should be myself, I ain't good as gold like her there—every inch of her."

"Then we must clear her out of this the first thing, that will be better than blessing her for entering our doors," he said, leaving the room.

The moment Iris's errand was done and the strain on her relaxed, though she was convinced she had acted rightly, and felt humbly thankful that she had done it, she began to realise the awkwardness of the situation, standing in that room, beside the strange woman shrinking now in the man's clothes she had borrowed, even without the account to be rendered to Lady Fermor which stared Iris in the face all the time. She was sensible Sir William was right, and that she should be gone.

Lady Thwaite would have asked Iris to take some refreshment, but the hostess did not know how to make the request, at such a time to such a guest. With a quick perception of the difficulty, Iris went to the table, took up a biscuit, and began to eat. "I had luncheon at the Rectory, but I am too late for afternoon tea at home. No, thanks, you must not get fresh tea or coffee for me, Lady Thwaite, this biscuit will do perfectly. I must go at once, to be in time for dinner."

In the meantime the spring mist had so condensed as to be falling down in dazzling rain.

"I don't mind it, I assure you," Iris asserted. "I have an umbrella, I am accustomed to be out in wet weather, and it does not hurt me. We are quite near." She hardly knew what she was saying.

Sir William came back at that moment to tell her he had ordered the carriage, and Bill Rogers would see her home. He did not offer her either his escort or his wife's. When it came to the mention of Bill, whom she had personified, Lady Thwaite had just enough perception to turn scarlet, and make a quick retreat to avoid meeting her double, in her husband's and Miss Compton's presence, or lest any of the other servants should catch a glimpse of her ladyship in her odd garments before their master and the first "real lady" who had crossed the threshold since its mistress came to Whitehills.

Sir William went with Iris to the hall door. "Miss Compton," he said, "whatever may come of this, it ain't words that can make a fit acknowledgment for what you've sought to do to-day, words are idle. Only God can reward you, though He may well have forsaken me, and He may not listen even when I call down blessings on your head."

"God never forsakes," she said. "A mother may forget her child, but He will not forsake. God bless you and Honor, your wife, Sir William."

He hesitated whether to leave Bill as beyond comparison the wretched of the two men, to put her into the carriage, but she ended the doubt, which she had not guessed, by holding out her hand to Sir William.

She drove away in the clouding-over after noon, as she had disappeared in the gathering darkness on the first evening that he had heard of her existence—the polar star of his life, which had come so near and yet gone so far from him.

Something of the glory of self forgetfulness and self sacrifice was still kindling up in a little fact, though it blanched visibly every moment before the anticipated encounter with Lady Fermor, something of the glow of that noblest enthusiasm which for the time breaks down social barriers was yet bracing her nerves and warming her heart when she alighted before the hall door at Lambford, and stood a moment to thank Bill. "You are William, our little housemaid's brother, she said brightly. 'Jenny is a good girl and a good servant, and so I am sure are you. Such servants are beyond price. Let me thank you again, and say how sorry I am for bringing you out and getting you wet.'"

Bill louted low like an ancient squire. "You have nothing to thank me for, miss," he managed to say. "It would have been a rare pleasure to sit off the box, with such as you inside, though it had been raining cats and dogs, which it is only a spring shower that don't hurt a bit. But if I might make bold and take the liberty, I would thank you, miss, and so would everybody as cares for as good a master as ever lived, and nobody's enemy but his own, to this day, and a mistress that ain't anything like right-down vicious, bless you only restless and full of jibbing and boking, because she weren't ever broken in or trained to go in harness. If you will forgive me, miss, for saying so much, since Jenny has told me the kind young lady you are, you may care to hear what a comfort it is to a stupid block as ain't much good, to find the likes of you showing mercy and holding out your hand to his betters."

Iris did not preach what she would not practise. She carried the head that was beginning to ache, and the heart to flutter, and the little white face where they would meet no pity from Lady Fermor.

The old woman, in her shawls and wamps, was already in the dining room, sitting at the head of the table, though the second dinner bell had not rung. She had been fuming over Iris's unusually prolonged absence, and had stolen a march upon her in order to convict her of being too late. Lady Fermor was in an additional wrath with the cook for not having the dinner ready before the appointed hour. "Good heavens, child! where have you been?" she demanded angrily. "I thought you had run away, and upon my word you look like it, only," she added cynically, "when the members of our family run away they are not like the lost halfpenny—they never come back again."

"I am very sorry I have made you anxious, grandmamma. I am glad you have not waited for me," began Iris a little breathlessly.

"If you think I was anxious about your white kitten's face you are very much mistaken. I was only anxious for our credit, which, being brittle ware, needs to be carefully handled. No, I have not waited for you, why should I? But where have you been dawdling? Out with it. A lad would have spoken once, and though he had been at more mischief, at least he would have been in manly scrapes, not wretched girlish trifling and pottering."

"I was at Whitehills."

"At Whitehills! Are you crazy?" cried Lady Fermor incredulously.

"No. I went there with Lady Thwaite."

"Lady Thwaite! What! has she returned? I thought she was still in Rome. And what the dickens did she mean by carrying you there? To cloak her own hypocrisy and greed in going into low company. Of course, I should have forbidden her if anybody had thought it worth while to ask my leave. It was the height of impertinence in Lady Thwaite to take you anywhere without getting my consent. Iris, you are even sillier and more stupid than I could have imagined you. I must bestir myself in my old age and tie you to my apron string."

"I was not with that Lady Thwaite, said Iris, with dry lips, "not with your Lady Thwaite, Sir John's widow, she has not come home that I know of. I was with Sir William's wife."

"Gul!" exclaimed Lady Fermor, striking the table with her closed hand and said no more.

"Grandmamma, I could not help it. I met her as I was coming home from the Rectory. I knew her though she was in man's clothes—I am sorry to say—in her groom's clothes. I had to stop her. She admitted two things—she was going to the Guilds—I don't know if you remember them, they are the worst family in the parish, and I had just heard the Actons say that she very worst Guild of all, the man Sir William Thwaite threatens to bring before the justices, has been boasting in the village that he could get Lady Thwaite to come to him at any place, at any hour, by a wag of his finger, because she was once to have married his brother Hughie, and because she has set herself against her husband. She was either going to the Guilds to compromise herself beyond redemption, or she would have drowned her self in the pond ■ Hawley Scrob. I could not walk past and let her go on. You know I could not, if ■ was possible for me to help her. I got her to return home with me, and I think that she and Sir William have made up their quarrel, and may do better yet. He sent the carriage home with me. That is all."

"All I should say it was," gasped Lady Fernor in one of the furies which were restrained perforce, and were so much more terrible for their restraint, because they contended with the weakness of age, and made her look like a devil-possessed mummy gnashing her teeth, but unable to do more. "How dare you come to me with such a vile story? What had you to do with these people, unless, indeed, you were at the bottom of all this mischief and misery? Like the wilful, insolent chit you were, you drove the fellow to a low barbarian of a wife and to drink. You lost your one chance, you made me the laughing stock of the neighbourhood, and I bore it without lifting my hand to strike you, or turning you from my doors. As if that were not enough, and too much, for my poor patience, you go and make friends with this creature of the highways and hedges. You are not deterred from meeting her, like the disgrace to her sex that she is, in man's clothes. And where any other girl of your rank who made any pretence to delicacy—to common decency, would have felt shocked, or pretended it, at least, and would have crossed to the other side of the road, and looked in the air or on the ground till the woman passed by, you chose to be half-fellow well met with her." Lady Fernor paused for a moment exhausted.

Iris tried to strike in, "I knew her when I was a little girl. It was very foolish and wrong of her to put on men's clothes. I was shocked, but Nanny Hollis once wore her younger brother's clothes, and walked through the village with Maudie. Mr Hollis was not told, but her mother did nothing save laugh, and you only called Nanny a pickle of a girl," Iris ventured wistfully ■ remind her grandmother.

"Nanny Hollis was not a married woman, and her brother's clothes were different from a groom's," said Lady Fernor truly enough in her sternness. "I hope you are not such an utter imbecile as to fail to see that there is one law for a family like the Hollises and another for the scum of the earth. But you didn't rush off and hide your face, you turned and went with the depraved gipsy to the wretched man whom she had inveigled, who had wanted you, whom you had sent to his ruin."

"It was to save her and him from the last sin and misery," urged Iris, forgetting the prohibition to cast pearls before swine. "If I had anything to do with their wretchedness, I was the more bound to aid them."

"Child, I sometimes wonder whether you have been sent to torment me before my time, whether you speak and act simply for the purpose of exasperating me, or whether it is all done out of pure fatuousness of mind. I can tell you that you have enough to do to look after yourself, without inviting all the vagabonds and blackguards in the country to hang on by your skirts. Do you know what the thing that pious puritans and ninnies call 'a good name,' means? Do you know what it is worth in the eyes of the fools and hypocrites of this world? Are you aware that you have come into the world with a smirched shred of a name, in spite of your airs and scruples—though you seem to have cast aside the last of your detestable goody goodness? Why, the women of your family who lived before you, and were ■ strong drink to your milk and water, played away your good name before you were born. I have told you it was not ■ be trifled with, and that it was little I could do for you or your mother before you—so little that, though she was a harmless fool, I was fain to dispose of her to the first scamp, with the show of a good rental, who would take her off my hands."

"Oh! grandmamma, for mercy's sake don't say such things," implored Iris, putting her hands upon her ears.

But the old woman caught the hands and pulled them down. "Ask Tom Midway's wife what she thinks of you, and whether she would invite you to pay her a visit en fami-le, though her boys are still in petticoats and her girls in short frocks and pinafores. Was it for such a one—whose name is as shaky as a tottering tree, whose fame has been breathed upon, though she herself may creep about as if she were begging folks' pardon, and getting up good deeds—to go within a mile of Sir William Thwaite, with his randy beggar wife, and their disreputable house and doings? Mrs Hollis—even Nanny and Maudie, might go for their amusement, and laugh themselves out of the adventure. Mrs. Acton and the girl Lucy, or any other clergyman's wife and daughter, might hand in tracts—at is their business—wipe the dust from their feet and nothing be thought or said. But for you, girl! even I can hardly believe that you went from any other motive than a secret hankering after the miserable fellow you thought fit to reject last year. There, that is the bell at last! It ought to have rung half an hour ago, and I'll pay out Fordham and the rest for it. I'm old, and Fermoil is a wreck, but I am not come to the pass of being either neglected or bullied by my servants, or, for that matter, by my grand-daughter. You may stay upstairs and have your dinner sent to you. Your company gives me little pleasure at any time, and I am not forced to bear it when you have made it intolerable to me. If starving on bread and water would be likely to do you any good, you may be sure I should try it, but I know to my cost the conceit and self-assurance of young people in this generation, and that if you have not stout stomachs, you have the capacity of mules for sticking to your point. I don't mean to give you the consolation of making yourself a martyr at my expense. Besides, I'm a good grandmother, Miss Compton," with another snarl under an ugly grin, "I don't wish to set servants and people talking of you, so long as I can prevent it, for when all is said and done, I dare say you will go the way of those who came before you. It is in the blood."

With this hideous, scornful prophecy, Iris, too crushed and aghast almost to be sensible of her deliverance, was at liberty to flee from her accuser.

CHAPTER XXVII.—THE ANGEL OF DEATH SMILES TWICE.

WHILE Sir William Thwaite was still under the constraining influence of Iris Compton's appeal, a thought struck him. "Why should we not leave this place, my lass?" he said, addressing Honor, while the two sat together, hot with excitement, yet shivering with momentary reaction, physically wretched and uncomfortable, shy, affronted, neither united nor disunited, on the evening of the day that Iris had been to Whitehills. "Why should we not get rid of Whitehills?" He looked round him with more of loathing disgust than sad yearning—the last was for the woods and fields, the blue horizon which had grown familiar to him, the far-reaching, yet often pale, dim sky. "It's little good we've been and done here. We'll go to some new land, such as I've read of, as rude as its colonists, we'll break it and ourselves in together. We'll hold it against the wild beasts and the wild men, till we've tamed them and ourselves, which is like to be the harder job," he ended with a heavy sigh.

"Oh! shall we, Will?" cried Honor, with the first cry of real joy and eagerness which she had uttered for many a day. "That will be grand—a life worth living. That will be a thousand times better than shooting and hooking harmless beasts and birds and fishes here. I had a notion of the kind when father and I were going to 'Merica—an out-of-the-way bit, I think they called Kansas. But father's nigh done, and young Abe and me, we didn't sort together over well when he was at home. I doubted he would not care for the hills and plains and woods, he would mind a deal more tying his luck at the diggings, or even at the cards which Eastwick folk play in houses like this, and in hovels like ours at Hawley Scrub, you know, Will, from the time the players can hold the pasteboard. But I'll work and dig, and plant and build, as well as shoot with you, and be your fit mate. I can kindle a fire and boil a kettle, and bake and roast, and wash and dry, and rough-darn for you, and you'll want nought else out there. We'll leave books and fine manners behind us."

"So be it," he said, after an instant's pause while he looked a little drearly into the fire.

"And you'll never more regret them, Will," she pressed him with hungry eyes, "you'll never fret after them, or think it would have been better if you had knowed how to keep still an idle gentleman among fine gentlemen and ladies in England? You might have done so without crossing the seas, without setting your hand to work or going out with your gun to fill the pot and keep you and me from starving."

"It will be for you to keep me from fretting, Honor," he tried to say more lightly, "to make me feel that what is best, to teach me, as I'm sure you will, that I could never do without you," and she was satisfied for the moment.

So it soon came to be roughly understood that Sir William had pulled up sufficiently to decree that the saturnalia should come to an end, so far as the place was concerned, at least. Sir William would have sold Whitehills, had he been in his power; as it was, the house was to be let. He and Lady Thwaite were going away—not to the Continent to retrench, not to German baths to drink mineral waters, not to Monte Carlo to play—but to the wilds of America, in company with old Abe Smith, where the whole party would doubtless soon sink into the gulphs of oblivion provided for the lower class of sinners. And if the couple did not send home an heir in the course of years, Whitehills would pass into the Court of Chancery, to be stranded there till a fresh sprout, refined or rude, from the family tree of the Shwates could spring up.

Sir William had severed himself from the squirearchy some time before, so that their interest in him had begun to die out, after the first burst of repitiation, though they still felt a concern for Whitehills, which he was not going to carry away with him. Besides, the attention of the neighbourhood was drawn to another quarter at the time, by the additional news that old Lord Fermor was dying at last. He had been far longer dead to the world than Sir William Thwaite had been, but the peer had this claim, that he had been one of themselves from first to last, and that his career fifty years before had been notably before a greater public—not much to its edification. Neither was ■■■ the edification of Eastham that so many stories of him were revived as he lay on his death bed, and even found their way into the newspapers again, until poor Iris Compton dreaded to cut one open, and looked fustily at the first words of every local paragraph. She had a distressing consciousness that her neighbours of every degree pushed certain journals out of sight whenever she happened to come across the papers—in the village post office, thrown down on a carriage cushion, spread out on a Knotley shop counter.

Lady Fermor had always been her husband's head nurse in his serious attacks of illness, and she continued punctual in her attendance on him till death released her from her post. For the last day and night she never quitted his bedroom. Iris was not permitted to enter, but all who came and went from the semi-darkness and the muffled sounds, into daylight and natural noise, appeared with disturbed or scared faces. Even Soames, in his reticence and composure, broke down a little, and murmured she wondered Lady Fermor could stand it. She did not think she herself could—not though it were for a pension—Soames's one idea of a bribe.

The incident leaked out from other sources that Lord Fermor, who was pronounced unconscious, while he retained his powers of mind, had been calling for his wife, with an interval of silence, throughout his protracted death-struggle. Sometimes he spoke in a voice of piteous entreaty, sometimes of abject terror, sometimes of hoarse reproach, sometimes of sharp summons. But however the tones might vary, there was never an alteration in the name, it was always that of his master spirit, his temptress, the curse of his life.

She kept answering in her loud, bold voice. At first she said, "I'm here, Fermor," as if she would rouse him to the fact of her presence. Then she cried, "I'm coming, I'm coming, Fermor." At last she fell into, "I'll follow, never doubt, I'll follow, Fermor," with a kind of fierce impatience and determination ringing out in reply to the feeble call. When all was still, Lady Fermor came down-stairs with a face almost as pinched and grey as the face in the room above, but making no other sign.

Iris looked at her grandmother with generous, tender longing. Could the stout heart have gone through the awful ordeal without being melted? Would not the aged new-made widow suffer a word of sympathy from one of her last descendants, the sole descendant of him who was gone?

The Rector, who had been waiting in the house, had followed Lady Fermor down stairs. He advanced and said, "My dear and venerable friend, our dear departed friend has left us full of years," he had almost added "and full of honour," but stopped in time, a little awkwardly. "He has been long spared to us, we must not refuse to give him up, though our human hearts may bleed. We look to you—the greatest sufferer of us all—for an example of fortitude. Dear Lady Fermor, he is not lost but gone before. You must not give way."

She looked at the speaker, with the self-command that had never faltered, and a supercilious expression, as if she were tempted to say, "Don't I know all that already? Can't I tell beforehand what you and your cloth are prepared to whisper into my ear?" But when she opened her mouth it was to make another remark. "When my lord was ■■■ his best, he was a man, and not a milk-sop," she said, with emphasis. Then she went on in a lower key, "It would have been better for him to have been taken away before he became a burden to himself and others." With the next breath she observed briskly to her speechless condutor, "Come, we have a great deal of business on our hands. I sent last night for Metcalfe," naming the family lawyer. "Has he come or written? Tom Mildmay—I beg his pardon—the present

Lord Fermor, must be telegraphed for. The funeral arrangements ought ■ he made immediately."

The dowager Lady Fermor gave no thought to rest or seclusion. The world had always ranked with her, if not before, certainly immediately after, the flesh and the devil. The world was of signal importance to her still, and she had been fond of business in her prime. Even in its grimmest aspect, and under the burden of her years, she looked to it for solace and abstraction.

"She must miss and mourn for him in her own way," Iris said to herself slowly. She was not wanted in the busy days which followed. She wandered away by herself, or sat seeking to recall the few kindnesses her grandfather had shown her. With a little hesitation, lest her grandmother should object to the gentle tribute, Iris gathered and arranged the flowers which were to lie on his bed and on his coffin, as the last dutiful service she could render him.

Lady Fermor would not be persuaded to remain away from the funeral. She tottered on Iris's arm by choice from the mourning coach to the church, and then to the mouth of the vault to look down with dry eyes on Lord Fermor's final resting-place, in the niche next to that in which her own worn-out body would soon lie.

At the reading of the will, when Iris was again present with her grandmother, it was found, as most of those interested were previously aware, that by the agreement with Tom Mildmay, Lambford was still secured to Lady Fermor as a residence during the few years she could survive. In addition to her furniture Lord Fermor bequeathed to his widow the remnant of the fortune which was at his disposal, apart from the entailed estates. The bequest was practically unconditional, for the slight mention of his grand daughter Iris's name, though it was coupled with a recommendation, still left the succession entirely a matter of Lady Fermor's will and pleasure. She had caused it ■ be written that the testator devised such and such property for her use during her life time, and on her death for the use of their granddaughter, Iris Elizabeth Compton, or to be disposed of in any other way which Lady Fermor should see fit.

Iris was thus left dependent on her grandmother. The girl had never conceived of any other disposal of Lord Fermor's means, than that he had executed. Brought up under the sole control of Lady Fermor, accustomed ■ her precedence in everything, it appeared but natural and right that ■ her should continue the sovereign power.

Later in the afternoon of the funeral day, not only the new Lord Fermor but the new dowager continued still closeted with business men lingering over trifles which were pronounced of moment, and which held a fascination both for the heir and his natural enemy with whom he was too prudent a man to quarrel, preferring to maintain towards her his old attitude of cold politeness and armed neutrality. Iris sat alone in the drawing-room amidst the pompous space and tarnished gorgeousness which seemed ■ mock at the narrow bounds of a coffin and the most glittering unseal that could deck a coffin lid. She was ■ the furthest window, to which she most frequently retreated. She was yielding herself up to that sense of the emptiness of the dwelling, and the hollowness of life itself, which is apt to hunt any sensitive imaginative mind, in a household from which its dew has been taken away to be buried out of sight, even when there has been no anguish of spirit in the rending of near ties. When one of the servants came to her with a message. A lady had been inquiring several times that day at the nearest lodge, which was a short distance from the house. She had been asking for Miss Compton in reference to the possibility of seeing her. The lady was at the lodge now, waiting till Miss Compton should be told.

Iris thought of Lucy and her affectionate sympathy. The lodge keeper was a stranger, who had taken service at Lambford only the other day. He and his wife might not recognise the Rector's daughter, and no doubt it was from reluctance to intrude at such a time, that even Lucy had not come on to the house.

Iris looked at her watch—there was time enough to spare before the first dinner bell rang, even if Lady Fermor did not eat her dinner, for once, in her dressing room. She ran up for her hat and jacket and hurried to the lodge. It was a wild windy day, during which showers of hail had repeatedly pelted down the petals of the wild cherry blossom and scattered them about the walks. A blast came scurrying along faster than Iris walked, so that she could only distinguish a tall figure, surely taller than Lucy, standing looking out for her at the lodge-house door. The figure stepped forward to meet Iris. ■ was not Lucy Acton, it was Lady Iwhaite.

Iris felt vexed and troubled. On this day of all days she would least like to Lady Fermor. This was not a place for Lady Thwaite to appear, when Iris could no more invite her up ■ the house than she could have bidden Sir William attend the recent funeral ■ was something, however, that her ladyship was dressed with much greater propriety than on the last occasion when Iris had seen her. In fact, Lady Thwaite was clad more in accordance with the station to which Sir William had raised her, than Iris had yet known her to be. Honor wore a fur-lined travelling cloak wrapped round her ■ protect her from the driving wind and hail, and she had on a fur cap to match, which sheltered her head and became her. But, after all, the most suitable dress could not do much ■ qualify an unauthorised and undesirable visit.

"You do not care to see me, Miss Compton," cried Lady Thwaite, speaking first, "but I could not go without one more look at you."

"Are you going so soon?" answered Iris, startled. "I thought you were not to sail till next month, when the season would be more advanced, and you might depend on better weather."

"Fither and I are getting too weary," said Lady Thwaite, with a little smile, "besides, one can never tell how many more opportunities there may be. I thought there might be a likelier chance of seeing you this afternoon than later, when other great folks be come ■ comfort you, and when Lady Fernor is able to take her ride in her carriage again."

"Perhaps," said Iris, doubtfully, then she said more readily, in the goodness of her heart, "It was kind of you to wish to bid me good bye, and I am sure you will not be offended if I cannot stay long talking to you. You know poor Lord Fernor was only buried this morning, and I must not fret Lady Fernor to-day by being out of the way, should she want me."

"No, to be sure," Honor admitted frankly. "But, my sakes! how tied up you are, and what a little delicate creature—if you will forgive me for saying so—you do look in your black. You are not much above my shoulder if we were to measure, miss."

"I believe it without measuring," said Iris with a faint smile, "more than that, as I am not very little—I am as tall as Miss Acton, for instance—you must be a big woman, big and strong, fit to face and conquer the world."

"Ah! but it was you as faced and conquered me and Will, when I durst not have done it to him, not though he ■ my master. Now, t that strange? a delicate, dainty young lady as couldn't shoulder or fire a gun, not to save your life, but you could face the wild beasts which he said him and me were when the drink were in him and the rove on me!"

"It was not I," said Iris, "it was the good that was deep down in your own hearts, it was the spirit of goodness striving with your spirits. 'If I helped you by a word or a look that is my great reward. Oh! Lady Thwaite, see that good overcomes. Fight and pray for yourself and your husband, and may God bless and prosper you in the land to which you are going.'"

"That's a kind wish, Miss Compton, and I'm main indebted to you for it and for all that went before it," said Honor less restlessly and slightly, in a more subdued, earnest tone. "Surely I'll do my best, if—if he comes to me of his own free will, if he shows me beyond mistake that there is none as is like me to him, none—not even an angel from heaven as can come between us two." And again, with one of the quick revolutions natural to her moods, the craving for supremacy, the exacting tyranny of a proud and passionate temper flashed from her grey eyes.

"Sir William has gone to you, he has shown you that already," said Iris a little wearily, as she remembered with self-reproach afterwards. "Don't play with your newly-found peace, don't be captious and plague your husband with idle suspicions. I cannot tell—I am speaking from what I imagine and what I have read, but I believe if you would keep a man you must trust him." She was in haste to get back. "Good bye, Honor, I will not say farewell, for although we shall be far apart, there ■ no saying but that we may meet again."

Iris did not know how far she would be, in time to come, from this early friend and late claimant on her pity and charity. The girl could not guess under what different conditions the two would meet again, ■ she hurried home, feeling that on this day she ought not to ■ abroad, ought not to be engaged in the most innocent unpremeditated interview of which her grandmother would disapprove. ■ seemed ■ her as if Honor Thwaite and her husband were melting away from her view, fast sinking beneath the horizon, gone together for their new chance and their united struggle in a fresh country, while she remained forlorn, standing by her colours, facing Lady Fernor and the world.

Under the circumstances, Iris heard nothing from the world without, of Lady Thwaite and Sir William for the next ten days, when an appalling piece of intelligence startled and shocked her.

On the very morning following Lady Thwaite's visit to Mrs. Sir William, to his unbounded surprise, dismay and anger, found his wife's place vacant and herself gone without leave. She had left a letter for him primitively queer in caligraphy, orthography, and syntax generally, still queerer in sense, but eminently characteristic of the wayward woman —

"DEAR WILL THWAITE,—By the time this reaches you and finds you all well, father and me, we will have sailed for 'Merica. We, leastways I, for father did no more than I bid he, 'ave stolen a march on you and are starting in the small 'ours so as train may reach Liverpool in time for us to sail in a hummingrant vessel as is to leve old England a month before the vessel in which you was to take our births. The reason why, Will, is that I wishes to leave you free to make your chuce anew. I am sensible as our marriage do not have ansered so far, and I have been a truble and a burden to you—drav you back to the wild curses of your youth. All that may be ended, I hop so, with all my hart for your saku, still more than for my own, but I 'ave made up my mind, Will Thwaite, you shall not be forced to keep to your bond. If you prefers to stay on at Whitehills without the cumbrance I have been ■ you, if you would lick to ■ back to the ranks of the fine laddies and gentlemen as you're entided to walk in, this here is to say you can and welcome. Even though I had not done you enuff harm already, I am not the woman to hold a man against the gram. But, Will, if you do care, the rod is before you as before me. You have not ■ do, but to come on in the next ship, as us spoke on, and father and me will be awaiting of you at New York. I can take care of myself, as you know, and father, too, both, so no more at present, and I am your servant to command or your loving wife as you will.

Sir William Thwaite was not a meek man by nature. Events had left him full of honest compunction and desire ■ amend his ways, no doubt, but he was also sore, worried, and irritable.

He took great umbrage at this last very inconvenient and unseemly freak of Honor's. He did not distrust her word or even her motive, but her plea of offering him the freedom which was not hers to give, and of testing his love, did not touch him, as it might have appealed ■ his heart had there been more ■ true love than of mere kindness and pity for her there. He fell back on the charge of deceit and falsehood which he had been forced to bring against her from the first. She had promised to do her best, she had been elated and filled with sanguine anticipations of the wilds of Western America, and what had her good intentions and extravagant hopes come to? He predicted ■ would be always thus, she would be wrong headed, perverse and crafty, if not treacherous, ■ the close of the chapter.

But he would circumvent her, if possible. She was not fit to take care of herself. Abe was no proper protector for his daughter and another man's wife. She had taken away enough money for two steerage berths, which would throw her into company the least capable of restraining and shielding her, while he did not believe she had sufficient means for the maintenance of herself and her father on landing.

Sir William set off, within an hour of getting his wife's letter, in pursuit of her. He hoped to arrive in Liverpool before the emigrant ship had sailed, to go on board of her the first thing, and intercept the fugitives. He would either induce his wife to return and wait for the vessel on which he had originally fixed, or he would insist on taking his passage in her ship, and sailing with her and her father.

When Sir William arrived, he found not only that the ship was out of the Mersey, but that the pilot had returned, and there was no hope of his overtaking her. Indeed, she had gone even before Lady Thwaite arrived, but her ladyship had been equal to the occasion, and was so resolute in her purpose that she had hired a boat and followed in time to be taken on board when the pilot was dismissed. There was no good in rushing to Ireland, for the ship was not to touch there. Much displeased and disheartened, Sir William stayed on for a time at the first railway hotel ■ had entered. He made inquiries about the next vessel to sail for America, and settled to go with a screw steamer in the course of the following week, without returning to Whitehills to show "his diminished face" there. He would leave all the concluding arrangements, as to the letting of the house, and the supplying him from time ■ time with funds, to Mr. Milb, and he would write and summon Bill Rogers, who was ■ be his fellow voyager.

The weather was now fine, even balmy for the season, the equinoctial gales had blown by Sir William had not so much as the sardonic satisfaction of reflecting that Honor in her first experience of sea sickness might be ruing her wilfulness in giving him the slip—she had hardly ever been ill in her life before—and that subdued by circumstances, she might miss him, and repent of her rash separation from him.

The forsaken husband was loitering about the docks, when he became aware of a certain ferment and stir among the dockyard labourers. He heard fragments of scuffling talk, one old man said to another, 'There's been nothin' like it, I can say' the last sunnion down off the Kent coast or the sinking of the Princess Alice in the Thames.

'Look her right in the waist, Joe,' answered his mate, "and clipped her there so that her ware not only stove in, but parted midship and went down in two bits, one after t'other like two stones. There weren't no time to sing out for help, even if t'other vessel hadn't sailed on as fast as she could run and never looked behind her. Not more than a couple of boats could be got down and they do say nine-tenths of the whole lot of them poor people are in Davy's locker by this time.'

'Right of way, do you say? That's a question will be tackled in our day, Joe, not till lords and ladies and princes and princesses have had their turn of clustering like bees about the gangway with their scarves hoisted!—them that a beard do tell Bless us! What do the sinking of an immigrant ship or two, cause of wint of tale of right of way make to the Lords and Commons?

Sir William stood as if nailed to the spot, with his heart failing him for fear of what had befallen some unhappy voyagers. He could make out the talk to refer to a collision of ships at sea, with great loss of life. On inquiry he learnt a few more details that right of way, which may be even more fatally neglected or misunderstood on water than on land, had been disregarded or blundered over once again. Two vessels—the one foreign the other an English emigrant ship—had run foul of each other in a fog off the Welsh coast. The foreigner had drawn off little injured, and sailed away like a cowardly depredator and wanton murderer. The emigrant ship had suddenly parted midships, settled, and sunk, before more than a couple of boats could be lowered and put off. Of a great living freight sailing along without a dream of danger—no storm in the sky, no heaving, tossing sea, neither rocks nor breakers ahead, the mother country still in sight—the mass had perished.

The words 'emigrant ship' caused Sir William to clench his teeth to keep in a cry. The name? There was no doubt of it. The name was that of the vessel in which his wife and her father had sailed. But still there was a glimmer of hope. Two boat loads of passengers had escaped. Boats from other ships on the same course might have picked up such of the shipwrecked men and women as could swim, or keep themselves afloat for a space, in a sea "as calm as a pond." Nay, it was reported that some persons in the emigrant ship at the moment of collision had leapt on board the other vessel, which had taken itself off.

There was no printed list as yet of the passengers saved, but it would be published as soon as authentic intelligence could be procured, and there would be no difficulty in reaching the little village on the Welsh coast, the nearest point to the scene of the accident.

Sir William made out in a terror-stricken, half-despairing little crowd of relations and friends. Scarcely recovered from the pang of temporary parting, they hurried in hot haste to the locality of the disaster to ascertain if the parting had been for ever in this world, and to exchange the passing pang for the weeping which would not be comforted, for those who were not.

The tale conveyed to Liverpool was found substantially correct. There was still great uncertainty with regard to the fate of individuals, but the many bodies already washed on shore served not merely as grievous confirmation to the heavy loss of life but bore melancholy testimony to the final chapter in the history of not a few men and women.

Sir William received his answer in the first ghastly row of corpses he inspected. It came to him in the spectacle of a drowned young woman of fine physique, with a marriage ring on the third finger of one brown hand. She had on a dark dress, with which had been worn a bright-coloured neckerchief still knotted about the throat. The rich colour had been washed out of the cheeks and lips, the grey eyes looked up without speculation in their congealed depths. But there was no disfiguring mark on the still face, and there was eternal peace in the breast which heaved no longer. He had followed her fall of justifiable anger, but there was no room for anger or for anything save immeasurable sorrow when he overtook her. Of what use had been the splendid strength which had not preserved the brave life for a little hour? She had saved another from a more dangerous pond than that pond-like sea, but she could not save herself. Why had he not been at hand to repay the life she had given back ■ him? Was it always to be thus in his history, that the woman who saved him were to suffer and die as their part in the salvation?

Old Abe's body was not to be found, and without waiting ■ search for it, Sir William did indeed carry home his wife to Whitehills, but it was in her coffin. There was a great talk, much scandal, and some pity excited by her untimely end. There was a funeral at Whitehills ■ which some of Sir William's neighbours and social equals—among them Mr. Hollis—came uninvited, and to which he himself bade those of the Quarry men who had been Honor's relations and friends. But though the widower, silent and stern in his suffering, ordered that the late Lady Thwaite's remaining kindred and former associates should return with him to the house and have refreshments set before them, he himself did not eat or drink with them, and he took his last leave of his guests on the threshold.

"You were no true friends to Lady Thwaite," he said coldly, "she owed it at the last. You know she quitted the country without saying good-bye to one of you. You are no friends of mine that I should ever seek to see you again—still I have had you here to day, because blood is thicker than water, and because, admitting my own misdoings, I bear no ill-will to you. And if you can point out at any time a way in which I can really help you, I will do it, for her sake who was a link between us, since she, my wife, counted kin with you."

The Quarry folk departed, discomfited and affronted. They wanted none of his help, or his sauce either. What was he to come it over them with his taunts and lectures? they blustered amongst themselves. They supposed they were not to have another blow out when old Abe's carcass cast up. He was to be buried like a dog. But they would not suffer it. They would bury old Abe like one of themselves, and drink themselves blind in his honour, to shame the turn-coat squire, with his wet and his dry bouts, his sinning and repenting.

But in spite of Sir William's efforts and offers of reward the remains of old Abe never "cast up," so as to be disposed of honourably or dishonourably. He either slept as quietly as many another at the bottom of the sea, or his unidentified body filled a pauper's grave, or it was just possible he escaped, and vanished into obscurity. He had the secretiveness, love of mystery, intrigue, and sensation, the restlessness and fitfulness inherited from an ancient migratory, predatory race. He had transmitted some of these traits to his daughter, intermingled with the headstrong impulses of a warmer, more faithful heart, and a more generous temper, a union more perilous than the tendencies taken singly.

If Abe did survive the destruction of the Geoffrey Hudson, his dislike of being looked after, cared for, or, as he would have considered, shelved, and perhaps his apprehension of Sir William's anger, because Abe had abetted his daughter and furthered the scheme which had cost her life, prevented the old man from ever reporting himself to his son-in-law, and claiming his assistance. Like a wail, or the wild, hairy creature of the woods, which the little ex-gamkeeper had first appeared to the master on whom he had preyed, Abe drifted away into oblivion, replucked, as his predecessors the squatters had been, by more reasonable and steadier sons of the soil.

BANNOCKBURN.

I HEARD beneath my feet the sharp clear ring
Of grinding rail and wheel,
I felt, as on we sped with rush and swing,
The carriage sway and reel.

Outside, the metals on the other truck
Like two thin lights were seen,
Ahead, the signal, in a ground of black,
Glimmer'd red, white, and green.

I saw from windows, as if hung in air,
'Mid handles gleaming white,

Pumpmen that clutch'd and drew the levers there,
And set the pumps aright

At times from out the dark there roar'd and crash'd
With sudden whistle blast
An engine, and a gleaming head-light flash'd
A moment, then shot past,

But not until I saw, as in a land
Misty with whirling steam,
Driver and stoker on the foot-plate stand
Ghostlike, as in a dream.

Then all my thoughts began to wander out
To meet the march ~~in~~ time,
With all his triumphs poets rave about
And prophecy in rhyme:

The higher man, the broader laws to be;
The life of larger powers,
A furlong farther from the moaning sea
Of what to-day is ours

Till, freight with wonder at such Atlas toil, Wherever I might turn,
A voice said, "We are passing sacred soil,
The Field of Bannockburn."

"The Field of Bannockburn," that name to me
Came like a spell of might,
I rose and put the window down, to see
That glorious spot by night.

Ahead, the dark, as in a sudden breeze,
Went swaying up and down,
Behind, but faint and dim, by two and three,
The lights of Stirling town.

A heavy, murky wall
Rose up, and spread a drear and cold expanse
Of darkness over all:

Not over all, for, when the smoke drew
The furnace doors apart,
A shaft of light rose upward, and shot through The clouds like some huge dart.

Then I drew back, but as I took my seat
My former dream was gone,
The iron music underneath my feet
Sang with another tone.

The roar of wheel on rail had now become
One long continuous tread
Of thirty thousand men by tramp and drum
To battle sternly led

The engine's whistle was the trumpet shout,
The mighty battle cry,
Calling on men to sternly face about,
And for their country die.

My blood was up. I saw the standard shake
Its folds upon the breeze,
And men from out the heavy columns break
And fall upon their knees.

I saw the glitter of an axe on high,
And keen to overwhelm,
Flash like a sudden bolt from out the sky,
And crash a shivering helm;

A war-steed rearing with his nostrils burst,
And eye-balls gleaming white,
Rush from beneath his falling rider, first
Front of the coming fight;

Then rolling onward full of death and doom,
A flood of cavalry,
Led on by streaming flags that rose like spurs
Shook from a roaring sea;

A hollow sea of steeds and rulers grim
Maid to the very lips—
Lack one the bearer of some doom, like him
In the Apocalypse.

A sound of cutting hoofs that mar and smite
The turf, a long deep roar,
As if a muffled ocean smote by night
Upon an unseen shore!

From right to left with trumpet blast and blare,
A gleam of English steel
Sweeping on thirty thousand Scotchmen there,
On fire from head to heel!

On, on they came. At last they reach the pit,
A quiver and a shock
Breaks through the front rank, as a river splits
Upon a stubborn rock.

Then with one shout that quiver'd with its wrath
Our Scottish lions leapt,
And, like a torrent from its mountain path,
Down on the foe they swept.

A clash of sword and spear, of shield on shield,
The flash of eye to eye,
Whereas was but one thought, to keep the field,
Or loving it to die!

So went the storm of battle fever red
From thinning rank to rank;
I lie careless earth beneath the heaps of dead
Their life-blood slowly drank.

A waver through the English hosts, and then,
Like some retreating sea,
They fled and, fleeing, left their heaps of slain,
And Scotland once more free.

Hark! that long shout from thousands as they yearn
To make their hearts as one,
That shout has made this Field of Bannockburn
Another Marathon!

I wake up from my dream. I hear no more
The battle-shout prevail,
Nor underneath my feet the rush and roar
Of wheels upon the rail.

Far other music now is mine again;
The battle clangour ceases,
With all the woe and years that proffer men
The white results of peace.

For lo! I hear on either side of me
The busy tramp of feet,
And, like a lower lane of stars, I see
The lights of Princes Street.

CHAPTER XLIX—"VICTORIOUS IN A STRIKE WHERE ONCE HE FAILED"

"Formerly
He turned his face upon men speak enough,
If I said father? Now, I might cry loud!"
L. B. HARRINGTON

DO people, when they lose their presence of mind, always do the thing that they ought not to have done? May not a serviceable instinct take the place of the lost mind? Surely the impulses that come of a life long habit of right feeling, sensible thinking, can not always be wrong when called in at a crisis. It seems probable that many a one who gets credit for presence of mind in an emergency might be willing to confess that mind had nothing to do with the matter at all. A shock, a stun, scattered senses, a passionate desire to be doing something—that is all that can be remembered, though the people praise you ever so loudly.

Genevieve Bartholomew remembered no thing afterwards but the sight of the dark, still form lying on the studio floor between the returned pictures.

Though she forgot all else she could never forget that. She did not know that she had called to her father in despairing, beseeching tones, imploring him to speak, that she had tried to lift the grey head from the floor, that finding herself unable to do more than that, she had placed it on a cushion, and had covered the still prostrate figure with rugs. This was all done in the first moment of distraction and terror. Then the girl went flying through the orchard, and away up the snow covered field paths to Hunsgarth Hags, just as she had dressed herself for her morning's work, she had not stayed even to snatch a hat or shawl. But the keen frosty air had no chilliness in it, the sun rising silently upon the earth had no beauty. The whole world had only one vision—a vision of a dark figure lying helpless, and left alone.

Her hands were clasped she was praying passionately and audibly as she went upward. But her voice ceased presently. When she reached the Hags she could not speak at all. She could only stand there, white, breathless, stricken with horror, and pointing downward toward Netherbank.

"It is your father?" Dorothy Craven said, taking the girl's half-frozen hand. "I'll be ready in a minute."

XXV—

"Come—come now! . . . And your boy, Hanson, he will go for a doctor . . . Come, oh, come now!"

They went down together, Miss Craven and Genevieve, running, hurrying breathlessly across the fields. Old Joseph Craven came to the brow of the hill. "Lh, but it's hot," he said, smiling in his gentle, unmeaning way. "It's her wi' the bonny gold hair. She sudn't ha' come out wi' that bonny hair when the snaw's all white upon Langbarugh Moor."

No change had passed upon the prostrate man—none that could be discerned by a glance, but Genevieve perceived, with an intense thrill of joy, that the pulse gave faint signs of a faint vitality. She chafed the thin hands tenderly, and bathed the helpless head. Dorothy had brought some brandy, and she set herself to administer it with a slow and cautious persistency that had its reward at last. The grey, weary eyes unclosed, the ashen lips parted—there was a moment of recompense for many moments of ill.

Full life came back slowly. Privation had told upon the man's strength more than he himself knew. But by and-by, when Genevieve had lighted the fire and drawn the sofa forward, he was able to reach it. He was lying there when Dr. Armitage came, Dorothy had gone up to look after things in the cottage. The two pictures had been put away out of sight, the studio had been made to look tidy and cheerful, to seem warm and comfortable. There was not much, save the look on Genevieve Bartholomew's face, to give extraneous evidence as to the stun and agony that the morning had brought.

Dr. Armitage was a man whom it was good to have near you in such a moment. Mrs. Caton was in the habit of saying that he was the most unprofessional professional man she had ever seen. This may be conceded so far as his manner went. Though you had stood by a dozen sick beds with him, you did not associate him with the sickness, or with the gloom, but rather with all alleviating things—the smiles, the small pleasantries, the newest bit of lively news, the first hope he had given you, the last laugh he had hid over your too fearful despondency. If he had been with you in a dark moment, you only remembered his skill, his quiet strength, his unending sympathy.

He was a tall, grey-haired man, with a look of out-door life upon his russet cheek. He had met Genevieve many a time by the bedsides of the poor people of Murk-Marshes; and he came into the studio with the air of an old friend.

"Good morning, Miss Bartholomew," he said, shaking hands heartily, and making the most of his opportunity for reaching her face. "I'm rather sorry to have a patient at Netherbank. I suppose you are finding that you are hardly yet acclimatized. Certainly this cold weather is very trying."

Then he sat down with a careless swing in one of the uncomfortable antique chairs near the sofa. Bartholomew was sitting up, leaning forward in a tired, weary way. "I feel very much ashamed of myself," he said smiling, and looking more wan for the smile. "To think I may have brought you out here at this time of day!"

■ was a perplexing case for a doctor, and one that required careful thought before any satisfactory diagnosis could be arrived at. The prostration of strength was only too evident, and the fact that there had been a sudden mental shock was evident also—this Bartholomew himself confessed, as he felt bound to do, while Genevieve sat by him, holding his hand, and trying to keep back the slow, hot tears that came to her relief.

"It will all come out, I am afraid," the artist said with quivering lips. "I would keep it quiet if I could, but the man who brought the pictures back, and put them down at my door this morning, will hardly keep such a matter secret. I fancy he was a Thirkeld Abbas man."

"Did he say anything, father?" Genevieve asked with white lips, and eyes that yet looked through a mist of tears.

"Yes, dear; he had a message, a brief message to give. 'Mr. Richmond's compliments, an' he's sent them pictur's back.' That was all the man said, but he looked more. I shall not soon forget his look. If ever man was ashamed of his errand, he was ashamed. There was another man in the lane below, I think, indeed there must have been. The pictures are too large to have been brought even from the village by one man. . . . But I cannot tell. I was feeling faint. I had not slept all night; and I ■ had come down here ■ see if the air would revive me. I had only just come when I heard a knock at the door. The pictures were standing there, and the man with them. That is all I remember. It was a kind of climax, I suppose, the insult and the humiliation coming after long anxiety. . . . But it is over now. I shall be all right in an hour or two."

"Say a day or two, or a week or two," said Dr. Armitage. "I am not given to saying things likely to depress people, but I want you to take care of yourself a little, that is all. I shall look to Miss Bartholomew for help if I have to enforce obedience."

"You do not mean to say that if I can work, I may not?"

"I mean to say that you may not work, that you may not think, and that you must take an abundance of extra nourishment. . . I shall speak to Miss Bartholomew about that before I go."

Dr. Armitage made no comment concerning the confidences that had been made ■ him. Comment was not in his way. He was not a silent man, but he was capable of silence, especially if anything impressed him. ■ he were impressed now, he did not say so, but he sat with a certain look on his face which spoke very eloquently of private opinions. This thing that he had heard was not all new to him. It was new to no one in the neighbourhood of Murk-Marshes, and he was not sorry to see and hear the painful truth for himself. He knew that he had stepped as it were into the very middle of a piece of tragic circumstance, but he asked no questions as to the beginning, and he could wait for the end. It was enough for him that he was in possession of the facts as they stood at present.

"It is the insult, the humiliation," the artist had said, but Dr. Armitage made his own additions to this. To him, as to all other doctors, many questions not medical were presented for consideration, and though no man could be less given to interference, he was not a man to put aside an obvious duty because ■ happened not ■ be, strictly speaking, a professional duty. It appeared to him that such a one was before him now.

"You will understand me," he said to Genevieve as she went with him up the orchard. "I do not desire to know anything more than I know already. But it seems to me, that placed as you are at present, I ought to try to be of some use to you. I mention it to you rather than to your father because he must not be harassed. Keep him from thinking of this affair as much as possible."

"You are not alarmed for him now?" Genevieve asked, with a sudden new anxiety coming into her eyes, a sudden flush of fear spreading over her white face.

There was a perceptible pause.

"I think it only my duty to say to you that the attack of this morning has been of a more critical nature than I admitted while speaking ■ your father. . . I do not say this ■ alarm you, but to impress upon you the fact that he will require to be careful. He ought to have absolute rest from anxiety. As soon as ■ is ■ for work I shall encourage him ■ begin at once, and it may be that he will throw off all this much more easily than I think. So I repeat, don't be alarmed, and spare him all the mental disquietude he may be spared. . . . Now you will understand more clearly why it is that I want you to have some help. And since I have no time to spare, pardon my brevity. Would you like to have Mr. Kirkoswald's advice in this matter? ■ so I will ride round that way, or would you prefer that I should call at the Rectory as I pass, and ask Canon Gabriel to come over?"

A quick blush that was more of pain than of merriment surged over Genevieve's cheek.

"It will be easier for you to call at the Rectory," she said in quiet, indifferent tones.

The doctor smiled, then he said "good-bye" in his hearty, cheery fashion, and rode off, thinking it pitiful that a woman so young, so beautiful, so regal-looking, should be buried in such a place as that, and buried under such a weight of sorrow too. "If I were Kirkoswald she shouldn't stay there another week," he said to himself. "But after all, the rumour that mentions the two names in a breath may be only an idle one. Rumour has been very busy about Netherbank of late. The picture affair is an odd one, but easy to be seen through. It is no question of price—the idea is absurd. Think of young Richmond caring for fifty guineas more or less! It is only too evident that the paintings don't give satisfaction—and poor Bartholomew can't be expected to see that, much less to admit it. . . . I wonder what he'll do? The most dignified thing would be to put the pictures into the fire, and never mention them again. I should like to see them first though."

So the doctor was thinking as he went down between the white, sparkling hedgerows. Genevieve had stopped for a moment in the kitchen to speak ■ Miss Craven, who was going home. "I must go," she said, "I've let the milk stannin' in the pails, I hadn't even got ■aled. But I'll be back afore long. An' Keturah'll be here afore I get down again."

"You have sent for her?"

"Of course I've sent for her. I've sent Hanson, an' he'll fetch some groceries an' things back with him, an' leave 'em here as he passes. He doesn't know but what you've sent for 'em, so don't you say 'at you didn't. An' what are you cyyin' for? It'll be all right." Then Dorothy laughed, but the tears came into her own eyes as she did so.

"It's allus the poor 'at helps the poor," she said, clasping Genevieve's professed hand. "You've done me many a good turn afore ■ dry, an' I make no doubt but you'll do me many another. Not 'at I'm don' aught now with an eye ■ what you'll do when you're mistress o' Usselby Hall."

"Oh! don't say that, Miss Craven, don't even think it, please," the girl begged. She was crimsoning through her tears, her lips were tremulous. "Perhaps it will never be. I do not think it will ever be. But I will not forget—I will never forget that you have been my friend when I had no other."

Then she went swiftly down the orchard again. The sun was shining clearly now; diamonds were dropping from the apple-boughs, the red rosehips were gleaming through the white snow, the birds went fluttering timidly away out of the ivy that was upon the little porch. In the open doorway her father was standing.

The girl's heart leapt and bounded with a great joy.

"Oh, I am glad! I am very glad, but is it wise, father?" she said, going up to him, putting her two hands on his shoulders, and holding up her smiling, trembling lips to be kissed. "You are to obey—you are to obey me: Dr. Armitage says so. And I order a sofa, with cushions, and the new novel that Mr. Kirkoswald brought, and the cups of tea that are going to be brought by and-by. Oh, come in, come in, and let us be glad together, and happy together. . . Try to look happier, my father!"

It was not simple unhappiness, simple despondency that was written on Bartholomew's face, and Genevieve was quick to perceive that it was not. There was a new look there, a deeper gravity, a deeper quiet.

And in his heart there was a feeling that his studio where the two pictures stood was a room where some dead thing was lying.

"Is there a fire in the sitting room?" he asked.

"Yes," Genevieve replied. "There is a good fire. Miss Craven has made it. And there is your easy chair, and Prince Camaralzaman is singing as if he had some special reason for singing. You will go there? ■ will be better. . . Shall I lock the studio door?"

"Yes, dear, lock it, please, and put the blinds down."

CHAPTER I.—WORDS WHICH LIFT UP ONE CORNER OF THE VEIL.

"The Divine charity, of which the Cup of the Communion is the emblem, belongs to the whole Church. To recover that Holy Cup that real life-blood of the Mediator is a quest worthy of all the chivalry of our time, worthy of all the courage of Lancelot worthy of all the poetry of Gabriel."

DEAN SMITH

THEY went up the orchard together, the father's pale thin hand within the daughter's arm. Some of Genevieve's doves were wheel- about over the apple boughs, the two white ones were cooing on the window sill. Within there was a yellow rose-tree in bloom, it had only one rose, but that was something in late November; and the sunshine upon its creamy petals seemed to crown it for reward.

They sat down by the fire, Genevieve on a footstool at her father's feet, her head resting upon his knee. It was a time to be silent, but the silence was eloquent in its sympathy, its comfort, its perfect understanding.

Relief from a great strain, a great and sudden shock, is happiness in itself. That one may be at peace is matter for a gratitude that is almost rapture.

Presently Keturah came. There was a tear glistening in her round surprised eyes, but she wiped it quickly away because Joe Hanson was there with Miss Craven's butter-bucket full of packages, and also because Canon Gabriel was coming along the path-way through the field. The old man seemed paler and more fragile than ever as he entered the little sitting room where Bartholomew sat holding his chill hands to the fire.

"I shall leave you to entertain each other," Genevieve said. "I am going to make some beef tea. Then I shall come and expect to be entertained in recognition of my services. . . . Father, you will not let Canon Gabriel miss my chattering tongue!"

"Then don't stay long enough to be missed, dear," said the artist, speaking as if he were a pain to him to miss her at all. He looked up at the Canon as the door closed, and the Canon understood the look.

"The wind is tempered for you, my friend," the old man said, seating himself opposite to Bartholomew.

"Yes, but the wind is a little rough," said the younger man. Then, after a pause, he added, "Tell me how much you know about its roughness?"

"How much I know! Well, you remember how much I knew when we spoke of this matter before—was it a fortnight ago? . . . I have heard nothing further until this morning, until Dr. Armitage poured his indignation into my ears."

"He was indignant? . . . Sorrow is not all sorrow. The man who has but the sympathy of one friend is not left without assurance."

"You can feel that? Then one need not sorrow for you as one sorrows for those who have no hope. . . . All the same, this trial must have its own keenness."

"It seemed to have until this morning."

"And since?"

Bartholomew paused before he replied. He was recalling the events that had happened to him since daylight had spread across the frosty skies.

"Since the stroke fell, I have not for one moment recognised the weight of it," he said.

"I had no time to recognise it before unconsciousness came down, and since that I have had no inclination to dwell upon it. . . . Genevieve is feeling it far more than I am. Feeling seems almost dead within me at present, but it is not so with her. She is enduring at the highest point of endurance. If you can say one word to help her, then, for Heaven's sake, say it before you go."

Almost as he spoke Genevieve came in, bringing a little china tray with a china cup full of beef tea.

"Was there ever anything so dainty?" she said, kneeling on one knee, and turning the tray so that the morsel of dry toast should lie under her father's hand. . . . "And now I am going to talk to Canon Gabriel," she added, seating herself on her own little chair in front of the fire. She still had her tennis apron on with its embroidered spray of clematis all across it. Her cap had been thrown aside some time during the morning. She leaned her head back against the chair; her lips quivered, her eyes closed wearily; then the tears began to drop slowly over her face. They would not be kept back any longer now.

They were quite silent tears; and seeing that they were tears of relief the Canon made no effort to check them. He took Genevieve's hand in his, and stroked it gently and tenderly as he would have stroked the hand of a sick child.

"It has all been so strange!" she said presently, speaking out of the middle of her own stream of things. "It has been so unexpected, so unaccountable, so unforgivable!"

"Yes," said the girl, seeming as if the question had roused her to a newer and more passionate pain. "Yes: I must tell the truth, it will do me good to tell the truth, since it hurts me ■ keep it. I am feeling full of unforgiveness, full of bitterness, full of resentment. They have been so hard, these people. There was the long silence, the refusal to answer my father's letters, though he wrote ■ quietly, so patiently, that was an insult that was difficult to bear, nay, it was more than that, it was an oppression. They could not know that we wanted the money to buy bread, but they must have known that my father did not paint pictures to amuse himself. And now this last blow, this worst wrong, this worst injustice, could they have done it in a more cruel and stinging way? . . . The deed was theirs, the stroke that laid my father low, but it is not their mercy that has brought him back to life, not their goodness that gave him back to me. Can I ever forget? Can I ever forgive? . . . But help me, help me if you can, for it is such a misery as I have never known, this hardness that is in me, this indignation, this ceaseless sense of embittered feeling. Thoughts pass through my brain that I dare not look at, dare not acknowledge even to myself. . . . Deliver me from them; deliver me if you can. Say something to make me feel as if I could forgive!"

"You want to forgive, then?" the old man asked, speaking very quietly.

"Yes," the girl said, clasping her hands, trying to keep back a fresh flow of tears. "Yes, I do want to forgive them. I would if I could. And I want to do it now before the sense of wrong wears itself out. There is no virtue in the forgiveness that comes of forgetfulness."

"Then it is because you know forgiveness to be a duty that you desire to arrive at it?"

"It is only partly that," Genevieve said. "But, of course, I believe that it is a duty. I have always thought that forgiveness of a person who had grievously and deliberately injured another, and had never repented of the injury, was the hardest duty the Christian creed demands."

"And you know my opinion, that it is as it were the very core and centre of practical Christianity?"

"Yes: I have not forgotten the day in Soulsgrif Bight. All this morning the words have been ringing in my ears, 'The love that taketh not account of evil.' But let me speak the truth, let me confess that I am not only taking account of evil, I am overcome of it."

"Let me speak, dear," Bartholomew interposed. He was sitting listening quietly, his clasped hands resting upon the arm ■ his chair. "Let me speak. I think, being a little excited, you are disposed to exaggerate your ill-feeling. Let me ask one question. If it were in your power to do any injury to either Mr. Richmond or ■ his sister, would you do it? Take time ■ reply."

"Would I injure them?" Genevieve exclaimed, taking no time at all. "No, certainly. You knew that, my father, before you asked. Unforgiveness does not mean a desire for revenge. If any opportunity for doing them a kindness were to come in my way, I should probably be even more anxious to do it than if they had never hurt us or pained us at all. Sometimes I think that persistent revenge is dying out from among human passions. It seems to belong ■ Greek literature."

"I fear that is taking too favourable a view of matters," said the Canon. "I am afraid that with the uncultivated, the isolated, revenge may still acquire power enough to become a monomania."

Bartholomew looked at him intently as he spoke. Was there any hidden meaning bearing upon present events underlying the Canon's words? Did he remember the remarks he had made months ago concerning the conflicting passions and emotions written on the face of the Judas, remarks made even while discerning an unintended likeness in the features and expression of the face on the canvas? "It is like Miss Richmond!" Mr. Severne had said, and no one had contradicted him.

"Perhaps you are right," Genevieve said, answering Canon Gabriel. "But you will believe that I am not revengeful, that I have no desire to see my father's wrongs avenged in any way."

"What do you desire?" asked the Canon. "What is your highest and strongest wish?"

"My highest wish of all is that Mrs. Richmond, or Mr. Richmond, or both of them together, might come down and say, 'We are sorry for all this pain!'"

"And what excuse, what motive would you wish them to urge for having caused the pain?" asked Bartholomew.

"I would wish them to tell the truth, whatever the truth may be. If all is as I suspect, Mrs. Richmond would say, being in a regretful and human mood, 'I have come down to explain, to tell you that my brother gave these commissions thoughtlessly, that our silence was the result of an habitual carelessness about small things that do not concern ourselves, that not understanding the value of works of art, and considering the price of the pictures to be above their worth, we returned them, not dreaming for a moment that it would really matter to Mr. Bartholomew whether we kept them or not, and that now we have discovered that our carelessness and slothfulness has caused you distress, we are anxious to make such atonement as we may. . . . Here! you have my highest notion of the good that could come out of all this evil."

"And from that time there would be no more unforgiveness?"

"There would be no more unforgiveness. I here would be comprehension, with a high admiration on my part for the man or woman who could confess having erred in understanding."

"Then my advice," said the Canon, "is simply this, that you should suppose that the Richmonds would do all that you dream might be done if their human culture had been such as I lead them to the conception of it. For my own part I have little but pity for them in this matter, supposing it all to be as you say, and I think it very probable that your suppositions may be correct. They are not so low down in the scale of humanity, but they must feel a great deal more than they seem to feel. I pity them, the uneasy remorse they must have, that they will certainly have when they hear of your father's illness, the consciousness of an essential vulgarity in their deed, the utter unwisdom of such a victory as they probably imagine themselves to have gained. Pitying them, I could only pray for them, as one prays for all those who despitely use one. Try that—prayer for them. Pray not only that you may be enabled to forgive them, but that you may see the result of your prayers for their welfare in their continued prosperity, their continued safety, their increased happiness, their additional peace. Pray for their worldly good first, then for their higher good. It is not impossible in the providence of God that you should be permitted to see the outcome of prayers made from such a motive as yours would be. That once discerned you will no longer find yourself praying for power to forgive."

Even as the old man spoke it seemed as if the wild waves of intolerant impulse were stilled a little. It was easier to think kindly of the people who had caused all this suffering, easier to believe that her father might come out from ■ unhurt, perhaps even with no smell of fire upon his garment.

"It is always so," said the Canon, in answer to some remark of Genevieve's. "It is always so. Christ speaking ■ His disciples spoke of two conditions on which their prayers should be answered. His followers were to have faith, and they were to forgive."

"'And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have ought against any'"

"And we all of us have the feeling within ourselves that when we are at peace with the world it is far easier to enter into the peace that is between God and our own souls—that is, or may be—it is never broken by Him."

"But I did not come only to try to comfort you with words," the old man went on, not hesitating, not speaking with difficulty, but with a beautiful ease and tranquillity of manner. "I came to try to help, if help may be. I need hardly ask you to let me try, if you consider that my friendship entitles me to the privilege. . . . In the first place, do you not think that I might call upon the Richmonds, and either explain, or ask them to explain? I propose this at a venture, not knowing what you may ■ wishing or intending to do."

"I have had no time to intend anything yet," replied Bartholomew. "But I could hardly bear that any friend of mine should go to Yarell in my name, and entreat the Richmonds to take the pictures now. . . . No, that could never be. . . . Besides, there is another reason," he continued. Then he stopped. He could not say that he did not dare to think of one so aged, so frail, so sensitive, exposing himself to the excitement and annoyance of such an interview as that would probably be. If any one went to Yarell Croft, ■ should be Kirkoswald, who was stronger, more astute, and would be better able to meet the Richmonds on their own ground.

Perhaps the Canon misunderstood the sudden pause, the silence, he did not urge his offer of help. "If there is anything I can do you will not hesitate to ask me," he said. "And since that matter is disposed of, I will pass on to the next. Have you sold the Juhas, the original head, I mean?"

"No," said Bartholomew, smiling. "One does not expect to sell pictures in Murk-Manchester. Besides, that was only a study."

"But as you know, a most masterly study. I have felt notions of covetousness since the first moment I saw it. Am I asking too much in asking you to let me have it?"

"Certainly I will let you have it if you have taken a fancy to it . . . You must leave it a little while though, till I get the head of the figure finished. I mean to finish ■ now."

There was a little friendly difference about the price, but the Canon knew the value of his purchase too well to take it at Bartholomew's own inadequate appraisement. Of course the artist understood the old man's motive in buying it just now, but the Canon did not divine to the full all that his small act meant. Genevieve knew, and Dorothy Craven knew, and perhaps Keturah might guess, since there was no more any need for anxiety concerning the daily bread. It was as if a great weight had been lifted off from every heart under the roof of the thatched cottage, ■ weight that no man nor woman may appreciate until they have staggered along under it for weary days, and wearier nights, until they have learnt that a failing pulse means a failing hope, a failing enterprise, a failure of the very desire for life itself. But the lesson once learnt is not forgotten, and the human being who has it in remembrance looks out over God's world with eyes that see farther and penetrate deeper, than the eyes of the man whose worst earthly trial is the incompetency of his cook. Some knowledge is power, and some knowledge is light, and there is a knowledge that is as purifying as fire from off the altar.

CHAPTER LI.—'LEI JOY BREAK WITH THE STORM'

"O sorrow wilt thou rule my blood
I am sometimes lovely, like a bird;
And I at thy harsher moods aside
If thou wilt have me woe and good to Memoriam

THAT same November afternoon closed in darkly and heavily, a wide band of gleaming light stretched right across the outer sea edge, the sullen curtain above dropped its fringe into the silver. There was light shining somewhere—there ■ always light somewhere, be the day ever so dark where one sits drooping for the need of sun.

Though there was no sunshine at Netherbank Genevieve was not drooping. She was sitting beside her father. The Prince was silent on his perch. The snow was thawing fast away, great waterdrops were trickling down from the eaves, making the ivy-leaves and the bare brown stems of the honey-suckle quiver under the heavy dropping. The sound of the gurglings and babblings of the tiny runlets came even to the fireside of the little room in the stubble-field.

"It is really like living in a tent," Genevieve said, breaking in upon the long quiet. People do not care to talk who have only just come through the storm. The rush of the tempest is still in their ears, with the sound of the wind that had swept them on to the rocks of fateful circumstance. They are glad to sit by safe fires, ■ brood in silence upon the danger overpast.

To Noel Bartholomew it seemed already as if the events of the morning had happened weeks ago. The anxiety had gone from his face, the nervous apprehensiveness from his manner. What apprehensiveness was left ■ him now was for his daughter. Had the pain passed from his soul only to fall into hers? Her little irrelevant remarks did not deceive him. Her care ■ put on a pretty dress, to arrange a dainty tea table did not confuse his perception of things. The physiognomy of sorrow is unmistakable ■ eyes trained by sorrow, and you shall not need ■ tell your tale to one acquainted with grief.

All the afternoon he had thought only of her, of that hope that was half a dread that he had had concerning her in the spring, that had been deferred so strangely all through the summer, and now was apparently passing out of all recognition as a distinct idea. He had not understood, he had only once asked his daughter if there was anything that he might understand, and her reply had for the moment almost satisfied him. It was not so long ago, only a few weeks since she had said, "Silence is not congenial to me, but I would rather keep silence in this instance, and you may trust ■ too. I know that you may trust him."

That day also had been put farther back for Bartholomew by the stress and strain of intervening circumstance. His own feeling in the matter, his perfect trust, his perfect patience, was half forgotten. What it after all he had to go, to leave his child friendless, penniless, and alone? What then? . . . There was a great silence in the man's heart, the silence of an inexpressible anguish.

Even as he endured it he was watching her as she moved about the room, placing the lamp on the bracket between the windows, lifting the yellow rose tree ■ the table, drawing the curtain, arranging the tea cups, stirring the fire into a blaze. The great grey cloud curtain was descending now, dashing in wild rain drops upon the window pane the chill wind was coming gustily up from the sea. ■ was the sort of night when people awake afresh to appreciation of their comforts, their protections, their alleviations. However unsatisfactory their surroundings may be ■ other times they become satisfactory by such sharp contrast as memory, inspired by rough elements, can present to most people on occasion.

"What a dismal night for those who are compelled to be out!" Genevieve was saying. Her eye had fallen upon the little Viking. Was poor Ailsie out? Was she there wandering up and down among the rough, dark stones, where the white foam was breaking? Here also, there was trouble, and up at Hunagarth Hagg there was trouble. Dorothy Craven's face had gone back to the old thinness and paleness that it had worn before that gleam of brightness had struck her path, and though she made no complaint Genevieve knew that hope was dead or dying within her. Had George Kirkoswald forgotten Miss Craven?

Had he forgotten other things? What was he thinking? How was he bearing now? Was he still weary of endurance, was he still feeling weary of long silence, long restraint? "If you are weary, then I am not weary," Genevieve had said, only a few weeks before. "Could she say the same thing now?" she asked herself, and the answer was, "No, if he ask me now I must say I am weary, I am very weary, and my heart cries out incessantly that you would put an end to its weariness."

She had not seen George since the evening of the concert. It was only four days, but it was long enough for surprise, for pain—a pain that had been felt through all the other sorrows that had come thronging into the days. It was worse ■ bear because he had been so kind, so full of tenderness on that evening. All the strong passionate love within her had gathered itself up to meet the renewed shows of love in him. She had had a feeling of coming good, coming joy. Her soul had borne itself receptively. She had waited for a shower of blessing, but instead there had been a very hailstorm of trials and wrongs and consequent sufferings. But the one help, the one countenance that would have given support above all others had been wanting, and it was little wonder that all the other pain was understruck by emptiness and aching.

She had had no time ■ brood over these things in silence, and it was well that she had not. But there was time enough for a yearning between the pouring out of cups of tea, for a cry of unsatisfied love while arranging the cushions of her father's chair, and stooping to stroke the grey tired head that seemed to ■ bowed with a new pathos every time she looked at it. She had put his cup of tea on her own little table by his side, the rain was still rattling wildly on the window-pane, mingled with its dashing there was a sound of quick footsteps, of a sharp, decided knocking, Keturah's voice was answering George Kirkoswald.

He came in, seeming now as always, to fill the narrow room, to fill it with strength, and power, and protection against all harm and ill. ■ was impossible that any shadow of doubt, of distrust, of displeasure should linger in his presence. Some strong and fine individuality in the man attested the moral purity and rarity of the atmosphere about him. There was a distressed surprise on his face this evening, and the lines in his forehead and about his mouth were eloquent of the working of some fervid and absorbing emotion.

He hardly spoke in his surprise. Bartholomew's lip quivered humorously under his grey moustache. "And when she came back the dog was a laughing," he said, offering his hand to Kirkoswald's strong warm grasp. "That is a quotation from the antique mythological poem known as 'Mother Hubbard'."

"So I perceive," said Kirkoswald. "And you are equal to quotation?" he asked, looking into the grey stricken face before him, seeing there evidence enough that the tale that had been told to him by Dr Armitage had not been overcharged with colour.

"Have you dined?" Will you have a cup of tea?" Genevieve asked, looking up with a pale pink colour flitting across her cheek, and the bright light of a new gladness in her eyes.

"I had my dinner ■ one o'clock," George said. "I dined in the refreshment-room ■ York Station. I shall be very glad of a cup of tea if you will give me one."

"You have been to York again?" Bartholomew asked.

"Yes. I went there three days ago, the day after the concert. Poor Warburton has had a relapse," said George. He did not add that Mrs. Warburton had telegraphed a little prematurely in her fright and concern. Her husband had spoken so warmly of his friend that her first thought had turned toward him in a moment of sudden dread and perplexity. She had begged to ■ forgiven. She was in a strange place, strange to her; and she felt lonely and unnerved when her husband was ill. "I am happy when I only know that you are on your way to me," she had said with a tear of thankfulness in her eyes.

"Then you have not been to Usselby yet?" said Bartholomew.

"No. I have not been home," George replied, going to the table for the cup of tea that Genevieve was pouring out for him. "I met Armitage at Gorthwaite Station, he was on his way to Market-Stubley. He told me ■■■ tell you that it might be afternoon to-morrow before he found his way to Netherbank."

There was a pause, Genevieve was sitting in her own low chair with the firelight on her face, her hand was on the arm of her father's chair.

"I suppose Dr. Armitage would tell you more than that?" she said, looking up at George, with the recollection of the storm and terror of the morning in her eyes, and speaking with a pathetic vibration in her voice.

"Yes," replied Kirkowald, the look of compression coming back to his lips swiftly, and the lines on his forehead drawing themselves together in a way that was curious to see. "Yes, he told me more than that, he told me all that a discreet doctor might tell even to his patient's closest friend. He had evidently made up his mind how much he might say, and how much he must leave unsaid; and no indiscretion of mine tempted him beyond his line. I dare say I didn't use as much judgment in putting my questions as I might have done. I was too—too much surprised."

"You will find yourself more ■■■ liberty here," said Bartholomew, looking up quietly, openly. "There is nothing in this matter that need be kept secret from you."

And nothing was kept secret, nothing but the terrible strain of the actual want, the long continued insufficiency of food, and the distressing pressure caused by a few small debts. All else was laid open, disclosed without exaggeration, without bitterness, but with every expression of a keen surprise, a still keener perplexity.

"It is the absence ■■■ motive, or rather the obscurity of motive, that exercises me," said Noel Bartholomew.

"Every one who knows the story will explain it for himself," interposed Genevieve. "And the general explanation will be that the pictures have not given satisfaction."

"Will it be considered a satisfactory way of expressing dissatisfaction, the sending of the pictures back again without a word of previous warning?" asked Bartholomew, "the sending a man to put them down at the painter's door before the day had fairly broken?"

The depth of Noel Bartholomew's suffering, the intensity of the anguish ■■■ was enduring and hiding, had not betrayed itself before. It was betrayed now, not in the words used in asking these questions, but in the tone of unutterable cruciation in which he spoke.

He leaned his head back against his chair, pallid, exhausted. Was that terrible unconsciousness coming down upon him again? Genevieve rose to her feet, and put her arm about the tired, trouble-stricken head. Then she pressed her pale lips upon the hot aching forehead.

"It cannot happen again, my father," she said, in low soft tones. "It is over, and other things are over, and we shall see, believe me, my father, we shall see a long light and peace for this strife and darkness. Believe, believe that we shall yet see compensation."

Kirkowald sat silently, silently thinking, silently wondering. His own temperament was poetic, and therefore artistic in a sense, enabling him to comprehend where some would have been confounded. He knew well enough that the brain that expands itself in search of beauty, in search of the last expression and effect of beauty, will have no lie left wherewith to live the common life, the life of endurance of human hardness, of human shortightedness, of human greed, of human self-seeking. It was not incomprehensible to him that this man should be unable to meet an amount of insolence, of humiliation, that a commoner man would have passed by with a smile of contempt. It was not incomprehensible to him, though he did not know the worst, that this blow should have struck straight to the root of life itself. Perhaps he comprehended it all too plainly for his peace of mind. Not that he was thinking of his peace of mind then, on the contrary his resolution was leading him into the thick of the strife.

His time had come, his time for action, for strong determination, for a fight that could but end in freedom, be the fray ever so dark and desperate, so he said to himself as he sat there thinking.

"You will know that I am ■■■ your service," he said presently, "and you will know that my words are not idle words. Action in this matter is unavoidable now, in the name of the common rights of humanity it is unavoidable . . . Forgive me for saying, perhaps prematurely, that action is my duty as well as my privilege."

There was another pause. "I think I agree with you that some movement is desirable," said Bartholomew, who had recovered himself, and was leaning forward with his hands clasped in the old way on the arm of his chair. "I had resolved upon some step I thought of you first, then I thought of Montacute, the lawyer. — Thurkeld Abbas. You will know him? Years ago we were friends in a certain sense. I know him to be an upright man."

"As upright as a pillar of granite, and as hard."

"Is that your view of him? It was never mine," said the artist. "I thought him human above all the lawyers I had ever known. I have a firm impression that in this matter he would deal humanly."

"What could he do?"

Bartholomew smiled. "I know no more than a child what he could do. But I know that if kill or knowledge could avail, those things would not be wanting. Do you know Montacute at all? He used to amaze me. I always thought of him as a man who could twine an Act of Parliament round his little finger with a smile. But he would have had to be a very bad act. A right cause was safe in his hands always."

Kirkoswald did not reply at once. After a time he said, "Perhaps I do not know the man as you know him. Our affairs have always been in the hands of Waterland of Market Studley, and, of course, I have left them there. Once or twice Mr Montacute has had to do with matters of ours that were involved, as legal matters always are involved, and I have never known aught of him but the uprightness you speak of. All the same, he impressed me as having an immense and intense inflexibility."

"Uprightness must always be inflexible."

"True! And, of course, you neither desire nor require deviation. All you want is justice, or rather equity, but the latter is more difficult of attainment than the former."

The poor artist closed his eyes wearily. He would have been glad if he might have closed them altogether upon this unkind entanglement, the first entanglement of the kind that he had ever known. For him all discord had a taint of lowness, an element of commonness, of coarseness. He seemed as if this thing were entering into his inner life, making havoc there. He was but wanting justice, yet if he got it, would it not seem as a kind of revenge, a kind of victory that would be more humiliating than any failure? Oh, how weary he was of it all! And he

this strong unwearied man begging with kind earnestness that he might take the burden, that he might fight the battle.

"You shall do as you will," he said, at last, in answer to a plea of Kirkoswald's. Genevieve had gone out to speak to Keturah about some supper for her father, the two men went on talking, planning. Bartholomew was a little anxious about the quiet conducting of the matter. When Genevieve came back again, pale, yet smiling, looking up with sweet tired eyes, George was saying—

"Trust me, what I do, I will do quietly. I hope I shall be able to come down to-morrow evening, and tell you that the affair is settled one way or another. Don't think about it now, if you can, put it away, or if you must think of it, think of it as some one else's affair, something with which you have no concern."

To himself he added, "And when that is settled there will be another matter to be settled." He looked up with the thought, the resolution in his eyes, and Genevieve understood it, or thought that she understood. He was saying again to her, as he had said to her father, "Trust me," and he was silently adding, "Trust me for more than this, for more than a small effort to help a friend. I trust me through the silence, trust me through the darkness, trust me for life, trust me for love. I will not fail you."

And plainly as a look could answer, the look in Genevieve's deep dark eyes said, "I know, I know certainly that you will not fail me."

All the evening George Kirkoswald lingered there by the cottage fireside. He liked the brightness, the pleasantness, the warm poetic human life.

"I always think this is the most homelike home I know," he said, looking round upon the well-filled bookshelves, the pale coral-tinted walls, the pretty bright chandeliers, the few ornaments, the many evidences of artistic instincts and occupations. Genevieve had on a dark warm-tinted dress which made her look fairer than ever, and her lovely shining hair seemed to light up the place where she sat. Kirkoswald could almost see the tired look fading away from her face. The sunniness came back to her spirit; the little quick, bright sayings that he loved so much to hear fell from her lips as they had been used to do. It was as if months of dreariness and weariness had been blotted out in the sudden warmth of this new and unspoken understanding.

Even Bartholomew felt and understood something ■ it, the influence came to him as an alleviation. If the morning had been dark, surely the evening was bright and good, surely it held a promise of brightness and goodness to come.

It was like listening to music, to something that had opened with crashing chords, and wild clanging dissonances. Then when the brain was wearied, and the ear deafened and pained to the uttermost, all had changed.

Here was a sweet fire side song, a few bars of a restful, mystic harmony that soothed like a wind harp, and had power ■ uplift as well as to tranquillize. The parting words were said to this accompaniment.

When Kirkoswald had gone the music fell a little, the strain had loneliness in it, the last cadence dropped into the moaning wind, and went sighing across the rain-swept fields sadly, tremblingly.

CHAPTER LII.—"THUS I ENTERED, AND THUS I GO"

"Hear up, my soul a little longer yet,
A little longer to thy purpose, then,
Woe's way's Odyssey."

GEORGE KIRKOSWALD looked very resolute as he walked over the corner of Langbarough Moor that frowned darkly between Usselby Hall and Yarell Croft. ■ was the day after the day that had been so sadly eventful at Netherbank. The rain was over. There was a sunny grey-white mist lying upon the Marshes. Beyond there was a grey sea, with dark hulled ships moving north and south.

To his dismay, George saw that there were two or three carriages drawn up in the yard at the back of Yarell Croft. "There are people there, then," he said to himself somewhat impatiently. Nevertheless, he went in. The big drawing room was hot, it was half full of people who had come over to luncheon. They were talking, laughing. Diana was in a new mood. Her colour rose when George went in, and a quick, pleased light shot into her eyes.

"Now I call this provoking," she said. "If I had asked you to come you would have declined. Don't take the trouble to be polite, but since you are here, sit down, and try to be sociable for once. Do you know that you are getting a dreadful character for unsociableness?"

All this was rather terrible to George.

"I think, then, that ■ will be only honest ■ say that I came on business," he replied, looking very intently into Miss Richmond's face, and speaking so that his admission could be distinctly heard. A curious little pause in the general conversation followed, compelling him to add, "But don't let me intrude either my business or myself. I will come again. Will it suit you if I come to-morrow about this time?"

"It will suit me well, eminently well. After so much pleasure—I may even call it dissipation—at Yarell, to-morrow will be a day of dulness, of unendurable reaction. Come to-morrow by all means. Only let me say, I don't believe in your business. Our possessions don't touch. There is Birknigg Beck between. Are you going to propose a division of the beck? or of the stones at the bottom of it?"

"I will not go into the question to-day," George said. He was a little amazed at Miss Richmond's unusual mood. Had she mistaken his errand? Had she guessed ■ rightly? It would have been only natural if she had guessed it, and if so, if this were the cause of the strange change in her, what was underlying her conduct towards Bartholomew—her conduct, George said ■ himself always, never dreaming of referring any decisive motive to the well dressed and well contented young man who was teaching bagatelle to three pretty frilled and flounced girls in the recess by the window. George watched him wonderingly, and somewhat compassionately. "It was not Cecil's doing, that act of yesterday morning," he said to himself as he sat listening to Mrs. Aylmer's advanced views on feminine suffrage. He listened patiently for awhile; then, hoping that he had done all that was required of him, he went away.

He was in considerable perplexity as he went, his disappointment was not his only.

Should he go down to Netherbank for the purpose of explaining that an untoward chance had hindered him from fulfilling his intentions? ■ seemed hardly worth while to risk the producing of a depressing effect when, in all probability, he would be able ■ go down on the following evening with relief on his lips, and satisfaction. He would have been glad enough ■ go down, so glad that he looked for selfishness in his desires, and seemed to find it. Since ■ could take down with him nothing to put ■ end to any pain, or any sore feeling, then why need he go at all? He would wait. Waiting was difficult, so surely it would be right and wise.

He was in a different mood when he entered the drawing room at Yarell on the following afternoon, and Miss Richmond was in another mood also. He was prepared for a sterner ■ more ■ effort, than he had at first anticipated. Thinking over things in the silence of the night he had come certainly to the conclusion that Diana Richmond was prepared for conflict of some kind.

As was natural to her, she had in the first instance considered her dress carefully, not considering what would be the proper thing for a woman approaching middle age to wear in her own house in a morning dress. Such an idea would be the last likely to occur to her. ■ was not that she was ignorant—this by no means, but she was defiant, and had a passion for effective colour. This afternoon she wore a dress of richly tinted Indian silk, relieved by masses of dark, changeful velvet. There was some fine old lace round the throat, and an enamelled cross fastened it in front. Her beautiful hands were half-covered with jewels.

Kirkoswald was tolerably free from personal vanity, but he could hardly help feeling as he entered the room that his shabby loose grey coat was of the nature of a solecism. Miss Richmond was sitting there in her low chair with a mass of white lace arranged carelessly upon it, so that her dark head was thrown into relief, her eyes had a heightened brilliancy, her cheeks a touch of colour. Though it was so early, he could hardly help the feeling that she had been waiting for him, expecting him.

His task might have seemed even more difficult than it did seem, if he had known how long she had been waiting for this present moment. She had just been saying to herself, "I have waited for it for years. I have desired it passionately."

The usual greetings were said, the usual remarks made on the changeableness of the weather. Diana all the while was watching George carefully, admiring the look of resoluteness on his face, there was resoluteness even in the way he sat on his chair. She smiled a little as she watched.

"I shall begin to believe in your business, after all," she said presently. She spoke with the studied deliberateness she always used, so that no word of hers ever seemed to be said with too great ease or lightness.

"I think you can hardly refuse to believe in it, either in the existence of it or in the importance of it," George replied. Then he added in a more conciliatory tone, "Indeed, I am sure you will not refuse ■ consider the matter. You know something of ■ already, of course. I am speaking of the two pictures that Mr. Bartholomew has painted for your brother."

The changes that ■ over Da face were very slight. Her eyelids drooped a little, as if she would see Kirkoswald's face more clearly, her under lip was drawn in. Presently she leaned forward, resting her fine oval chin on her white hand.

"I thought the matter had brought you here," she said. "I knew that yesterday . . . How was ■ that Mr. Bartholomew could not come himself?"

"He could hardly have done that. Pardon me, but your own perception will enable you to see why he could not come on such an errand, even supposing that ■ had been well enough to do so. You will have heard of his illness?"

"I heard yesterday that he was ill. I heard this morning that he was walking in the field near his house."

"Probably. All the same, the attack was a serious one. Dr. Armitage is of opinion that had Bartholomew been alone at the time he would not have recovered."

"Poor man! . . . What was the cause of it?" asked Miss Richmond, using an unexpressiveness of tone and manner that was admirable under the circumstances.

Kirkoswald paused. How could he explain to a nature like this the depth, the intensity of the suffering endured by a man endowed as Bartholomew was endowed, with a temperament of such hyper-sensitiveness, that an idle or unthinking word would lower his mental tone for days? How could he make her to see the intimate connection between such a man and his work, a connection so close that the mere careless mention of anything he had done would sting him like a cut with a fine lash? The difficulty of the task seemed insuperable.

"Since you ask me what was the cause of his illness, I must, of course, believe that you do not even guess. . . . It was the return of the pictures in a manner so unexpected, so inconsiderate, that struck him the blow from which he has not yet recovered, from which he may never quite recover."

There was a noticeable pause before Miss Richmond smiled. She did, however, smile, and incredulously.

"How tragic!" she said at last.

George compressed his lips, and succeeded in his effort to be silent.

"What is that quotation one often sees?" Diana said, "something like—"

"What great events from little causes spring!"

■ used to be in one of my lesson books."

"Does this seem to you a little cause?"

"Emmently little."

"The whole matter seems ■ you a small one?"

Diana smiled again. "You have lost none of your old diplomatic talent," she said. "Then a change toward something of hardness, of defiance, crept into the curves about her mouth, and she added "The matter is small in one way, ask any one whether they would not consider the incident a trifling one in the life of a man like Noel Bartholomew. But it is not small in another way . . ."

Miss Richmond paused here. Her eyes seemed to fill with a deeper darkness, her lips to meet with a fuller strength. Her utterance was more than ever deliberate, studied, inexpressive.

"It ■ not a small matter to me to feel that advantage has been taken of my brother's inexperience," she said, watching Kirkowald through her half closed eyes with a curious intentness.

George started in his chair visibly. A dark colour spread over his face, a light like flame shot from his eyes.

"You believe that? You believe that of him—of Noel Bartholomew? Are you . . ."

"Am I mad? Well, no, I think not. It seems to me that it is because I am so sane that I refuse to ■ imposed upon."

"Then it ■ the price? I would not believe it, I could not, since the pictures seemed to me ■ be worth so much more than the price asked. Even ■ myself I have insisted that you did not consider them to be satisfactory. That is what every one ■ considering."

"And you are afraid that his reputation will suffer?"

"Not for a moment. Such reputation as he has will not be touched by any experience he may happen to have at Mark Marshes."

"That is precisely what I said to Cecil . . . By the way, let me take the opportunity of explaining that whatever blame there may be in the matter ■ mine, not my brother's. He is a fool in such things. He acted foolishly in the first instance, in giving any commission whatever, and, though he does not admit it, I am fully convinced that the commissions were extorted by means of undue influence, or rather undue pressure. Cecil does not admit this, as I have said, but neither does he deny it, and on these two facts, undue pressure and exorbitant price, I shall take my stand. And let me say plainly, it will save time—I mean to fight the battle to the end."

George was silent a moment. The colour had gone out of his face, even his lips were pale.

"It will help to enliven a winter at Yarell, Croft," he said, knowing that ■ sent his small arrow ■ the white.

"It will," Diana replied. "I was dreading the tedium of the next four months."

"And nothing will move you, nothing will touch you—not even Dr. Armitage's declaration that another such shock might be fatal?"

"That sounds very commonplace."

Agam Kirkowald was silenced by hardness, elusiveness, impassibility. He broke the silence presently.

"Before I pass on to another matter," he said, "there are one or two small points that I should be glad ■ have explained. May I ask why you have not made some of these objections sooner—for instance, when the first picture was finished? You saw the size of it, you must have had some idea of the value of it. Why did you not speak then?"

Diana smiled. "This is new," she said. "It is a long time since I have been put through such a catechism as this."

"You are not bound to answer my questions if you find them inconvenient."

"Thank you, then we will let the matter drop."

"You wish it? You will not think of the pain you are causing? You will not even consent to any compromise?"

"Not now. . . Since you know so much of the Bartholomews and their affairs, you will be aware that my brother wrote, endeavouring to effect a compromise?"

"Hardly that! I beg your pardon, but I believe that the letter was simply a request that Mr. Bartholomew would take the pictures back, and try to dispose of them."

"That was an opening, of course," said Diana.

"Then it should have been more straightforward."

"A quality you do not lack."

"Thank you, I seem to need it at present."

"I do not dislike it," said Miss Richmond languidly. "But you spoke of another matter. Will you not bring your straightforwardness to bear upon that?"

"You anticipate it, of course," said George, feeling as if he were entering upon a mere formality that admitted of neither desire nor fear. "It concerns the letter you wrote to me a few months ago, after you had discovered that an engagement existed between Miss Bartholomew and myself."

"An engagement! . . . This is interesting. May I ■ stipulate you?"

said that you repented not having come sooner? What difference can it have made to you, since you admit that you are engaged to Miss Bartholomew?"

George hesitated a moment. Let the issue of this interview be as ■ might there should be explanation between himself and Genevieve that evening, and before he slept Bartholomew himself should be told all. This being firmly settled ■ could hardly be very necessary for him to be guarded in this conversation with Miss Richmond. Perhaps frankness might have an influence that caution would fail to have, and frankness was always easy, while caution in the exactly right degree was often an extremely difficult thing.

So it was that George Kirkoswald came to tell the story of the past six months of silence, of suffering, of suspense, to Diana Richmond. He hardly mentioned Genevieve's name. "It has been as if no word had ever been said between us," George declared, "and I have left her to judge of my conduct as she chose, knowing that she could never judge uncharitably of any human being."

Miss Richmond listened very quietly, very attentively. Was there any compunction in her at all when George told her of the shock, the stun, that her letter had given him, coming as it had done, into the day that was to have been one of the happiest days of his life? Did she perceive any desire to be honourable, to be patient, to do well and wisely in his long restraint, his long waiting for some light to show him the next step onward? "I have seen so many lives, so many causes wrecked by impatience," he continued, "that I set myself at all costs to wait, to do nothing that I should afterwards repent of having done. But ■ I have said, I repent now of the thing that has seemed to me a virtue. You remember that day when I spoke to you in Soulsgrif Bight? I should have come to you again at a more suitable moment. But regret is idle now. I have only to ask you to withdraw the letter you wrote to me, and to return mine. I think you will not refuse me now."

Diana looked up with one of her most expressive looks on her face.

"And if I do refuse?" she said.

"Then I must tell you clearly and plainly that it will make no difference in my deed. I shall explain everything to Miss Bartholomew, and to her father, and abide by the result."

With an exquisite grace of movement Miss

Richmond rose and crossed the room. There was a davenport near the window which she unlocked, taking from ■ a packet of letters. Her diamond rings flashed, her dress rustled imposingly as she came back. George saw at a glance that they were his own letters that she had in her hand. He had prevailed. He sat down again quite silent in his relief, his satisfaction.

Another brief moment, and his emotion rose up tremulously. Miss Richmond had taken out two letters from the rest, and unfolded them. To his great dismay, she began reading some passages aloud.

"Believe me, my own queen, when I say that my love for you is as changeless ■ my love of life itself, and far more sweet to me," she read in low, soft tones. "The days when I do not see you are dead, empty, divided days. When I am with you, holding your hand in mine, feeling secure of 'the crown and comfort of my life your favour, then, and then only, do I live any real life. Apart from you I have no vitality. All my old interests are dead, utterly dead. I cannot even take up the old books, if I do I find nothing in them. Do what I may—

'Only I discern
Infinite passion and the pain
Of finite hearts that yearn.'

Kirkoswald's pale lips parted —

"Will you not spare me?" he asked hoarsely. "This can do no good."

"I only wished to remind you that I have some ground to stand upon," said Miss Richmond, speaking in the same gentle tones.

"And you mean to stand upon it?"

"I do."

Kirkoswald rose to his feet. "Then it will be better that I should say no more. But let me ask you one thing. Will you tell me what is your motive ■ all this? I do not deceive myself for one moment by supposing that you still care for me."

"Then it will hardly trouble you if I tell you that I never did really care for you. I did not always know it, but I know it now."

"Then, why, why since you never cared for me enough to have suffered yourself from any deed of mine, why should you take pleasure in making me suffer? I cannot understand it. What is your motive? What do you wish to do? What do you wish me ■ do?"

"I wish you to go and explain to Miss Bartholomew."

"Then assuredly you will have your wish!" said George, offering his hand, and saying "good day" with something that ■ would be an understatement ■ call decision of manner.

Miss Richmond remained standing for a moment or two after Kirkoswald had left the house. Her white hands were clasped tightly, her eyes half-closed, her brows knitted as if in perplexity. This was an expression seen on her face but rarely. Diana Richmond was seldom perplexed.

"So far I am foiled again," she said, speaking half aloud. "Are they fools, all of them, that they will not see?" . . . Then, while she still stood quietly there, the drawing-room door was thrown wide open again. A tall, white, fur clad figure entered with a fine grace of bearing and movement, and bringing an element of some strong half spiritual emotion into the atmosphere. "Miss Bartholomew," said Kendle, in his most pompous manner. "Then be closed the door. The two women were left facing each other, greeting each other with smiles, and quiet, graceful courtesies.

CHAPTER LIII—AND TO MAKE IDOLS, AND TO FIND THEM CLAY."

"Yet God the sower and sower thou have
A lady in thy wad
Me: man proud and his
As one thou (thy) be him?
And (and) me take with him to him—
For him I cannot love too well
As I have loved my kind

Mrs. Brewster

THE quietness at Netherbank had not been broken during the two days that had passed since George Kirkoswald's offer of intervention. When the evening of the next day closed in, the day on which George had found the drawing room at Yarell full of people, Noel Bartholomew had betrayed a little expectancy, a little eagerness. Genevieve had opened the piano, she had filled the big china bowl with fresh green moss, scarlet holly-berries, pale gold chestnut-leaves. There were some ferns in a tall vase, some rare engravings on the small table easel. A friend of Genevieve's, Mrs. Winterford, had sent her some photographs from Vinice, they had only come by post that morning, and they were lying on the table, waiting to be talked over, admired . . . Was it because no one came to admire them that the evening seemed so long, and that the quiet of it grew to be oppressive?

"I hope Mrs. Warburton has not telegraphed for Mr. Kirkoswald again," Genevieve said, gathering up the engravings and putting them back into the portfolio. The remembrance of the previous evening was in her eyes, ■ had been there all day, filling them with the glad, tender light of hope; it lay under the white lids like a shadow now. It was after nine o'clock. There was no longer any probability that George would come down from Usselby. The old look of weariness had taken the place of the expectancy that had been visible on Bartholomew's face all the afternoon.

"No," he said, in answer ■ Genevieve's remarks, "no, it is not that. ■ is nothing so painless as that. He is delaying to come, because coming can only be painful. I wish he knew that I am prepared!"

Next morning brought a little hopefulness, as morning almost always does, but as the day wore on it died down again, dying into perplexity, into some inevitable soreness of heart. It was nothing to Kirkoswald, ■ any rate, it was very little. The man was busied with his own affairs, his free, fine outdoor life lifted him up above the small strains and stresses of ordinary existence. ■ was not to be expected of him that he could understand that great and sudden quietness which had come down into the little sitting room at the mere offer he had made. . . . Then all at once Bartholomew turned round upon himself with blame and contempt and self-reproach. He was undeserving of that last and best good, a true, unswerving, and loyal friend.

The night had been a sleepless one for him, his heavy eyes, his wan thin face, told of an ever-increasing sleeplessness. And sleep during the day was impossible to him, nevertheless, he consented to go and lie down for awhile, if Genevieve would be obedient, and consent to go for a walk. Then if Kirkoswald came, or Dr. Armitage, Bartholomew would be there ■ receive them.

Genevieve went out reluctantly. It was just after their early dinner. The day was cold and uninviting, the land looked dreary; the long reedy marsh stretched darkly away round the curve of the upland. She had put on her long paletot of warm white fur, and her little oval white fur hat, yet she could hardly help shivering at first as she met the keen breeze that was coming up from the north, sweeping over the bent and broken sedges that were grouped so gracefully together in the standing pools. A few lean startled yearlings looked up with wondering brown eyes as she passed, the water-wagtails went skimming about. A blackbird was thrusting his yellow bill into a tempting scarlet rose-hip.

Genevieve had less mind than usual for these things to day. The worn hopelessness of her father's face haunted her as she went by field and farm, the wrong, the oppression he was enduring came back upon her with an almost overwhelming sense of its strangeness, its incomprehensibleness. A dozen words, if they might but ■ spoken, would at least make things straight and plain. ■ circumstance remained hard and bitter, it would surely be better to bear, being understood. Then a great desire came upon her strongly and suddenly. She was not so far from Birk-rigg Gill now. Why should she not pass through it, go up to Yarell Croft, and speak with Miss Richmond face to face about this unprecedented thing herself?

The girl stood still a moment, turning from white ■ crimson in the working of her own strong emotion. She remembered that George Kirkoswald had undertaken to act as mediator, but it was not impossible that he had failed, as her father feared? "I can find out if he has failed, or if he has succeeded, and either way I can do no harm by calling," Genevieve said to herself. "I am not afraid of Miss Richmond, she has always been courteous ■ me, sometimes she has been kind, and, though I do not understand her, I have always felt as if I wanted to understand her. I will go now. I will certainly go. It may be that I shall try nothing when I get there, but I will go and find if there is anything to be said."

Her purpose gathered strength ■ she went on, and her impulse seemed no longer an impulse, but a sane and sensible measure, which she ought to have thought of much sooner. It seemed to her eminently probable that ten minutes of simple and kindly and straightforward conversation would explain everything, bring everything to a peaceful and satisfactory conclusion.

So ■ was that less than a quarter of an hour after George Kirkoswald had left the drawing-room at Yarell Croft, Genevieve Bartholomew entered, with her strong purpose, her yearning human loving kindness, written plainly on her face. Miss Richmond's eyes were radiant with the unexpected satisfaction.

"This is really kind of you, ■ come so far to see me on such a dull day," she said, with quiet cordiality. "Come nearer to the fire, take the chair that George has just left. . . You would meet him?" she said, with studied indifference. "He has just gone."

"Mr Kirkoswald?" No, I did not meet him," Genevieve said, changing colour, in spite of all effort. Then she paused awhile. When she spoke again there was a new calm ness on her face. "Let me be candid, since you thank-me for coming," she said. "Perhaps if I had met Mr Kirkoswald I should not have come. I think his errand and mine would be the same."

"His errand?" Miss Richmond exclaimed, looking up as if she were rather at a loss. "Oh! you are alluding to the little affair between your father and Cecil. Then with an exquisite turn of her shapely head, Miss Richmond let her eye fall upon the velvet-covered table that was between Miss Bartholomew and herself. Genevieve's eye naturally followed hers. The morocco case, with George Kirkoswald's photograph, was lying there open, the letter that Diana had read aloud was open also, and close to Genevieve. The merest glance at that distinctive handwriting was enough. Two small heaps of letters were carelessly spread out behind.

"Do you think that a good likeness?" Miss Richmond said, handing the case ■ Genevieve. It was a little foreign case, with pockets for cartes de visite.

"I do not know if it is good," Genevieve said simply. There was a mist before her eyes. It was not the mist of tears, and it passed away in a moment or two. "I hardly know if it is good," she repeated. "It seems to have been taken some time ago, when Mr Kirkoswald was young."

"When he was young!" exclaimed Miss Richmond, laughing a low, cool, deliberate laugh. "Oh, that ■ good! I must tell him that!"

It was only taken ■ month after we were engaged. There are two others in the pocket that he had taken afterwards in Paris. I do not like them. You can look ■ them if you care to do so. I never care to look at photographs myself. They either tell one nothing, or something that is not true. If I had seen George's photographs before I saw himself I should never have cured for him. There is such a look of sternness, one might almost call ■ hardness, about his mouth when it comes to be photographed, and a certain expression, half disdainful, half what I call consequential, that ■ undoubtedly has sometimes, but very seldom. Why should it always come out ■ a photograph?"

Was Miss Richmond soliloquising in mercy, in malice, in utter indifference? Genevieve did not know. Had something struck her, wounded her, taken her strength? Was she blinded? Had some sudden madness touched her brain, filling her soul with a sickening, crushing, cruel delusion?

She rose to her feet, white, pallid as the garment she wore. Her great dark violet eyes were dilated till they seemed as if they saw nothing. She stood there tall, and still, and stricken.

"It is true, this you say?" she asked, speaking in a strange, quiet, yet bewildered undertone.

Miss Richmond rose too; for the moment she was half-alarmed, and she stood there asking herself what was the worst, the utmost thing she had said. . . . That utmost thing was true, true to the last letter, and she said so, regretfully, as if the thing gave her pain in the utterance.

Genevieve grasped the back of her chair. She was still standing, still pale and motionless. She had no power to move. She was not thinking, she was only trying to stand strong and firm for the moment, without losing consciousness, without betraying herself. She hardly knew that her wide beautiful eyes were slowly filling with tears, she made no effort to check them. Her lip quivered with the word that came.

"You know that I am hurt?" she said, in a simple, child-like way, speaking as if in the sudden stun she were moved to turn for sympathy to the hand that had dealt the blow.

Miss Richmond made no reply. She, too, was pale, and there was a look of controlled duquitude on her face. The strife of good and ill was strong within her at that moment. She had been prepared for the infliction of pain when the moment came, but not for such a manifestation of pain as this.

Genevieve was still standing before her, the tears still in her eyes, as if the chill of her heart had frozen them there for ever.

She was looking through her tears, beyond them, beyond the purple hills that bounded the horizon. Was she trying to look beyond and behind this hour that had so surely struck its darkness through the hours to be?

"I must go now," she said, turning to Miss Richmond, and speaking as one who comes slowly back again to a life that has been suspended, "I must go to my father."

She went out almost silently, hardly knowing the way she took. The great gates clanged into their places again, some sheep were bleating rather piteously on the moorland above. A big brown retriever came out from among the bushes, and looked up into the sad human eyes that were passing by as if he divined all the sadness, and all its meaning, but the girl took no notice of him. She noted nothing. She went hurrying on.

Kendle out to find her, to bring her back; ■ was to desire her earnestly to come back for a moment or two. But Kendle was unable to overtake Miss Bartholomew. The man imagined that she had gone by the moor; but she was nowhere on the upland. She had gone homeward as she had come, by the dead, dark, marshy reeds.

All the way she went by the dark marshes. The wintry twilight was coming down quickly, icily. A lurid crimson flush was fading in the west. The trees stood still, the withered drooping sedges were still, the birds were silent. One great pale star stood shining in the lonely heavens.

Presently she came to a road that crossed her path, a road that led down from Usselby into Soulsgrif Bight. Once, not so long ago, she had been passing through the marsh in the early morning, singing as she went out of the gladness, the lightness, the fullness of her heart, making for herself a little tune ■ the words that were ringing in her ears —

"I must not cover my self, he loves me still.
Let no one dream but that he loves me still."

Surely it was but yesterday! She had been singing aloud, freely, gladly, unrestrainedly. Then, suddenly, at the turn of the road she had met a tall, stern figure clove at hand. He had heard, that was evident, and the gay glad song of assurance had turned to a silent and painful blush of maiden shame.

Surely it was but yesterday! And now? . . . Now the girl stood by a stunted black-thorn bush and held it so that the thorns passed into her hand till the pain was greater than she could bear. So she kept back the tears that would have betrayed her soul's anguish to her father.

Then, again, she went rapidly on by the dim ways, and as she went there came ■ her, like an echo from afar, some words that Canon Gabriel had spoken one evening to the people in the music-room at Soulsgrif Bight. He had been speaking of St. Peter, of his attempt to walk on the waves to his Master, walking as on the earth till he had looked round upon the wild waters that were raging on every side. Then his faith had failed. Had he looked steadfastly at the Master only, ■ had never felt himself beginning to sink.

■ was so in many a crisis, the Canon had gone on to say in simple words. A man's sole chance of outwining the storm might lie in his ability to look above and beyond the terrible stress of it. . . . The truth, the help of this came mercifully just now when it was wanted. She would not look, she would not think, not yet, not till strength came for looking and thinking. . . . Would it ever come? A chill sighing gust of wind came up from the sea through the gathering darkness; it went away up to the moor carrying with it a half-uttered cry, "Will it ever come? Will it ever come? Will there ever again be any life to be lived with desire for life's continuance?"

She reached the stile at Netherbank at last. Mr. Severne was just coming away from the cottage. He stopped for a moment, half-surprised, wholly pleased.

"I beg pardon, but I don't think you ought to be out so late on these cold evenings," he said, when his greeting was done, speaking kindly, tenderly as a brother might.

"Do you care?" Genevieve replied, speaking in strange new tones, tones that were a little excited, a little wild. "Do you care, do you still care? I wonder that you should care so long. But, perhaps, it is only seeming, only mockery. I could understand that. I cannot understand in any other way."

Mr. Severne could hardly see her face in the darkness, but he could not fail to recognise some change, some development of life's fitful fever. Was it her father's trouble that was trying her thus?

"What makes you suspect me of insincerity?" he asked, speaking gently, yet breathing more quickly under the intensity of his own emotion.

"I don't suspect you more than others. I don't suspect anybody. It is not suspicion, it is knowledge, new knowledge of the world, of life, of all things—the good glad life that I have so delighted in, the beautiful world that I have loved so keenly. Oh! try to see it—try to see it for what it is! Believe certainly that it—"

'Hath really neither joy, nor love, nor light, Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help from pain.'

But, there, I am preaching to you, when you should be preaching to me. Come and preach to me, but not to-morrow, not for a long time, not for a long, long time. Then come and say something to help me, come and say anything you will."

She discerned the change in Mr. Severne's voice when he spoke again, the intonation of disappointment.

"I am not to come to Netherbank at present?" he asked.

"Come in the morning," Genevieve said, still speaking as if she hardly knew the thing she uttered. "Come and try to make me good as you are, help me to bear trouble as you bear it. Be my brother, and be very wise, and be very patient, and be good to me—oh! be good to me! There is no one else, my father must not know. There is no one else who may see me weak, and wilful, and overpowered in the fight as you may."

There was a pause. A good many thoughts were passing through Mr. Severne's brain; and if there was effort in the next remark he made, there was for him no irrelevancy.

"Perhaps I ought to have told you before that Mr. Kirkoswald is with your father," he said, as if the remembrance had just struck him.

"He is there now? Good-bye, then. And come again when you care to come. And when you come, be true! be true! It the world may have one true thing in it, oh! be true!"

Genevieve went swiftly across the stubble-field. There were lights in the cottage windows; the ivy dropped in long clustering sprays, the birds flew out tremulously. The one lonely star was still shining; an unspoken cry went far beyond it, a cry for help in the sore strife—only for help that she might not fail, help that she might be strong for the moment, help that she might not betray herself in the presence of him who had betrayed her life's whole faith, its utmost trust, its last bound and possibility of love. "Help for a little while!" she said, "and then, then I will be still. All my life long I shall need only to be still . . . still between dawn and dark, still between dark and dawn . . . nothing can break the stillness."

VILLAGE WEDDING BELLS.

RING on, ring on, ye wedding bells!
There's a duty rests with you,
The joy you make is a joy that tells
Of hearts that are brave and true.

The times are hard for simple folk;
They're oft in stormy weather,

But a man and wife must pull through life,
And breast the waves together.

One side of life is dark as night;
The other is clear as day.
In doing right you keep to the light,
And the dark will pass away.

Though times be hard for simple folk,
And we mourn the ills of fate,
The rule for man is, do what he can,
He must learn to work and wait

Behind the cloud's a silver light,
A joy for the faithful heart
Then plight your troth by a solemn oath,
To be true till death do part.

It's not in vain the wedding bells
Ring joy on the wedding day,
Though the battle's nigh, yet hopes are high,
And hearts are merry and gay

Ring on, ring on, ye wedding bells!
There's a duty rests with you,
The joy you make is a joy that tells
Of hearts that are brave and true

JOHN HUNT.

A HOLIDAY AFLOAT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN"

I HAD long heard of the house boat, and had once seen ■ (as you see it here, my readers, in a sketch done by a gal little older than many of you, but already a notable English artist) It lies, summer after summer, moored in a tiny bay on our river Thames, and twice it had been offered to me for a week's occupation by its kindly owner, but I never was able to ■. When at last I found I could go, I was as ready to "jump for joy" —had that feat been possible at my age—as any of you young people To live in a house boat on the broad river, with a safe barricade of water between you and the outside world—to fish out of your parlour door, and if you wanted to wash your hands, to let down jugs with a string from your bedroom window, moreover, to have unlimited sunrises and sunsets, to sleep with the "lap lap" of a flowing stream in your ears, to waken with the songs of birds from the trees of the shore—what could be more delightful? Nothing, except perhaps "camping out" under the stars, which might also be a trifle damp and uncomfortable

No dampness here More than comfort—actual beauty. When I went down ■ look at it, in early spring, and the kind owner showed it with pride—pardonable pride—I found the house boat adorned with Walter Crane's drawings and William Morris's furniture, perfectly æsthetic in its decorations, and as convenient as a well appointed yacht. Also, there was a feeling about it, as if the possessor loved it, and loved to make people happy ■ it. There were mottoes from Shakspeare, Shelley, Keats, Milton, in every room, and pictures on every wall, besides the perpetual pictures outside—a gallery of ever-changing loveliness.

I came home enthusiastic, and immediately set about choosing "a lot of girls," as many as the boat would hold, ■ share it. Only girls; any elderly person, except the inevitable one, myself, would, we agreed, have spoiled all. I did not choose any girls for outside qualities, though some of them were pretty enough too—but for good temper, good sense, and a cheerful spirit, determined to make the best of everything; and face the worst—if necessary. These were the qualities I looked for—and found.

I shall not paint their portraits nor tell their names, except to mention the curious fact that three out of the six were Katherines. We had, therefore, to distinguish them as Kitty, Kath, and Katie, the latter being our little maid-of-all-work—our coachman's daughter. The other three were the artist, whose name is public property, and two girls, specially mine, whom I shall designate as Meum and Tuum. All were between fifteen and twenty-five—happy age! and all still walked "in maiden meditation (fancy free)," so we had not a man among us! Except our sole protector, Katie's father, whom I shall call Adam, after Shakspeare's Adam in As you like it, whom he resembles in everything but age.

Six girls afloat! And very much afloat they were, swimming like ducks—no, let us say swans—on a sea of sunshiny felicity. As we drove from our last railway station—

Maidenhead—our open omnibus, filled with bright-faced girls, seemed quite ■ interest the inhabitants. Reaching the open country, that lovely Thames valley which all English artists know, our ringing laughter at every small joke startled the still July afternoon, and made the birds dart quickly out of the hedgerows. Such hedgerows, full of wild briar roses, pink and deep red, honeysuckle, traveller's joy, and dozens of other flowers.

"There it is! There is the house-boat!" cried Kitty, who had seen it before, having been with me when we investigated it domestically.

"Hurrah! we have nearly reached it—our 'appy 'ome," exclaimed Meum and Tuum, standing up in the carriage together. Two of the Katherines followed their example; indeed we should have looked a most ill-behaved party, only fortunately there was no one to see us, except one labourer lazily sitting on a mowing machine which was slowly cutting down all the pride of the

There she lay, the Pinafore, and beside her the Sub, a little boat, which was to ■■■ our sole link with the outside world. In it sat the owner, who had patiently awaited us there two hours, and whose portrait I should like ■■■ paint, if only to show you a bachelor—an old bachelor you girls would call him—who has neither grown selfish nor cynical, who knows how ■■■ use his money without abusing it, and who does use a good part of it, in making other people happy.

The Pinafore is his hobby. He built it on the top of a barge, under his own direction, and from his own design. ■■■ consists of a saloon at one end, combination kitchen and dining room at the other, and four cabins between, with two berths in each. A real little house, and well might we call it our happy home—for a week.

Our host showed us all over it once more, pointed out every possible arrangement for our comfort, partook of a hasty cup of tea, and then drove back in our empty omnibus. Londonwards, deeply commended by us, whom he left behind in his little Paradise.

The first meal! Its hveliness was only equalled by the celerity with which it disappeared. And then came several important questions.

"Business before pleasure! Choose your room-mates, girls, and then arrange your rooms. It is the fashion on board the Pinafore to do everything for yourselves. When all ■■■ ready we will take a row in the sunset, and then come back to bed."

Which would have been a pleasant business, if some of them had had to sleep in beds of their own making!

"Ma'am," said Katie, who was beside me when I peeped into one cabin, which was one confused heap, "hadn't I better do the rooms? The young ladies don't quite understand it."

Katie, the best of little housemaids, was heartily thanked, and her offer accepted. "But, girls, remember it is for the first and last time. After to night you must learn to do your rooms yourselves."

So we threw overboard the practical for the poetical, and, like Hiawatha, went sailing towards the sunset in dreamy delight.

What a sunset ■■■ was! The river with its flowery banks, rushy islands, and tree-fringed back-waters, was dyed all colours, according to the changing colour of the sky. Such green mounds of trees, dark woods on either side! everything full of rich summer life, from the stately pair of swans sailing about, with their six grey cygnets after them, to the water hen scuttling among the reeds, the willow-wren singing among the bushes, and the wary rat darting into his hole as we passed. All was beauty and peace.

"If it is that insect the day
That is their tears like the Arctics,
And suddenly sto d away"

My five girls could all handle an oar, and how they did enjoy their row! The two youngest took it by turns, and at least succeeded in "catching crabs" with much dexterity and hilarity.

On and on, till we were stopped by a lock—the three evils of the Thames are locks, weirs, and latches. So we turned, and let ourselves drift back with the current. Now and then we "hugged" the bank, and gathered thence a huge handful of purple loosestrife, blue and white bugloss, meadow-sweet, forget-me-not, or we floated over great beds of water-lilies, yellow or white, which grew on a quiet little back-water, where we nearly got stranded in a shoal and paired with a wing. But "a miss is as good as a mile," said we, and were more careful another time.

The sun had long set, and the moon was setting—the young moon, like a silver boat—when we re-entered our "happy home" for supper and bed; the second speedily following the first, for various excellent reasons, one being that the supper table was required for Adam's couch. He had his choice whether to sleep on it or under it, and preferred the latter as being "more like a four-poster." Adam is by nature almost as silent as his horses, but his few remarks, terse, dry, and shrewd, often pass into family proverbs.

So all the Pinafore's crew sank into repose, except one, who has an occasional bad habit of lying awake "till the day breaks and the shadows flee away." How gloriously ■■■ did break, that dawn on the Thames! and how strange were the river sounds—the chirping of birds and the lowing of cattle mingling with other mysterious noises, afterwards discovered to ■■■ the tapping of swans' beaks against the barge, and the water-rats careering about underneath it. Nevertheless at last sleep came, and with ■■■ the power ■■■ face and enjoy another new day.

A holiday is never the worse when there runs through it a stratum—a very thin stratum—of work. So the two working bees, author and artist, decided ■■■ be put ashore after breakfast and left under two trees, with their several tasks, while the others enjoyed themselves, till dinner time, when we expected friends who were ■ row about ten miles to spend the day with us.

Dinner reminds me of our domestic com-missariat—a huch, considering that food for eight or ten hungry people does not grow on every bush, was important. Groceries and other stores we brought with us, but bread, milk, butter, fruit, and vegetables, we had to get from the inn opposite, which also sent us our meat ready-cooked, it being impossible to roast a joint on board the Panafors. Fresh water too we had ■ get from the inn pump—river water not being wholesome for drinking. Great fun were those endless journeys, for we were all thirsty souls, and all, even Adam, teetotallers. The amount of water and milk we got through was such that some one suggested it would save trouble to fetch the cow on board. The kindly landlady bade us "gather our fruit for ourselves," so we often brought home a boat load of valuable food—potatoes, peas, crisp lettuces pulled up by the roots and eaten as rabbits eat them, also raspberries, cherries, and currants. It was almost as good ■ shooting or fishing one's dinner. And, by the-by, the sight of the fish jumping up round the boat brought the saddest look to Adam's amiable countenance.

"If I had but a rod and line, ma'am, I'd catch them for dinner."

And very nasty they might have been—river fish generally are—yet politeness would have obliged us to eat them, so perhaps all was for the best.

After a mirthful day our guests departed, and, to test their arms, my five girls decided to stretch their legs and take a walk on shore. "Let's have a race," said the biggest and the most beautiful. As she tucked up her skirts she looked a real Atalanta. The second in height, and only a trifle less in grace and activity, did the same, and off they started, up what seemed a solitary road, when lo! suddenly appeared two young Oxford men, book in hand! What they thought of the apparition of these two fair athletes, and the three other girls behind, all of whom collapsed suddenly into decorum, will never be known. But I doubt if they read much for the next ten minutes.

The race thus stopped, we thought we would go into the village churchyard, where two old men were soberly making hay of the grass cut over the graves. Thence we passed into a quiet wood, and finally came home—hungry, as usual—to supper, and so concluded our second day.

happened a most dramatic incident. A sudden and violent bump caused the Panafors to shake from stem to stern, and woke us all up. Some declared they heard a voice exclaim, "Hallo, Bull! where are you going to?" and others vowed they heard a great rattling at what we entitled our "front door." Adam was vehemently called, and he and his mistress, in rather hasty toilettes, carefully examined every corner, but all was safe. Then we looked out, in case there had been an accident, but nothing could be seen, the river flowed on, empty, dark, and still. I entered the cabin where five maidens, all in nocturnal white, stood congregated together in a group, not unlike the daughters of Niobe, and took their evidence. However, as the mystery, whatever ■ was, could not be solved, we all went to bed. And Adam having, with his usual cautious fidelity, poked into every place that a thief, or even a fly could enter, made the brief remark, "Pirates," and retired again to his—table.

The only result of this remarkable episode was that about eight the next morning, finding a solemn silence in the cabins instead of the usual tremendous chatter, I went to look at my girls, and found them all five lying fast asleep, "like tops." As it was a pelting wet morning, with the wind blowing after a fashion which required all one's imagination to make believe that our dwelling was quite steady, this infringement of my Mede and-Peruan rule—eight o'clock breakfast—was less important. But I said remorselessly, "This must never happen again." Nor did it.

Their laziness lost my girls the great excitement of the day. A sudden outcry from Adam of "The boat! the boat!" revealed the alarming sight of our little Bib having got unmoored, drifting away calmly at her own sweet will down stream! For a moment Adam looked ■ if he intended ■ swim after her, then changed his mind and hallooed with all his strength. Female voices joined the chorus. At first we were in despair, for at this hour, and on such a wet morning, there was not a soul to be seen at the hotel garden or ferry. A last agonising shout we made, and then saw a man rush out, evidently thinking somebody was drowning. He caught the position—and the boat, which in another minute or two would have drifted past, and brought her back to us in triumph.

After this we settled down, thankful that things were no worse—except a dreary down-pour and a wind that rattled every door and window of our frail dwelling. The girls' countenances fell.

Now, though the happiest days of my life are spent among young people, I have always found that a certain amount of law and order is as good for them as for myself, else we get demoralised. So instead of hanging about and moaning, wondering when it would clear up, and if it didn't clear up what we should do, I set everybody to do something. Two cleaned the bedrooms and exulted over the dust they swept away, another wrote home letters, and a fourth gave us delightful music on the harmonium. The artist had, of course, her own proper work, the result of which you here behold. And when about noon the sky cleared, and grew into a lovely July day, breezy and bright, with white clouds careering about, we felt we had earned our felicity.

Still it was too stormy to row much, so we investigated the shore on either side. First the Abbey, beside which was the hotel and its farmyard, splendid hay stacks almost touching the ancient ruins, which date from the time of King John, then, after the important interval of tea, came a long walk on the opposite bank, where, protected from the wind by three umbrellas, the party sat admiring the scene, and themselves making a charming picture not painted in the present. And lastly, as if to reward our cheerful patience, after sunset the wind sank, and in the clear west, in the midst of a brilliant twilight, sat the crescent moon.

"We must have another row!" and so we had, until twilight melted into dark.

The third morning came, and by eight o'clock the house boat was as noisy as a magpie's nest. We had arranged for a long expedition, with a boatman who knew each lock, weir, lasher—every danger on the river, and leaving to him all the care of the voyage, were determined to enjoy ourselves solely.

Our morning row was delightful, but brief, since the girls and the boat had to sit for their portraits, as they here appear, the young artist having afterwards done herself—from memory—sitting in the bow. But we had scarcely reached home when there came the most awful downpour. I had warned them of this, reading in the Times that a "depression" was travelling over from America—all our bad weather does come from America—but of course they didn't believe it. Even now, though the sky was a leaden grey, and the river, too, bubbling all over with the sheets of rain which pelted on our flat roof, and our "front garden" and "back garden"—as we called the two ends of the barge, used, one as a scullery, the other as a drawing-room—

"It must, it will clear!" persisted they, but it did not clear for six mortal hours. We soon ceased to lament, and rejoiced that we were safe under cover. We made the best of our afternoon—we read, we drew, we played games, then we took to music, and sang, or tried to sing, some catches and rounds. Finally our eldest gave us Mendelssohn on the little harmonium, and our youngest, in her clear, fresh, pathetic voice, sang us Schubert's songs from Wilhelm Meister, till a boat load of soaked, white jacketed youths was seen to stop under the opposite bank, listening to the Lurlei like strains. (NB—I hope it did not cause their deaths from rheumatic fever.)

But the worst times come to an end if you can only wait long enough, and by seven P.M. we looked out on a cloudless sky and a shining river. Ere we started for another sunset row Adam said briefly, "There's fish for supper, ma'am." He too had utilised the wet day, and behold! a dozen small dace, caught by some fishing tackle he had borrowed, were swimming in a bucket, alike indifferent to the hook they had swallowed and the prospect of being speedily fried. But Adam's pride in his piscatory exploit was a little lessened an hour after, when we found him, with mingled laughter and anxiety, gazing after a majestic swan, which had swallowed the baited hook and then swam away, carrying rod and line after him. It took a long chase to recover both, but they were recovered, and so, we concluded, was the swan, for he reappeared shortly after as lively as ever, and ate the food we threw out to him with his usual dignity and grace. These swans, of whom our artist has taken some portraits, are the pride and ornament of the Thames. They belong to the Thames Conservancy Corporation, and no one is allowed to molest or destroy them. They sail about like kings and queens, followed by their families, and are petted and fed and admired till they become quite tame. They used to gather round our boat and eat out of the girls' hands, and their graceful motions were a delight to behold.

The last day had now come, at least our last whole day—Friday. We resolved to make the most of it, by going up the river in the forenoon and down in the afternoon, taking with us a frugal meal of bread and butter, milk, and cherries, also the towing rope, in case rowing up stream should be too difficult and too long a business. There is a towing-path all the way along the Thames, at one side or other, and we used often to see a young man, or even a girl, or sometimes both, amicably harnessed together, pulling along a whole boatful of people with the greatest ease. We thought the towing, if necessary, would be great fun for the after-dinner row.

Our morning row was a failure, being much too "genteel." The river flowed between civilised shores, dotted with splendid villas. Its banks were elegantly boarded in for promenades, its very boat-houses were palatial residences. No osiers, rushes, and lovely water plants; the very water-lilies looked cultivated. We agreed that our own bit of river was much the best, and that not a single house-boat—we passed half-a-dozen at least—was half so pretty or so commodious as our Pinefort. Content and hungry, we came back to it, determined to eat our dinner in ten minutes, and ■ off again; but fate intervened.

"Listen! that's surely thunder! And how black the river looks! It ■ bubbling, too, all over! Hark!"

Craah, crash, and down came the rain, regular thunder rain, continuing without a moment's pause for three hours. Drenched boat-loads of unlucky pleasure-seekers kept passing our windows, struggling for the hospitable inn opposite.

"Still, yesterday evening was lovely; to-night may be the same," said the girls, determined to keep up their spirits. And when at last the rain did actually cease, and a bit of blue sky appeared—"enough to make a cat a jacket"—they set to work baling out and drying the boat, protesting the while that the occupation was "delightful."

Fortune favours the brave. ■ was seven o'clock before we were able to start; but that last row was the loveliest we had. Such a sunset! such views! of osier beds, and islands of tall rushes, and masses of woodland, and smooth, green parks with huge century-old trees, and noisy weirs, and dark, silent locks! We had now grown fearless, or desperate, and determined to go through two locks. Some of us, I think, would have liked to ■ right on to London! drifting contentedly down the rapid stream. But motherly wisdom, seeing the sun fast sinking and the twilight darkening, insisted on turning homewards, and was obeyed.

Only once, when the crimson sunset reflected in the river from behind a fringe of low trees, made a picture too lovely to resist, our artist implored to be "dropped," as was her habit, which being impossible at that hour, we compromised by "lying to" for half an hour, while she painted, or tried to paint, in the dim light. We sang a quantity of old songs, duets and glees. ■ the pauses the cornetist put in his note from the shore, and one or two other birds wakened up with a sleepy chirp, then all sank into silence, and there were only the quiet river and the quiet sky, up which the crescent moon was sailing, brighter and brighter. I think, however long my girls may live, and whatever vicissitudes they may go through, they will never forget that night.

It was not evening but actual night, when we reached our "appy home." Adam was anxiously watching. We had his little daughter on board with us.

"Did you think anything had happened—that we were all drowned?"

"Yes, ma'am, I did," said he briefly.

Poor Adam, shut up in his floating prison, had evidently not spent the happiest of evenings, but we had, and—it was our last.

About eleven or so, when the magpie's nest had all sunk into silence, I saw the loveliest moon set. The large bright crescent close upon the horizon shone in a cloudless western sky, and was reflected in the river, with a gulf of darkness between. After watching it for several minutes, determined to see the last of it, I went back into my cabin, and took up a book—"Essays" by Miss Thackeray. One "On Friendship" interested and touched me so much that I read it to the end, then started up and rushed to the window. It was too late. My moon had set! Only a faint circle of light in the sky, and another fainter still on the river, showed where she had been.

I went back to bed, a little sad at heart and vexed with myself for having missed the lovely sight by about a minute, after having sat up on purpose ■ watch it. Too late, too late! Why cannot one always do, not only the right thing, but at the right time?

My girls had apparently discovered this secret. Long before even I was stirring, though old birds are usually early birds, I heard a great clatter and chatter in the parlour or saloon. ■ was our two "little ones," broom in hand, with their dresses tucked up, cleaning and sweeping, throwing about tea leaves, taking up rugs, dusting tables and chairs, washing china, and in short fairly turning the house, or house-boat, out of windows. The delighted laughter with which they watched the dirt and debris sail down the river, a floating island of rubbish, was quite infectious.

"No, no, we can't eat any breakfast till we have done our work. We are determined to leave the parlour as clean and beautiful as we found it."

With which noble sentiment I entirely coincided.

After breakfast there were the cabins to be put in order, and all the packing to be done. ■ was eleven before we felt free to enjoy ourselves, and then the sky looked so threatening that I protested against the long expedition which had been planned. Suppose it rained—in fact it had rained a little—and we all got wet through and had to start for our long railway journey without any possibility of drying ourselves. So, in deference ■ the prudent mother, who never denied them any thing she could help, the good girls cheerfully gave up their expedition, and we spent a delightful hour or two in paddling about close at home and gathering water lilies.

This last proceeding was not so easy as it looked. Water lilies have such thick strong stalks, and grow in such deep water, that in plucking them one is apt to overbalance the boat, especially if fully laden. We had to land half of our crew on an oster island, while the others floated about, guiding them selves with the boat hook, and cautiously grasping at the dazling white blossoms and plate like leaves which covered the surface of the water for many yards. A risky proceeding it always is—gathering water lilies, but when gathered, what a handful—may, armful—of beauty and perfume they are!

We got back not a minute too soon, and had scarcely sat down to dinner, our last dinner—at which we laughed much, perhaps to keep our spirits up—when flash! crack! the storm was upon us—and a more fearful thunder-storm I never saw. The river was one boiling sheet of splashing rain, the clouds were black as night, between them and the water the forked lightning danced, and once, when after a loud clap of thunder, a column of white smoke burst out from the wood opposite, we felt sure the bolt had fallen.

For two whole hours the storm raged, and then, just as we were wondering if the carriage would venture to come for us, and how we should accomplish our seven miles' drive without being drenched to the skin, the rain ceased, the blue sky appeared, and the world looked, as the world feels after the thunderstorm in Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

And so, with contented, thankful hearts, although a little melancholy, and with the very tune of the reapers' thanksgiving song out of the said symphony ringing in our ears, we left our sweet ■■■ house boat and our beautiful Thames and went our several ways homeward.

"We may never in all our lives have such another week," said one of the gulls mournfully. Which is very possible, but, ought we not to be glad that we ever had it at all?

HOW WE FIND OUT THE SHAPE AND SIZE OF THE EARTH.

BY PROFESSOR A H GRILLN

A KNOWLEDGE of the real shape of the earth on which we dwell was reached only by slow degrees. Men very soon got an inkling that the earth was in some way or other round. The "round world" of the Psalmist, and the views held on this subject by the Greeks of the Homeric age show how prevalent the notion had become at a very early date. It is a notion that naturally suggests itself when we cast our eyes across the sea from the top of a ship's mast or over a broad plain from a lofty summit, for the spare visible to us is always bounded by a circle.

But the roundness that was at first assigned to the earth was very different from that which it really possesses. The portion of the sea that we see from a mast head looks like a round flat plate, and men, who had not yet learned to distrust the evidence of their senses, naturally came to the conclusion that the earth as a whole had the same shape. Guided wholly by sense, and not yet trained to abstract reasoning, they overlooked the fact that a large round plate would look circular to an eye placed above it only if the spectator were near its centre. Or if this had occurred to them, the objection carried no weight, because each man never moving far from home and feeling the great importance which the country he belonged to possessed for himself, was firmly convinced that that country occupied the commanding position of the centre certainly of the world, probably of the universe at large.

The hackneyed proof that the earth is not flat is now taught in every Board school, and nowadays when ships put out straight to sea with hulls rising high above the water and towering masts, it may be verified by every visitor to a seaport town. But in the days when as a rule the sailor hugged the coast fearing to lose sight of land, and low masted galleys were the rule, there were not so many opportunities of noting that a vessel did not go out of sight all at once, but that the hull disappeared first, then the yards, and that the top of the mast remained visible after these had vanished and was lost to view last of all.

Still ■ must occasionally have happened that the home sick voyager, when he spied at last the temple perched on the top of a lofty cliff which furnished the land mark he had so often strained his eyes to descry, was struck by the fact that the roof came into sight before the basement, and that the whole was full in view long before ■ could distinguish the town below in which his home lay.

I thus men came to realise that the earth was not a round plate but a round ball. When this conclusion was first arrived at we do not know, but the fact was accepted as generally in the time of Ptolemy as in our own day, perhaps even more generally, for we have no record of a Greek sceptic who was prepared to stake a large sum that a crucial experiment would prove the earth to be flat, and made difficulties about paying when he lost his wager. But there was yet more to be learnt before the earth's figure could be finally settled. There are many kinds of round balls, cricket balls and foot balls for instance. A cricket ball is a sphere, that is, every point on its surface is at the same distance from a point within it called its centre, the constant distance being called the radius. This would not be true of most foot balls, probably of none after a hard fought match.

Now the fact that the line which bounds our view at sea, the horizon as it is called, is a circle not at one or two places but everywhere, points to the conclusion that the earth is much nearer a cricket ball than a foot ball in shape. For take a well-made cricket ball and a glass funnel big enough for the ball to lie in it, hold the ball in the hand and place the funnel upon it. The funnel will touch the ball all round, and if we suppose an eye placed at the summit of the cone of the funnel, ■ would evidently see the part of the ball inside the line along which the funnel touched the ball, and would not see any part of the ball outside this line. This line is the horizon for an eye in such a position. Smear a little paint on the inside of the funnel and again apply it to the ball, the paint will make a mark along the line of contact, and this mark will be a circle. And it will be a circle to whatever part of the ball the funnel be applied. ■ we were to make the same experiment with a foot ball it is quite clear that we should require different shaped funnels for different parts of the ball we might get circular horizons on some parts, but not all over some of our horizons would be oval, and others of very irregular curved shapes. Now it can be proved by geometry that there is only one surface which will give circular horizons all over when treated in this way, and that surface is a sphere.

The fact then that the horizon is circular as far as the eye can judge everywhere on the earth, shows that the earth is spherical or very nearly spherical in shape. ■ course we cannot pretend to say that the horizon is an exact circle, and therefore the earth may not be an exact sphere, but the horizon is certainly not very far from being a circle, and hence we cannot be very far out if ■ assume the earth to be a sphere.

And now how big ■ this sphere? To explain how ■ is measured, I must use language savouring of "the mathematics," and therefore calculated ■ terrify the ordinary reader. But, gentle reader, lay aside, I beg, any fear that you may feel on this head. You would be much insulted if I hinted that you could not do a sum in Addition or Subtraction, you might perhaps take it ill if I doubted your mystery of the "Rule of Three," well, the amount of mathematics I must inflict on you is very little worse than Addition and Subtraction, and ■ certainly not so formidable as many a sum ■ "Double Rule of Three."

First we shall have to deal with two kinds of quantities, lines and angles. Lines present no difficulty, they are measured in miles, feet, inches, and so on. Angles, though not so familiar, are measured quite ■ simply. Suppose the edge of your watch face was divided into 360 equal parts instead of into 60, and that each part was called a degree: suppose both hands at XII in 5 minutes' time the minute hand will have passed over 30 of the divisions or through 30 degrees, and we simply say that the angle between the two positions of the minute hand contains, or is, 30 degrees; the corresponding angle at 20 minutes past 12 is 20 degrees, and so on. Each degree is further subdivided into 60 equal parts called minutes.

Now for a little bit more of these formidable mathematics. Draw on a sheet of paper a triangle, and put A, B, C at the three corners: this triangle has three sides, and three angles, we call the angle between the lines B A and

C A shortly B A C, putting the letter A, where the two bounding lines B A, C A meet, in the middle. Now suppose A, B, C are three towns, and we want ■ find out how far they are apart. We can walk from B to ■ and measure the distance with a tape, but there are broad rivers which prevent us walking from B to A and from C to A. For all that we can find the distance between the towns.

We have ■ large brass circle the edge of which is divided into 360 degrees: a telescope moves round on a pivot placed at the centre of the circle. We stand at B (Fig. 1) and direct the telescope to C, and note which division of the circle it covers, say the 32nd: we turn the telescope round till we can see A through it, it now covers the 65th division. We have turned the telescope through 33 degrees, and this is the size of the angle C B A. We then go to C, and in the same way measure the angle B C A.

We now know the length of the side B C, and the size of the two angles C B A, B C A. We can now, merely by doing a sum, find the lengths of A B, and A C. What that sum is the curious reader may learn from works on Trigonometry, if he has no leaning that way, he must take the statement on faith. He must also be prepared to believe that we can in this way determine the distances B A, B C much more exactly than by measuring them with a tape. Next suppose that D, E, and F (Fig. 2) are other towns, and that we measure in exactly the same way as before the size of the angles A C D, C A D. We have found the length of A C, and by doing exactly the same kind of sum as before, we can find the lengths of A D and D C. By making the same kind of observation at A and D we can find the lengths of ■ E and D E, and by carrying our instrument ■ ■ and E, we can find the lengths of E F and D F. So we may go on till we have determined the lengths of the sides of a network of triangles reaching over any extent of country. We call the process a "Trigonometrical Survey."

Calculations of a similar nature will enable us to determine the length of a long straight line C M running in any direction, say due north and south, across the network. Note that, to do this, we have had to use our obvious at first sight why it should be so, the accurate measurement of this base line is about the most difficult part of the whole operation. What shall we measure with? A tape? It will stretch. A wooden rod? It will warp. A metal rod? It will be longer on a hot than on a cold day. These and many other difficulties present themselves, but by proper precautions they can be got over. The accuracy with which base lines can be measured and the whole of the work carried out can be tested in various ways, of which the following is an example. In the Trigonometrical Survey of Great Britain several base lines were measured, one on Hounslow Heath was about five miles long, and another measured on the flat sandy margin of Lough Foyle was nearly eight miles long. Starting from the base on Hounslow Heath the network of triangles was carried northwards over England, thrown across the Irish Sea, and continued over Ireland up to Lough Foyle, and the measured base there was made a side of the last triangle. Step by step the lengths of the sides of the successive triangles were worked out, and if the observations had been accurately made and the sums correctly worked, the answer to the last sum ought to be the length of the Lough Foyle base. This answer differed from the measured length only by as near as may be two and a half inches. Do not we use a similar check every day when we want to learn what our expenses have been? Railway fare, cab hire, what we spent in this shop and what in that, we try to recollect, and add the amounts together. To be sure we have overlooked no item, we count the money in our pocket and subtract it from what we had when we started. As far as the writer's experience goes, the two figures seldom agree anything like so closely as the calculated and measured lengths of the Lough Foyle base. Checks of this kind are constantly applied during the progress of the survey, and thereby any errors of observation or calculation are detected and the highest accuracy insured.

In order to bridge over the Irish Sea the observation of angles had to be made on hills high enough to be visible from one another across the water. By means of a mirror on one hilltop the light of the sun is flashed across to another hilltop, and the aerial triangles are bounded by rays of light which shoot across from the mirror on one summit into the telescope on the other. Snowdon and Piceilly in Wales, Scafell in England, Sliève Donard and some high points on the Wicklow Mountains in Ireland were among the stations used for this purpose. The side of one triangle reaching from Scafell to Sliève Donard was 212 miles long.

In this way then we can determine the length of a long straight line on the earth's surface. But we cannot girdle the whole of the earth with a chain of triangles, and we must now inquire how knowing the length of a long line on the surface enables us to find out the size of the earth. A little but more mathematics will be necessary. Suppose the line we have determined runs north and south and that A and B are its extremities, and that O (Fig. 3) is the centre of the earth. If we could ascertain in any way the size of the angle A O B, we could find the length A O by doing a very easy sum, we should simply have to divide the length of A B by the number of degrees in A O B, and multiply the result by 53°.7.

But this does not seem to bring us much nearer to a result, for how are we to find out the size of the angle A O B? In this way it may be done. Let S be a star, draw the lines AS , $\blacksquare S$, and draw $\blacksquare A$, $\bullet B$ upwards to C and \blacksquare then it is known that

Fig 1

Further reflect that the star \blacksquare very far off indeed, and that for this reason the angle ASB must be very small indeed. It is easy to convince one's self of this. Fix two pins in the wall of a room a quarter of an inch apart and tie a string to each, stand a little way off, pull the strings tight holding the ends together, and mark on a sheet of paper the angle between them, go a little farther from the wall and do the same, the angle is smaller than before, the farther you go away from the wall the smaller does the angle between the strings become, and by the time you have reached the other side of the room, it is very small indeed, though still measurable. If the room be 17 feet across, the length of the strings is about 800 times the distance between the pins, and it would require a very carefully constructed instrument to measure the angle between them. But AS \blacksquare many thousand million times AB . How inconceivably minute then must the angle ASB be! Really it is many times smaller than the smallest angle that we can measure with our best instruments. We may therefore leave the angle altogether out of our calculations, and this amounts to saying that

The number of degrees in the angle AOB is equal \blacksquare the number of degrees in the two angles CAS and DBS .

We shall know then the size of AOB , if we can find the size of CAS and DBS .

Things now begin to look more hopeful, instead of an angle whose point lies at the earth's centre, we have to deal with two angles whose points lie on the surface. And these angles can be easily measured. If I hang a plumb line CA over A , it will point straight to O . I can also take a telescope AE , turning round a pivot at A , and turn \blacksquare till it points straight to the star. The angle between the plumb line and the telescope can then be measured on a circular ring CE , whose centre is at A and which \blacksquare divided into degrees. The line AC points to the spot in the heavens directly over our head, and this is called the Zenith hence the angle CAE is called the "Zenith distance" of the star S . We have supposed AB to run from north to south, and hence the angles CAS , DBS are measured when the star is due north or due south of us. In such a case these angles are called "meridian zenith distances."

All we have to do then is \blacksquare measure the meridian zenith distances of the same star at A and B add together the number of degrees in these two angles, divide AB by their sum and multiply the quotient by 53'. The answer is the radius of the earth.

In this way we find out that the distance from the centre to the surface of the earth is not far from 4000 miles. We shall find it useful to recollect that if AB is a mile, the angle AOB is nearly one minute.

We have been going on \blacksquare along on the supposition that the earth is exactly a sphere. If this be the case, it will not matter where AB is taken on the surface. Wherever our measurements are made, whether near the poles, near the equator, or \blacksquare intermediate spots, if AB is a mile, the sum, or difference as the case may be, of the meridian zenith distances of the star at A and $\blacksquare B$ will always be the same, nearly one minute. It will be worth while to check our assumption by seeing if this \blacksquare the case, when trial is made, \blacksquare is found that it does make a difference in what part of the earth's surface AB lies. We measure the meridian zenith distance of a star at A , we then walk southwards till we reach a spot B , where the meridian zenith distance of the same star is one minute less, or one minute greater, as the case may be, than at A . We find, if we are near the pole, that the distance between A and B is greater than a mile; if we are near the equator, that it is less than a mile. The earth is not an exact sphere, and a line on its surface running direct from pole to pole is not an exact circle. We could roughly represent

* If S lies to the right of BD or the left of AC , we must read the difference between the number of degrees in CAS \blacksquare the number of degrees in DBS .

* Meridian, mid day, because the sun is due south at twelve o'clock.
+ Or by their difference, if S lies to the right of BD or the left of AC .

the shape of this line by supposing it is to be made of a number of little pieces of different circles joined together. The circles of which each piece formed a part would all have radii of different lengths and different centres, and the radii of the different circles would grow shorter as we passed from either pole to the equator. In Fig. 4 the radii of the circles which form the little bits of the surface at A, B, P would be CA, CB, CP , AG, BH , and PK , A, B, G, H and K being their centres, and all the centres would be on the dotted curve $BGHK$. More careful calculation proves that the line from pole to pole approaches still more closely in shape to the half of an oval-shaped curve called an ellipse, whose shape is shown in Fig. 4 by $PBAHQ$. If C is the centre P one pole Q a point on the equator, CP is called the polar radius or axis, and its length is 3949 miles, CE is the equatorial radius and its length is 3962 miles. The poles are therefore 13 miles nearer than the equator to the earth's centre.

So much for the shape of a line running over the earth's surface direct from pole to pole. The next point is to determine the shape of a line, like the equator running all round the earth from east to west. By methods very similar to that already described it is found that these lines are exact circles. If the earth were sawed in two, the saw being held parallel to the equator, it would not matter where the cut was made, it would always be a circle.

Thus being so, we can form a surface such as that of the earth by taking half-ellipses EAQ and turning round its shortest diameter PQ , for every line running from pole to pole will be an ellipse, and, since all points such as B, A, L describe circles, lines running round it from east to west will be circles. Such a surface is called in Geometry an Oblate Spheroid of Revolution, the word 'oblate' denoting that it is flattened at the poles.

It must be mentioned that the latest calculations seem to point to the conclusion that the equator is not a perfect circle but is itself an ellipse. There is, however, very much uncertainty at present on this point, and even if the result should turn out to be correct the equator differs very little indeed from a circle, for its longest diameter would be only about one third of a mile longer than the shortest diameter, and one third of a mile in 4000 miles does not amount to much.

One more point must be noticed and we have done. The earth we have been speaking of differs in one respect from the actual earth on which we live. It is an earth in which every valley and all the deep basins in which the oceans lie have been exalted and every mountain and hill has been laid low. But the difference between this ideal earth and the earth as it is, is far less than would first appear. The surface of the solid part would be some mile and three quarters below the present sea level, and it would be covered by an ocean of a uniform depth of about a mile, the differences in shape then between the actual and ideal earth are altogether insignificant when compared with the radius of 4000 miles.

On paper all this looks at least I hope I have succeeded in making look very simple, but it is quite otherwise in practice. A part only a very small part, of the difficulties which present themselves at the very outset in measuring a base line has been hinted at. The whole process is thickly beset with difficulties of a similar character, difficulties arising from the imperfect construction of instruments, from the habitual practice which instruments have of getting out of adjustment, from the mistakes which all observers are liable to make, and a host of such like sources, and this necessitates an elaborate system of checks and the employment of the most tedious mathematical calculations so as to eliminate as far as possible every error. The marvellous accuracy which is attained at last is proved both by the close agreement which obtains between the results of independent calculations, and also by the fact that other methods totally different from that described here lead to almost exactly the same conclusion as to the shape of the earth.

* The reader must carefully bear in mind that the difference between the equatorial and polar radii is very small, as indicated in the figure. If the curve had been drawn on the true proportions it could not have been distinguished by the eye from a circle.

REST

By MINNIE AMES

LOVE came floating o'er the waters of life's calm untroubled sea, Flashing in the morning sunlight, "Rise, He said, "and follow me
' Lord I cried, 'the flowers thou gavest, they are claiming all my care.
I owe, I cannot rise and leave them, never flowers were half so fair '

Then the decoy freshness vanished, and the fierce un pitying heat
Smote upon my tender blossoms, laid them dying on my feet
I owe came near me, in the shadows of the evening cold and grey,
' Let the dead their own dead bury Rise, He said, "and come away

' Lord I cried, "yet still there lingers the rich perfume of their breath
I thought my flowers were fur in living, they are sweeter still in death '
And the evening shadows deepened to the blackness of the night,
And, the darkness gently piercing, came a ray of Love's own light

"Lord," I cried, "oh, take my blossoms, take my weariness and pain, Take my loneliness and longing, only give me peace again
Then He drew me—oh, how gently—to the shelter of His breast "Child," He said, "I take thy sorrow, thou shalt have thy part of rest."

Still, I have it, passing onward through a scene, each step more fur
All my joy in Him is springing, all my gladness He doth share
And though gently, days unfolding sometimes pain and sorrow bring Yet the Hand, that gives them to me, first doth rob them of their sting.

THE ISLE OF SPICY BREEZES

By HENRY W. LUCY

WE sighted Ceylon early in the morning, and throughout a summer day with the sea like glass and the sky supphur, we skirted the island, passing poor Point de Galle now shorn of its glory and making for Colombo, which within the past two years has inherited the advantage and distinction of being the port of call for the Pacific steamers. Passenger familiar with Bishop Heber's hymn went smiling about in search of the 'spicy breezes that blow soft over Ceylon's isle' and were evidently disappointed at not realizing the dream of early infancy. But the bishop knew what he was writing about, and the spicy breezes are due to no effort of the imagination or exigency of rhyme. Captain Atkinson, of the Porpoise, tells me he has sniffed the spicy breezes when steaming fifty miles off the island. It all depends upon the state of the weather in Ceylon and the direction of the wind.

Point de Galle was abandoned as a port of call because it lies exposed to the ocean, and with the south west monsoon is too lively a place for vessels lying at anchor, still less for those taking in cargo. There is a break water at Colombo which, though it seems to be low windows for or less and affords a safe and convenient anchorage to the largest steamers. We landed in the early morning, Adam's Peak forty miles off shining in a car outline against the golden sky, through which the sun was rising.

We crossed the harbour in a catamaran, a kind of gondola of which the Cingalese have obtained the monopoly, and are likely to keep it. The craft consists, to begin with, of the log of a tree roughly hollowed out. On this is built a structure of pole and canvas, which is in no part broader than two feet, and tapers to the ends, which are on the average 20 feet apart. It is clear that a boat on this plan would not float, a difficulty triumphantly overcome by attaching to it, by two arched poles 20 or 25 feet long, a heavy spar, which floats on the water. This balances the catamaran and makes it seaworthy in moderately fine weather. Should the catamaran be caught ■ a stiff breeze, the proceedings of the captain and crew are simple and efficacious. ■ it ■ what they call a "two-piecey-man breeze," two men climb over the arched poles and, descending on to the spar, sit there, regardless of the raging sea. If it is a "three-piecey-man breeze," the requirements of the occasion are uncomplainingly met. In a big catamaran, with large sail hoisted, scudding before the monsoon, as many as nine men have been counted holding on to the spar, apparently half the time under water.

Our boatmen, favoured by quiet weather, sat one in the bow and the other in the stern, and rapidly paddled us ashore. They were fine-looking fellows, with a full measure of the national love of jewellery and gay clothes. Both had massive ear rings, apparently of gold, and one wore a silver bracelet on his wrist.

All the people in Ceylon, from babes just "feeling their feet" ■ old men and women, their steps tottering on the brink of the grave, wear gold and silver ornaments. They even invent new places for carrying them, and it is no uncommon thing ■ to see a Cingalese belle with the top of her ears covered with gold plate or wire, a large pair of rings pendant from the lobes of the ear, a gold or silver circlet round her hair, her nose adorned with rings, bracelets on her wrists, rings on her fingers, and silver plates on her toes. This is the perfection of adornment, but in one or other of the fashions, or in several of them, the Cingalese woman, of whatever station in life, is set forth. I saw running out of a house a sturdy little boy two years of age who had nothing on but a silver key fastened round his waist by a girdle of silver wire. The men take their pleasure less expensively. They delight in gold ear rings and rings, but beyond this are content to entrust the recommendation of their personal appearance ■ a fine tortoise-shell comb of circular shape, set on the crown of their heads, with the ends towards the forehead. The men evidently pride themselves on their hair, which is generally drawn back from their forehead and tied in a neat knot at the back. As they wear earrings, and not always whiskers or moustache, it ■ not easy at first sight to distinguish man from woman.

The funereal gharry does not make its appearance at Colombo, the public being served by a conveyance something like a dog-cart on four wheels, with an awning, indispensable protection against the tropical sun. They are very cheap. I had one for three hours, for which I was charged two rupees, a little over three shillings, and was overwhelmed with thanks for a trifling and evidently unexpected four hours. The horses are poor creatures, the real draught animal of Ceylon being a plump and well shaped little bullock. These are yoked singly or in pairs ■ light waggons roofed with dried palm leaves, and can upon occasion get up quite a respectable trot. They are artistically branded, characters being stamped all over their sides. It is pretty to see a crawler—a light, palm thatched waggon, drawn by a pictorial bullock, driven by a man in a red turban and white robes—hailed by a native, who gets in behind, sits on the floor, with his feet dangling down, and is trotted off.

Bishop Heber's well-known description of Ceylon as a place—

"Where every prospect pleases,
And only man is vile,"

is open to criticism on both assertions. There is much in Colombo which does not please, the town for the most part being squalid, dirty, and ill kept, the streets flanked by hovels, comparison with which is to be found only in the south-west of Ireland. On the other hand, both men and women, particularly the latter, are strikingly handsome. It is not only their flashing black eyes, their well-shaped faces, or their graceful drapery that please the eye. They have the rarer gift of graceful carriage. A Ceylon girl walks like a young empress, if empresses are particularly good walkers. I use the simile in despair, since I do not know anything in common Western life that equals or approaches the manner of the commonest Ceylon woman in moving about the streets. It is the custom in the island to engage women as street-sweepers, and in the matter of what Mr. Turveydrop called deportment, ■ is a liberal education to watch one of them swaying the long, flexible brush of bamboo twigs.

Both men and women chew the betel-nut, which incidentally serves the purpose attained by other means by young girls in Japan, giving a red tint to their lips, an effect in some cases by no means unbecoming. In the country districts the men wear nothing but a pair of earrings and a narrow loin cloth. Taken in conjunction with the tall palms, leafless for 20 or 30 feet, and then breaking out into a tuft of green leaves, they realise, with gratifying fidelity, the picture on the cover of the Juvenile Missionary Magazine. In towns, and near them, men dress generally in a single robe, thrown about them with infinite grace. One colour frequently recurring in the gay procession was a dead gold, which, set against the tawny flesh and the straight, lithe figure, was a constant refreshment to the eye.

The first thing people do on arriving at Colombo is to take the train for Kandy, for which slight Colombo may find consolation in the reflection that if Kandy were the point of arrival visitors would rush off to the railway-station to catch the earliest train for Colombo. There is nothing particular to see at Kandy, certainly nothing more than at Colombo, unless it be the Botanical Gardens. But the journey through the country is well worth taking, and affords a convenient opportunity of seeing the island. This is not marred by any undue rapidity on the part of the train, which takes four hours and a quarter to do the seventy-two miles. It should be added that the gradient is for half the way very steep, clambering the hills, and presenting a splendid view of the country. I suppose Ceylon is given all the year round. Certainly nothing could surpass its verdure in mid-December. At Kandy rain falls on about two hundred days in the year, the annual rainfall being 85 inches. This is a bountiful supply; but the peculiar good fortune of Ceylon is that it is pretty equally divided throughout the year. Unlike India, the island knows no alternations of wet or dry seasons, with the earth green for so many months and bare brown for so many more. In October and November the north-east monsoon is blowing, and in June, when the south-west monsoon is taking its turn, the rains are heaviest. The dry season, such as it is, happens in February and March. But even then the earth is at no distant intervals refreshed with genial showers.

Ceylon, like some other members of the colonial family, has seen better days. For some years past its coffee crop has been unremunerative, and it is said many of the plantations are heavily mortgaged. This year the hearts of the planters are cheered by brighter results. There is more coffee, but prices are low, and on the whole planters are inclined with increased assiduity to extend the growth of the cinchona. This tree, from whose bark quinine is made, was only a few years ago introduced into the island, and great things are looked for from it. Tea is still steadily grown, and holds its high place in the market. Rice is another product, of which there are abundant signs on the journey from Colombo to Kandy. The hillsides for miles, far as the eye can reach, are carved out in terraces, on whose level the rice is sown. The water running down from the upper hills is dexterously trapped, and abundantly supplies each step of the terrace, an immense boon to the planter.

As the train slowly mounts the steep ascent, on the level height of which stands the capital of the old Kandian kings, the view grows in beauty, sometimes closely veiling on grandeur. Below, a green dip in the circle of hills, is the green valley, with the water on the rice fields glistening in the sun. Beyond is a range of hills, ever varying in shape as the train creeps higher, and all the way, sometimes within reach of hand, is a tropical wood, rich with cocoanut and banana trees, glowing with the blood-red hibiscus, fair with countless wild flowers, and cool with fern-clad rocks, down which muskally tickles the bountiful water.

Kandy is a pretty town, with its white roads, its green foliage, its flowers, its lake, and its sentinel guard of mountains. In the native quarter, though the streets are broader, the houses and shops are not much better than in Colombo. Anything in the shape of four walls and a roof will do for the Cingalese to live in. The look of the streets is further damaged by the widely spread appearance of shut-up tenements. When the Cingalese family goes forth to their daily work they put up a shutter in the place where the door ought to be, and all that is needful is done. There being no windows to the houses, a row, when thus shut up, looks like an agglomeration of deserted sheds.

The artisans of Kandy turn out some simple brass-work and a curious kind of pottery. These are soon examined, and Kandy, from a tourist's point of view, lives chiefly on the beauty of its Botanic Gardens. These are situated in the suburb called Peradeniya, and are reached by a drive of nearly four miles along the high road to Colombo. We drove out early in the morning, long before the sun was in full blaze. We met a long stream of men and women hurrying into town carrying baskets of vegetables and fruit and bundles of packets. The principal industry on the long stretch of road appears to be the barbers'. There was a barber's shop at every few hundred yards, a low shed, in which a man was squatted on the floor beside the implements of his art awaiting custom—sometimes, with better luck, actually engaged on a job. The process is a little peculiar. Artist and subject squat on the ground face to face and knee to knee, the artist pulling the subject's head about as his convenience may require. As frequently as not the Cingalese does not squat on the ground, but, stooping down, hangs his weight on his knees with only his feet on the ground. I saw two acquaintances meet on the high-road. After an interchange of salutation they both sank down in this position, and, putting up their umbrellas, prepared for a morning's gossip.

Kandy being the principal object of attraction for the British and American tourist, has suffered the consequent demoralisation of the floating inhabitants. Boys and men hang about the door of the hotel in search of any odd job that shall look like work and bring in annas. Another art, brought to curiously high perfection, is that of mutually helping each other to prey upon the foreigner. Being told that a small boy hanging about the hotel was a useful guide, well up in botany and arboriculture, I engaged him for the day, and at once discovered that he was utterly useless.

"What's that?" I asked him, pointing to a curious white flower.

"A kind of flower," he replied with perfect confidence, and bumbling over with self-satisfaction at coming out successfully from an early test.

"What's that?" I asked a little later, indicating an unfamiliar member of the palm family.

"A kind of tree," he promptly answered.

One of his minor triumphs was to point out what he called "a banyan tree," meaning a banyan, and once, when we heard a familiar whistle and saw, he, with a wave of his hand towards the passing object, said, "A train." All of which made us glad we had taken a guide.

He accompanied us to Lady Horton's Walk, and had not gone many paces when we were joined by another youth, whom our guide genially introduced, and who accompanied us on the walk, confirming the younger one as to this being "a kind of flower" and that "a kind of tree." When we got back to the hotel our budding courier said, with a patronising wave of the hand, "You give him something?" I said I would do so with great pleasure, and consulted him as to the precise amount, explaining that I had meant to present him with a rupee for himself, and expressing my appreciation of his generosity in desiring to share it with his companion. Hereupon the youth's advocacy of his friend's claim abruptly cooled, and I heard nothing more on the subject. Something better still happened on driving to the station. The coachman drove off without waiting for his fare. Presently, when we were seated in the carriage, he sent a friend for his fare, and the friend asked for something for himself for conveying the money!

The Botanic Gardens cover nearly a hundred and fifty acres of land, and stand fifteen hundred feet above the sea. The climate is admirably suited for garden cultivation, being hot, moist, and very equable. I learn from Dr. Trimen, the director, that the mean annual temperature is about 77°, April and May being the hottest and December the coldest months. The gardens were established sixty years ago, being partly formed out of a royal park attached to the palace of the kings of Kandy. They are beautifully situated, lying within a loop of the river, musically named Mahaveli, which surrounds them on all sides, except the south, where they are bounded by the high land. We took our guide with us, but the little impostor was stopped at the gate, as he knew, he would be thus done on the principle of division of plunder. The attendants within the gardens have the perquisite of showing strangers round, and brook no rival near the throne. It is a nuisance, greatly marring the pleasure of strolling through the gardens, for one cannot take a turn without being accosted by one of these men wanting to sell a handbook, to "show the scenery," or presenting a flower or specimen of fruit, with a too obvious eye for annas.

The gardens are, however, quite good enough to compensate for petty annoyances of this kind. Whilst rare specimens of tree and plant are lovingly cultivated, the original beauty of the ground, its undulating sweep, and in some spots its virgin jungle, are left undisturbed. Always there is the flowing river, with the view brought here and there of the vineyard bridge that crosses it like a network of gossamer. Following the various walks there are found nearly all the choice trees of the tropics. Within view of the gateway is a magnificent group of palms, planted more than forty years ago, containing within its area all the native "peckers" and many specimens of foreign kinds. Here is the talipot, the aloë of palms, which flowers but once and then dies. Continuing the round of the gardens we come upon the palm of Central America, from the leaves of which the Panama hat is made. Here is the upas tree of Java with considerably more than three branches, and none of them cut down. Here is a magnificent clump of bamboo, spreading outward at the top like a bouquet. If any one cares to sit out a long summer day they may see these grow at the rate of a foot in twenty four hours—half an inch per hour.

On the left of the pathway are three mighty trunks, dead to themselves, but living outside with what looks, at a short distance, like masses of ivy, but is a flowering creeper, gemmed with a pale violet blossom. Here is the indiarubber-tree and importations from Perak which yield gutta-percha. Here, their branches almost intermingling, are the Himalayan cypress, the pencil-cedar of Bermuda, the Norfolk Island pine, and the champak of India, sacred in the eyes of the faithful. Here is the coco de mer, the Columbus of tree fruit, which, found floating on the India Ocean or washed up on the shores of Ceylon, was for two centuries a mystery to man, till its home was found among the least known islands of the Seychelles group. The growth of the tree is as slow as its offspring is adventurous, putting forth a single leaf a year, and so taking something like an eternity to reach its normal height of a hundred feet. Here is the candle-tree of Central America, with its fruit hanging down like tallow dips ten to the pound

Here is a banyan-tree, whose branches cast a shadow two hundred feet in diameter. Here is the Ceylon ironwood tree, beautiful in life with its sweet-scented flowers, its leaves, born blood-red growing into green above and white below, and in its death useful for household purposes. Here is a tree local to Ceylon, whose leaves serve with cabinet-makers the purposes of sand paper, and here—the glory of the gardens—is a long avenue of palms, whose stems run up, round and smooth as if turned by a lathe, and are suddenly crowned at the top with a coronet of fan like leaves.

Everywhere there are flowers and sweet scent, and here and there, up trees of dark green foliage, one comes upon boys beating with sticks at branches, from which fall fruit, the colour of peaches, and something similar in size and shape. As they fall they split, disclosing the dark brown nutmeg bound in the scarlet meshes of the mace. Many of these plants and trees are to be seen carefully nourished under glass at Kew, but they look infinitely better at home in the clear atmosphere and under the sunny skies of the tropics.

THE "STATE SOCIALISTS"

THIS title is somewhat misleading, for those to whom it is applied, and who cheerfully accept the appellation, are so far from being Socialists, in the ordinary sense of the word, that the name Defenders of Society on Church and State Principles would convey a more correct idea of their aims and purposes to English readers. Properly speaking they are Conservatives would be saviours of society, who see no other means of escape from the present social dilemma, but in a firm alliance between Crown and Altar for the purpose of regenerating society. Huber, described in a former paper (GOOD WORDS, December, 1882), the Privy Councillor Wagener, and Rudolf Meyer, the well-known historian of the "fourth estate" (by which he means the working classes), had formed at one time the triumvirate of religious Conservatives, who thus tried to "save the Republic." The Court chaplain Stocker and Pastor Todt may be regarded as the clerical representatives of the same party.

In 1878 Wagener published a pamphlet, not under his own name, on the solution of the social question "from the practical standpoint of an experienced statesman." It contains the fundamental doctrines of the party, and a few extracts from it will be all the more instructing from the fact that the writer is, or was, a persona grata with the German Chancellor.

Modern Socialism, according to Wagener, is the third act of "that great European tragedy of fate," the French revolution. The leading idea of that revolutionary movement all along has been to extend the possession of liberty and property. Nothing can avert the coming catastrophe but timely reforms like those in England, where social politics in favour of the working classes have prevented the latter from regarding society and the State as their natural enemies. The monarchy of the future to be strong must be rooted in the heart of the people. Such was the policy of great Prussian rulers like Frederick II. and statesmen like Stein. A strong "social kingdom" alone can save society; for a powerful government can afford holding itself aloof from petty interests, and thus becomes the natural protector of the weak and poor. Royalty in France fell because of its alliance with the doomed nobility. Modern Royalism, leaning for its support on cotton lords and speculating baronets, will fare no better, for its fate is linked to an industrial aristocracy, the fall of which, too, is certain.

At present, indeed, socialistic schemes appear in the form of nebular theories, where the obscurity often serves the purpose of veiling deep designs for the "liquidation of society." What is wanted is a department of labour, appointed as part of a powerful administration. Such a department of government would treat the social question as urgent, and prepare an independent programme to deal with it thoroughly and energetically. It would collect trustworthy and impartial inquiries into the natural capacities and requirements of the labour power of the country, and bring about a proper adjustment in the relationship between capital and labour.

The meantime its province would be to insure the protection of health and security against accidents for the employed, the limitation of Sunday labour and the employment of women and children in factories, the appointment of factory inspectors, the fixing of a normal day of labour, the establishment of conciliation courts, and the resurrection and modern adaptation of the ancient guild system. As only the State has the power for effecting such sweeping changes, those who would promote them are properly called State Socialists.

This form of State Socialism, or, as it is sometimes called, "Royal Socialism," was, at the time, not only approved of in highest quarters, but also acted upon, and in this lies the chief interest of the movement.

Side by side with this "Royal Socialism," or Socialistic Caesarism, we have a kind of Christian Socialist Clericalism, which finds its expression in the speeches and pamphlets of the Court chaplain Stocker, and in the more solid works of Pastor Todt. The history of this clerical section of the Conservative Socialist party, which was soon divided into two streams, one of which has been lost since in the sand, is rather interesting, and the information here given is taken entirely from original documents obtained by the present writer from the parties concerned. It materially helps us to follow up the history of Christian Socialism to the present day. Of Todt's principal work we shall speak later on. Here it is sufficient to remark that, owing to its appearance at a time when the Socialist craze in Germany was at its height, it naturally found in many readers among religious people. The author was appealed to by his sympathisers to found a society to carry his theory into practice. He accepted the invitation and addressed himself to Stocker, whom he had previously known, and who at that time was staying with the Emperor at Gastein, as Court chaplain. Stocker expressed his willingness to join and even to feel his way with the Court, but this was not easy. An association was formed and soon gained adherents in "Christian circles." It called itself the "Central Union for Social Reform on a Religious Constitutional Monarchical basis." It sent forth an appeal to the clergy, reminding them that the hour had come for the Church to bestir itself to meet the social crisis with the spiritual weapons at its command, as an Evangelical body. Two fundamental principles are laid down in the programme, one indicating the duties of the State, the other those of the Church.

1. That thorough reforms have become necessary in order to inspire the enfranchised masses with confidence towards the Government.

2. That the solution of the social question is impossible without the co-operation of the moral and religious factors, and the Church's recognition of the just demands of the fourth estate (the working men).

The appeal met with a ready response, and for a time all went on smoothly. Soon, however, an incident occurred which had a damaging effect on the further development of the movement. A certain Grunenberg, who afterwards proved to be an impostor, but gave himself out as a converted social democrat, prevailed on Stocker to hold a public discussion in which he, Grunenberg, was to confront his former colleagues in open controversy. The meeting was convened, not without some misgivings on the part of the promoters, when Grunenberg's utter incapacity to meet the arguments of the social democrats turned it into a farce, though Stocker came to the rescue. Most, the opponent whom Grunenberg had thus ineffectually confronted, expressed his willingness to meet more competent antagonists, and other public meetings were arranged accordingly. The result of this was the collection of a small band of labourers round Stocker, and it was felt desirable with this nucleus to found a "Christian Social Labour Party," distinct from, but in full sympathy with, the original association. The latter continued to address itself to the ruling classes, the former to the labour population of Berlin. But Todt and his friends felt themselves much hampered in their efforts by the prejudice created against their body by the incident referred to, which brought the Christian Socialists generally into discredit. Stocker resigned accordingly in May, 1878, and notified his action publicly, and after that the two societies for a time existed side by side, practically represented by the same organ, the State Socialist.

The law against the Socialists had a discouraging effect on the efforts of Todt's party. His book was denounced by the Chancellor in the Diet. Stocker, indeed, was characterized on that occasion by the same authority as a "terrible" person. But we imagine the popularity of the Court chaplain has not permanently suffered in consequence. Even the Christian Social Labour party seems to have found favour in the eyes of the Great Chancellor and his Royal Master, for its deputation, headed by Stocker himself, has been graciously received on the occasion of the Emperor's birthday since.

The Christian Socialist, like many similar publications, has had ill fortune from the beginning. After a season of prolonged suffering from intellectual and financial depletion it expired in March, 1882, in the fifth year of its existence. The following are its dying words:

"The committee find it necessary to discontinue the State Socialist at the close of this quarter, as the further development of the Christian social movement requires other instruments for its propaganda."

It has been succeeded by the Christian Social Correspondence, the new organ of the party for "agitational purposes." At the same time a change has taken place in the external organization of the Christian social party. Its two branches have merged into one "Central Association for Christian Social Reform," with Stocker and Professor Adolf Wagner for its Presidents. At a late general meeting of this society Todt is reported to have said, that now Prince Bismarck had taken in hand the economic measures demanded by the society their work was nearly over.

Having given a rapid sketch of the history of the movement we may now proceed to give a short account of what may be called the two collateral branches, of the Christian social movement.

The object of Todt's volume is to state ■ an unprejudiced form the principles of Socialism generally, and German Socialism in particular, ■ compare the principles of the social democratic party with those of the New Testament, and after stating the social principles contained in the latter, to gather from them the respective duties of society, the State, and the Church, in the settlement of the social question. Socialism, he says, is the "Effort to reconcile, by the establishment of a new social and economic order of things, the keenly felt contradiction between the actual condition of society, and the social ideal as conceived by certain sections of the community."

He partly admits that, from the Christian standpoint, the existence of this contradiction must be acknowledged, so that "every active Christian, sincere in his belief, must have ■ vein of socialism in him, whilst every socialist, however ill disposed towards positive Christianity and the Church, bears about him unconsciously something of the principles of Christianity."

The practical objects of modern Socialism are reduced under three heads by Todt — Republicanism, as affecting the State, Communism, as affecting social economy, and Atheism, as touching religion.

We may pass over the first and last, the former being a subject unsuitable for these pages, the latter being naturally excluded from consideration in a paper on Christian Socialism.

The communistic idea, says Todt, which underlies all socialistic schemes, takes for granted that much evil exists in our present social arrangements, that its root is selfishness, and its remedy the opposite of selfishness, i.e. solidarity of human interests. This statement, he remarks, is quite consistent with gospel teaching. In fact the social constitution of the early Christian Church rested on such a common basis, although the communism of the primitive Christians was only partial and purely voluntary, the result of individual enthusiasm ■ opposed to the retention of individual rights of property. The expansion of the communistic idea implies two leading principles and their consequences — 1. The triad liberty, equality, and fraternity. 2. The transformation of private ownership in land and the instruments of production into collective property. From these follow — 3. The demand for associative, or co-operative production, which would have for its result — 4. The abolition of the wages system in favour of a more complete enjoyment of the results of labour by the labourer, and with it — 5. The removal of the evils complained of, and the consummation of human happiness.

Todt, like Charles Kingsley and others, has no difficulty in showing that liberty, equality, and fraternity, are ideas not only reconcilable with, but the outcome of, the Christian idea, though, as he shows, not always practically realised in Christian society. He also shows that the institution of private property in some of its abuses was objected to often enough in the mediæval Church and by some of the early reformers, and adds that it originates in heathen egotism and finds its sanctions in Roman rather than Germanic Christianity.

But the compulsory abolition of the one system in favour of the other finds no encouragement whatever in the pages of the New Testament. If an "associative community with collective property, and on co-operative principles, is possible at all it must be one where the Christian principle of self-denial is paramount, not otherwise. But this must be voluntary.

Still, he maintains, something has to be done in the meantime by way of protecting the weak, and it is the duty of the State to watch over the welfare of those classes who cannot improve and develop unaided. The Church more especially must be on the alert. Passive inaction, timid and silence, and want of tactical skill in dealing with the social question he complains have been the characteristic faults of Evangelical Churchmen. Hence the electoral successes of Socialists in Protestant districts. Henceforth by direct and indirect efforts in improving the condition of the working classes, by insisting on the duties of the rich to regard property as a committed trust, and opposing the condescending tendencies of an ungaily and self-indulgent Mammomonism in both, the Church must help in repairing social disorders. Hence the importance of an effective propaganda for the diffusion of Christian social ideas.

Agitation in the ranks of clerical officialism is not a common phenomenon. But the Christian social party of Germany has produced an agitator of this description in the person of the Court chaplain Stocker.

Stocker has many enemies and also many warm friends and admirers, and it is natural that he should be overmuch praised by the one, or blamed too severely by the other. He is called the "Laird of social politics" by the former, and the "Paul of the German people" by the latter, but a well-known writer on social subjects who has full personal knowledge of the man, and whose official position is a security for his unbiassed judgment, assures us that Stocker is deserving of high esteem, and would be far more useful and effective as a social reformer if he was not a Protestant clergyman, for it is one of the misfortunes of Germany that her Protestant clergy have scarcely any social influence. There is no doubt, however, on this point, that Stocker has the right qualifications for a public orator. His inflammatory speeches are listened to with enthusiasm by his own party, and his pamphlets, short, pithy, and direct, command general attention. With a demagogic readiness Stocker popularizes the social politics and humanitarian theories of Wagener and Todt, without adding any thing materially of his own. Latterly he has gained upon the Berlin public by his anti-Semitic agitation, whilst his fulminations against the Bourgeoisie and the Liberal press gain for him the sympathies of the Conservative party, by whose influence he obtained a place in the House of Representatives. The Christian social party under his leadership count now seven thousand members, most of whom reside in Berlin. We have read and heard a very large number of Stocker's speeches with a view to get a clearer idea of his civil views, but can not help being disappointed with the absence of clear and defined statements. Stocker never gets beyond vague generalities and rhetorical phrases, up to patriotism, bursts of religious enthusiasm, and demands for social reforms introduced by State authority, without troubling himself much as to the manner in which they can be practically accomplished.

Instead therefore, of giving a detailed account of Stocker's opinions, we prefer passing on to the last of the Christian Socialists to be mentioned, the friend and latterly the fellow-worker of Stocker, Adolf Wagner the late Professor of Political Economy in the University of Berlin. Wagner is what few of the Christian Socialists whom we have been considering claim to be, a recognized master in the science of Political Economy. As a young man of twenty-three, he had already sufficiently distinguished himself to receive a call as Professor of Political Economy in the newly founded Academy of Commerce in Vienna. The celebrated Roscher reckons him among the best experts of Germany in matters of finance and banking, and his published works, as well as his previous successes as a teacher in several German universities, have gained for him a well-earned fame. Moreover, Wagner is a politician of note, and his eloquence and learning have all along vigorously supported the several attempts of Prince Bismarck to introduce economic measures, such as the reform of taxation, the tobacco monopoly, and general compulsory insurance for the good of the working classes. It is not Wagner's fault if they have failed in consequence of party manoeuvres and other causes which we need not dwell upon here. In Wagner's suggestions for social reform we have something more than humanitarian aspirations and vague statements. We have the recondite utterances of the economist, and with him Christian Socialism enters into what may be termed the scientific stage and comes within the range of practical social politics.

In a speech published ten years ago before a mixed assembly of churchmen in the Royal Garrison Church of Dublin, Wagner formulated forcibly and fearlessly his opinions on this subject. Endorsing some of the socialistic criticisms on the evils of competition, and giving a partial and guarded support to some of the demands for State help he concludes by saying that the true remedy for the present social discontent lies in voluntary concessions on the part of the privileged classes rather than in changes enforced by authority. On the other hand he is opposed to the system of laissez faire, laissez aller, and the extravagant notions of the Manchester school on this head. His criticism is mainly directed against the tendency of regarding the present state of things as necessary according to natural laws, instead of dwelling on the state of things as it ought to be according to a higher moral law. According to the ethical aspect of economic laws property is regarded in the light of a trust rather than an absolute possession, and self-indulgent luxury of the few at the expense of the many is a wrong done to society. Wagner condemns severely the irresponsible abuse of the rights of property in land when the unearned increment of value only ministers to private advantage. He notes the dangerous tendency of our times towards increasing the gulf between wealth and poverty, which intensifies class antagonisms. He laments the alarming accumulation of huge capital without corresponding benefit to those who are mainly instrumental in creating it. He shows how it becomes more and more difficult for the wage-earning classes to raise themselves, and how they of all sections of society draw the least advantage from progress in the technical arts.

There are three ways for ameliorating then condition he says the revolutionary, the radical and the reformatory methods. He rejects the former two in favour of the last. "Reform," he says "is neither subversive nor stagnant nor retrogressive," etc. in other words it is progressive without being revolutionary. He examines the various projects we have already mentioned for improving mankind and after showing their advantages and disadvantages comes to speak of his own specific proposal. Among them may be mentioned—

A. The establishment of independent productive associations not supported by the State, but enjoying legal protection. He would also extend the principle of co-operation to some branches of the public service as in experiment and example.

B. He points out the desirability of

(1) Raising the normal price of labour not by authority as is sometimes demanded by State Socialists but through the institution of labour boards and arbitration courts, fixing a fair day's work for a fair day's work.

(2) Compulsory insurance until as in the case of compulsory education the benefits of the system are appreciated by the masses of the population. As it would extend over all classes, the burden on the poor would be comparatively light.

(3) Factory law for sanitary protection of labourers and especially women and children.

(4) Reduction of the cost of articles of consumption by means of distributive stores.

(5) The intellectual, moral and religious elevation of the lower orders.

(6) The partial abolition of indirect taxation, the levying of progressive income tax and succession duties, and other similar legislative measures introduced voluntarily by the ruling classes to conciliate those below and thus by a cardinal system—a term first introduced into text books on Political Economy by Wagner—to secure social peace.

"The lesson taught by history throughout," he remarks justly enough, "is this, that by means of such timely reforms social revolutions may be averted. If by such sacrifices of the wealthy it is possible to ease the shoulders of the poor no time ought to be lost in making the attempt." "I am clear on this head," he concludes, "that I have not suggested what may be called a solution of the social question. Such a solution, in the proper sense of the word, is impossible. Poverty and wretchedness, need and penury, competency and affluence, these differences of fortune will always coexist side by side in the world independently of real merits and personal faults. But it is our duty ■ lessen the resulting evils and existing inequalities to the best of our power. This ■ possible to a very large extent. When we shall have accomplished this, then we shall have done what it was our bounden duty to perform. Thus much may be expected of us, neither less nor more."

With these words of truth and soberness of the latest, if not the last and certainly not the least of Christian Socialists, we may appropriately bring this paper to a close

M LAUFMANN

THE SALMON.

His Natural and Economic History

SECOND PAPER.

IN our first paper we spoke of the salmon as an object of natural history, we shall now say something about it as an article of commerce. Excluding parr and smolts, we may assume each salmon to weigh an average of 50 lbs and to be of the value of one pound sterling. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the salmon has been long a fish of great commercial importance. To be in possession of an acre or two of water on a good salmon river means a few hundreds a year. The average rental of the river Tay will probably this year amount to £25,000, a sum which represents the capture of a large number of fish. Most of the "commercial fisheries," that is, places where the salmon are taken by means of nets, are annually put up to auction, and one or two of the stations on the Tay are worth from one to three thousand pounds per annum. To provide a rental of £25,000 it ■ necessary to capture every year sixty five or seventy thousand fish in order to pay the cost of fishing, the sum agreed upon for rental, and the interest on the cost of fishing gear, as well as to admit of the lessees obtaining a profit for their own labours and intelligence. Salmon fishing is at all times a lottery. When the rental is being fixed it cannot be known whether the fish will be plentiful or scarce. If the supply ■ short the engagements of the lessee, even with very high prices, may not be met by the take of the season, if, on the other hand, the supply proves a plentiful one, the markets become glutted, the prices fall, and the profits of the lessees are diminished.

The chief mode of capturing salmon is by means of a net and coble. The net is piled on the stern, and as the little boat is rowed out the net falls into the water. The men work the boat out and in, in semicircular fashion. Sometimes a long tow rope is used, and the nets are hauled in by the fishermen, and their contents abstracted. The fish, being killed and weighed, are then packed and dispatched by the first train to their destination, which is chiefly, so far as Scottish salmon are concerned, the great market of Billingsgate. Salmon are caught ■ various other ways, there being still on some parts of the coasts what are called stake nets, and other fixed nets as well. Angling for salmon is also indulged in at every opportunity. In Scotland there are various arrangements made by which anglers, "for a consideration," can obtain leave to kill all they can. On Loch Tay, one of the most picturesque sheets of water to be found in Scotland, salmon fishing begins on the 5th of February, and continues till about the end of May. The hotel-keepers arrange the terms of fishing, the cost being considerable. The dues for a boat are at the rate of £5 a week, besides the wages of two boatmen.

The economy of a salmon river deserves attention. The stream forms but a highway for the fish from the sea to the breeding beds, and from the breeding beds to the sea. ■ in the smaller tributaries which feed the larger river that the fish find their procreant cradle, and it is sufficiently obvious that if there were no breeding-grounds there would be no salmon. It is not a little remarkable, however, that the men who afford to the salmon "redds" for their ova and a safe nursery for their young, seldom obtain any greater reward than the "honour of the thing." The men who own the commercial waters, which are much nearer the sea than the breeding-waters, get nearly all the fish. Let us take as an example the river Tay, which takes its rise in Loch Tay, which, again, is fed by the Dochart, a river which flows out of the loch of that name, under the shadow of the mighty Ben More. The Tay is fed by a countless number of tributaries, most of which are above the Bridge of Perth, but the more valuable commercial fishing stations are situated below the fair city, and thus it comes to pass that the men who may be said to contribute the fish to the river seldom or ever see them again after they have left their breeding beds. Even a fair share of the angling is in some seasons denied to them, for it occasionally occurs that the salmon cannot reach the headwaters of a fishing district till the annual close time has arrived.

On the river Tay there are, or, at any rate, there were two years ago, a hundred and thirty-two commercial fishing stations, employing about a hundred and eighty nets. These fisheries, it may be explained, are not all worked continuously, as several of them are in the hands of one "tackman," whilst others are useless to fish at one or two of them except on Monday morning, by which time the fish have worked their way pretty far up the river. Several hundred men—as many as seven hundred it has been calculated—find employment during the fishing season on the Tay, thirty persons being sometimes employed at one station. The wages must therefore amount to a considerable sum, although the fishing only lasts for, let us say, twenty-six weeks. If the wages paid be taken at the average of 12s a week, including "fish money," it will be seen that the total amount expended will be considerably over £10,000 for the period of the fishery. Fishing for salmon on the Tay, which we continue to take as an illustrative river, is throughout competitive, each fishing station, to use a homely phrase, being worked "on its own hook." If the fishing system were to be changed so that of co-operation the wages would not exceed a third of the amount now paid, because the capture of the salmon could be effected at three or four stations, and, speaking in the interests of the salmon lairds, no more fish need then be taken than would find at once a ready sale. A shilling telegram would indicate the state of the markets, and if these were overstocked, then the labours of capture might cease for a period. The river could be more intelligently fished than is the case at present, when each lessee secures every fish that he can find, in order to prevent its passing into the nets of his neighbours, and the incomes derived per annum for a period extending, say over twelve years, could be taken as a basis on which to award shares, the proprietors of angling water and those who afford the fish their procreant cradle could be liberally dealt with, whilst the questions of poaching and pollution could be still more effectually battled with.

Appropos of salmon poaching and salmon poachers, there are few who know the number of fish thus killed. It was calculated by Mr. Russel, author of "The Salmon," that on the Tweed alone, probably twenty thousand salmon fall a prey to the poachers during the close time. The most pitiful circumstance of salmon poaching lies in the fact, that the season selected by the poachers in which to engage in their unlawful occupation, is the very period during which these fish are of greatest value. A salmon is certainly never more valuable than when it is about to fulfil the grandest instinct of its nature, namely, the multiplication of its kind. Much sympathy is from time to time evinced for the poaching fraternity. The writer does not share in it, the poacher, as a rule, is a pitiful scoundrel who makes a "trade" of poaching. One could have a degree of sympathy for a man who captured a salmon or shot a hare for behoof of a hungry family; but none for the professional poacher, who sends the produce of his night's work to market. There are hereditary poachers all along Tweed side, men and boys, and even women, whose fathers, grandfathers and great-grandfathers were fond of "a fish." The writer can recollect a time when nearly every family within hail of the river had a kippered salmon or two in store for winter use. At one period, poaching was a pastime, and "burning the water" was the form in which it was usually indulged, the lairds themselves, if not taking a part in the play, winking at the sin on the part of their servants and tenants. Now poaching is a "profession," and, in our view, a loathsome one.

It is a somewhat remarkable fact in the economy of our salmon rivers, that the mortality which has resulted from the "salmon disease" has not in any way decreased the stock of saleable salmon. Although, in all likelihood, over a hundred thousand fish have fallen a prey to the epidemic of Saprolegnia Awar, yet the market supplies instead of having diminished have increased, the season 1883 having been the most fruitful we have experienced in the course of the last dozen years, whilst the present season, so far as it has gone, looks as if it would be nearly as fruitful. In the face of "the disease" the Tay rent roll has been considerably improved. It is just possible, however, as a large number of the salmon which had to be destroyed were spawning fish, that the takes of next year may be sensibly diminished, as the ova of the last four or five seasons will only then be arriving at the maturity of table fish. Were all the eggs deposited by the breeding salmon to hatch out, and all the fish to live and thrive, a score of twenty five pound fish would yield as many eggs as would suffice to stock the Tay, which it has been computed yields from fifty to eighty thousand salmon every year, and contains in its waters, according to the calculations of experts, something like a quarter of a million of fish, ranging in weight from five or six ounces to fifty pounds.

In England, the privileges of salmon fishers are more extensively recognised, the river as a rule being open to all comers who choose to provide themselves with the authority of a license to fish, either by means of nets or rods. But salmon in English rivers is a comparatively scarce fish, and although there are over a hundred and twenty streams south of the Border, which yield or should yield bountiful supplies of salmon, the total quantity makes really no great show, when compared with the yield of our Scottish rivers, not to speak of the supply which is contributed by the seas and waters of the Emerald Isle—estimated by the Irish fishery inspectors at over half a million sterling per annum. No official statistics of the salmon catch of the United Kingdom are taken, but judging so far as we can by the quantities of fish sent to market, the annual value of the salmon caught in the seas and rivers of this country cannot be less than one million sterling per annum.

JAMES G. BERTRAM.

MOHAMMEDAN MAHDIS.

By PROFESSOR W. ROBERTSON SMITH, LL.D.

SECOND PAPER.

WE have seen in the last paper how the belief in the Mahdi or Hidden Imam first sprang up among the Iranian Shia, in a form which is still part of Persian religion. We are now to look at the way in which the notion of the Mahdi influenced other parts of the Mohammedan world.

The Shiite doctrines, viewed as a whole, presented so many extravagances repulsive to any race that was out of sympathy with Persian thought, and the Shites themselves displayed so much fierce bigotry and national intolerance, that the partisans of Ali never had any real chance of bringing the whole Moslem world to their side. Their greatest victory was the overthrow of the Omeyyads in favour of the Abbassids, who, though not descendants of Ali, were of the near kin of the Prophet, and were supposed to have inherited by testament the sacred rights of the descendants of Mohammad ibn al Hanafiya. But when they came to the throne the Abbassids found it necessary to break with the Shia if they were not to lose their influence over the rest of Islam, and they soon became as bitter foes of the house of Ali as their predecessors had been.

Messianic doctrine of the Hidden Imam was well calculated to exercise a widespread influence. Towards the close of the ninth century, at the time when this doctrine had taken full shape, the internal disorders of the empire and the miseries of its subjects had reached a pitch which made men everywhere despair of existing institutions, and look with eagerness for the hope of a supernatural deliverer. The doctrine of the Mahdi, though Shiite in origin, might be easily put in a shape not too closely dependent on Shiite principles, and it was not very difficult to persuade men that the Prophet himself had foretold the coming of a righteous leader to bring in the Moslem millennium.

It is difficult, and often impossible, to trace the hidden channels by which such a belief as this spreads through Eastern countries. Oriental despotism leaves no room for public life and gives no freedom to public opinion, but it is powerless to suppress the secret propagation of revolutionary ideas. An Eastern revolution gives no sign till it is on the point of breaking out, but the total absence of visible movements of discontent is never a proof that society is not permeated in all directions by the emissaries of a secret propaganda and leavened with the most revolutionary ideas. A state of things in which all popular movements must be ripened under ground is extremely favourable to the operations of the subtle, plausible, persistent intriguers who are never lacking in Oriental countries. The wildest doctrines, the most visionary schemes find credence and support where they have never to stand the test of open discussion, but are passed on from man to man with all the attractive mystery of secret initiation, and can be recommended to each disciple by precisely that argument which is most likely to affect him. Above all, it is possible that in this underhand way a movement may acquire great and victorious force, without, so to speak, having anything whatever behind it. When the armies of Khorasan were sweeping the Omayyads before them, the Abbassids, in whose name they fought were living an obscure life in a remote corner of Syria. The victory was gained before they had once presented themselves to their soldiers, and those who fought for them did not, for the most part, know so much as the names of the men whom they were about to raise to the greatest throne in the world. All this was accomplished by secret emissaries, by a long continued propaganda, which had adroitly contrived to make Ibrahim the Imam and his family a centre round which all the religious and political fanaticism of the Persians could gather. If so much could be done in the name of an obscure house, which had no more than a most fanciful claim to the sympathies of the Shia, there was no reason why a sufficiently adroit and unscrupulous band of intriguers might not do as much in the name of a mere fiction, in the name of the Hidden Imam.

The first to conceive this bold idea was a Persian from Susiana, Abdallah al Kaddih, the son of Manun. Abdallah was a man of scholarly attainments, by profession an oculist, and at the same time an accomplished juggler—a useful power to an intriguer in the credulous East. He belonged to the Ismaili branch of the Shia, but at heart he was an absolute Nihilist, without faith in God or man, and knowing no other laws of action than hatred of Arab rule, and the principle that it was the privilege of the man of knowledge and insight to be cool and enslave the ignorant. The Ismailians in his time had no longer a visible head, but the doctrine of the Hidden Imam, which he defended with persuasive arguments, was precisely adapted to his deep-laid plans. But this was not enough for him to be head of a Shite party. His schemes demanded the formation of a great secret society, which should gradually undermine the whole empire, and prepare a general revolution and the overthrow of Islam. This society was organized in nine successive grades of initiation. Those who had only the lower grades were allowed to believe in the Mahdi or Hidden Imam, the hope of whose coming was the best lever to work on the common people. But apt disciples were gradually prepared to reject the Koran altogether, and finally they were led on, in a most cunningly devised progress, to esteem all religions alike and devote themselves consciously to the task of bringing the sovereignty of the world into the hands of the true philosophers, who could free themselves from adherence to those religious forms which, in every nation, had meaning and use only for the blinded crowd.

By this series of stages Abdallah was able to gather into his society men of all ranks and opinions. His best helpers were Zoroastrians, philosophical freethinkers, dualists, and others already hostile to Islam, but he could use emissaries of every stage, and when these died, as they were called, addressed themselves to the common people they were accustomed to wear an aspect of ascetic piety, and preached nothing more profound than the hope of a coming redeemer. Abdallah knew that his work could not be ripe in his own lifetime, but he left behind him on his death a son, Ahmed, who succeeded him as Grand Master of the order, and the work still went on. In Ahmed's days the society had its first great success. A day went to labour among the oppressed and despoiled peasantry of Babylonia converted a whole village, and what was of more consequence, found in one of the peasants a leader, Hamid-ul-Kirmat, whom he could trust with its deepest secrets, and whose capacity won the whole district to the cause. In due time Hamid himself became the great day of the region. He acquired unbounded influence, succeeded in gaining his followers, and at length proclaimed a communistic system, freedom from all the burdens of prayer and fasting, and the right of the peasantry to rise and plunder their masters. The secret society had developed into the organization of a formidable peasant war. The movement spread far beyond Babylonia; the Caliphs were powerless before it. For two centuries the dreaded Carmathians were the scourge of the East; they pillaged Mecca, and bore away the black stone, hoping thereby to give the Moslem faith its death blow, and throughout Syria, Irak, and Arabia nothing was able to stand before them.

But this was but one part of the success of the great plans of Abdallah ■ Kaddah. The missionaries, or dāys, were at work in the West as well as in the East, and one of them, who betook himself to the Berber tribe of Ketama, in the province of Constantine, and began by teaching their children to read, acquired an absolute influence over the simple race, then he declared himself a follower of Ali, and called them to battle in the name of his cause, promising them all the good things of time and eternity. The war was a successful one, the throne of the Aghlabite sovereigns of North Africa was overthrown, and the Grand Master of the Ismailian society, a descendant of Abdallah, was called to the head of the victorious movement, and proclaimed Caliph under the title of the Mahdi. To justify his dignity he concealed his real descent, and claimed ■ be sprung from Ali and his wife Fatuma, the daughter of the Prophet, and hence the dynasty which owed its origin ■ the far reaching schemes of the obscure oculist and juggler ■ known in history by the name of the Fatimite Caliphate. The first seat of empire was at Mahdiya, on the Tunisian coast. Sixty years later Egypt was conquered, and the capital removed to Cairo, where the power of the Fatimites was not wholly extinct till near the close of the twelfth century. In its highest prime the empire extended as far as the Euphrates, the Carmathians acknowledged the Fatimite Caliph, and paid him tribute, and in the year 1098 the Fatimite Mostansir was even for a moment proclaimed at Baghdad.

The rise of the Fatimite empire is the most singular example which history presents of the power of religious fanaticism directed by conscious and unblushing imposture. The Grand Masters of the Ismailians were deceivers, not enthusiasts, and when they had reached the throne they still played the same double part. In Mahdiya or in Cairo they appeared sincere though not orthodox Mohammedans, yet all the time they were secretly encouraging the communitic Carmathians in enterprises directed against the very existence of Islam. The surprising thing ■ that this career of profound duplicity was successfully carried on from generation to generation. The bubble never burst, but the religious empire of the Mahdi simply passed by degrees into an ordinary Oriental despotism, and fell by the usual process of decay which ultimately saps every Eastern dynasty. ■ may well be doubted whether the East is so much changed as to render it impossible—apart from European interference—for similar schemes to succeed even in our own day. Those who know Islam best are least disposed to set a limit ■ the possibilities of its slumbering forces, or to dogmatise as to the real character of movements of which we can observe only the most superficial aspects.

One generalisation, however, may safely be made on an observation of the whole course of the history of Islam. In the Mohammedan East every great popular movement is quite certain to present itself as a religious movement. The chaotic state of all society, and the total absence alike of popular national institutions and of fixed hereditary distinctions of rank, make religious organisation the only possible means of uniting large masses of men in the pursuit of a common aim. Individual tribes or local communities have their own local patriotism, but a wider union is impossible except on religious grounds, and can acquire political importance only by the aid of religious enthusiasm. The political ideas of Islam are all religious, and in their original form are thoroughly democratic. The actual government of the countries of Islam, on the contrary, has been almost from the first absolute despotism, and so the rallying cry against an oppressive despotism has always been that the existing government is a godless government, which has forsaken the laws of true religion. The revolutionary leaders must, therefore, present themselves as zealous for the true faith and the sacred law. They can acquire reputation with the people only by presenting themselves as pious men, with an insight into the divine ordinances, and they can provide a revolutionary organization only by making themselves the heads of a religious society. Such a society forms, in able hands, the best vehicle for a secret propaganda, and the most effective organization for a movement which can at any moment assume a directly political form.

This being so, it is not surprising that the belief in the coming Mahdi has supplied for many centuries what may be almost called the stereotyped form of popular rising among Mohammedan nations, and that the history of the Fatimite empire has been often repeated on a smaller scale. Every influential religious personage has temptations to play a political rôle, and every political adventurer who cannot hope ■ rise in the common path of court intrigue or military usurpation must necessarily clothe his ambition in the disguise of religion. The attempts of would-be prophets and Messiahs have little success against a strong central government, but to a weak

Oriental government they have always been a serious danger. And since the idea of the Mahdi has long ceased to be confined to the Shia, and has a great hold in all parts of the Moslem world, false Messiahs have risen throughout the length and breadth of Islam.

Nowhere, however, have religious revolutions been more frequent or formidable than in North Africa, whose fierce tribes are peculiarly susceptible to religious influences, and are always much under the control of holy men. The part which the holy sheikhs, morabiths or marabouts, played in the conflict of Algeria with France is known to every one; it is perhaps less well known that it is the same word, corrupted in another way in Spanish mouths, which gave its name to the great empire of the Almoravides, which held Morocco and Spain in the eleventh century of our era. But for our present purpose we must be content to look at only one of the religious revolutions of North Africa, and may choose the case of the origin of the empire of the Almohades, who succeeded the Almoravide dynasty, and furnished some of the greatest princes of Moslem Spain.

The Mahdi of the Almohades was a Berber of the tribe of Masmuda, in the mountains of Morocco, by name Mohammed ibn Tumert. In his youth he was noted for piety and a love for study. His piety was of the superstitious Berber type; no man lighted so many candles before the shrines; and as he grew up he was occupied with astrology and occult sciences, as well as with the study of theology. As a zealous student of the sacred law he not only visited Africa, but travelled into Spain, and ultimately as far as Baghdad. There he became acquainted with the doctrines of the great Mohammedan schoolman, Al-Ashari, the man who secured the victory of orthodoxy over the freethinkers by taking philosophy into the service of faith. The school of Ashari was more than a hundred years old when Ibn Tumert came to the East, but nothing was known of it in the conservative West. The young Berber received the new method of orthodoxy with avidity; he became an expert dialectician and a learned fakir or theological lawyer, and as he travelled slowly homewards to the far West he signalled himself wherever he stopped by denouncing breaches of the law, and enforcing a stricter morality. In the Moslem system there is not much difference between a teacher of ethics and a volunteer police magistrate; and a man who went about the streets without a commission from the Government, smashing wine-pots, breaking instruments of music, and challenging women who appeared with uncovered face, was no doubt very zealous in a good cause, but was extremely likely to get into trouble with the Gallios in authority. Ibn Tumert was always receiving orders to move on from town to town; even on shipboard, we are told, his moral lectures once grew so tiresome that the sailors flung him overboard. But his zeal acquired him reputation with the common people, and as he gradually approached his native place he began to be a man of mark with the populace, and in the eyes of the government a man not only troublesome but dangerous. None of the orthodox doctors was a match for him in disputation; he taught law gratuitously to all who sought guidance; he was distinguished by two sure marks of holiness—the meanness of his dress and ascetic habits, and the circle of his inner associates he affected supernatural knowledge and a possession of the secrets of the future. At length he reached Tlemcen, and here, although as yet he pretended to be no more than a pious doctor, he acquired so absolute a command over the minds of the people that no one dared to disobey him.

One night, as Abdo'l Wahid tells us, when he was holding his usual reception at a mosque outside the gate, he missed a regular visitor, and on inquiry was told that he was in prison. "Then," says the historian, "he arose straightway and asked one of those present to walk before him till he reached the gate of the city. Then he knocked loudly at the gate and demanded entrance, and the porter hastened to open it without parley, though if the prince of the town had asked entrance at such an hour he would have been refused. So he went on to the prison, and all the gaolers gathered round him, eager to touch and kiss his garment. And he cried, 'Ho, such an one,' and the prisoner answered him; then he cried, 'Come forth!' and the man came forth, while the gaolers stood looking on as if boiling water had been poured over them."

Equally bold was Ibn Tumert's conduct in Morocco itself, at the court of the Almoravide Ali ibn Jusuf, where he and his followers ventured openly to chide and almost to assault the sister of the prince for riding in the street with uncovered face. At first sight, one is tempted to admire this conduct and fancy that such holy courage is a proof of sincerity. In point of fact, however, Ibn Tumert knew very well what he was doing. His whole campaign in favour of righteousness was part of a deliberate scheme, and he had taken the measure of the weak and pious Almoravide prince. Ali could not bear the idea of using violence against a man who was so good a Moslem and whom no one could prove a heretic, and Ibn Tumert's courage, like a great deal of Oriental courage and religious devotion, was nothing more than successful insolence. Of course the time came. Last when the government was forced to interfere, but when the order for his arrest was sent forth, the agitator was already safe in the wild country of his own tribe and was ready to throw off the mask. Still, of course, keeping up all the signs of a holy ascetic and maintaining his influence alike by his legal teaching and by the exercise of occult arts, he began to wind out his manoeuvres in all quarters, to stir men's souls by legends of the coming Mahdi, and as soon as the Marinidum tribes were let loose by this teaching he proclaimed that he himself was the unseen Messiah, and made open war on the Almoravid dynasty. The contest was long and bloody, and the final victory did not fall to Ibn Tumert himself, but to his trusted lieutenant and successor, Abdal munim. The progress of the war need not be traced, it ended in seating Abdal munim on the throne of Spain as well as of Africa, but there are one or two points interesting to notice in their bearing on present events.

If ever once acquired a supernatural reputation, Ibn Tumert was able to keep his hold on the Berbers through the seven years of his life that followed his proclamation as Mahdi, and he did this in spite of many reversees and many acts of cruelty to his own followers. Half the things told of him by Ibn Athir are true, Ibn Tumert was as savage, unscrupulous, and treacherous a hypocrite as ever lived, and even if there be exaggeration in some of the stories, it remains quite certain that he was no enthusiast, but a cold-blooded impostor at the head of an army of dupes. Yet he not only gained the loyalty of the Berbers, but retained it to the last and transmitted it to his successor amidst the most trying difficulties. This is a fact which has many parallels in Eastern history, and it ought to make us cautious in assuming that a few reversees or a brief lapse of time is necessarily sufficient to make an Eastern imposture harmless.

There are depths of social misery, and they have not seldom been sounded by the unhappy populations of the East, in which the wildest and vaguest hopes are grasped at as the only alternative to despair. In such cases men are not disposed to look very closely at the credentials of any one who promises them divine help, and though an honest enthusiast might be sacrificed in the revolution of feeling after a defeat, a cunning intriguer can generally turn the suspiciousness and cruel temper which are engendered by long oppression away from himself and against such of his allies as began to doubt his mission. The role of an Eastern Messiah does not even demand any high political or military faculty. The motive force of the movement is not derived from the leader's personal character or ideas, but from the sense of oppression, swiftly changing to an eager enthusiasm of revenge, as soon as the suffering tribes have found a common centre to rally round.

The few periods of really good government, that is of benevolent and humane despotism, which the East has enjoyed, have been due not to the heads of religious rings but to captains trained in the discipline of a camp. To the historical observer an Eastern movement of religious purification is always suspicious. It is certain to be bloody and cruel, and it is very unlikely to contain any elements of lasting reform. Its strength is that of a destroying force, it can endure defeat and struggle against hope with the vehemence of despair, but success is fatal to it. For when it ceases to be fanatical it ceases to be strong. It represents no political principle, its force is the blind force of a downtrodden mass turning against its oppressors, and its leaders, if they are not ignorant fanatics, are—and this is the more likely case—cold-blooded and selfish dissemblers. It is hard to produce a movement of real political vitality out of notions which for at least a thousand years have had no political life, or to evolve a national constitution out of the elements of a secret society.

Certainly not every religious leader in the East has belonged to the class of which the Fatimite and Almohade Mahdis are typical examples. If space permitted one could draw a very different picture from a recent example as Bih, the martyr Mahdi of modern Persia, whose pure and gentle enthusiasm was tinged with no political ambition and no bloodthirsty fanaticism. But such a movement as Babism would not have been possible in most parts of Islam, and even in Persia it never had a chance of permanent success. The course of history has no evidence to offer in favour of the idea that the renovation of the Moslem nations can arise from any form of Mohammedan revival.

THE FALLOW FIELD

THE days were bright, and the year was young,
As the warm sun climbed the sky
And a thousand flowers their banners swung,
And the larks were singing high,

For an angel swept on silent wing
To the grave where the dead earth lay
And the luster was in the angel's wing,
Holloed the rugged stone away

Then the fields grew green with springing corn,
And some with flowers went bright
And each day came with an earlier dawn,
And a fuller, sweeter light

So the year grew older noon by noon,
Till the reapers came one day
And in the light of a harvest moon
They bore the sheaves away

But one field lay from the rest apart,
All silent, lone and dead
And the rude shroud ribbed its quivering heart
Till all its life had fled

And never a blade, and never a flower
On its silent ridges stirred
The sunshine culled, and the passing boy cried—
It answered never a word

It seemed as if some curse of ill
Were brooding in the air,
Yet the fallow field did the Master's will Though never a blade it bore

For it turned its furrowed face to heaven,
Catching the light and rain
It was keeping its Sabbath—one in seven—
That it might grow rich again

And the fallow field had its harvest moon,
Reaping a golden yield
And it learned in its ever brightening noon
That rest for God was good

Read Jonah 1:1, and St. Mark 1:2-15

THERE are two extremes into which religious teachers sometimes fall. One is the preaching of a religion of terror as a necessary means to peace. Such preachers imagine that the true method of bringing men to Christ, is first to rouse such a sense of danger as may frighten them into the acceptance of the Saviour. The appeal that is made is frequently to the most selfish instincts, and the kind of security which is offered is not less frequently an essentially selfish sense of safety. The other extreme is that which is expressed by the prophet when he describes those who "preach peace, peace, where there is no peace." Instead of representing the love of God as being so holy that He insists on men being right in order to be blessed, there is set forth a kind of love which is so colourless that it ought to be called good natured rather than true.

The truth is to be found in neither extreme. Terror, like bodily pain, has its undoubted uses, for it indicates something wrong in our moral or spiritual condition. It draws attention to a danger which might otherwise escape detection. And as there are only two conditions—the state of health and that of death—when the body is free from the sense of discomfort, so it is only the spiritually healthy or the spiritually dead soul which is without the element of moral pain that so frequently takes the shape of fear. On the other hand, we cannot declare too fully the love of God, but we must ever remember that "this is the love of God, that we should keep His commandments." His love can be satisfied with nothing less than spiritual health. He is at one with eternal righteousness. And it is thus that Christ constantly insists upon repentance as essential to life. It was with the cry "Repent" that John the Baptist prepared the way for Him, and the call to repentance was the first message which He commissioned His disciples to deliver. That call assumed that there was something wrong in the society and in the individuals that were addressed. It was an exhortation to a change of mind, to new thoughts, motives, and aspirations. It also assumed that men were responsible for that change. They were commanded to pass from the one condition to the other, from wrong to right, from being lost to being saved, from death to life.

There are many characteristics of true repentance which may be gathered from the word of God and from experience.

(1.) He must be inward. External actions are morally valueless if they spring from false motives. The giving the body to be burned or the bestowal of all the goods to feed the poor are worth nothing if prompted by vanity, while even a cup of cold water granted from love to Christ is priceless.

(2.) The consciousness of God must always enter into true repentance. There may be great mental suffering connected with sin without any sense of God. The stings of conscience, the self-disgust, the remorse, the despair, which often track the career of the depraved, have in themselves no necessary meeting of the mind of God. When a man acts wrongly he may fancy that he repents when he means no more than regret at the injury caused to his interests, or the suffering which he has brought on himself or others. There is a sorrow too which "works death." The sensual egoist may taste a melancholy and gloom which turn his life's joys into Dead Sea apples—

"Love, shame, unbroken sorrow—'tis the cross,
Each side, and all its, and some the worst!"

But the true penitent goes higher than self, or society, or any worldly consequences. He cries, "Against Thee, Thee only have I sinned." He sees that God is right and that he has been wrong, that God is His Creator, His Father, and His King, and that he has been a rebel and is guilty before Him. The thought of self is lost in the thought of God.

(3.) It is the evil of sin rather than its consequences that fills him with horror. He is the sin which he finds in him as a terrible possession from which he cries to be delivered, the sin that belongs to thought, motive, and affection, as well as the sins of action of which memory speaks. His prayer is therefore for something more than pardon. "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

(4.) Repentance leads to complete self-surrender to God. There is no reservation as in the case of the Pharisees, who yielded strict obedience as regards the anise and mint of observance while they kept whole departments of life for self-indulgence. The reformation of one bad habit may in fact blind a man to others that are allowed full sway, except he is willing to let the light of God in on all his thoughts and ways. "My son, give me thine heart," is a demand which reaches to the very citadel of our being. And in true repentance all is surrendered—not one position alone, while others are kept closed against Him, but everything is given up with the earnest desire that He who is our lawful King should reign over us and subdue us completely to Himself.

SEPTEMBER 14TH.

Read Isaiah i. 1-40, Romans ii. 1-27.

One of the chief influences leading to repentance is said to be the goodness of God. This is illustrated in many ways in Scripture. That goodness is described by St. Paul as "forbearance and long suffering."

These terms are very suggestive, because they imply man's freedom as well as the divine tenderness. If men were no more than stones, or incapable of moral choice, like the beasts that perish, there would be no room for long suffering. We cannot speak of forbearing with a clod of earth, but it is not so with the child, who can resist or yield to our wishes. And when the goodness of God is represented as forbearing with men, it shows that He meets in us what He does not find in sun, moon, or star, for they cannot try His patience or grieve His love. They are the unquestioning servants of His all-directing power. But as He has endowed us with wills to choose the good, or to refuse it, He does not force our obedience as He compels a planet, but seeks our obedience even as a father with his child. He does not shape our affections, as He moulds a crystal. He comes to the heart by the only way in which it can be approached. Through His own love He wins the response of love. It is not the same thing to Him whether we are holy or wicked, saints or devils. He cares for us, and the measure of His good-will may be found in His forbearance and long suffering. Our salvation is, therefore, not a question of mere power, such as is exerted over material objects. Omnipotence in that sense cannot be thought of here, for it is a matter of moral influence, and the only power to affect the end in view is the infinite goodness of God.

This goodness of God, in the general sense of the term, is a fact of experience as well as a truth of Scripture. The universe is full of His glory. Everywhere and always, wide as the farthest reach of our knowledge, continuous as is the length of human experience, this marvellous care of God is found without flaw or blemish. Like the great ocean, which fills every cranny of the sea shore and touches the tiniest coral, or moves the sweetest sea-flower with the same tide which spreads with irresistible might along a continent, so does the all-pervading goodness of God sweep in from the remotest stem till it embraces every object, every law, the vastest, the minutest, with the same spotless perfection of government. Except where sin, that fruit of voluntary resistance, has left its mark, there is not a blot in the unsullied field of this universe of His. When we reflect on it, and for a moment realise the grandeur of this truth, it is marvellous that we do not break out into a "Hallelujah," because we are His creatures, Whose wisdom and tender mercies are thus found in all his works.

But when we think of the divine goodness in His dealings with men new elements are at once suggested, and these are expressed negatively by "His forbearance and long suffering," and positively by the revelation of Himself in Christ. Let us consider these in one or two lights.

(1.) Remember His perfect knowledge of every man. Even the lowest, the poorest, the loneliest man on earth can say, "I have been searched me and tried me. Thou art acquainted with all my thoughts. There is not a word on my tongue but thou knowest it altogether." If it seems difficult for us to believe in such knowledge it would surely be more difficult to believe the opposite, and to suppose that there was any creature of whom God was ignorant. It may seem too high for us to understand it, but it is true.

(2.) Think of His holy hatred of sin, and then imagine all that He has beheld in human history! Recall the centuries before the flood, or the history of Israel with its resistance and unbelief, or that of the Church of God since—the Middle Ages, with their cruelty, the Modern Church with its sectarianism, pride, avarice. Contemplate what it is the living God sees at this hour in every city of Christendom, and say if His forbearance is not marvellous! Or if we look back each on his own history since childhood and remember all that He has been to us, and what we have been to Him,—the lessons we have received in joy and in sorrow, and our impotence, unprofitableness, and unbelief, how much it has been in spite of us that we have been led on to better things—we may well acknowledge His long-suffering.

With some life may appear as a long battle against Him, with others it has been unbroken thoughtlessness and self-indulgence, and with others shameful unfaithfulness to untold opportunities. And now as He still blesses us when we deserve it not, we must surely feel how kind the Lord is.

(3) And we may realise it more fully when we look at the still more constraining form in which His good will has been expressed. For as if when all other methods had proved inadequate, when nature with its unbroken tale of wisdom and order, and when the Law and Prophets had failed to utter the mercy of God in language sufficiently articulate, then Christ came that in the living movements of incarnate Love, visibly affected by all that man is in his sin and sorrow, we might know what the Father feels. He lived among all conditions of men, among the ignorant, depraved, the poor and diseased, the rich and luxurious. He dealt with Herod, and Caiaphas, and Pilate, as well as with publicans and sinners, but towards all He manifested the same holy goodness, which if wounded by transgression, also showed equally His will and power to save, and which embraced all in a divine atmosphere of purest, tenderest righteousness. And His death for men was the seal of His testimony. No one can gaze up to that cross without feeling that whatever else is true, it is certain that He is not willing that any should perish, but rather that all should come to repentance.

(4) And the very purpose of it all is that we turn to God in self-surrender. The goodness of God is to lead to repentance. If He bears long with us because He does not wish to part with us, then His very long-suffering with any individual is a token of good will. Sometimes we imagine that we are entitled to putance, or that putance signifies divine indifference. That can never be. We must be delivered from sin or lose the life whose very nature is blessedness. Disease and health cannot be conjoined. Sin must bring its consequences, however long they may be delayed. If order is eternal in the physical world, no less is it eternal in the spiritual. And just as nature ever re-establishes any equilibrium that may have been disturbed, and even through destructive forces restores stability, so we may be assured that in the moral world a like principle holds with stricter force. "Heaven and earth may pass away," but the word of that law which blesses righteousness and condemns evil is unalterable. Let no one therefore "despise the riches of God's forbearance and long suffering," but rather recognise in that goodness the very power which leads to repentance.

SEPTEMBER 21ST

Read Psalm 14 and 1 John 1.

The subject which we will consider this evening is the confession of sin. It is closely connected with repentance, and is put in a very clear light by John in the well known passage "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

At first sight these words seem to make forgiveness so consequent on the acknowledgment of sin as to supersede the necessity for the work of Christ, which we have been taught to regard as the one ground of our salvation. A fuller consideration of the true import of confession will remove this misapprehension.

St John had been showing that it is eternal life to be in fellowship with the Father and the Son. This "fellowship" he further explains by representing it as being "in the light," as God is light. The salvation of a spiritual being must be nothing less than bringing him to be right spiritually, by inspiring right views, sympathies, and affections. Now the purpose of God in Christ is to lead us to have fellowship with Himself, and, however feebly it may be attained, that we should to some extent see things as He sees them, hating what He hates, and loving what He loves.

Confession of sin to be true must, therefore, be something more than the setting forth a catalogue, however complete, of our omissions and transgressions. It must arise from such a perception of what sin is, beholding it in the light of God, as will make us confess it to be sinful. There is a confession which does not imply any necessary meeting of the mind of the Father, nor any saving repentance, and is often accepted as sufficient by Protestant and Romanist alike. The Romanist who fancies that he has made adequate confession when he tells the priest all the bad actions or bad thoughts of which his conscience accuses him, or the Protestant who expects forgiveness if he can only draw up a prayer to God an accurate account of his offences, equally mistake the nature of the divine requirement. Such avowals may be quite consistent with the most unreligious convictions, for they may arise from utterly wrong motives—like the confession of the criminal, who hopes thereby to mitigate his sentence—and may be rendered without the slightest perception of evil as God would have us see it. There is no intrinsic connection between a statement of so many wrong deeds and fellowship with God. A parent might bring a child to acknowledge a lie, and yet that acknowledgment might be rendered in such a cold and unfeeling spirit as to prove shocking blindness in the child to the nature of falsehood. The admission in word would under such circumstances be no satisfaction, for what the parent seeks is some fellowship with himself in his hatred of dishonour. In like manner the acknowledgment by us that we have done what God has forbidden, or have come short of what He enjoins, may be of a totally different character from the confession of the man who has brought himself into the light of God, and can say 'Amen' from the heart to His just condemnation of evil. He, as it were, agrees with the mind of God. He has 'fellowship with the Father and the Son.' When this takes place then we can understand how it is faithful and just in God to forgive sins, and to cleanse from all unrighteousness. For it is just this which God has always been seeking. It was to produce such right thoughts that Christ came and died. He taught us what sin is to God by His own 'agonies and bloody sweat, by His Cross and passion.' When we sincerely repent we pass from death to life, from darkness to light. We go, so to speak, over to God's side, and are reconciled to Him, for we are reconciled to His holiness, justice, and truth.

We would not, however, lessen hereby the necessity for self-examination and for the summoning before conscience and before God those offences of which we have been guilty. Religion may evaporate into sentimentalism except we deal with actual facts. Nor would we deny the use which may be found in confessing sin to any wise and godly brother man, be he priest or layman, when conscience may be troubled with painful iniquity. Scripture recognises the benefit of being sometimes guided or advised by those who have spiritual insight. It is suggestive, however, of the nature of such help that the crises of confession recorded in the Word of God are not to priests but to prophets, in other words to men of God who were fitted by character rather than office to deal with the sinful.

Now when we pass from the general statements made by St. John regarding the characteristics of true confession to those instances of sincere penitence which occur in Scripture, we at once recognise the presence of that "fellowship" with the Father which is the basis of the Apostle's teaching. Let us take two instances. In the Old Testament we find it in that which is emphatically the Psalm of Penitence, where David pours forth his broken hearted acknowledgment of iniquity. "Against thee only have I sinned," he says, "and done this evil in Thy sight, that thou mightest be justified when thou speakest and be clear when thou judgest." He thus justified God's judgment on himself. He says "Amen" to it as being a right judgment. He avows God to be "clear" in condemning him. And in harmony with this his whole cry is not so much for deliverance from the consequences of his sin, as from the sin itself, which had become his very hell. He feels that he is but 'one pollution,' and he can be satisfied with nothing short of 'truth in the inward parts,' a clean heart and a right spirit.

In like manner the thief on the cross, who is the New Testament type of penitence, meets the mind of God, as we saw when considering the incident in connection with the Third Word from the Cross. His confession, "I receive the due reward of my iniquities," as combined with his fear of God and his humble but deep faith in Christ, is a marvellous response to the mind of the Father. He then saw himself in the light of God and confessed his sin under a sense of its exceeding sinfulness.

Such confession of sin is not easy. We can attain to it only as we know God. For it is light which reveals darkness. It is the pure who understand the vileness of impurity. No one ever knew what the sin of the world really is as the holy Christ knew it. And if He rejoices over the first cry of penitence, though it should be no more than 'God have mercy upon me a sinner,' He will also deepen that knowledge by leading into fuller fellowship with Himself. At the best we never can confess sin as we ought. But He has confessed it who through our sin was pierced unto death to receive Him is to accept that witness as true, and when we surrender ourselves to Him He will "perfect that which concerns us," and cleanse us from every sympathy with the wrong. If we thus confess sin He is indeed "faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

SEPTEMBER 28TH.

Read Psalm cxxxviii, and 1 Cor. i. 17 to end.

Power is perhaps the last quality which we would attribute to Him whose glory was meekness, love, humility, and truth. ■ is also not easily associated with that scene where "He was crucified through weakness." And yet St. Paul speaks of Christ as pre-eminently "the power of God," and describes the Cross as "the power of God unto salvation."

If science were asked to illustrate the power of God she would give a very different answer from that of St. Paul, and yet her answer would be a true one also. Unfolding the vast roll of her discoveries and telling her wondrous tale of magnitude and power, she would reply, "The power of God! My loftiest calculations scarcely touch the skirts of His infinite greatness and glory."

But, however overwhelming the conception which might thus be conveyed, there is another display of power, though of a different kind from that of which the material universe speaks, which is higher and more awe-inspiring in proportion as the moral world transcends the physical.

For the power which ■ exerted in raising a weight from the ground is totally different from that which is required ■ lift a sorrow from the heart. The power which can create a star belongs to another order from that which can inspire the love of a child, or can touch conscience with new convictions. The power of him who can hurl the dart or bend the iron is dissimilar from his who can influence the opinions, elevate the tastes, touch the affections, and purify the sympathies of his brother man. The power of hand and eye which enables the sculptor to shape "a thing of beauty" is wholly different from the strength of character which can suffer all trial rather than betray a brother.

Now, these different views of power have been revealed in the two spheres of the material and moral world, in both of which God has manifested His glory. There is the one kind of power exercised in the creation and sustenance of mighty systems and in the reign of physical law, but if we would behold the power of goodness, the greatness of divine patience and mercy, and the strength of righteousness, we must lift our eyes to another region. The qualities of mercy and holiness cannot be expressed in the terms of arithmetic, or be weighed and measured as we calculate the forces and magnitudes of bodies. Nature cannot declare these. The path of moral glory is one which "the vulture's eye hath not seen . . . the depth saith, It is not in me. and the sea saith, It is not with me. It cannot be gotten for gold, neither shall silver be weighed for the price thereof." When we turn to the deepest, highest, and most awe-inspiring revelation of God, we must look not to the marvels of earth and sky, but to the sphere of heart, mind, and spirit—to the world of character in short—and when we examine this for the most wondrous exemplification of the divine goodness, we recognise the truth of what St. Paul asserts when he terms Jesus Christ the power of God.

There are many lights in which the power of Christ might ■ viewed. There is often, for example, as much power revealed in what one cannot do, as in the opposite. ■ is power and not weakness which prevents the man of honour from uttering a falsehood, which makes it impossible for the judge to pronounce an unjust sentence, or which makes death preferable to apostasy. And we find the greatness of Christ similarly tested in manifold ways, from the temptation in the wilderness, when He was held by the strong ties of sonship from asserting that kingdom of self, independent of God, which promised relief from suffering at the cost of duty, on to Calvary, where His own will was rendered wholly up to God, and the path of obedience accepted although leading to the Cross.

We see in like manner the unsullied strength of the holiness of God. As we behold Christ in contact with the sin of the world, the Cross becomes in this light the measure of our evil, and of the ineffable power of divine sanctity and love.

But the kind of power to which St. Paul especially alluded when he spoke of Christ as "the power of God," was His power to save. To save man by restoring him ■ God, and thereby to the ideal of his nature, is very different from removing him out of a place called hell into another place called heaven. ■ cannot be accomplished by any external change, for it is the restoration of our affections, sympathies, obedience, and hopes to their true objects. And Jesus Christ is really the power of God for these ends. For if love cannot be produced in any other way than by the commanding influence of a love which wins the being, if the heart cannot be purified except as it is cleansed from all sympathy with evil, if conscience cannot be delivered from the fear and burden of guilt, but by an act of free mercy, if despair cannot be removed except by the awakening of strong assured hope, if admiration and desire for the right are inspired only by the vision of the supremely good, if spiritual darkness needs light, and weakness needs grace: then at every turn we can recognise how truly Jesus Christ is "the power of God and the wisdom of God." For it is His love which has constrained the love of the redeemed, His humility which has abased their pride, His life which has inspired their devotion, His forgiveness, grace and presence which have sustained them from the first moments of spiritual infancy. He is the full stature of the saints in light. He is who has brought man home to God in the truest sense. It is this mighty power of His glory which has created anew the vast world of the intelligent universe, which in a nobler order than what keeps sun and moon and stars in plastic obedience, evokes the willing submission and the ceaseless worship of the spirits of the just made perfect, who obey because they love, and who serve in the liberty of continual joy.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

J. Robert Fleming

By SARAH TYLLER, AUTHOR OF "CLOTILDE JACQUELINE," "LADY BELL," ETC

CHAPTER XXVIII.—A FUGITIVE IN BROAD DAY.

THE fugitive was not Sir William, he stayed on at Whitehills as if he meant to stay there for the rest of his life. He had given up his scheme of emigration, and after his short scandalous outbreak and his wife's death, settled down as he had done on his arrival in the neighbourhood. But though he had made no inroads on his fortune during his brief prodigal madness, he took no steps to reorganize or replenish the ranks of his household, which had fallen into still further disorder, and been diminished to the last degree in the prospect of Sir William and Lady Thwaite's leaving the country. In fact Sir William's establishment now consisted of an old woman, with a girl to help her, and Bill Rogers. With this the master of the house appeared satisfied, leading as he did the life of a recluse.

This went on for nearly two years. Mr. Mills came down on business occasionally, and tried to prove his client's reformation and his own trust in its permanency, by seeking to draw out Sir William afresh, and by endeavouring to interest him in county matters, and in his duties as a landlord. So far as that went Sir William was amenable to influence. While he read more than ever, he strove harder to lay himself open to every source of intelligent observation and occupation around him, and to comply with all the obligations that could reasonably be required of him. He began to rebuild the half-finished houses, he dabbled in the allotment system, he showed interest in the decisions of the justices. He met his neighbours again on public occasions, and displayed to them something of the dearly bought obliviousness and blunt superiority to manners and fashions generally, which were partly the results of passing a second time through the fires of remorse and unappeasable regret.

But Sir William's complacency ended there, though the most of his neighbours would have been well enough pleased to have granted him further grace, even venturing to re-admit him to the sanctuary of their homes. These magnates were coming round to the conclusion that Sir William had sown his wild oats in one crop, that it was all the result of his miserable marriage, but now that he had got a deliverance from his low-born wife, he was living once more as quietly and soberly as a judge. He had escaped with the skin of his teeth from all his perils, and it was the duty of every good Christian and good neighbour, after a sufficient interval had passed to test his reformation, to welcome back the prodigal, and encourage him in the way he should go.

But Sir William declined every social overture, not so much rudely as with a calm persistence that foiled and wore out the most persevering endeavours. He did not even make the exceptions he had allowed himself three years before. Lady Thwaite, Sir John's widow, had returned from Rome long ago, but though Sir William's carriages and the produce of his hot houses were once more at her disposal, no little notes, clever manoeuvres, or frank advances would induce him either to go to her at Netherton, or to authorise her interference in the domestic economy of Whitehills.

The cool overtures which old Lady Fermor made to Sir William to renew his intercourse with Lambford fared still worse. There was a rumour that he not only declined all her invitations, but passed her carriage with a bow, though its mistress hailed him in a voice which might have been heard a mile off. What better could have been expected from the plain man with whom she had played like a wicked, hoary-headed enchantress, whom she had beguiled with lures which her grand-daughter disowned?

Sir William was never seen within the Rectory, though he had resumed his attendance at church, had gone to vestry meetings, and was ready with help for the parish poor when it was called for.

■ Sir William enjoyed the respite from neighbourly visiting, there was another person, the last ■ would have exposed to suffer on his account, who was punished for his remissness. Old Lady Fermor, who had formerly simply neglected Iris, and who had shown some capacity of toleration where what the girl's grandmother classed as fanaticism and obstinacy of temper were concerned, now set upon her grand-daughter day after day, taunted her with barbarous taunts, vouchsafed the agreeable information that Iris's father had ended by despising and detesting her mother, and added to it the comfortable sequel that the Hon. Mrs. Compton had cared nothing for her child, and had thrown it a dead weight upon her mother. Lady Fermor reverted shamelessly to the shameful passages in her own life, in the hearing of the pure ears that tingled with horror and affront. She dwelt on hereditary taints and hereditary spotted reputations until Iris grew sick with loathing ■ the infamy in which she felt hopelessly entangled, in spite of her utter revolt against its foulness and baseness. She cried day and night to the God of righteousness, Who has declared it is not His will that because the fathers have eaten sour grapes the children's teeth shall be set on edge. "Lord, thou wilt hold me up. Thou wilt sooner send the Angel of Death ■ set me free," prayed the poor girl.

Lady Fermor's last deliberate, well-nigh insane sin against the grand-daughter thus in her power was that she threw Iris in the way of Major Pollock, who continued after Lord Fermor's death the one constant male habitué of the house. All her life long Iris had experienced an extreme repugnance and positive dread of this man. He was a disgrace to the town of Knotley, which yet tolerated the blackleg because of the prestige of his original rank, his supposed knowledge of the great world (on the evil side), and his connection with such a house as Lambford. There was hardly a redeeming trait ■ be discovered among his leers and sneers, his cheater, effrontery and profanity. Iris's recoil was the instinctive shrinking of good from unmixt evil over which it has no power. Yet it was for this man, old enough to be Iris's father, brutalised by a lengthened career of vice and debauchery, impoverished by such riot as was within his reach, that Lady Fermor now affected to destine her grandchild!

The mistress of Lambford, as ■ seemed, half in cruel jest, half in more cruel earnest, in the frenzy which had taken possession of her, ceased to encourage any other visitor at the house. She refused to let Iris go to Lady Thwaite at Netherton, or to the Actons at the Rectory, compelling her to sit and talk with the worst of companions, and to make herself conspicuous by walking, riding, and driving with this reprobate, till the girl was half mad with fright and disgust.

There are exhausted states of the bodily constitution which medical men assert are favourable to the sowing of the seeds of disease. In the same way there are depressed conditions of the mind after it has been subjected to prolonged trial, when it loses its capacity to balance probabilities, and readily falls a victim to panics. People who remembered Iris's mother during her last visit to Lambford began to remark that her daughter was acquiring the same harassed, hunted look, which, if it settled down on her face, would go far to spoil its sweet, bright beauty. Why, she was not twenty-three years of age, yet she was fast losing colour and flesh, and would be faded and pinched before she had attained the fullness of womanhood. Lucy Acton was vexed by the change, but she could do nothing, even if her hands had not been very full with a contumacious curate, a twist in the smooth running of her Dorcas Society, and a proposal for pauper boarding out where her pauper children were concerned.

Lady Fermor only noticed the alteration in her grand-daughter's looks to make use of ■ in her gibes. "Well, Iris, you were a poor enough affair ■ the best, but I think I had a right to expect that you would keep what little looks you had till you were turned five-and-twenty. I was as young as ever at five-and-forty. But I see I must look sharp and dispose of you while I can, before you go off entirely, since I wish no old maids left on my hands, even though I could live to provide for them—which I won't, girl; there are more to profit by my savings, on which you have got your eye, no doubt, than you. I have had little to do with the Dugdales and Powells, but they are my grand children too, all the same. My lord left what he could at my discretion, and I can tell you he cared more for my blood than his own. He would have preferred a dog of mine to a child of his first wife's—if she had borne him one. It did not matter greatly to him that his blood flowed in your veins. He took my view of you as a troublesome, perverse minx of a girl. If there had been a likely lad among the Dugdales and Powells, I should have sent all your brats of girls to the right about, but my ill-fortune has followed me through two generations, with troops of useless girls as my sole descendants. However, if you think I am going to make an eldest grandson of you, then you are mightily mistaken. It is no matter that I don't believe I should know a Dugdale or a Powell girl if I saw her. I suppose they all take after their maternal grandfather, and are a flat footed, round-nosed, blinking eyed set."

"I have never seen them," said Iris, faintly.

"I dare say not," exclaimed her grandmother, scornfully. "Do you think they count you a relation of theirs? They may condone what they are pleased to consider my offences, because I can do something for them if I choose, but what on earth should induce them to forget that you are the wild Lord Fermor's grand daughter, while they are the grandchildren of that wronged saint Bonnet of Hyndcoomb."

"Grandmamma," said Iris, with a gasp, "I have never sought to stand in my cousins' way. If there is any wrong to be redressed then for mercy's sake let it be done, and don't mind me."

"And, pray, what do you intend should become of you?" retorted Lady Fermor, in place of being softened, more contemptuous than ever. "I dare say you are mean enough—good girls are generally sneaky—to think of becoming a pensioner on Lord Minkmay, the new lord, whose aunt I superseded. Child, I am not in nature. He barely tolerates you, and his wife hates you like poison."

"I shall not be a pensioner on anybody," said Iris, with grave determination and more spirit.

"And what position do you hold to me, may I ask?" demanded her grandmother, with mock deference. "I have plenty of holes to put my money in without them ever becoming filled up. It is not a pure pleasure for me to provide for a girl, and endure her namby pamby, priggish company after she has disobeyed and offended me, and spoilt a finer fellow than she was worthy of, according to the dictates of her conscience and religion, of course. No, no, I see nothing for it but that I should hand you over to old Pollock. He may be better able to manage you than a poor doting woman over fourscore years can aspire to do," with a sudden assumption of extreme age and weakness.

Still the probabilities, if Iris Compton had only been able to take them into consideration, were all against Lady Fermor's going farther than to threaten her grand daughter with this last horrible injury. It was a free country, in which no woman could be compelled to marry any man, good or bad, against her will. Public opinion would cry out against Lady Fermor, and although she had defied it in her prime, in the strength of her will and passion, she was not likely to set it at naught for so small a gain as the punishment and degradation of a refractory descendant. Lady Fermor had always kept her eyes open with regard to worldly advantages and disadvantages. Major Pollock had none of the hint to recommend him, and the chance was, as the old lady well knew, that if she were so reckless and if she possessed the power to bring about a disgraceful, unsuitable marriage between him and Iris, she would find him the most unpudgent and inveterate parasite a tie of relationship ever permitted to fasten on the head of a house.

But Iris was no longer able to reason on the dangers which she wildly exaggerated. Her home was becoming intolerable to her. It needed but one more indignity and foreboding of future misery to drive her to extreme measures.

Lady Fermor had gone for her afternoon drive to Knotley when rain came on. She made her coachman stop at Major Pollock's door. She said she feared the wet, and was too stiff to alight. She would sit there and have a cup of tea handed to her by the gentleman of the house, who had come out to attend his patroness. But her grandmother ordered Iris to alight, and go in with Major Pollock, and sit down with him at his table.

Iris could not escape compliance, unless she was prepared to engage in a discreditable contention in the public street. She was forced to cross the threshold which no respectable woman in any class was in the habit of passing. She did not tarry above a few minutes. Even Major Pollock seemed put out, and did not urge her to sit down, but when she came back, pale and trembling, her grandmother had another order to give her. Iris was to take the carriage-umbrella and go on and do what shopping Lady Fermor wished to have done, while she drove slowly after her grand-daughter—till Iris could re-enter the carriage. Would Major Pollock be so good as to accompany Miss Compton, hold the umbrella above her head, and lend her his arm, as she had not been strong lately, and was not looking well?

In vain Iris protested she could hold the umbrella and walk by herself perfectly well. She was compelled to parade the streets—empty because of the rain, but commanded by a double row of windows—and enter shop after shop with her escort.

He was not the man to fail long in presuming on his opportunities, though he was likely to make a more correct estimate of the situation, and to calculate, without grossly blundering, the length and breadth of Lady Fermor's old-standing favour for him, and dislike to her grand-daughter. "Upon my word, Miss Compton, this is nice and cosy to have you tucked like an unruly chick under my arm, and to be sent to go messages with you turtle-dove fashion. We must be better friends. Come, I prophesied we should, when you paid me a compliment at your ball an age ago. I don't think you've paid me another till to-day, but better late than never, when the old lady is so jolly set on our friendship. There is no saying where it may end. Why don't we make common cause? and I'll fight your battles with my old terma-gant. Better broken ships than none, young lady. I am not the only reform'd scamp in the neighbourhood, but there is a distinction which my lady is able to appreciate. While a certain gentleman is safe to go on sulking at the end of the chapter, I'm at your feet whenever you condescend to hold out your hand to me. And though you're young and fair, and an angel, and all that sort of bosh, and Lord and Lady Fermor's grand-daughter, which is more to the purpose, and entitles you to some line, by Jove! you owe me compensation for past ills, Miss Compton."

When Iris got into the carriage and it drove off, leaving Major Pollock behind, she heard Lady Fermor chuckle, "I have given the Knotley gossips something to talk about. The women in our family never missed affording ground for talk. The public owe us a vote of thanks on that account, and if I have taken down a little of your squeamishness and high-mindedness, Miss Compton, you ought to be obliged to me also."

Iris was silent. She entered no protest, she heard no further word. She was pressing her hands to her forehead and taking a desperate resolution. "I am of age, I am my own mistress with any little gain that implies. It cannot be right to live on with grandmamma and tempt her to behave to me as she has done, to compass, if that were possible, her shocking suggestion. I cannot die when I wish. I cannot go to the Actons, I should only compromise the Rector and Lucy, entangle them in a family quarrel, and if they were to take my part, form a bad precedent for all the family quarrels in the parish. Lucy does not know, and how could I ever pollute her mind as mine has been polluted? Will it ever be clean, fearless and God trusting again? Lucy would advise me to stay on with grandmamma and be good, and seek to do her good. Ah! it is not so easy to be good and do good as Lucy imagines. She would laugh at the mention of Major Pollock as a child's bogge. She would charge me to be patient where patience is of no avail. I cannot speak to Ada, Lady Thwaite, she would dislike getting into an awkward predicament, interfering between relations, helping to make mischief—as if there were any left to be made—between a grandmother and a grand daughter whom the grandmother has brought up, and Lady Thwaite would be right, according to the sound of the thing. Grandmamma is so very old that nobody would believe what power she retains as she sits there. It seems doubly heartless to turn upon her and abandon her to hired servants. If the other Lady Thwaite, poor Honor, had lived and remained at Whitehills, she would have dared to come over to Lambford and beard grandmamma, fetch me away before her face and lavish upon me all the poor shelter she could provide. I must go away from them all, I must earn my own bread. Surely I can do as thousands of women earn theirs. But I shall tell grandmamma first. I don't know if she will seek to prevent me, except to maintain her rule, but if she should shut me up, then it will be time enough to think of fleeing like a culprit in secret and in the dark."

Secrecy and darkness were utterly foreign to Iris's nature. They were among the bogbears which she would abhor and shun to her dying day. Therefore she arranged for her departure from Lambford, not so much in an orderly and methodical manner, but on principles of her own which took even her graceless old enemy by surprise, much more so than if the unhappy girl had absconded under cloud of night.

She spent a wakeful night for the most part packing such clothes, books, and trifling possessions as she felt entitled to take with her. But she scrupulously and tenderly respected her grandmother's times for sleep and breakfast. "Grandmamma must be refreshed and at her best," the rebel said. "She may feel my going in a way, she may be stirred up to oppose me. I must take care to do her no harm." Therefore it was at high noon that Iris, in her linen morning gown and straw hat, with her dust cloak over her arm, knocked and sought permission to speak with Lady Fermor.

The room according to its wont was bare of all beautiful and youthful associations, though supplied with every luxury. Lady Fermor sat muffled up in the glare of the mingled sunlight and firelight, which on another would have fallen fiercely, but in her only aroused a grateful torpid warmth, while ■ lit up with ghastly illumination her shrivelled parchment skin, pronounced brows and false teeth and hair. She was revolving old memories and twirling her thumbs, and at first only bestowed a supercilious glance on her grand daughter.

Lady Fermor was roused to attention by the thrill in Iris's voice when she said, with all the calmness she could command, "I am going away, grandmamma. I do not see how we can live together any longer. I am very sorry that I have not been more of a comfort and pleasure to you, but since it is not so, and our differences are becoming worse every day, ■ is better for me to quit Lambford."

"And this is all the thanks I get for having brought you up, Iris Compton, this is all your gratitude?" said Lady Fermor, leaning back in her easy chair and crossing her hands in her lap.

Iris might have inquired what she had received to be grateful for which her grand mother could have decently kept back. But she was of another mind. "I am not ungrateful, I know you have had a great deal of trouble with me," she said humbly, "and my heart is sore that ■ should end like this."

"I don't want any of your whining and cant," said Lady Fermor fiercely. "I wash my hands of you from this day. I don't care what becomes of you, and you may go where you will for me. You know, and I know, it won't be an honest road long, least of all after such vile ingratitude. I have only one stipulation to make, since ■ is your modest little game to set out on your travels in broad day and call as much attention ■ the proceedings as possible, you shan't leave Lambford in the guise of a beggar, or ■ mock nurse in an hospital, or a sister in a nunnery, or whatever other silly example you may choose to follow, and so bring further disgrace upon me. You'll be so good as to leave this house dressed like a lady, and you will do me the favour of making use of the carriage to the train. I suppose you mean to journey by rail and not on foot like an ordinary vagabond?"

Iris went back to her room, and with fingers that would hardly do her will, changed her dress for the last elaborate costume in dove coloured cashmere and silk, which her grand mother had ordered for her.

As Iris was doing Lady Fermor's bidding, Soames made a solemn muffled appeal for admittance. She brought on a salver an open cheque for fifty pounds and a slip of paper on which was written, "This is the last you shall have from me. Make the best or the worst you can of it. Don't disturb me by further leave-takings, I have had enough of them, and I don't choose they should spoil my luncheon."

Iris took up the cheque and put it down again. It was her grandfather's money and yet she felt ■ if it burnt her fingers. She looked wistfully in Soames's face.

"I have to go back to my lady instantly in case what has happened should be too much for her," said the woman in a strictly official tone, taking her stand on bung on duty. "Good bye, miss. If I may ■ so bold, I wish you an 'appy journey."

On the whole Soames was relieved by Iris's going away, but she did not wish to know more of the step, since the knowledge might get her into a scrape. Her greedy eyes grudged the grand-daughter of the house the large cheque, but the maid must not imperil the annuity for which she had already paid dearly.

The suspicion that Miss Compton might be going away for good, remained confined to the cold and cautious breast of Soames. The other servants were baffled and put on a false scent by the circumstances of the dress, the carriage, and the hour, under which Iris set out. The old cook, the footman, whose life Iris had saved, Jenny Rogers, who was her young mistress's special favourite, all supposed, and kindly welcomed the supposition, that some sudden visiting expedition had been fixed on by Lady Fermor for her grand-daughter. "She will be all the better for it, poor dear young lady," they settled cordially among themselves. "She leads a deal harder life than any of us, that she do, and she has not been looking well of late, but a change will set her up." Thus it happened that Iris, the friendliest of human beings, departed from the place which had been her home for nearly the whole of her young life, without a tear shed for her sake, without a caress, or a blessing, or a God speed, beyond Soames's ceremonious measured good wishes.

Though it had been her own doing that she should go like this, she was impressed by the desolation of the step she was taking, while it lacked the engrossing excitement of a clandestine adventure shrouded in gloom that might be dispersed at any moment with the escapade discovered and arrested.

Iris had not taken advantage of age, or betrayed a trust or transmitted a legacy of bewilderment, doubt, or even terror to the dwellers at Lambford. But did nobody care what became of her? Was there not one to ask where she was going—a lonely girl into the wide world? It was unreasonable in her to put such questions when actually nobody save her grandmother and Soames had any suspicion of the true nature of the case. Poor Lucy would be grieved and perhaps hurt beyond proportion, because the advice which she gave so glibly had not been sought. The Rector and Mrs. Acton, too, might blame Iris, and resent her lack of confidence in them. Yet, it had been a hard struggle for her to be silent under the desire of saving them a hopeless contest with Lady Fermor, above all when it would seem like a clerical and priestly obligation laid on them to enforce the old lady's authority, though their hearts should be with Iris in her distress. As for King Lud he had been gone on a long cruise, and though his ship was again in harbour he had not yet returned to the Rectory.

It was a grey cloudy day, with soft subdued light and shade, and the birds singing as they do in such a premature long drawn out gloaming, when Iris in her solitary state drove along the wide grass-bordered roads, through the pastures and downs and occasional corn fields. She had selected—with a sense of strangeness in having the privilege of selection—Cavesham instead of Knotley for her station, because of a violent apprehension which still harassed her, and caused her to shrink with a nervous horror from the most distant chance of encountering Major Pollock, though she had no just cause to fear the encounter. He could not stop her flight. It would not even matter though he should convey to her grandmother the information that he had seen her departure.

While Iris avoided Major Pollock, she could not altogether shake off a delusion, though she knew it to be a delusion. She fancied that the people whom she passed were looking at her, that they were surprised to see her alone, and wondered why she came to Cavesham, instead of the usual station for the Lambford household, that they were suspecting a family quarrel, and watching with idle yet oppressive curiosity her every movement.

She had no doubt what she would do to begin with, for her mind, naturally courageous, quick and fertile in resource, had decided promptly within a few minutes of her having come to the conclusion that she must act for herself and go away from Lambford.

Iris was unacquainted with her cousins, the Dugdales and Powells, and her grandmother had told her, what was too probable, that they would not acknowledge her as a relation. She knew her other cousin, the present Lord Fermor, she was conscious that he had been politely passive in his bearing towards her, but unless in the last necessity she would not appeal to him, though she believed that in spite of some faults and his wife's influence, he was on the whole an upright, tolerably humane man. She could not commit the last wrong against her grandmother which would be implied in Iris's addressing herself to Lady Fermor's natural enemy and claiming his protection. Lady Fermor, whatever she had done, remained Iris's mother's mother, her nearest relative, the guardian of her childhood and youth, as the old woman had so often reminded the girl lately with cruel reproaches. Nothing could do away with that obligation, which entered like iron into Iris's soul, so that under the sharp smarting of the wound there was little probability of her forgetting a duty which, according to her notions, was still paramount.

Iris was shut up in one course. Her old friend, Miss Burrage, had a sister in London who kept a boarding-house in which the girl and her governess had once lived for a few days. Iris would go to Fitzroy Square, to Mrs. Haigh, who knew all about Iris Compton, and would surely receive her without difficulty. Perhaps Mrs. Haigh would help Iris to look about and find some way of working for her living, since fifty pounds and the small sum left of her last quarter's allowance would not last for ever. ■ did not strike Iris that there would be anything degrading in entering the great army of workers, though she had the sense to anticipate that there might be much that was not agreeable, but trying and full of drudgery. She even failed ■ see that Lady Fermor was certain to regard the project with the utmost hostility. On the contrary, the wanderer sought to pacify her tender conscience and the aching longing of her affectionate heart, by telling herself that she might soon write to Lucy Acton, when the Rector, if he saw fit, could inform Lady Fermor that Iris was well, and able to maintain herself.

But Iris, in her ignorance, thought less of these questions than of the strangeness of her solitude and independence as she left the carriage and entered the station, took out her ticket for London and paced up and down the most secluded end of the platform. Did the man in the ticket office recognise her, and regard it as odd that she should be travelling alone, which she had never done before? Was the station master keeping his eye upon her, or did he direct the porters to do it? She saw one of her fellow travellers, a harmless looking middle class woman, surreptitiously reading the address on Iris's postmanteau. It might be ■ gratify idle curiosity, at the same time the action was suspicious. Yet why should she mind, even though what she dreaded, next ■ being followed by Major Pollock, came to pass, and some of her personal acquaintances, Lady Thwaite, or one of the Hollises, or even an officer from Birkett, were to appear through the archway?

But was Iris really going away from Lambford, from Eastham, from country sights and sounds, and all she had ever known and loved? She stooped, as she pondered over what seemed still impossible, and gathered a daisy that grew on the railway bank. Was she bound for the great city, with its swarming population, in which she would be the merest unit? Or was ■ no more than a vexed, confused dream, from which she should awaken presently?

Iris's perturbed half incredulous reflections were brought to an end by the arrival of the train. Amidst the little stir of arriving and departing passengers, she stepped into an empty carriage and seated herself, but rose the next moment and stood in the doorway, impelled by the recollection that since there was no one to look after the luggage she ought to attend to it. Nothing had been left on the platform, the train was moving, and she drew back just as she caught a glimpse of a familiar face, the owner of which was coming leisurely into the station. The face was the homely but trustworthy visage of Jenny Rogers's brother Bill, Sir William Thwaite's man servant.

Then the engine steamed off, carrying the travellers fast into the unknown, and the marvel of the expedition, the adventure of it, began to seize hold of the brave spirit, to fascinate and excite it, ■ the same time that a great trust in the Father of the fatherless, and the Brother of all His desolate brothers and sisters, rose in her soul and stilled its tribulation.

CHAPTER XXIX—REPARATION.

LADY FERMOR gave no token of missing the girl who had been her companion for the last twenty years. The old lady awoke and breakfasted, read the newspapers or got Soames ■ read them ■ her, took her stroll on the terrace, ate her luncheon, had her afternoon drive, her nap, her dinner, her evening game of écarté if Major Pollock dropped in, or, failing him, condescended to a game at cribbage with Soames, retired to bed, and slept apparently without a care on her mind or a feather's weight on her conscience. She had always boasted that though she was fond of company in her day, she could suffice for herself and now it looked like it. To the few visitors who made a point of inquiring for her, she merely alluded to Iris's absence without stating its cause or term, and when it was Lady Fermor's will to keep her own counsel not many people would venture to dispute the point with her. Even Lucy with the rest of the Acton family and Lady Thwaite, who were the most surprised and perplexed at the unexpected, unexplained, undefined visit somewhere, to somebody, which Iris was paying, submitted to be kept for a while in ignorance. The mystery, however, began to make itself felt, and within a fortnight ■ the event Lady Fermor's tranquillity was disturbed, and she was assailed and called ■ account in her own house, which ought to have been her castle.

Lady Fermor had returned from her afternoon drive, and had gone into her drawing-room for half an hour, when a message was brought to her from a former friend, who had arrived at the frame of mind when forms and ceremonies were indifferent to him. Sir William Thwaite bade a servant tell Lady Fermor that he wished ■ see her, and had not the savvy to add, "By her ladyship's leave," or "If the call is convenient for her," notwithstanding that he had long ceased to be a daily visitor at Lambford. He had not been there since the night of Miss Compton's bill. He had not spoken to Lady Fernor since she left him in a rage, in the teeth of a thunder storm, after her last visit to White-hills. He had been a husband and a widower in the interval.

As the message was delivered to the venerable woman her sunken eyes gave a warlike flash, and she managed to sit erect after she had snipped out the two words, "Admit him." Strife, and not peace, was her natural element. In spite of her years, a tough encounter, a rousing contention, a battle of words were more acceptable to her than sluggish rest.

Sir William came to his former haunt, looking too stern to be lightly discomposed and discomfited. He gave a hurried glance round while he was mechanically saying "Good morning" to his former ally, and the sternness was intensified on a face which, when it was not lit up with a smile, had always been more the type of a certain form of comely strength, than of sunshine and sweetness.

"It is a treat to see you nowadays, Sir William," said Lady Fernor tentatively, motioning him to a seat beside her.

But he did not sit down, and he did not answer her, save by telling his errand with brutal straightforwardness. "Where is Miss Compton, Lady Fernor?"

"Why do you ask?" she parried his question with the utmost coolness and intrepidity, while her eyes twinkled mischievously.

"Because I am determined to know," he answered after an instant's pause.

"And by what right do you claim to be made acquainted with my grand daughter's whereabouts?" she repeated her counter-challenge. "Really, Sir William, you were always an original, and at one time, I believe, I rather liked your originality, but that time is past, and there are limits even to good things."

Her sarcasm did not ruffle his mood, he had ceased to wince at the prick of such weapons, and he was also able to proclaim a right which in his eyes was all sufficient to authorise his presence and interrogation. "You were willing to give her and her happiness into my keeping once. Is not that enough to entitle me to ask what has come to her?"

"Very little has come to her, as you say, that I know of," answered Lady Fernor with an insolent criticism of his English, and with exasperating nonchalance. "If she had many rejected lovers it would be an awkward precedent to establish, that each man might come and bore me with his curiosity to hear the last news of his old flame. But she was not much of a belle, poor thing! and, tell the truth, I do not know that she had the glory of dismissing any suitor save one, therefore, I do not mind saying to you that I know nothing about her."

"It ain't possible," cried hotly, "she was in your care. Women of your class don't let girls go out into the world on their own hook, to do what they like, without having somebody to look after them. Your notion is, that girls cannot take care of themselves no more than if they were babies."

"And I dare say we are right," she interjected briskly.

"And you make and keep them helpless," he went on without appearing to pay any attention to her, "till they are too delicate and dainty to stand on their own feet and make their own way. I know she isn't like that, and I haven't such a bad opinion of the world as to think that there are many, either gentle or simple, that would harm her. But it ain't kind or considerate that she should be exposed to what another young lady could not face, and though she may not be right down harmed, she may be frightened and worried. Lady Fernor, I insist on your giving me satisfaction."

"In my day it was gentlemen who gave each other satisfaction," said Lady Fernor airily, "a good manly custom which, like some other customs not half so bad as they were called, has passed away—but let them go, they served my time. I assure you, Sir William, I am not accountable for the young lady in whom you are pleased to take so deep an interest. I am sorry not to have it in my power to say she returns it, or would thank you for it," with a little mocking, palsied bow to her listener. "She took our relations, hers and mine, into her own hands. According to your definition, she assumed the privilege of the lower orders. She said it was better we should part, she could not stay any longer with me. I am too old a woman to pretend to fight with disobedient, undutiful girls, or boys either, even though they are my grandchildren. She said she would go, and she went—there is the long and the short of it."

"Before it came to that, my lady, you had something to answer for," said Sir William, gulping down what was sticking in his throat.

"Now, don't you think this is getting tiresome?" suggested Lady Fermor. "I have told you the truth, which, whatever you may believe, you have no earthly call to swagger here and demand from me. May I beg you to spare me your reflections on it, and to cut short your visit? Don't you see, man, I have come in from a drive, and am tired?"

"I cannot help it," he protested, but in the middle of the rudeness he pushed a footstool under her feet, and caught up a cushion to place it behind her back. Remembering former services of the same kind, rendered under different circumstances and highly valued then, the wicked old face twitched and softened a little, though it relapsed the next moment into its malice and hardness.

"You don't mean to say you let her go like that?" he persisted, still standing like an avenging giant before a hard-hearted witch. "You never asked her where she was to turn to? You are not acquainted with any friend she might seek?"

"No," she had the coarseness and cruelty to answer him, "it is not always advisable to ask too many questions. We women are not often without friends at Iris's age, and we don't always care to publish the road we mean to follow."

"It is a shameful lie!" he said, speaking his mind without the slightest reservation, while his fresh-coloured face darkened to a dusky red, and the veins on his forehead, within the curves of chestnut hair, stood out knotted like whipcord. "By George, if you were a man, though you were a prince, I would not stand to hear it. You are an old woman and my lady, but I say you have spoken an infamous slander against your own flesh and blood, as much above you as heaven is above earth. Where is your natural womanly feeling, your mother's heart, Lady Fermor?"

Something in his air and attitude smote the rock of her nature on which his words had struck in vain. She shrank and cowered a little, and collapsed into the feebleness of her years.

"Don't," she implored, "don't you curse me; you are like—like a friend I had once. Never mind who it was. I saw the likeness the first day we met, and took a fancy for you, and did my best to serve you. I don't deserve this treatment from you, Thwaite, but I am ready to give you satisfaction—all the satisfaction I can. That goose of a girl you think so much of, though she don't care a straw for you, and she ain't worth your trouble—well, let that be—she never told me where she was going, and I am not bound to know, but she is no more fit to carry out a plot than that Spanish ass, Don Quixote. She behaved like a simpleton, as you may be sure. Her baggage was addressed to the care of a sister of a canting, mischief-making governess the child once had, and her ticket was taken to London. She had money for her board for three months. I can give you the address if you care to have it, though I don't see what good it will do you now. Sir William, will you go and leave me alone in peace, and don't come back to haunt me in another person's guise on my dying bed?"

"No, I want to do something better than that," he said, half with lingering fury, half in gruff relenting and concession to their old friendly relations. "You say you took a fancy for me, and meant well by me. I am willing to believe you, though it was a fancy which played me strange tricks, and went far to my undoing. I was not ungrateful, whatever you may think. I take it you have not so many true friends to call your own at the close of your long life, that you should shake off this one, and she your grand daughter, as good as gold, or even a tough, little-worth fellow like me. Why in the name of goodness should you not go after Miss Compton, find her, and be a loving grandmother to her, as I am sure she would be a loving child to you, if you would let her?"

"Because it ain't in me, Thwaite," replied her ladyship with returning coolness and candour. "You must be a bad reader of character, if you cannot decipher that. 'Loving grandmother,' indeed! Bah! I leave that to your tame old body who has kissed her faithless tyrant's feet, and run after her prodigal sons and fast daughters, until in the evening of her days she is content to sit chirping and snivelling over her mischievous brats of grandchildren."

He was not to be diverted from his aim.

"You say Miss Compton has the payment of her board, among people you disapprove of, for a month or two. What is she to do then? Will you let her feel herself forsaken by man?—not by God. You cannot touch her there." He broke off in a low tone with a mixture of reverence and tenderness—the true chivalrous devotion, very different from any species of love poor Lady Fermor had ever given or taken, shining in his blue eyes. "You do not intend Lord Fermor's grand-daughter to beg her board from strangers, or to hire herself out for a wage, do you? though she might count it no dishonour to make service honourable by discharging it."

"She has chosen her course, and she must abide by it—ay, and eat the fruit of her folly," argued the old woman, before she changed her cue, and suddenly made a concession. "If I do anything more for Mrs. Compton, it will be as a favour to you, Thwaite. The hussy—or the angel, if you prefer it, shall owe my forgiveness to you. That will be something for her pride to swallow, though I fear you have lost the spirit I cast it in her teeth."

Powerful as Sir William's championship had been, this was not exactly true. It was a fact that Lady Fermor, like most women of strong passions, had possessed little ritual affection. The passions had burnt themselves out, and in their ashes there were few elements for the growth of the domestic virtues. Still there were bounds to her callousness and vindictiveness. Lady Fermor had driven this girl, as Sir William had put it, from the dignity and ease of Lambford, to beg her bread or hire herself out for a wage. In the end the old woman might not be unwilling, for more reasons than one, to yield to his advocacy, giving it all the credit in order to save her own consistency, while underneath the veil she appeared her grisly ghost of a conscience.

"Thanks," he said shortly, and then, fearing to displease her and turn her from her cautious admission, he forced himself to protest, "I'll stand no end indebted to you if you do this kindness to yourself and Mrs. Compton at my bidding. But what you mean to do you ought to set about quickly."

"You are in a great hurry, Thwaite," observed Lady Fermor sarcastically. "I suppose you see that I have my bonnet on my head, and you think I shall be ready to stir my old bones, and rise and run after a flighty fool of twenty or thereabouts. Much obliged for your consideration for my age and infirmities. You had better order the carriage back once, and ride on before, and get a ticket for London, and let me start napless and dinnerless. I should arrive dizzy and starving before midnight. I dare say I might knock about for a bed, or if I found my way to Fitzroy Square, perhaps my good grand-daughter would have the common humanity to lend me hers for what remained of the night."

"You are talking nonsense," he said bluntly, staring at her, "but you will go up to London and seek out Mrs. Compton—won't you?"

"I may if you will be my escort. I have never been accustomed to travel without a square," she said with a kind of ghastly coquetry. "When I was younger, a good deal younger, I used to have half a-dozen sparks and beaux at my disposal. As it is, I am not so strong and nimble as Mrs. Compton. By the bye, I'm not at all sure that she will give me, and consent to put herself under my wing again. Disobedience is a virulent as well as a common complaint nowadays. I shall need all the foreign support I can get. Yours may not be very available in this case, but it is better than none. To be sure, my young lady may have eaten her look and changed her mind, while another person has had time and reason enough to alter his opinion. I shan't blame him, though I am reduced to wonder whether he has attacked me out of a spirit of contradiction and devilry, or from mere mawkish magnanimity, pity, and such like stuff."

She looked at him sharply. He returned her glance coldly, and dismissed her wonder with a formal, "Good afternoon, Lady Fermor. I shall see you to London if you like, at whatever time you fix," as he left her.

That night Bill Rogers was considerably impressed by finding himself put in authority at Whitehall, while his master held himself in readiness to start any day for London.

CHAPTER XXX.—YOUTH STRIVES.

Iris had reached London in safety, she had found Mrs. Haigh, a fat, florid, over-dressed woman, hospitable, and friendly in a way. But Iris had not found another Mrs. Burrage—it would have been unreasonable to expect in the matron who was in an extraordinary flutter of mingled pride and alarm at having Lord and Lady Fermor's grand daughter again under her own roof. Iris's presence lent a glorious distinction to the upper middle-class boarding-house, but she might be drawing down upon the hostess the wrath of "the combined aristocracy," because of aiding and abetting insubordination in their ranks and desertion from their leaders.

Iris had said honestly, "I am sorry to say grandamma and I have not been happy together lately, Mrs. Haigh. Perhaps my dear old friend, Mrs. Burrage, may have said something long ago which will help you to understand matters. I don't mean that I am not to blame. No doubt I have failed in tact and patience, and a thousand things, but the painful fact remains that we have not got on well together. Now I have left Lambford with Lady Fermor's knowledge, and come up to town to ask if you will take me in, till I see what is to become of me."

Of course Mrs. Haigh would take Iris in. What mistress of a boarding establishment, unless she were a very exceptional person, would refuse to receive a peer's grand daughter, looking as Iris looked, wearing the dress she wore, even if there had not been the old family connection of which Mrs. Haigh had boasted for the last fifteen years?

Mrs. Haigh was soon satisfied that Iris was neither impertinuous in the meantime, nor possessed by any romantic delusion of throwing herself on the devotion of ancient allies and living on air, her dignity, and their worshipping commiseration. When this important little item was agreeably settled to Mrs. Haigh's practical mind, she had nothing to disturb her but the apprehension of Lady Fermor's displeasure and that vague horror of the wrath of the combined aristocracy which was not without its breathless charm, like the coveted terror produced by an exciting ghost story. Certainly Mrs. Haigh was aware that Lady Fermor had been a very formidable, unmanageable person, though she ought by this time to be in her dotage. But whether doting or not, surely she would rather have her grand daughter in Fitzroy Square, with highly respectable people of whom her ladyship knew something, than wandering through the world without cha- peon or companion. Lady Fermor ought rather to feel relieved and grateful when she heard Mrs. Haigh's name mentioned as a temporary guardian for Miss Compton.

Having persuaded herself of this, Mrs. Haigh was at liberty to rejoice in the acquisition to her circle, even though her reason whispered it could not be permanent. Its reflected glad might long survive its actual existence, and while it lasted the mistress of the house could load Iris with overpowering attentions.

Iris was vexed that Mrs. Haigh would constantly speak of her and to her as "Lady Fermor's grand-daughter." The excellent woman would even betray at once her ignorance and vanity, by bestowing on Iris a handle to her name to which she was not entitled. Mrs. Haigh always called Iris the Honourable Miss Compton, and considered it foolish modesty and shyness—perhaps a little hauteur in disguise, when the girl first hinted, and then said plainly, that neither the Herald's Office, nor Debreit would authorise the use of such a privilege.

Iris was still more wounded when she had reason to suspect that Mrs. Haigh, in her incessant reference to Lambford and Lady Fermor, did not refrain from imparting in mysterious whispers to chosen members of her circle the scandals with which the name had been associated, or else by nods and shrugs and hinted innuendoes refreshed her ladies' and gentlemen's memories on the subject. She was irreproachable in her own morals, yet she seemed to take a warped pride in what she was pleased to view as aristocratic iniquities.

These ladies and gentlemen were perfectly respectable, better-class pensionnaires. Though the ladies had the priority by courteous phrase, the gentlemen were really the ruling power in the establishment, as they still are in the world. Whether married or single, from the bachelor confidential clerk in a tremendously great banking establishment to the retired clergyman and half-pay officer, they all paid board in full; and as they were the members of the establishment who were the most out of the house during the day, they were supposed to give least trouble to their hostess, while they were also the most profitable boarders. It was for the gentlemen's appetite and tastes that Mrs. Haigh in reality catered most sedulously, it was the gentlemen's evening rubber that she guarded from interruption most carefully.

Some of the spinsters were ladies in reduced circumstances, and paid Mrs. Haigh a smaller board for rooms nearer the sky, and for inferior attendance generally, with which, in strict justice and logic, these half-indigent gentlewomen ought to have been contented. But in point of fact they employed a considerable amount of their time in jealous inspection of the better position of their neighbours, and muttered grumbings over their own wants, or in high-fluting, ostentatious professions of indifference to circumstances, or else in judicious, assiduous attentions to their better-off companions—attentions which had their reward.

To the single ladies, more than all the other inhabitants of the house, Iris's advent was a windfall. For once the spinsters felt equal to the men and to the married women. The other maidens, however ancient, shared in the fuss made about this girl, as if it had been a tribute to the whole body of unprotected females. In return for the homage paid to her—or rather to Lady Fermor's grand-daughter—Iris made figuratively a series of courteous bows, and sought to possess her soul in patience like a princess on a royal progress. But, although in her faith, hope, and charity, which, after all the sneers liberally launched at these graces and their Christian origin, are as trustworthy touchstones as any that have yet been found for use in the motley crowd of life, Iris had no doubt that there was more than sufficient to respect, like, and inspire interest in her fellow-boarders, ■ one only knew them better, and held the clue ■ the true life beneath the conventional; still, looking only on the surface, she did not find anything to attract her particularly in any of the members of the large family under Mrs. Haigh's roof.

Iris was not overwhelmingly impressed by the rich, stiffened, silent, white-haired clerk of so great a banking-house, that even its first clerk was surrounded by a nimbus of golden influence and responsibility. She did not yield to the lively fascinations of Captain Boscawen, who knew all the gossip of the best society, and being affable, gallant, and chatty, was a favourite with most of the ladies. She was not even greatly touched by the Rev. Edward Calcott, a younger man than the first two heroes. He had been forced to retire from his vicar's charge on account of an abiding relaxed throat and weak chest, and was, therefore, as a clergyman and a confirmed invalid, invested with the double attributes of spiritual director and object of tender sympathy to every soft heart. Iris was sorry for him; but her heart was not so soft in this quarter as to prevent her perceiving that he was both self-conscious and self-indulgent; so she left the nursing of him to his wife, and kept her spiritual concerns out of his reach.

Iris was not more won by the ladies—from bluff Mrs. Judge Penfold, who, arguing from her title, had appropriated her husband's office as well as the reins of his phaeton, down ■ little Mrs. Rugely, the inconsolable pretty young widow, who, to the envy of the remaining men, sat bereft at the Rev. Edward's feet, yet was able to take the deepest interest ■ the exact fit of her widow's gown and the becoming shape of her bonnet, and pensively asked her friends' advice whether scarlet flowers were not admissible after the first stage of mourning was past. Her lost love had always preferred her with scarlet, and entire black was really too trying for a brunette complexion.

Iris had received a blow in finding Mrs. Haigh so unlike Miss Burrage, and the blow was not softened, neither was the likeness increased, on the only occasion when the girl spoke of her best friend to that friend's sister. Mrs. Haigh twinkled away a facile tear, indeed, and expressed her thankfulness for having had her dear Emily in Mrs. Haigh's house, to be waited upon by her during the good soul's last illness.

"It was a great privilege, Miss Compton; you who knew her, and who, I may say, was her pet pupil, can guess how uncomplaining, considerate, even cheerful, she was to the very last."

But Mrs. Haigh was honest in her thick-skinnedness, and absence of deep or delicate or abiding feeling. She added innocently enough in the next breath: "It was a mercy the illness was short, for it saved the dear saint a great deal of suffering; and to have had her lying long here, or even lingering on, neither ill nor well, unfit for duty, without a sufficient provision for her needs, a burden to herself and others—as, between ourselves, I think Mr. Calcott is sometimes, when he murmurs so at his chimney smoking, and objects to the piano being played after certain hours—would have been more than I could have undertaken, with my husband and children and the care of a boarding-house on my hands. When one comes to think of it all," reflected Mrs. Haigh with a species of complacency, "darling Emily was not suited for this world. She was an excellent creature, but she was painfully plain from a girl. She had ability and accomplishments; but she had no manners that I could see, though, of course, we know she lived in the best society. She could not relish what most people enjoy; to dress what I call well became a bore to her. She was not fond of shopping or calling or dining out, and hardly cared for a box or a stall ■ the opera or the theatre, unless the play or the opera, as well as the singers and actors, chanced to be exceptional. She potted about more than she was able among hum-drum, fallen-down people she had known long ago, or sick or poor people. She had a regard for out-of-the-way churches and eccentric clergymen that few people save herself had heard of or cared for. Put her down with a book she liked and her work, and the world held little more attraction for her. No, poor dear Emily was not a woman for this world. She was a woman to ■ overlooked and slighted—which she did not mind, for she had rather a lack of spirit and proper pride. She was apt to be smiled at, for she had her little peculiarities, dear soul! though she was my sister—and jostled against and trampled upon, as the world goes. I trust she is far better off where she has gone, poor love."

"She was a woman of whom the world was not worthy, Mrs. Haigh," said Iris hotly.

To compare Miss Burrage ■ Mr. Calcott! To have been capable of thinking of her as a possible burden, and so finding her premature death in one light a boon, instead of wrestling with God that the loved presence might be spared for a season, and yearning to keep it here so long as life lingered in the feeble frame, and sense and love on the peaceful, wasted brow and lips! What would not Iris have given to have seen her old friend's dear face again, though it had come but in a vision of the night, to have heard her wise, gentle counsel, though it had been only in a dream!

Iris was not disappointed in Mr Haigh as she was in Mrs. Haigh. He was only Miss Burrage's brother-in-law, by Mrs. Haigh's election, not a member of Miss Burrage's family, of the same father and mother, and of kindred blood. Besides, Iris had retained a dim recollection of him—more correct in all respects than her early vision of his wife as a lively, handsome young man, who had petted her and been very affectionate to Miss Burrage.

Mr. Haigh was the cipher that Iris had always remembered him. He sat at the foot of the table and did the principal carving. He kept the gentlemen company when the ladies had retired. He was safe for a partner at whist, unless somebody else wished to make up the party. He could serve as a tolerable second when the boarders happened to be musical and a second was in request. He dabbled a little in art, so as to have the retrous ■ a few studios, and afford the benefit of his opinion ■ any amateur artist in the house. He had the same intangible connection with the theatres and opera houses, so that he could always procure tickets, boxes and stalls, and predict what a play would turn out, when the mass of the public was helpless and voiceless. Mr Haigh had been educated abroad, and possessed an additional advantage, of which he was rather vain. He was tolerably conversant with several European languages. He could serve on a punch as an amateur counsellor by anticipation to inexperienced projectors of continental tours.

In any other position, Mr. Haigh might have been a purely ornamental member of society, but as the spouse of a lady who kept an upper-class boarding-house, he was almost the right man in the right place—while Iris had never imagined she would get anything more than a host's gentlemanlike notice from Mr. Haigh.

But Mrs. Haigh had children who were also Miss Burrage's nephews and nieces. They were all at school save one, Juliana, or Ju-ju, the eldest daughter, a girl of nineteen, to whom Iris turned eagerly. But, alas! Ju-ju was more like her well-bred lymphatic father than her mother—far less her aunt. Ju-ju's chief end in life seemed ■ be ■ comply with all the obligations of the most finished young ladyhood in the fashion of the day, under such difficulties as limited means and the necessity for the family's keeping boarders implied. Ju-ju took her stand on her father's and mother's claims to gentility as educated people, the children of a clergyman of the Church of England on the one hand, and a captain in the army on the other. She ignored the stems that Mrs. Haigh had been a governess like her sister and that Mr Haigh had failed in succession as a barrister, an operatic singer, an artist and a playwright. Ju-ju was inclined to make out that her father and mother kept a boarding house for their private pleasure. She did nothing save sit embroidering the artistic, elaborate embroidery of the hour, and attend to her toilet to the minutest details of the rosette on her French shoe, and the extra button on her prettily buttoned glove.

She was neither pitty nor plain, though she had a good figure, and felt the more persuaded on that account that dress was of the first consequence to her.

Iris Compton contemplated Ju-ju from a puzzled mental and moral distance, with the puzzle deepened by the fact that the girl was Miss Burrage's niece. How could personal enjoyment and the idler trifles engross her wholly? What was she thinking of when she sat calmly applying herself for so many hours to this costly fancy work, while her mother, behind backs, was really cumbered with the care of her servants, the burden of house-keeping for a large, disconnected, troublesome family, and the worry of account books which frequently refused to "square"? And what became of all the splendid and delicate embroidery, of which only a few finished specimens appeared in the shape of table-covers and cushions in the drawing-room? Did Ju-ju simply work it to train and gratify her hand and eye, and then wantonly destroy it, or did she bestow it as presents on all her absent friends?

Iris found out the enigma at the same time that she hit upon a little opening for her own unprovided-for future, which was beginning to weigh heavily upon her mind.

In vain had Iris asked Mrs. Haigh's advice about what she ought to do to earn a little money Mrs Haigh was convinced that Iris's illustrious relations would not permit such an indignity. Miss Compton would only require to hint to them that her coffers were becoming empty to have them filled again to overflowing.

In vain Iris frankly approached the subject with some of the other ladies—counting on them as a sort of informal women's friendly society. She was always stopped by their smiling and pooh-poohing her. They would not have their peer's grand-daughter pulled down from her pedestal, or else they regard her prospects with regard to working for her bread as so hopeless, that they preferred not to discuss them with her. In fact they told her it was lowering herself to hint at such an alternative, almost as much as if she were to propose to borrow money from them.

At the same time Iris found to her dismay that life in a Fitzroy Square boarding house, apart from the board, was a great deal dearer than life in Lambford. Everybody overdressed, punctiliously, with studied variety for dinner. In the light of Mrs Judge Penfold's brocade and diamonds the one day and velvet and pearls the next, Mrs Rugely's diaphanous black and jet, or gold, and Ju-ju Hugh's earnestly thought out, subtle harmonies in strange, wonderful stuffs and tints from art shops, her beads from Venice, her amber and shagreen work from Damascus—all bought in London town, for Ju-ju had been no traveller—Iris was more than outshone. In such a white India muslin, with turquois ornaments, as had dazzled Sir William Swaithe, or in such a blue silk, festooned with hops, as would have been voted decidedly "swishish" by the Hollies at Thoinbrike, and pronounced perfectly exquisite by the Actons at the Rectory, she knew she looked shabby, stately monotonous in costume.

Iris had the impression that she was playing at being a grand demoiselle in an effeminate, luxurious, extravagant court. She tried to resist, but she was a young woman without a home, and had to yield something to what Mrs Haigh called "the rules of the house." She was forced, like the poor ladies, to waste a great deal of time in contriving still transparent devices, for her dress must muster among the elaborate shifting toilets of the company.

It was on an errand to procure some not so costly, gauzy transformation, that Iris, who had from the first claimed the liberty of walking out by herself without becoming a mutual drag and fetter either on Mrs Haigh or Ju-ju, visited such a monster shop of all wares as is a remarkable feature of the London of to-day. It was a little of an enterprise even for so fearless a girl as Iris to enter one of the many doors, fall into a stream of purchasers, pass down the streets of counters and be bewildered by the different departments of the business in story after story, of the blocks of buildings.

Iris felt so small and so swallowed up, that she uttered a little cry of pleasure when she discovered Ju-ju Haigh at a counter on which the exquisite materials for some of her embroidery were displayed.

Ju-ju could not be said to return the compliment by sharing in the gratification. She reddened and had a constrained air while the girls exchanged half a dozen words. Iris would have passed on, but the crush of buyers and sellers was great here, and she could not advance many steps before one of the elder shop-women, or ladies of the establishment as they prefer to be called, came to Miss Haigh and delivered a courteous verbal message, "If the piece be done by next week, madam" (old-fashioned modes of address have acquired fresh life and new associations in connection with London shops), "Mrs Cree says it will be in time enough for the Countess."

Ju-ju met Iris's surprised eyes and immediately turned aside, crimsoning from brow to throat, through the pearl powder which she and young Mrs. Rugely and elderly Mrs Judge Penfold and Mrs Haigh and poor Miss Swan, the poorest of the poor ladies, did not hesitate to use, though as yet they stopped short of rouge.

But Ju-ju showed no further inclination to be left alone, on the contrary she hurried over her business, offered Iris her valuable aid in a purchase, and seemed even anxiously desirous of bearing Miss Compton company in her walk home.

The motive was soon explained. Whenever the girls got into the quieter streets, Ju-ju spoke with almost painful earnestness "You have found me out, Miss Compton, without being able to help me. I embroider at home for Mr. Blackburn's art department. I dare say you have observed that I work rather closely, though embroidery is a pleasure to me also. Other people in the house have noticed it, though of course nobody asks any questions. My mother can only afford me a small allowance. I could not dress and go out like other girls, if I had not an additional income. I assure you many girls design or embroider on private commissions, which are the best, as they are for friends, or for the art schools where the girls have been taught, or for art departments in some of the great shops, and nobody outside is any wiser. The rage for art work is such a boon to people who would not think of working in any other fashion. Art work can be done by any lady without loss of caste, and if you will believe me, many ladies do it for pay who are in no want of money, as I am sorry to say I am. Some of these are connected with the nobility as you are, and, for the most part, they do not care though it is known they embroider for money. They laugh and boast of it, and are as proud of their earnings as if they were sumo gained at Monte Carlo, or the payment of wagers, or the prices of books or pictures which the girls had written or painted. But it is a different thing when working is a necessity. I don't think I should work if I had a good allowance or a rich father," admitted Juju, "and I believe in my case, it is certainly much better to say nothing about it. So, Miss Compton, I shall be very much obliged if you will not mention what has come to your knowledge to-day—not even to my mother, though I need not say she is aware of my arrangement and has given her full consent to it."

This was a revelation to Iris, but she did not stop to inquire if the game were worth the candle. She did not weigh against each other the false pride of girls like Juju Haigh, who eked out their means and supplied themselves with foolish extravagances by labouring in strict secrecy for tinsel—not bread, and the childish vanity of the wealthy aristocratic girls who vaunted their uncalled-for achievements in the shape of working, at will, for a few sovereigns, twice the number of which the workwomen wasted every day they lived. It just crossed Iris's mind that there was a performance resembling this on the part of the ladies of the French noblesse before the great revolution, when dainty fingers ostentatiously unravelled gold thread in lace which had decorated coats of husbands or brothers, or sons, and sold it as bullion. But she drew no inference from the comparison.

Iris did not even speculate how it comes that to work at art designs and marvels of embroidery, can be more honourable than to work at the homeliest useful work, which is of still greater necessity to the welfare of the world than the coin with which the primitive toil is remunerated, she only thought that she too could do this art work, while she might not be fit for any other. She had delighted as a simple matter of taste, when she was a girl at ease, in the revival of art embroidery. She had practised it with enthusiasm, and had attained some local eminence by her performances. She had watched Juju's achievements with intelligent admiration, and had been able to offer her available suggestions and help sometimes. Now Iris ventured to propose, a little breathlessly in her excitement, "Could I do any thing for Blackburn's? Would they care to employ me? I should be glad—thankful if they would try me. I need not say I would do my best to give them satisfaction."

Juju received the proposal more graciously and encouragingly than her mother and the other ladies had met Iris's candid statements of the obligation on her to find work and wages. Juju, confident in her own skill and experience, feared no competition in her special province, while she was ready to clutch at another example to prove that lady-like girls, even girls connected with the nobility, freely adopted her calling.

Juju readily undertook to communicate with Blackburn and exhibit some specimens of Iris's capability as a nineteenth century Atachne. Mrs Haigh shook her head and was troubled by the anomaly, but Juju had sufficient influence over her mother to prevent her doing more.

Blackburn was a genius in his line, he kept all the strings to his bow and all the arteries of his vast organization under his personal inspection and control. He had found the secret of success, in the path which he had struck out, to be in universal applicability and novelty. He had boasted that he could furnish on due notice whatever the heart of man or woman could desire—whether the customer were a prince or a princess, a dock labourer or a charwoman, and he had reclaimed his pledge by providing an elephant within four-and-twenty hours of its being asked for on one extraordinary occasion. He was proud of his last development in an aristocratic art region. He magnanimously enjoyed soliciting the idleness of rich, the sorrows of poor gentility, that would never recognize him and his, in spite of his celebrity and wealth, as the equals and privileged associates of its members. He relished highly as Fouche did, counting in his pay some of the nobility, who were also among the chief purchasers of his rarest and best adaptations from Worth.

Iris did not know how much she owed to her grandfather and grandmo-when, to her great relief and something like happy bewilderment, she found herself at once approved of and appointed on Blackburn's staff. She was even intrusted with very valuable materials, including an idea of a screen in three panels, with a suitable moral, by a world-known artist, the cartoon to be destroyed as soon as a single copy was worked. One panel displayed Arachne "in her earlier humanity, carried away by conceit in her weaving, the second gave the cowering foolish weaver woman brought face to face with the great goddess Minerva, whom she had dared to challenge to a trial of skill, and the third represented Minerva looking down in supreme contempt on the humble spider and her web, all that remained of the presumptuous Arachne" and the product of her loom. Long afterwards Iris was wont to view that trophy of bold, true, delicate if formal lines, traced in softest, richest silks, with many mingled feelings. In the meantime it was a congenial occupation, as well as a bracing effort at independence, for Iris ■ work faithfully and lovingly at the great artist's fancy.

Iris needed this help for her heart and mind, her faith and patience, while the summer was yet young, since every day the weather was growing warmer and the season drawing nearer to its climax. The garden in Fitzroy Square, which had been a pleasant oasis in the dreary desert of stone and lime when Iris came, became prematurely sere, yellow, and brown in its lack of country freshness, country freedom, country wholesomeness of gradual bountiful growth and decay.

The society of the boarding house had lost its strangeness to Iris, but it had also become more and more irksome with a constant reminder that she was out of her element among people whom she neither judged, nor condemned, nor despised, but not one of whom bore much more than a human, national, tolerably civilised affinity to her, in her nature, beliefs, and habits.

Many of the residents in the house were going away with Juju Hugh to pay visits to the sea side, to Normandy, or the Engadine. Iris's choice of society, such as it was, began to narrow just as she had a craving for it to widen. She would be left almost alone in the white dusty streets by the time she thrustured intensely for a quiet, sandy-coloured country road running along a reddish, purplish green stretch of common or down, the shade of trees, the cool ripple of water, the yellow corn-fields ripening to harvest.

The figure of an old woman, loveless and unloved in her solitary age, sitting at home in her cheerless great house, or driving out by herself in her close carriage on her monotonous round, had reproached Iris, from the first, many a time. The reproach was more than half morbid, for Lady Fermor had never shown that she cared for her grand-daughter's company and she had driven Iris from her, by persecution and panic, which might have worn the girl into her grave, or carried her to a mad house.

CHAPTER XXXI.—AGE PLEADS.

Iris had been out for a little more air and a saunter in the greater space of Regent's Park, when just as she re-entered the house she met Mrs. Haigh in such a state of consternation that the girl's roused imagination could fancy no smaller calamities had occurred than the kitchen chimney on fire ■ the destruction of the eight o'clock dinner, or the first clerk in the great banking house having announced his intention to set up an establishment of his own. But Mrs. Haigh speedily undeceived her. "Oh, my dear Miss Compton, she is here. Lady Fermor is here, and I dared not attempt to deceive her about your being with us, indeed, she did not ask, she simply said, 'Take me to Miss Compton,' and she walked straight into the drawing-room, dismissing me with a nod, and staring about her without troubling to return the bows of the assembled ladies to whom I gave her a general introduction. They have all left the room, and she is sitting there alone, for Haigh has declined to have anything to do with her. I am afraid you must go to her and find out what she wants. If ■ is anything reasonable, if she wishes to board here along with you, I will do my best, though I do not know if Mrs. Judge Penfold and the rest will consent to be ignored, even by a viscountess—your grandfather was a viscount, wasn't he, dear Miss Compton? not an earl, as I am always inclined to make him—when they are all private ladies. If she thinks your board too high, though the times are terribly expensive——"

"I do not think that will ■ the reason of her coming, Mrs. Haigh. I shall go to her at once."

The thought of her grandmother away from Lambford from which she had not stirred for a dozen years, had a great effect on Iris. Whatever the person most concerned may have felt, it was a shock to her descendant when she saw the aged woman rooted up from ■ her old surroundings. Iris had been accustomed to think of her grandmother as about as stationary and constant in her attributes and actions as the fixed stars. Therefore the contrast was great of finding Lady Fermor seated uncomfortably in a chair which was the opposite of her own ■ Lambford, with Mrs. Rugely's easel at one side and Mrs. Calcott's basket heaped with the babies' socks and pinafores which she was always manufacturing for charitable bazaars on the other, and Mrs. Judge Penfold's dog barking and Ju ju's kitten putting up its tail as if ■ assail the intruder. Iris's heart smote her, and she advanced quickly ■ her persecutress, crying out, "Oh! grandmamma, I am sorry I have given you so much trouble, if you have come up to town on my account."

"You may be sorry," said Lady Fermor emphatically, extending two fingers to her grand daughter. "I have come a long journey on your account. I am here to fetch you away, so you had better get ready as soon as possible, and not keep me waiting longer than you can help. The carriage is at the door."

Iris was taken aback. This was not like the scoffing leave to go, which had been granted ■ her in their last meeting. To return ■ Lambford, though she had not been very happy in Kitaroy Square was never what Iris ■d intended, all the old objections to her residence with her grandmother, which had grown unbearable, might still remain in full force. The loathed apparition of Major Pollock, of which she had got rid lately, seemed to rise again before her and make her flesh creep. For anything Iris knew he might have come up with her grandmother to London, he might be in the carriage outside, ready to spring upon her, in a figure. She could not resign herself again to the old tyranny, the old taunts and indignities which had threatened to thrust her on the most miserable fate that could befall a woman, not for her native air and the place and the people she had known and loved so long, not for Lucy Acton, who had expressed herself by letter as dubious of the step Iris had taken, even while condoling with her most sincerely on the causes which had led to it, could Iris make ■ bootless sacrifice. But the assurance of the shrivelled-up wreck of a woman before her staggered Iris, and caused her to hesitate what to say or do.

Lady Fermor delivered herself of a gesture of impatience and called out harshly, "Have I not stooped enough, girl? Would you have me humble myself in the dirt to tell you I'll never mention poor old Pollock's name to you again? If you had not been a puma, scared idiot, you would have known it was not in earnest. I have got one of my other grand-daughters, Marianne Dugdale, to be a companion for you. I have taken a house in Kensington that you may spend a few weeks in town, before all the world is gone, in a manner more befitting your antecedents. Afterwards I am thinking of a little trip ■ Burton or Scarborough or Scotland—I am not too stiff to accomplish it—and let you two girls have the benefit of it. I dare say you will turn up your noses, because Buxton is not Spa or Homburg, and Scarborough Comptagne, or any other French place frequented by the empress, and Scotland Norway. But I can tell you, when I was young a girl would have counted such an excursion an opening for making her fortune and a wonderful stroke of good luck."

"It is kind of you to put yourself about," faltered Iris, not ■ all sure how her words would be taken. "We are much obliged to you. If I could only flatter myself you wanted me, you really wanted me, grandmamma," said Iris, with a more uncontrollable break in her voice.

"Oh! as to that," said Lady Fermor, carelessly shaking out her sable lined cloak, and giving a twitch to the strings of a new and striking lilac satin bonnet, "I got on very well by myself. You need not flatter yourself that you are of so much consequence. ■ was Thwaite, who came over and dug into me to go and see after you," with a keen glance at Iris.

"It was very good of Sir William to think of me," said Iris simply.

"Oh! yes, we're all kind and good now, when you've had your swing, and we're ready to look over and make the best of a girl's incredible folly. Thwaite brought Marianne Dugdale and me to town, but you need not thank him for it. I imagine he has taken a fancy to Marianne, and though she's a goose, like the rest of her kind, she won't be so goosey, perverse, and infatuated as ■ hold out against lawful authority, and a thousand advantages far beyond what she could hope for. By-the bye, I hope Marianne's having stepped into your shoes, both with regard ■ Lambford and Whitechapel, will not interfere with your throwing down your arms, and submitting to your natural superior," wound up Lady Fermor, fixing Iris with a wily, glittering eye.

"No, no," said Iris hastily, falling into the trap forthwith, lifting up her head involuntarily, unconscious of a bright spot rising on each cheek. "Why should ■? But there are some other things to be thought of."

"Out with them. Am I to go down on my knees to beg your pardon?" with a feeble movement to rise from her chair. "I have long thought the world was upside down, and this will only be the reversal of our natural position. Come, let me get over it as soon as possible. I should not mind it, if my old knees were not so rheumatic."

"Grandmamma, I beseech you don't," implored Iris, in terror lest Lady Fermor should carry out her horrible mockery. "How could you think or say such a thing? I only wished to tell you that I have paid my board, and Mrs. Haigh has made arrangements for me remaining much longer. I cannot help disappointing her perhaps, but I ought not to let her suffer otherwise."

"Humph! very impertinent in her to have anything to say to you at all, and still more impertinent to go on forming plans without consulting your friends, but we must take that with the rest. I'll settle with the lodging or boarding-house keeper, or whatever she is. Any more stipulations?"

"I have taken in work, art work, from Blackburn's, and I have expensive materials to account for, as well as the piece I undertook to embroider."

"Good gracious, Iris! were you mad? How could you disgrace yourself, and me, in such a manner?" cried Lady Fermor, stumbling to her feet. "You might have gone on the boards with less scandal, if ever such an act of low-lived absurdity come to light. We must drive instantly to the shop, and buy up all you had to do with—only buying up will stop the man's mouth, and though it were half the shop the sacrifice must be made. When I engage in a thing I go through with it. But your vagary is likely to cost me a pretty penny, Miss Compton, in addition to aching bones. You had better think twice—or rather I hope you will be off my hands before you engage in another. After the good education you had—even though that woman Burrage was a fanatic—to descend to the gutter by taking in work from a public shop!"

It was plain that in Lady Fermor's old-fashioned estimation, art needlework was not a whit better than white seams, and she considered that Iris Compton had let herself sink, in the course of six or eight weeks, to the level of a shirt-maker or slop-worker.

It was like a dream to Iris to find herself snatched away from Fitzroy Square. She left Mrs. Haigh in a manner consoled by the spectacle of the coroneted carriage at the door, and the undying recollection that Lady Fermor had called in person for her granddaughter, though her ladyship had not behaved quite so well on the occasion as might have been hoped for from a viscountess.

It was not so much as if the present—it was rather as if the recent past—were a dream, when Iris found herself sitting in her old place, listening to the old high-handed talk and vituperation. But as Iris told herself, what could she have done after the chief grievance was removed, and her grandmother had bound herself to keep the peace, than return to her duty, and wear again the yoke of her youth?

The house which Lady Fermor had taken off its former tenant's hands, for the last few weeks of the season, was at Kensington Gore. It was beyond the precincts of Belgravia, and beyond the Knightsbridge art studios and the barracks, which, following the example of the ubiquitous mews, invade select territories. Its windows did not give a false idea, as they looked full on the refreshment and refuge of the grand old leafy gardens. The glittering pinnacles of the Queen and country's memorial to a good prince, with his other monument, the huge ugly dome of the Albert Hall, promising unlimited music, and the pile upon pile of the second national museum, offering numberless antiquities, pictures, the Raphael cartoons, were all close at hand. So was the Row, with its mid-day horses and riders, and so was Hyde Park with its afternoon stream of carriages, and not very far off was the Broad Wall, that noblest avenue in which old court beauties, for I reach emerge, the world of fashion and letters, once came to see and be seen, to sun themselves, and shine as lesser luminaries, reflecting welcome rays on the obscure world crowding to gaze and stare at the town lions.

Iris had never before lived in such a charmed region, where the hours might well seem too short for the attractions which claimed them, but she hardly noticed it, at first, she was so full of excitement and anxiety about her cousin, Marianne Dugdale. Lady Fermor had been plagued by few scruples in calling this other grandchild to her side, but Iris retained a pained recollection of what her grandmother had said with regard to the light in which the Dugdales and the Powells must regard her, Iris. They might owe some charity to their grandmother, but they owed none to her. She was only a rival claimant for Lady Fermor's bounty, the grand-daughter of the man who had foully wronged their grandfather. It was a case of family guilt and alienation which could hardly be repaired even between the harmless representatives of succeeding generations.

BETWEEN THE HEATHER AND THE NORTHERN SEA

BY M. LINSKILL, AUTHOR OF HAGAR, ROBERT HOLT'S ILLUSION, ETC.

CHAPTER IX.—A FIRESIDE SCENE

GENEVIEVE went into the little lamp-lit sitting-room. Her father was there, leaning forward in his chair in the old wearied way. George rose quickly to place another chair for her. Then all at once, with a great rush there came back upon her brain the reasons she had had for going to Yarrall Croft, the weeks of pain, the unanswered letters, the returned pictures. Was it possible that she had forgotten—even for an instant? When she realised that for nearly two hours she had never once thought of all this strange trouble that had fallen into her father's life her forgetfulness, her seeming selfishness smote her like a treachery, and the fact that she had been preoccupied became a motive for such strong self-blame that her mind was for a moment drawn away from the thing that had caused her preoccupation.

She sat there quite still, quite silent, while George told of the unsuccessfulness of his visit. He did not go into details or repeat Miss Richmond's words. He confined himself almost entirely to an admission of the fact that he had failed in his enterprise, and to a few remarks expressive of surprise at his failure. As he spoke he was watching Genevieve with even more than his usual intentness and with some concern. He had detected the change that a few hours had written on her face.

Her father's eyes were not undiscerning. "Change your dress, dear, and be as quick as you can—it will be here in ten minutes. When I shall scold you and after that I shall make out a list of distances which you may not pass. You are exhausted. I can see that plain."

In a very few minutes Genevieve came down. She was passing into another mood now. There was a calmer and stronger look on her face, a look as when one recognises a new condition of things that changes all the old for ever, and, though she was still pale, her paleness was not pallor, as it had been. She had put on a pink dress rather a gay dress than she would have chosen to wear under the thatched roof of her store. had not been getting low, but she had chosen it to please her father—partly to please him, and partly for that inscrutable reason which not even a woman can define, but which is nevertheless existent, a reason that makes itself felt most decisively in the negations of an absolute poverty. Sartre Resartus and modern æstheticism notwithstanding the "Chesters philosophy" is as far from being understood as ever.

A woman does not need to understand it, it is enough for her, and often more than enough, that she has clear instincts. Genevieve's own instincts were very clear, but she did not always obey them and they were used to being thwarted. The fact that she was unusually well dressed this evening was supporting rather than annoying as under other circumstances it might have been. She had brushed her yellow, rippling hair into a more careless and artistic arrangement, her deep, dark eyes were bright and expressive of new and inexpressible meanings. Her gracious and graceful ways were filled with a new intensity. Every moment seemed to be a moment of fuller life—fuller meaning than the last. It was as if you could hear the life of the hour as the flame of existence went upward.

"And now tell me where you have been this afternoon?" her father said when Keturah had finally disappeared. The scolding I promised you shall remain in my memory since you do not seem to be the worst for your four hours' walk. You have been listening to Wilfred Stuart's violin, of that I feel assured. You look as if you were listening to it yet.

"Will you ask him to come up and play for me to-morrow?"

"Then you have not been there?"

"No. I have not been there. I have been to David Croft."

It was a noticeable silence each man hid his face.

You are a very curious child, said Mr. Tholomeus presently. He looked up with a grave look on his face as he spoke. "Now and then I feel moved to a fresh thankfulness that you are so good! If you had not been good you would have been——"

"Very bad?"

"No, but very troublesome, because so incalculable. I never seem to know what you will do next."

"Do you ever fear?"

"No, I do not need to fear. But what the same tell me what took you to Yarrall Croft?"

"An impulse."

"That, of course, and the impulse concerned the pictures, that, of course also. How long had Mr Kirkoswald been gone when you got there?"

"About a quarter of an hour," said Genevieve, looking up at George with a direct and unflinching gaze, which he perceived to be not without bitterness, not without sadness, not without a consummate disdain. It was only a look, but an entire revelation was in it. He knew now that there was nothing left to be revealed by him. Was his cup full at last?

"I need hardly ask any more questions," Bartholomew said clasping his hands wearily on the arm of his chair. "If you had had any message of peace you would not have kept me till now. Let the matter drop, then, let us be for this one night as if it did not exist. Perhaps I have been foolish—stupid. I think I feel a little as if my brain were overgrown by the moccasins of Mark Twain."

"Would it enlive your brain if you were to go and have a cigar in the kitchen, father? I think how long it is since Katharine has had the pleasure of your company—and your smoke, and remember how she delights in the latter."

"Which you do not?"

"Not in doors, but out-of-doors, as you know, I can endure to any extent."

"I perceive you wish me to go."

"Which does credit to the acuteness of a more grown perception."

Bartholomew went away, wondering, not a little, but there was no wonder working in George Kirkoswald's brain. He was standing near the fire, resting one arm on the edge of the mantel shelf. His face was calm, and somewhat pale, his deep-set eyes were filled with heaviness, and pain, and perplexity. He lifted them as Genevieve came and stood before him. He was intensely conscious of the soft sweep of her dress, the droop of her shining hair, of the new tenderness of her every movement.

"Will you not sit down?" he said, placing her chair nearer the fire.

"No, thank you. I will stand," she replied, clasping her hands with an apparent lightness, and lifting them full before her. "It will not be for long. I have only a few words to say, and I perceive that I will be less difficult to say them than I had anticipated. . . . You are prepared for them?"

She spoke without bitterness, without hardness, but the effort she used was apparent in every breath she drew—in every intonation of every word. At the last she had almost failed in her utterance, yet she looked into the face before her coldly and steadily.

"I am not prepared for anything," George replied, speaking with an emotion almost as evident as his own. "I have been trying to prepare myself, but I have failed. Of course, I know what it is that you want to say. You have learnt from Miss Richmond that once—some years ago—I was engaged to her. I can only hope that she has told you the whole of the matter, not a part only. And since you have heard her version of it, you will hardly refuse to hear mine, that is, so much of it as I can tell you?"

Genevieve stood listening to him, pale, patient, courteous.

"Pardon me, I have not heard Miss Richmond's version of the matter," she said, speaking with dignity. "And I would prefer not to hear yours. I should be glad—it would be a relief to me—if I might know no more than I know now. No peace could come of it. There could only be confusion, perplexity. Forgive me for saying that I have said enough of these."

George stood looking silently into the fire for a few moments. Then he lifted his face and spoke again.

"It would be a pity if our understanding should deepen between us for the need of a few words," he said. "And since I know that I have been to blame, since my error has struck me in a way I never expected it to strike, you will let me speak for myself. A criminal may do that."

He went on to speak, he told the story of his life's mistake as it had repeated itself to him on that day when he had received Diana Richmond's letter. Then he spoke of the letter itself, and of all that had happened since, of his own silence, his own suffering, his own suspense, last of all of his own love—his passion, his yearning, unrelenting love.

"Such love is not so common in the world," he said, "that a man or woman should trifle with it when it is given. You shall find a thousand lives that are being lived out to the last without once for one hour having been uplifted by such love as mine is for you. I have been to blame, but it is not until one has erred, and deeply, that one finds—"

It was a fearful effort
To love what we will and to love, we will
In us.

And you must see that my error has been of the understanding. I am a man wholly responsible for the women, tangled web he calls his life? But responsible or not, will you not take my life as it is?" the man said with a great tenderness breathing across his words "Will you not take it as it is with all its past mistakes, its present imperfections? Will such a love as mine cover nothing? I tell you truly I have never loved before, not with any love of heart to heart, of soul to soul, of spirit to spirit. There is another love which is of the sunset wholly and that love I have known, but I tell you in sorrow that I have known it only to wonder at it, to be perplexed, appalled by its unsatisfyingness, its incapacity to afford a man's soul one hour of any true rest or peace. Having known it thus, could I fail to know the higher love when it came? could I fail to bend before it in reverence—in a great and solemn and glad gratitude? My life since I have known you has been what it never was before, what it can never be again, if this days event has wrought any change in a love I trusted would never change while life should last."

So he pled, but even as he spoke his heart failed him and a cruel burning flush of pain came over his face as he noted the still revolting look on the face before him. Was it possible that now, when explanation had been made, when all was confessed—repented of, when there was no longer any mystery, any doubt, any hindrance, was it possible that now he should find that he had touched the end—the end of his life's last hope and its best? This could not be, he went on pleading. Had he no perception of the fact that his persistence at that moment was a mistake?

Did no voice whisper to him that Genevieve was still suffering under the first shock of finding suddenly that he had loved another—loved passionately, and with duration in his passion, for so Miss Richmond had implied in that quietly uttered admission of hers?

Blow upon blow had fallen. Genevieve did not doubt anything he said now, but he had not denied aught that Drina Richmond had said, he had merely added further facts. It was true that he had loved her—that he had loved her long, and his love had changed, had died out utterly, leaving him capable of loving again with equal strength, equal passion—why not equal mutability?

That he could change, that he could love now one woman and now another, was not a thing that a nature like Genevieve Bartholomew's could recognise with light equanimity.

"I do not doubt one word that you have said," she replied in answer to a question he had asked. She was still trying to speak quietly, dispassionately, but she felt that her quietness was turning to stoniness by reason of the force it needed. "I do not doubt you," she said "and I do not blame you I blame no one but myself."

"Then since you do not doubt me what is it that is to come between us now?"

"I am hoping that nothing need come between us. Genevieve replied, I find her beautiful face and raising her eyes to his so that he could not fail to see the huge sincerity written there. "That was why I used my father to leave me for awhile that I might ask you to be my friend all that you have ever been—a friend, a strength, a satisfaction. It may not be for long—I hope it will not. I mean to try to persuade him to leave this neighbourhood as soon as may be. Meanwhile will you come as usual? I will be as a favour. Another thing that I would like is that you should say nothing to him of what has happened to day."

But could he not mistake her meaning? Why would he not accept her proposition, or at least seem to accept it? Why since he had waited so long, could he not let himself wait and to wait for a little longer?

"I could not do what you ask," he said, his voice faltering and breaking as he spoke. "I have not strength enough for that. Genevieve have you forgotten? Did I not tell you, did I not warn you that your faith in me might be tried to the uttermost? It has been tried to the uttermost I know."

"And beyond," said Genevieve, with trembling, vibrating tones in her decisive words. "Beyond the uttermost, and it endures to the last. Is it my doom, that it has been suddenly struck dead?"

"And your love with it?"

"And my love with it."

There was a long silence in the little room. George turned and buried his face in his hands. The fire burnt low, the lamp was dim. Genevieve still stood by the table, growing paler and paler, feeling the gull growing wider and wider. It had widened with every wild unwilling word she had uttered, yet it was as if every sentence impelled her to the utterance of another that should be more final, more determined, more pitiless than the last. What was it that had come upon her? What strange perversity? What unprecedented and wayward inexorableness? Had he turned at that moment, had he taken her hand in his and drawn her to his side with tender force, he had met with little resistance.

Her love dead! It had never yearned and trembled toward him so passionately, so fervidly as it did at that moment. Had it not been for that word that she had said she had fallen ■ his feet as ■ stood there, and she had cried aloud to him, and her cry had been for forgiveness.

He spoke again presently. The flush of pain had gone from his face, he was paler, stronger, calmer.

"Let me ask you one thing," he said. "Have you any fear now that Mrs Richmond may carry out her threats? Do you dread that?"

Genevieve smiled. The question roused all the waywardness, the bitterness in her again.

"Can you imagine it?" she said. "Can you ever imagine that I should dread anything Miss Richmond might choose to say? Is not my name ■ fair in the world's ears as Diana Richmond's name? Would not any word or deed of mine justify itself before men as readily as any word or deed of hers? Does one then live a blameless life for nothing? . . . I have never yet needed to dread the breath of slander and detraction, let me jumpy that I never shall!"

"This was but an added sting. He might have known it all, he told himself, he might have trusted that so Genevieve Bartholomew would have met any possibility of being misunderstood. Having nothing to risk, nothing ■ dread, she could not have met it otherwise. ■ he argued now, not forgetting that he had used another argument not so long ago. Still he had tried to do right. He could only say sadly, bitterly—

"I might have known it—I might have known it!"

"Yes, I think you might have known so much as that," Genevieve said with quieting lips. "Had I known how things were I might have asked that you should have had faith in me."

"I had faith ■ you. My error arose out of my not perceiving that a ten times larger faith would not have been misplaced," George said, speaking with a new and more vehement earnestness. "I perceived later. What I did not know then I know now. I know it now, and you say that ■ is too late. . . . But you will unway it—you will unway that one word. Let all else stand if you will, but not that, do not say that you cannot forgive—that you cannot forget. . . . You say that your love for me is dead; that cannot be—it cannot be. It may seem so ■ you, but it cannot be so. No true love dies, not here nor elsewhere. . . . Tell me, Genevieve, tell me that it was your pain—the pain I had caused you, that stung you into saying that."

He had come a little nearer to her as he spoke; his eyes were lifted to hers, intense with yearning, with wistfulness, with an infinite humility. His lip trembled as he said the last sentence, which was so directly and closely near to the truth that Genevieve's eyes quivered under her eyelids as she heard it. Yet still the day's pain was upon her, it had struck through her whole being, warping her mental fibre, turning her from her better and truer, her wiser and tenderer self. When she saw a hand held out to take hers—held out in loving beseechingness, she lifted her eyes from ■ to George's face with something of disdain. Was ■ disdain? Could it have been aught else? Could ■ have been fear for instance—fear of love's strong domination? George did not ask. Wounded, pierced to the very heart of him, he drew back.

"I will urge you no more," he said.

And the reply came swiftly.

"Then I thank you."

CHAPTER LV.—"IS ALL OUR FIRE OF SHIP- WRECK WOOD?"

CONTINUALLY, and through all othersounds, Dr. Armitage's words were repeating themselves in Genevieve's hearing. "Keep your father from mental disquiet," he had said; but it was not easy now to discern how far Noel Bartholomew might be suffering from disquietude. With every flash twin of thought or event, it seemed to his daughter as if some noticeable degree of anxiety slipped away from him; leaving him, not himself as she had known him of late, but a more tranquil and less sensitive self. He was not apathetic, but he was unconcerned, and his manner was as the manner of one freed from care for evermore.

All the evening, after George Kirkoswald went away, Genevieve set herself to the perfecting of a finer sympathy between her own mood and her father's. This was what was left to her, and she knew it, and was not unthankful.

"Then nothing passed between you and Miss Richmond about the pictures?" Bartholomew asked when they had been sitting alone awhile.

"Nothing. When I knew that Mr Kirkoswald had been there I did not say any more."

"That was wise."

"And you have made up your mind ■ see Mr. Montacute?"

"Yes: I am going over ■ Thurheld Abbas to-morrow."

"To-morrow, my father! Think of Dr.

Armitage. He entreated you to be careful for a little while."

"I am very careful . . . I know what ■ meant, ■ meant that I was to keep quiet. I could hardly be quieter than I am, and I think this affair cannot harm me further. I don't know that I feel resigned, but I feel curiously regardless. . . . I shall simply take Montacute's advice, whatever it may be. I shall leave the thing in his hands entirely. Nothing could be less exciting."

This seemed eminently reasonable, and her father's manner was so full of a new composure that she felt its influence upon herself, through all the wild tumult that was surging within her.

It was Genevieve's doing that they sat so late. She worked awhile at her embroidery, talking all the time, thinking, suffering all the time, stitching down wild tender words with the pale silk that made the rose petals, sending long leaf-lances charged with bitter repentance all across the dark gold ground. All her life through that piece of handiwork would stand for so many hours of restrained agony, of brave successful effort to smile, and talk, and read, and sing, as if no great darkness had come down to mar and cloud her life, while life should remain. The singing was hardest of all, but her father asked it of her, and she would not refuse him aught that might be done. It was no matter for the cost of the doing. Sing me Robin Adair, Bartholomew said, and though every word struck through her brain with the sharpness of steel, she sang it to the end.

"Where's all the joy and mirth
Made this town a heaven on earth?
Oh, they're all dead with thee,
Robin Adair!"

Her voice thrilled on, clear, sweet, penetrating, full of passion as of pathos. It was the song that George had liked best of all her songs, and the one she had liked best to sing ■ him. Was it possible that she would never sing it to him any more? Would no kind night-wind carry the words up the sloping fields, and away across Langbarough Moor to Usselby? The wind had done so much as that for Wilfrid Stuart, and the boy's path had been by still waters ever since. Might it not be again? Might ■ not so happen that George should be out on the moor—what so likely? and might not words of such pain and intensity reach even to him? "Listen, listen," she was saying underneath, "Listen."

"What when the play was o'er,
What made my heart go on,
Oh, it was parting with Robin Adair."

Then she went on—

"But now thou art cold to me,
Robin Adair."

Cold! he had been cold many a time, cold, and strange, and absent, and incomprehensible. And she had loved him through ■ all, and the coldness had been hardly a pain because of the faith and understanding that she had brought to meet it. . . . "Oh, if he would but come back again, and be only cold to me!" the girl said, clasping her hands together when the last chord was touched.

It was nearly midnight before she was alone in her own little room under the thatch. She moved about quietly for awhile, till her father should be asleep, throwing her pink dress aside, wrapping herself in a white dressing gown.

"Across the shock her head
And showered the cold raindrops to her knee."

Would she ever take any pleasure in her golden hair again, since he who had so praised it would have no praise for her any more? That was his own word. "Never any more." Ah, why had she led him to say it? Why had she driven him to say it? What dark spirit of cruelty had entered into her to tempt her from herself, to tempt her from her love?

"My love that I said was dead!" she cried, in a subdued whisper, standing with clasped hands, in the moonlight that came streaming through the window in the roof. "I said that it was dead, George, but I said it with lips that were cold and chill for the lies they used. Forgive it, forgive it! It was my first untruth—it shall be the last. Come back and say that you forgive it, or come and say that you will not forgive it, that you will hold me in dadun for it always. Only come back again! Only come back again! You may look down on me, and scorn me, and be hard to me, you may crush me with a word, with a frown, you may strike me with that quick strong glance of yours, but never leave me. . . . George, George, George, how could you leave me?"

A long time she stood there, she could hear the faint gusty sighing of the wind as it came up out ■ the sea, she could hear the long low ceaseless roll of the waves at the foot of the cliffs. Nothing had changed. Nothing was as it had been before. Was she passing through some kind of dream or trance? Was it all a delusion that had been sent to her to test her strength? Would she wake up to-morrow, and find that she had had a vision in the night, a vision of darkness, of pain, of love's bereavement; a vision sent to witness to the value and meaning of love? To-morrow! It was to-morrow now; it was to-day, it was yesterday! There was no more any division of time, there was nothing but—

"Oat long dreary everlasting now!"

■ be lived as human life may be lived when the wheel is broken at the cistern, to be lived mutely, and desolately, yet always enduringly. That alone was left to be attained, a strong, silent, passionate endurance, acceptance of a life that no man nor woman might henceforth comprehend, that none might dare or care ■ comprehend. . . . This then was the thing that human beings called loneliness, one where two had been, a thick darkness where had been a great tender light, a coldness where had been a fervid, tremulous, palpitating warmth of love and life. This then was the dreaded thing that men named loneliness!

The winter night was half gone before she threw herself wearied and exhausted on the little white bed, over which the moonbeams were sinking slowly to the floor. The sound of the first cock-crow came from the farm on the hillside. Another day had begun. Was she glad? No, not sorry. The days might come and go, the years might come and go, but they might no more bring any gladness to a human heart that nothing could make glad. The sun would shine again—what would the sunshine be like now? Would it have joy in it? Would ■ have sadness? . . . The waning descending moon was better, the sighing wind from the sea was better, the restless darkness that came into the little room was better. . . . By and by there came quiet, but it was quiet that had no peace in it, no true usefulness, and there was silence, but the silence was broken by murmured words. "I'm on death, death on him," the girl said wearily, speaking in the sleep that ■ death's twin sister. Then she moved a little, and her lips parted yet again, saying sully, "Death on him!"

■ HADN'T LVL—"I HAVE MORE CARE TO SLAY THAN WILL TO GO"

COULD it really be said that Genevieve wakened to her sorrow when the morning came? Had she slept? Is it sleep to be conscious of pain—conscious with a benumbed yet intense consciousness that cannot strive nor cry, that cannot gauge the depth of one's anguish, that cannot turn from it, that cannot bring one thought to alleviate it; that can only be surer, helpless, confused with all hurrying irrelevant confusions, tortured and exhausted by all dark and impossible complications. . . . Is this to sleep?

If it be not sleep, neither ■ it waking. Dreams come, lights and shadows fall, voices cry out of the darkness, figures flit to and fro. The dream world is as the waking world. One wild disquiet pervades and dominates them both.

There was a new tenderness in Genevieve's manner when she came down stairs. He was there then, her father! He was not lying prostrate on some dark plain ■ she had seen him in the night. He was there, and he was speaking, smiling quietly, he was not silent, with his face downward upon his arm. Ah, how she had striven in her unrestful sleep ■ ease that grey fallen head! Her arm was yet aching with her striving, aching as if it would ache for evermore with the vain effort. She might well stroke the grey hairs lovingly, and kiss the pale lips tenderly. He was there. Though all else was gone, she had her father.

It was a wild, bleak morning. Dark rain-clouds were moving heavily above the moorland ridge. Though you had no sadness of your own, the sadness that was upon the land was sufficient for depression, discouragement, unhopfulness of heart. The very struggling and tossing of the bare boughs against the sky gave you a sense of desolation—of wild, imploring desolation, that might not be comforted nor stayed till the wind having done its worst went down. It would surely go down, that rough north wind that came from the sea. Would the wilder wind of sorrow go down when its work was done?

What would be left when ■ had gone down?

A fallen tree with its branch yet green?

A ship on its first voyage, stranded on a rock in mid-ocean?

A human heart wounded to be healed no more till its beating had done?

The grey morning went on silently, sunlessly. "I shall not go over to Thirkeld Abbas till the postman has been," Bartholomew had said. The coming of the mild pleasant little man who brought the letters was an agitation now, and the sight of an envelope in his hand a reason for painful nervous excitement.

He had only one letter this morning. It was for Genevieve, and it was from her friend and godmother, Mrs. Winterford, the lady who had sent the photographs from Venice.

She was coming home, she said, and she wanted Genevieve to go ■ her for a few weeks if it were possible.

"At any rate you will come to me for Christmas, dear," Mrs. Winterford said. "I know your father will spare you if he can. He will remember that I have never spent a Christmas alone at Havilands yet. I consider it my duty ■ be there, but I do not like to think of being there with no one to help to cheer me, to keep me up to my responsibilities. You will come, dear? I need not tempt you with a description of packages of brus d-bras to be unpacked and delighted in. It is for my sake you will come. It is for your own sake that I want to have you."

Genevieve gave the letter to her father silently, and ■ read it in silence.

"You must not refuse this, Genevieve dear," he said unhesitatingly.

"I must go to Havilands, and leave you here alone?"

"No, I will go with you as far as London, and remain there till you are ready to come back, then we will come back together."

A great sadness came down suddenly into the girl's face, a great weariness into eyes that had been weary before. This was no time ■ urge the plan that she had had in her brain last night, to explain her desire that they might leave the neighbourhood of Murk-Manishes as soon as it were possible to leave it, and come back to it no more, neither together nor apart. Had she desired it? Did she desire it now? Was not the sigh that she checked almost a gasp, almost a sob, a stifled protest against the idea of leaving Netherbank for one hour of one day?

Her first impulse—she had all but acted upon it—was to put her hand gently, entreatingly upon her father's arm, to say, "I cannot go ■ Havilands. I cannot go away from here. You will not insist, you will yield this once, you will be good and kind to me as you have always been, you will not ask me to go away?"

Then glancing at the white weary face, remembering all the strain, the fret, the pressure of the life he had lived of late, that he was living now, her heart smote her with her own selfishness. What could be better than that he should go for awhile? Even to have some change, some star to look forward to, would be good for him and right for him. What was there in her own life that she should think or care for the comings or the goings of it? Havilands or Netherbank, what did it matter, since one step would be upon the corn-field no more? So she asked herself, straining her ear intently for the step that might fall there at any moment.

But it did not fall. Her listening was in vain. Her yearning, beating, unpassioned heart might as well have been still. If any other heart was beating in response, there was Langhaugh Moor frowning darkly between, and the black stony upland was a small barrier to that rained by one false forbidding glance.

Only a glance, only one cold word following the glance, and that word—

*"Not from the heart bereft—
"I was a bubble born of breath,
Nor then sweet nor true,
Nor reprieve nor want."*

yet potent for ill as ■ the keen sword-edge that divides life from life in some unlooked-for moment.

"We will go if you wish it, father," Genevieve said, "but I need not write to day. We will talk over it in the evening, and the letter can be written to-morrow. Perhaps when you have seen Mr. Montacute you will know better when you would wish to go."

"I should not wish to go till nearer Christmas," Bartholomew said. "This matter will be settled by that time, and the Ænone will be finished. It is because of my sorrowful and forsaken Ænone that I wish to go to London."

The lone Ænone! Genevieve had half forgotten the sweet, complaining, disconsolate figure that was down there in the closed studio. Was it only four days since it had been closed? It was like four weeks, or four months. There was a hush upon the place. The gloom that had fallen there was not uplifted.

Genevieve went in, then she stood for awhile, silently watching the wind-riven clouds, the bare tossing branches, but not thinking of them. She was thinking of nothing. The strange chill, the strange quiet in a place where there had been so much warmth, so much life, so much love, where glance had answered glance, flashing a life's devotion across the fireside; where words had been spoken that seemed to germinate on the moment, where silences had passed surcharged with meanings of more imperative power than any that eloquence had created, the hush, the emptiness coming after these was like the dropping of thick darkness that could be felt into the middle of a sunny summer's day. Life itself seemed arrested. The thing that had been an ecstasy was reduced to a drear repentance.

It was easy to understand the Ænone now. Genevieve stood before the canvas with a new appreciation, a new reverence. The sorrow of the white-robed maiden, who stood there amid the wandering ivy and the vine, was no more an overdrawn and incomprehensible sorrow. "I know now," Genevieve said, speaking half audibly, as people do speak in the extremities of life, "I know now what moved you ■ cry ■ those far Ionian hills, to cry aloud—

'O happy Heaven how could there be my cry?
(1) Joy earth how could it be my cry?
(2) Death, death, death, thou wert afloat and here thou art and thy cry on the earth
I say the joys of this life I live
I pray thee pass before my light of life
And I will give all my soul that I may die.'

But I would not die—no, I would not die nor would I care to sing so, to 'build up all my sorrow with my song,' unless I knew that my song might reach and touch him who made the sorrow. . . Did he make it?

Was it his doing? Was it mine? Is there any undoing? . . . George, George, if I built up my sorrow, if I built it into poem, or picture, or book, and if it made you weep, then would you relent? Would you unsty that word? Would you come back and hold out your hand to me again with that tender look on your face, and that greater tenderness in your voice, that was there only yesterday? . . . But I may not do it. I have no art nor talent to use for winning you back. I have only love, only a true, strong love. You said certainly that love that is true does not die here nor other where, then why leave a living love like mine to live on for ever in pain? You have wounded me—you or another. You had hurt me, and crushed me, and in my agony I cried out, but you might have known that I cried untruly, as men have done on torture wheels not worse than mine. Now that I recall the thing I said, ■ it possible that you will not hear me? Is it too late? Are you hardening yourself in your pride? Is that look growing on your face that she spoke of yesterday, speaking as one who had full right to speak, to speak admiringly or slightingly, as a woman may when all is sure. Ah, how it struck me, and crushed me! And yet, yet you will not understand, I feel and know in my heart that you will not understand—

'And from that time to this I am alone
And I shall be alone until I die, because you will not understand. It is oppressing me more with every hour that goes by, the feeling that you will not stoop again ■ put your hand in mine, ■ look into my eyes and see there that the bitterness born of a moment's delirium has gone for ever."

A long time the girl stood there before the canvas, where a sorrow so closely akin to her own had been portrayed. She grew calmer as the moments went by, calmer and stronger and more reasonable.

"I am not myself," she said. "I have tasted the sweetness of love, its full rapture, its passionate joy, now its cruel madness has come upon me, and I am not myself. If I were I should try to find the uses of my pain, ■ find if it were a sacrifice demanded of me, or a piece of wilful, unacceptable, self-created misery. I see no good in this yet, no greatness in it yet, no plan in it yet. If it were a true sacrifice it would yield these and more than these. . . If I wait, will it yield to me? If I have patience, will the mystery of this pain of mine be no more mysterious? If I have not patience I shall not see. I shall not hear. Only when the soul is still, may it hear the wind harp of the spirit of peace."

While Genevieve was thinking, striving, passing from suffering ■ suffering, her father was going slowly by field and road to Thurkel Abbay, missing Mr. Seveine, who was going to Netherbank by the way. No agitations about Bartholomew as he went, the grey day did not sadden him, the toiling trees awoke no chord of desolateness in his heart or brain. He was quiet. "I am quieter than I remember to have been thirty years," he said to himself as he went, feeling that it was a somewhat curious effect for so tumultuous a trouble to have wrought. Altogether, things were strange, strange but not unpleasant, not unsatisfactory in a certain sense. "If the day were fine, I should be fancying myself young again," he went on. The strain of living seemed relaxed within him. He was conscious again of that feeling to which he could give no name. Was it content, a grey, placid content? Whatever it was, ■ was not pain, nor dread. "Perhaps it ■ a kind of foretaste of the mood that old age will bring," he continued. "It is only fair that age should bring back some of the satisfactions of youth, and there is no greater satisfaction than a permanent tranquillity."

■ was in this mood that he entered the house beyond the church where Mr. Montacute lived and had his office, if such it might be termed. With a somewhat rare abnegation the grim oppressiveness of an ordinary lawyer's office had been softened away. There was an inner room beyond a round-topped arch, and whether or no the usual tin boxes and red-tape tied parcels might be beyond the heavy curtains that fell to the floor, no uninitiated man or woman might guess, but no such evidence of a large and aristocratic practice obtruded themselves upon his clients' sight. The outer room might have been described as a library. There were bookcases in it, and an old fashioned comfortable sofa or two between the writing tables. The windows were curtained, the floors were carpeted, the walls were not destitute of pictures. You sat down with a sigh of relief from any nervous tremors that might have taken possession of your soul as you went up the somewhat gloomy stair

Mr. Montacute was an old man, probably nearer seventy than sixty now. He was tall, slim, erect, white haired, not unimposing. An accident had deprived him of the sight of one of his eyes, and he was learned enough to tell you—

In which direction the
He said never was to the right of though but little perceptible change had come upon "the unspotted crystal." It was the right eye. You noticed a difference, a want of expression, and Mr. Montacute was careful always to seat himself so that the expressionless eye was nearest to you. By so doing he gained an air of unperturbability that would have been priceless to some men. He remembered Bartholomew distinctly, indeed he slightly resented the idea that forgetfulness had been possible.

"I seldom forget a name, I never forget a face," said the old man, with considerable dignity of tone and manner. Then he sat down in a very upright chair, and listened to all that Bartholomew had to say. Now and then he interrupted the artist to ask a question, but very seldom. He was evidently gathering up his mind to precisely the same conclusion as other people had gathered theirs. The pictures had not been approved. "It is an awkward affair," he said, keeping the imperturbable side of his face toward Bartholomew, "and, pardon me, I must say that I think you were careless in the first instance. You should undoubtedly have made some more definite agreement."

"I perceive that now," replied the artist quietly. "But I can only say for myself that I have not been accustomed to make binding agreements. I have received many commissions. Nine times out of ten people have named a price which they did not wish me to exceed. I need hardly say that in no case have I ever touched the extreme limit, however narrow that limit might be. When no price was fixed, I have understood that it was immaterial."

"I should say that it was quite immaterial in this case," rejoined Mr. Montacute.

"Then what should you consider to be Mr. Richmond's motive for the course he has taken?"

"Ah! there I cannot answer you," said the old man, turning his expressive eye searchingly upon the painter. "There I cannot answer; but I should have thought that you would have arrived at some conclusion yourself on that point."

Bartholomew was silent. He had arrived at nothing that would bear the definiteness of words. Was his hope failing him a little? Was this professional questioning, this cautious answering, quite what he expected? What had he expected? He hardly knew. He was beginning to wish that he had not come, that he had set himself to bear his wrong, not seeking such redress as might or might not be found in English law or equity.

"You perceive, doubtless, that it is an affair that may be looked at from two points of view?" Mr. Montacute began again in his serene, formal way.

"I should say that it might be looked at from twenty points of view," Bartholomew said, speaking the impatient words without impatience of manner. "Every one who looks at it at all will do so from the little corner where he stands. I wanted to know how it seemed to you; and I think I perceive how it seems."

It was seeming different to the artist himself now. The colour and turn of the lawyer's mind struck upon his own hyper-sensitive receptiveness darkly. He had been a fool; and his recitude not above suspicion; that was how the matter stood now in this absence of sympathetic insight, in this presence of legal impossibility.

"It would be easy for me to say how I look upon the affair," Mr. Montacute replied, speaking with more consciousness of a wide and exact vocabulary than desire to conciliate a client. "If it seems, you want my advice, I can give it briefly. Let conciliatory measures be tried. If you like I will write to Mr. Richmond, proposing an interview between him and myself."

"I should wish to leave the thing entirely in your hands, if you will have it so left."

"Then certainly you may leave it, and I will do the best I can," said Mr. Montacute with a sudden graciousness of manner, and assuredly he could be gracious when he chose. "I will see Mr. Richmond, and you may expect to hear from me in a few days," he added, turning his expressive eye upon the artist as he rose to go, with a greater amiableness in it than before. Yet there was no assurance for Bartholomew to take away with him, no sense of any vital human helpfulness, of any desire to avert or assuage suffering. A coldly negative conduct of the matter to some end that should seem fitting in Mr. Montacute's sight was all that he need expect.

Noel Bartholomew went home as he had come, quietly, composedly, but the lightness, the hopefulness, had gone from his quiet. Had he hoped more than he knew, that he should thus be so near to disappointment?

It was only some two hours past noon, but over in the west there was already a look of evening. The wind drove the clouds aside, gleams of wild, flitting sunlight shot through, bringing out the colours of the grey upland, the reds and yellows of the fractured scars on the moorland edge, the green where brakes, the grey-white sheep, the verdant ivy that clung to the stems of the sparse trees. The smoke of the turf fire up at Hunsagarth Hags was curling against a mass of blue black cumulus. A horseman was coming down the road, but the dappled grey was not Kurlowald's. A moment later, Bartholomew perceived that it was Ishmael Crudas who was coming down from the Hags, and he waited at the stile to pass a word or two with Miss Craven's faithful and patient admirer.

"Noo; what Ah's glad to see ya oot again!" shouted Mr. Crudas heartily, and with considerable satisfaction in his tone.

He was dismounting, fastening his horse to the post ■ the side of the stile.

"Ah's comin' in," he said. "That is if ya've na objections?"

Bartholomew smiled his disclaimer of objections. "We shall be glad to see you. Come in and have some dinner. My daughter will be delighted."

"Dinner!" exclaimed Mr. Crudas shrilly. "Why Ah's aboot ready for my tea. I allus gets my dinner atween eleven an' twelve. An' Ah's ready for 't an' all, Ah can tell you. When ya've had yer break'ast by five o'clock, a twelve o'clock dinner comes nean ower sharp upon ya."

"I should say not, indeed," replied Bartholomew, opening the cottage door and leading the way into the little room where the table was set in the dainty fashion observed at Netherbank.

Many a long day after that Mr. Crudas told of his amaze at finding a dinner table decorated with "a few busy burn-works," and cattijugs,† stuck into a bit o' moss, an' all manner o' bits o' breckoon in green ivin i' ling narra glasses instead o' tumblers o' good yall. There was a jug of mild ale on the table which Mr. Crudas was asked ■ accept for his refreshment. Genevieve poured some out for him. "Think ya, miss," he said. Then he put down his empty glass. "Desperts poor stuff," he remarked with cool surprise. "I na't goin' to stop. He went on, turning to Bartholomew. "Ah nobbut com' in to ask a bit o' favour o' ya. Ah want a pictur' painted to hing up, ya know, to hing i' t' parlour, if ya think ya could mike a bit o' tahme to dea ma one."

What way ya?"

"I shall be very glad," said Bartholomew, restraining his smile, feeling in the heart of him that this new commission was an expression of sympathy under the mischances wrought by the old, and, perhaps, also a delicate way of offering practical help in a moment that he knew only too well was understood everywhere ■ be a somewhat critical moment for himself and his daughter. "I should be glad to paint a picture for you," Noel Bartholomew said, speaking quite truthfully. "What sort of pictures do you care for most? Have you anything in your mind's eye that you could describe to me?"

"Ay, Ah can see 't as well as ■ 'twas deam. Ah want ya to paint me an' t' beast—t' Kessenin's beast at Ah's fattenin'. An' a beauty he is, as fine as owt i' t' three Ridin's. Ah just want ya to take him ■ he stands, an' me wi' my hand upon him, an' when ya've painted him ya shall hev as fine a cut o' his sirlon for yer Kessenin's dinner as iver ya eat doon tea. An' as for t' price o' t' thing, its neither here nor there. . . . Noo, what saay ya?"

It must certainly be admitted that poor Bartholomew was a little at a loss to know what to say.

"I am very sorry," he began, "but do you know that I have never painted an animal in my life, not even in my landscape pictures? Animal painting is, as it were, a separate branch of art, and requires a special ■ uning."

"You dean't saay so?" said Mr. Crudas, evidently much disappointed. "Noo, Ah thowt you were up to anything. Ah ssa' ha' liked yon beast to hing up i' t' parlour."

"I have it photographed," suggested Bartholomew.

"Naw. Ah care nought aboot them things. Ah like a bit o' culter. But what na't to be, isn't, sea they saay."

"You wouldn't care for a portrait of yourself without the animal?"

"Yis, Ah sud," replied Mr. Crudas, brightening in a rather wonderful way. "Yis, Ah sud like to ha mysel painted vary weel. I here's woss like folks aboot, Ah reckon. An' there's Dorothy, noo Dorothy wad mak' a viewsome pictur'. Paint her an' all if she'll let ya. Mabbe she wean't. She's as awkward as owt. She wants you to be talkin' to her agan, Miss Bartholomew. She was as diskrant as could be, one bit, an' 'twas your doin', Ah know, an' Ah got started wi' wall-papars an' things doon ■ Swardhulst, an' all was gettin' smartened up nicely. But Ah've no heart to go on wi' sike things noo. . . . An' it's nowt but pride on her, it's been nowt but pride all through."

This was true, and Genevieve admitted as much, but even pride was easier to understand now, all things that might come in the way of a true and faithful and yearning love were easier ■ understand.

"It was not so much any word of mine that influenced Miss Craven," Genevieve said. "Circumstance did more ■ incline her to ward yielding than I did. If she were more prosperous, she would be less reluctant."

"Accordin to mah waay o' seein' things her troubles sud make her all the readier to gi' way. What for need ■ be frightened o' what folks saays? ■ she cared for me as much as Ah care for her, she'd let 'em talk till they were tired, an' then begin agan."

Her Sunday clothes 'ad fit no worse, Ah warrant ya

Having given his commissions, and arranged about coming to sit for his portrait, Mr Crudas went away. It was easy to see that he was not ill pleased with himself and his idea. He went along the field path swinging his arms, whistling a while, then singing as he went. It was a verse of the old song that ■ sang always

"He turned it a face on o' the sea
And I wad war with it an' de-

CHAPTER LVII.—"I KNOW THE TRACE OF THE ANCIENT FLAME"

THAT infinite need of the soul, which is love, ■ an eternal force which may awaken and develop under very varying conditions of intercourse

The love of Dante for Beatrice will to all time stand as typical of the highest human love. It was a passionate love—passionate enough to yield rapture and ecstasy 'to the utmost limit of beatitude.' And it was faithful—faithful even unto death.

Yet, so far as may be discerned, "Beatrice never so much as knew of the pure, lofty, ideal love she had inspired.

Does it need always the imagination of a Dante to enable a man or woman to worship for a whole life long in silence, in patience in a spiritual immaterial consciousness of the finest and most far-reaching sympathy?

A whole life long! ay, and beyond that. Though one may be gone by that grave which is the gate of heaven the one that is left may live on in a faithful, pure, exalted communion that it might have been less easy to establish permanently between two souls burdened and clouded by the intervention of material association.

I love that is truly love is spiritual affinity, puissant, dominating, serenely satisfying.

"So, though this alone were left to me, there need not be despair," George Kirkoswald said ■ himself, walking upon the cliffs by the grey, illimitable sea. "Though thus alone—a lifelong unspoken devotion were left, it would be better than the and blankness that was before.

"I know I sorrow must
It is better to have loved and lost
Than never to have loved at all."

There need not be despair," he said, knowing within himself that his despairing mood was passing on into some mood less wildly intolerable.

Only a few days had gone by—a few dark corroding days of isolation, of failure of heart, of crushing desolateness. This was the first day of anything that could be termed rebound, the first day of reawakened hopefulness. George did not know ■ for hopefulness. It seemed no more than resignation.

He had not forgotten Genevieve's request—not for a moment had he forgotten it. In making it she had made an acknowledgment that was priceless to him now.

"Be to him what you have always been—a friend, a strength, a satisfaction," she had said, and the words removed from their context were of an abiding value.

"If I may be her father's friend, ■ can hardly be that she will count me her own enemy," he said, with a feeling akin to contentment.

Nevertheless, the first moment of meeting had little of contentment in it. The December twilight was coming down, Genevieve sat alone in the little sitting room by a bright pine-wood fire. She was lying wearily in her father's chair, the Prince was chirping fitfully, the yellow rose tree was dropping its petals, the clock was ticking with audible monotony. She knew the footsteps, the knock upon the door. Her heart that had been beating so faintly stood still.

"I am sorry my father is out," she said, standing, there tall and straight, and beautiful and cold. "But he will not be long. He has only gone down to the village to see a poor man who is ill. If you can wait a little it will be a pleasure to him to find you here."

I thought he knew her so well, he was yet half-amazed at the strength in weakness that was so visible in her voice and manner. And he perceived for himself that the half of her strength was the strength that is always in truth. It was indeed of her father that she was thinking.

"Certainly I will wait," George Kirkoswald said, seating himself in the chair she had indicated in her graceful, courteous way. "I was wanting ■ see you. Severne tells me that the Canon wishes to have the next concert in the school room at Mark Marshes. I suppose it will be well to have one there now and again?"

"Yes, I think so," Genevieve answered, speaking without embarrassment or difficulty. She had on an old dress of pale grey green cashmere. Her little coral necklace was about her throat, her soft yellow hair shone in the flickering firelight. "I think it will be well to attempt some kind of entertainment there," she said. "The room is small and shabby and depressing in the extreme, but there are old people and invalids in Monk-Marishes who cannot get down ■ Soulgrief Right We should think of these a little."

She spoke as if there were nothing else to be spoken of, or thought of, as if the village concert had been the uppermost thing in her mind, as if neither day nor night had brought any regret, any pain.

That serene philosophic look was still upon George's face, and Genevieve saw it there. His voice too was quiet, composed, dispassionate.

"Do you suppose that the people really care much for the entertainments?" he asked, speaking as men speak of things that are far from them at the moment.

"I believe they care more than we can ever know, or imagine, or believe," Genevieve replied, with an energy that was perhaps above the occasion. "A concert is some thing that they look forward to, and look back upon in a way that is touching in the extreme. I never hoped to come so near to them as a verse of a song has brought me."

There was a pause.

"May I ask which of your songs it is that they care for especially?" George asked, repressing all sign of interest, and betraying an involuntary hardness in his effort.

"It is 'The Land o' the Leal,'" Genevieve replied, but voice faltered a little as she said the words. "They understand that—

'There's a wee sorrow there, Jo
'Ther's a weel / old sort an' / in 'The land o' the leal' /

That covers their view of the hereafter, and it is sufficient for many of them. It seemed rather pitiable at first, now I am glad when a woman reminds me, with patient face and tearful eyes, that after a little while there will ■ neither cold nor hunger, nor any care."

"What exactly do you take to be the meaning of the Scotch word 'leal'?"

"I am not quite sure about it," was the reply. "I take it to mean loyal, faithful, true of heart," she said, trying to speak so that her words should seem to hold no special meaning. "But I cannot be sure. It explains itself to me, and to them—at least to some among them. They understand things that neither they nor I can define."

"Shall you sing that song at the next concert?"

"I think so."

There was another pause—an interval lying between many things that might have been. Love, passionate love, that might have been one, was there divided. Recollection came across all emotion, and pride, and pain, striking, chilling, condemning.

The coldness of manner that comes of an exceeding great pain is a more severe coldness than any you shall find. The look on George Kirkoswald's face seemed an utterly ruthless look ■ the eyes that watched him. The blank pitilessness of it struck upon the girl's heart like a chill. An icy wind often gives strength to the fainting.

"Shall you come to the concert?" she asked, looking up at him with a look as calm as his own, and speaking in a voice free from any tremor of expectancy.

"No," was the reply, made with an apparently studious carelessness. "No, I am thinking of going to Cairo."

It was twilight. He could not see the sudden pallor, the sudden look, as of one stricken afresh, that came into the girl's face. He could not gauge the silence to its last depth. One word of hers—one brief, sweet cry of pain, and he had been at her feet, craving forgiveness there, entreating passionately that she would resist the deathless love that was in him no more. Why did he wait for this cry, for the word, since he could only feel that the breathless silence was full of cries? Was he remembering that word of his own, "I will urge you no more?" Was it her reply that was ringing in his ears so wildly, "I then I think you?"

The silence was broken by other sounds. There were noises outside in the twilight. Bartholomew had met Canon Gabriel by the sick bed in the village, but Calahad had failed to come for him ■ the time he had promised to come, so a message had been left—Mr Severne was to bring the trap up to Netherbank. The Canon had been persuaded to come back with Bartholomew for a cup of tea.

"I expect you to make me a cup of very good tea," said the old man, taking Genevieve's hands in both his own, and looking tenderly into her pale face. Keturah had brought in the lamp, and was bustling in and out with the tea cups. Bartholomew and George were talking by the fire. Opportunity was gone. Life was overpowering, and strangely confusing.

CHAPTER LVIII—"LATE, LATE, SO LATE!"

"Yes, I am thinking of taking a holiday," Kirkoswald was saying. "It must seem very absurd to you to hear me say so, but I am feeling tired, very tired. For some days past life has seemed almost burdensome because of the very weariness of living it. I suppose it is the dull December skies coming after the dull November fog."

"A clear frosty morning would change you plans then, I hope," Bartholomew replied. Genevieve was pouring out tea. the Canon was by her side.

"Is this your father's cup?" George said, coming up to her and looking into the still white face with some compassion, some surprise.

"It would probably take something more than a frosty morning to make me change my plans," he said, answering Bartholomew; "but of course they are not unalterable. . . . Sometimes I wish that I had been a little less master of my own fate," he added in a grave, weary way.

"I have often found that feeling," said the Canon. "I have often found that the man who is free looks upon the man who is bound hind and foot with something like envy. . . . I am not incomprehensible. The man who is bound is usually bound to something that is to him a motive and a purpose in life."

"And is therefore in possession of one of heaven's best gifts,—if indeed I be not the best gift of all," said George. "I agree with Carlyle that there is folly in that impossible precept, Know thyself, till it be translated into this partially possible one, Know what thou canst do."

"And are you wishing to improve us with the idea that your life is an idle one?" asked Canon Gabriel, who had met Kukoswold in the by ways of life rather frequently during the past ten days.

"No, I am not idle, happily for myself, or unhappily, I am constitutionally incapable of actual doing nothingness. But that is not the thing I mean. The man I envy is the man whose whole soul is absorbed in the idea that he has a work to do here on this earth, and that he cannot die till he has done it. That man has something to live for. The ordinary cares and pains and disappointments of life hardly touch him except when they touch his life-work. And if Fate beat him off from it for awhile, he comes back to it with his immense and vital energy bent upon it a thousand fold."

"How many men have you found living so?" asked the Canon.

"How many? I cannot tell you. One does not always recognise them. They have no time to sound their trumpet in the market place, and the market-place knows nothing of them as a rule."

There was a brief pause. The pinewood fire crackled cheerily, the canary started in his cage and gave a little chirp. Genevieve sat by her father's chair, silent, pale, that great stillness was yet upon her face.

"Have you nothing to say to all this?" asked Canon Gabriel, coming a little nearer to where she sat, and looking into her face anxiously, wonderingly.

"No," she said, "I have nothing to say. Some women are intrusted with a message of their own to deliver—some few, not happy women for the most part, I should infer, except they be happy in the utterance given them. For the rest, we are contented, or ought to be, if we may but minister to one to whom a clear message has been given."

Her father lifted his face slowly as she spoke: there was a new depth, a new solemnity in it.

"Are you thinking of me?" he asked. "Are you speaking of me as of one to whom a clear message has been given?" . . . Then let me speak the truth—it will do me good to speak it, since the knowledge of it is a burden. I have been asking, praying, that a message from God might be given for me to deliver to my fellow-men from the day I first began to desire to work to good purpose until this day. Now, after thirty years of work I see that my prayer has not been answered.

"You, who understand me, will not think I am speaking egotistically if I say that I believe that the gift that men call 'genius' has been mine. The man who possesses it can hardly be mistaken about his possession. If he speaks of it in the world's ears, his words are counted vanity. It is no more vanity to him than if he said, 'My hair is brown,' or 'My eyes are black.' He knows that he is no more to be credited with his genius than with his dark eyes. Yet to be conscious of the one is inevitable knowledge, to be conscious of the other is gross egotism."

"I only admit my consciousness now that I may show you all my suffering, and that I may prove to you that I am not mistaken in my conclusions."

"God gives genius. Carlyle's definition that 'genius is the clearer presence of God Most High in the soul of man' is the nearest and truest definition I have yet found."

"And that is the truest you will find," said Canon Gabriel, turning his pale fragile face towards Bartholomew with a flush of fervour coming upon it even as he spoke. "Here, it has always seemed to me, that the secret of that inspiration which men call creative power must for ever lie. A man's soul is a temple, a temple with an altar, and above that altar broods the dove of the Spirit of God. There, in that inner Spirit temple, a man may listen for the still small voice whose lightest whisper may inspire, and in so listening alone can he come to know himself 'a sounding instrument,' struck and moved to sounding by Invisible Hands."

"He may listen," said Bartholomew, beginning to speak again in the same strangely solemn way, "or he may refuse to listen. If he refuse to listen there he may not hear that voice elsewhere, but though he refuse to hear he will yet not be in silence. There are other spirits, other voices, other inspirations. They seem identical. But presently, in confusion and bewilderment of soul, the man finds himself possessed, the light within him has become darkness, the ecstasy of reason superseded becomes the foolishness of reason vitiated. If any impulse come to his creative power at all, it comes fitfully and in doubt. It may rule him strongly, and impel him to create things far in the sight of men, but in his own heart there will be the knowledge that his highest insight is baffled and outdone."

"I have the thought within me that a keener discipline of suffering in earlier life would have lifted me into higher regions of living and thinking, would have raised me above the desire for material comforts and surroundings, would have shown me that the only true beauty is spiritual beauty—such beauty as may so touch the chords of a man's soul here in time that they shall vibrate on into eternity."

"I wish it might have been given me to do, but it has not been given. And the loss lies with me. I did not live the highest life I might have lived. When suffering did come, coming as bereavement, I bore it ill. I sank under it. But for this child of mine I had gone down utterly."

"Now suffering of another kind has touched me, and the touch is as that of the fingers that were laid upon the eyes of the man who had been blind from his birth. 'Whereas I was blind, now I see,' and the conviction comes strongly that it is too late. It is given me to see as in a vision the things that belonged to my peace. I see them, but not now. I behold them, but not nigh."

"The message I have missed was never the highest message of all. I had never stood before my kind as the priest of the Church of Christ stands, offering only pure spiritual blessings. Nor had I ever stood as the poet stands, upon 'the flaming bounds of Space and Time,' upborne by the seraph-wings of ecstasy, speaking from out the burning bush of his own fervid and overpowering emotion. My appeal had been another nature, yet, but little lower, so it seems to me."

"Had I been stricken as others are stricken, with the intense consciousness that comes by experience of man's inhumanity to man, then I had had a burden. I had cried aloud, my message had been a passionate demand for a wider and greater and grander humanity, a humanity that had not only drawn heart to heart, but had impelled each individual soul onward from human love to a closer and fuller understanding of that love which is divine."

"The very elements of humanity have yet to be studied and acquired by the great majority of us who boast of the large outlines of our human culture."

"Years ago I read a book, and one sentence in it made my heart leap within me. It was this—

"No man who loves his kind can in these days rest content with waiting as a saint upon human misdeeds, when it is in so many cases possible to anticipate and avert it."

"Had I been in a sort of Rip Van Winkle sleep, and awakened upon a later era than my own? Were there things going on all round me, outside my recognition, of which I was unaware? Was it true that there was a new human alikeness abroad, a new and more perfect charity, a new and divine enthusiasm of compassion? Was it true that the old Juggernaut wheels of selfish indifference had ceased to roll on over the hungry, the naked, the sick of heart and soul?"

"For days, my weeks, I lived in a wondering hopefulness, trying to discern the signs of the altered times, lifting my face that I might catch some refreshing from the breath that had come from the four winds of heaven to breathe upon slain sympathies that they might live."

"But, need I say it? I watched to my own despair. I watched—need I tell you what I saw in my watching? Need I show you the followers of the Man of Sorrows; need I ask you to look at the disciples of Him who was scourged, crowned with thorns, and nailed to a bitter cross?"

"I watched, and I saw in my watching streets of palaces in the towns, and over the country stately palaces in steepest isolation everywhere. And I knew the life of the people who lived in these. I had tasted of their luxury, I had sat in their chairs of silken damask, and passed beyond their velvet curtains, I had eaten of their costly food, and

I had drunk of their costlier wine, I knew the pace of their splendid horses, and the creak of their imposing carriages. All this, and more, I knew; and as I watched in my awakened eagerness there came a voice across the centuries speaking sadly, wearily —

"'The Son of Man hath not where to lay His Head'"

"In the streets, ■ the shops of jewellers and dealers in luxury of all kinds, places that were crowded with rank and fashion, and beauty and indifference, and strength and selfishness, I heard above all other sounds that same voice speaking—speaking solemnly, commandingly —

"'Sett that thou hast, and give to the poor, and come and follow Me'"

"Crowding after these—the richest, the highest of the land, I saw the millions who follow on behind them as closely as they may, struggling each one to get nearer and yet nearer to some ever advancing standard of living. Success led but to desire for success. There was no time, no thought left for other desires. Their life of hurry, of restlessness, seemed but as one long fever. Ever is pain, pain is sacrifice, but to whom do men offer this sacrifice of the best they have to give? To him who spent whole long nights on the solitary mountain top alone with His Father?—or to the Moloch of modern luxury, whose reward is a vengeance unknown to blinded eyes, undreamt of by hearts hardened by softness of living.

"And again as I watched there came that voice above the world's wail din —

"'When thou makest a feast, call the poor, for they cannot recompense thee: thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection'"

"The poor! Could it be that there were any poor left in the land?

"Then I turned in my watching, and I saw the homes where live the hungry sickly who hide their hunger and then hid nakedness in silence and in shame. There I found the widow with her white face mired with weeping, worn with altitudes of hoping and despairing, with her fatherless children born but to cry for bread, and to die needing it. There I found sickness left unvisited, old age left unsolaced, sin left unwarned, patient long-suffering left unrecognized, strong pure hopes left to wither and die in despair, great efforts left to fail for the need of a helping hand, talent left in a painful and useless obscurity for the lack of ground whereon to stand, and genius itself left to hurl its natural scorn in the face of a hard and careless world steeped to the lips in its own refined sensualities. All this I saw, and again as I turned that piercing voice came thrilling passionately in my ears:—

"'Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to Me.'"

"That was years ago I turned from the sight, from the sound, but I did not turn from it the same man.

"Only to-day have I realized the meaning of all I saw, of all I heard; only to-day, when hard experience has touched me with her icy finger.

"Now, if any art of mine might ever speak again, its message would be clear—at the least ■ would be clear. And till the day of my death it would have but one burden, and that burden would be an appeal ■ man for man his brother, ■ pier that Christian charity might have reconsideration, a cry that the vast aggregate resources of a mighty nation might be brought to bear upon that nation's still-existing wants and wrongs and miseries and pains. 'A better world,' the people say, pardonably forgetting that Christ consecrated this by coming to it, and left it that His followers might make it better.

"Let them look to it when the King shall gather the nations, let them look to ■ when He shall divide His own with one unclouded and irradiating glance.

"But nay, if it may be, let us look now, such of us as have time. For myself, I am fain to gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost."

The low grave voice stopped. It was as if one new death had made a confession that he had been secretly wanting to make. Genevieve had never heard her father speak of himself, of his own inner life, of his convictions or want of convictions, as he had spoken now. Even so far as the principles of his art went he had been wont ■ use a reserve that was almost silence, and she knew that his best work had been the result of processes of thought well nigh unconscious, and therefore inexplicable in words. She had thought of him as one without the analytical gift. He had lived by instinct, as ■ wrote, and now it seemed that his work had been done by instinct too. He had disclaimed the higher inspiration. Instinct might be pure and true, but ■ was not inspiration. His past career was not satisfactory now that he had come to look back upon it. Where exactly was he stumbling at present? And now that light had come, where might he not stand in the future? She was conscious of ■ new reverence—reverence for the man to be even while she looked somewhat anxiously upon the man ■ was

Mr. Severne came presently, bringing a quite new element into the thought-stilled atmosphere. His boyish blushes and excuses were not unwelcome—they were never unwelcome at Netherbank.

"I had ■ down into Soulagrif, you know," he said, "and my watch is wrong ■ was thirteen minutes before the clock in the hall this morning, and the hall clock was seven minutes behind the church, and now look ■ it—it's just a quarter to twelve". What time is it really? Half past six. Oh, I say!"

Mr. Severne drank a cup of cold tea, and ruined the wires of Prince Camaralzaman's cage by trying to get a big piece of sugar in between, then he and the Canon went away. The dog-cart was standing near the stik, the stars were coming out, the wind had gone down. "Are you going too?" Bartholomew asked of George, who seemed as if he were preparing to take his departure.

"Yes," he said. "I think I've got a head ache, but I don't know, it's so long since I had one." He was looking at Genevieve as he spoke. The great stillness on her face had moved him, and she knew that he was moved. His voice faltered, the pitiless look had gone from his eyes.

"When do you leave Uselby?" asked the artist. "Have you any fixed time?"

"No, it is not fixed exactly. I thought of going some time this week."

"Come down again before you leave us."

There was a little silence: two glances met for a moment, one half sad, wholly wearied, the other pleading and still.

"Shall I come down again, Miss Bartholomew?"

And the answer came simply, yieldingly—

"Yes, come to Netherbank again before you go away."

CHAPTER III—"WHAT I DID NOT WRITE, I MEANT WILL."

No one could have written the letter that Mr. Montacute wrote ■ Bartholomew, except Mr. Montacute himself. As a piece of testimony ■ the truth that the style is of the man it was complete.

It was not a discourteous letter, even under provocation Mr. Montacute was rarely known to descend ■ anything that could be termed discourtesy. He never forgot that he was a gentleman, his clients seldom forgot that he was also a lawyer.

"I have seen Mr. Richmond," he wrote,

"and I have also seen Miss Richmond; and having heard their version of the affair I can only repeat more emphatically than before that the circumstances are difficult and embarrassing. There is no disposition on their part towards anything that could be spoken of as injustice. They are prepared to do all that they can reasonably be expected to do."

"Having given considerable thought ■ the matter, and hoping that if it can ■ arranged without further proceedings it may be more agreeable ■ you, I have suggested that the affair should be settled by arbitration. Mr. Richmond has consented to abide by the decision of any competent person. It remains for you ■ consent, or ■ refuse to consent, to this proposition."

"Then assuredly I refuse," said Bartholomew, speaking with ashy lips, as he put the letter down. "Arbitration! Where will they find an artist who will agree to put a sunset sky into a scale, and determine its value in money by the uncertain and doubtful test of his own opinion, his own ability? What man who had ever painted a picture himself would dream of attempting to put a market price upon the painting of a group of Madonna lilies, if he knew that the man who had painted them had put his own price there? No—assuredly no! Let them do their worst. Again and again I say 'no' to that mode of chaffering over any work of mine!"

So he spoke in that first moment of surprise, and bitterness, and agitation—an agitation that was even greater than it seemed to be, and more exhausting. He had not expected that the man whom he had asked in all good faith to help him in his strait, would have contrived to make him feel that he, and he alone, had been to blame. Instead of helplessness additional pain had come. Yet even now he could be thankful that he had not to bear his pain without companionship. His daughter sat beside him silently—silently soothing him, silently sympathising. Not till the first burst of indignation was over did she venture any word of her own. That word was surprising when it did come.

"Give your consent, my father," she said, stroking the thin nervous hand. "Give it ■ once, and unconditionally."

Bartholomew looked into her face with astonishment.

"Can you quite understand the meaning of your advice?" he asked.

"I think I can. ■ you refuse, it will be said that you are afraid that your work will not stand the test."

"No artistic work that ever was done would stand the chilling test of deliberate and intentional disparagement. Conscientious as those pictures are there is an atmosphere about them already through which I cannot penetrate myself—an atmosphere of gloom, of heaviness. The charm of a picture, as of a poem, is too delicate a thing to bear the cold, shallow glance of a man prejudiced beforehand by the very circumstances under which he requested me do his judging. Think of the fate of Keats's 'Endymion' for years after the Edinburgh Review had poured out its 'shallow ribaldries' upon the man, bidding him go back to his gallopots, since a starved apothecary was better than a starved poet,—not that I would presume to name my own name in the same breath with the name of Keats, but let your work stand on what level I may, the same rule holds good, the rule that one voice that blames has the strength of ten that praise—of ten? ay of ten thousand!"

"But what of ten thousand, if there were so many in Monk Marshes, what of them all to you?"

"I cannot explain all that it is to me," said the artist, feeling very sore at heart under this new humiliation. But it was a humiliation that had to be drained to the dregs. He had to write his letter to Mr. Montacute—a stupid, blundering, self-betraying letter he made it. And he had to consent that the pictures should be taken to Mr. Montacute's office to be weighed in the balances there by an artist who was to come from York for the purpose. Suchly here at length was the last ingenuity of a pitiless fate.

When the pictures had gone, Bartholomew went into his studio again, and set his palette, and drew his Alone forward to the light. Genevieve nodded a little at the still resolute face visible on his grey face. It was not his use and wont to begin working in a mood like this.

"Shall you make the alterations you once thought of making, father?"

"No, dear. I am only anxious now to get it done—this and the two others."

"You will not take them with you to London?"

"No, I shall make arrangements for their being sent up afterwards. . . . If it should be necessary for you to remember, I intend to send them to Messrs. Meyer and Calanson's, in New Bond Street."

There was a pause—it was only momentary, not long enough for the recognition of any feeling of chilliness or dread.

"As if you were likely to forget!" Genevieve said lightly, yet watching closely.

"I am very likely to forget," was the emphatic reply.

It was a bright sunny winter's day, and Bartholomew worked on persistently. Genevieve sat by him, sometimes talking, sometimes reading to him, sometimes silently working. "It is like old times," she said once, standing beside her father, who was touching the white lights on the robe of the Greek maiden.

"Yes," he said, "it is a little. It would still more like old times if Mr. Kirke would were to come in."

"He will come before he goes away," Genevieve replied, feeling glad that her father could not see the hot crimson tide that flooded her face and throat. But she heard the tremulousness in her voice, and changed the question that had been on his lips.

"I should think he would be at the entertainment to-morrow evening?"

"He said that he should not."

"But he intended going away at once when he said that."

"Perhaps he may have gone, after all," Genevieve replied, a sinking of heart being noticeable in her tone.

"No, I don't think he has gone, and I should not be surprised if he changed his intention. He did not seem in the most decided of moods about going."

"It may be so, but I have an impression that he will not be at the concert."

The impression deepened when the morning came, and hope strove with it unsuccessfully. The day was bright and calm, as most of the days of that week had been, and Bartholomew sat before his easel from the first moment of sufficient light, changing his work as movements of eye and hand came on, and feeling considerably relieved when Mr. Crudas came in an hour after dinner to sit for his portrait. Mr. Crudas had had the good sense to come in his rough grey cloth coat. The only change he had made was the discarding of his gingham neckerchief for a blue silk one with 'bird's eye' spots. The striking characteristics of his head and face, the abundant silver grey hair, the fresh, hale or complexion, the deep, keen, searching eye were not unimpaired to a man whose feeling for the lines of human character was at least as well-developed as his eye for human beauty.

Genevieve was in the studio when Ishmael Crudas came. "You will be taking the opportunity ■ go for a walk, dear," her father said, setting another palette, and choosing fresh brushes. Mr. Crudas was looking on with the amused interest of the uninitiated.

"Ay, what she nobbut leuks dowly,"* said Ishmael. Then apparently remembering something suddenly, he turned ■ her questioningly. "You'll be a bit doon about Mr. Kirkoswald mebbe. Ha' ya heerd owt hoo he is te-daan?"

"Is Mr. Kirkoswald ill?" Bartholomew asked, glancing toward his daughter, and making an instant effort ■ spare her.

"You deant know?" said Mr. Crudas in amazement. "Why, you're buried i' this spot! You hear nowt. It's four daays sen I heerd tell 'at Mr Kirkoswald had gotten t' fever. There's them 'at says he's reeght aarved; ■ sud ha' kept oot o' sike spots."

"He has been in some house where there was fever?"

"Ay! all t' last week he was in an' oot among them Scafis and Nunnelys, un' they hev it as bad as they can hev it. Young Joe Scafie's dead. He deed o' Saturday."

"They live in Thurkald Abbas?"

"Ay, doon at t' bottom end yonder."

Bartholomew went up the orchard with his daughter, holding her hand within his arm intimately, he could feel her tremulousness, he could understand her sudden weakness.

"Will you not go and be down, dear; instead of going for a walk?"

"No, my father. I would rather be out of doors."

"You will not go through Thurkald Abbas?"

"Not if you do not wish it."

"Go up and see Dorothy Craven, little one. She will know. And as soon as Mr. Crudas has gone I will go up to Ussaby at once, and make inquiries. I do not feel unhelpful. He is so strong, and he has lived his life so temperately."

"Do you remember the last evening he was here?"

"I remember only too well now. It struck me then that I had never heard him complain of physical weakness before."

Bartholomew was obliged to go back to his sister, and so for a time Genevieve went up to her own room. This was the third sudden shock that had come upon her in a little more than three weeks.

For a time it seemed as if her strongest feeling was the feeling of remorse that came over her. She knew only too well that a man despondent, downcast, with the strings of life hanging "soundless and slack," is a tenfold easier prey ■ any disease, to any chill, than the man in whose veins life flows with the vigour that comes of the spirit's savour of life.

Then, too, he had been reckless, this she could not doubt, translating some words of Canon Gabriel's by the light of Ishmael Crudas's words. He had not cared about the risk he had run since there was no one else to care. . . . Now perhaps he might never know that her caring had been passionate beyond the bounds of pain. ■ one told him, he might not hear, if he heard, it might be as if he heard not.

The knowledge that she could now do nothing was insupportable. Only last evening she had said to herself that when he came down she would undo all that she had done on that fatal evening. She would tell him that she had understood, that she had forgiven, that she even had sympathy for him because of all that he had suffered. . . . Now she sat there knowing that he would not come down. She might wait, but in vain, she might listen, but in vain. She might pray, would that be in vain also?

Prayer is never made in vain, and no man lives the life of prayer uncertain of its certainty. Not this answer to this prayer, nor that answer to that, shall convince you, but the slow result of time and trial.

Prayer is sacrifice, and though that answer that you look for may never come, no sacrifice is offered vainly. Not all the incense-smoke goes upward. It descends upon the man who carries the burning censer of prayer, it enwraps him, the cloud rises between him and the rude, wild world, and its influence comes upon him for soothing and for calm.

There is a thrilling ecstasy of prayer in mercy granted: it comes swiftly, it stays fitfully. There is a hallowed calm of prayer denied: it comes slowly, it comes after long wrestling, after sore strife, but it departs not at all. "He hath done all things well." So we see, so we learn to trust, assured that what He does must be always well.

An hour later Bartholomew tapped at the door of his daughter's room. He had a note in his hand. "It is from Mr. Severne, dear. The boy who brought ■ has gone, he did not wait for an answer."

Genevieve glanced over ■ hurriedly. "I had forgotten," she said. "The entertainment is this evening, and Mr. Severne begs me not ■ fail him, so many others have excused themselves."

* Dearly-derelict.

"But you cannot go, dear!"

"I think I can, father. It is nothing, no trouble I mean. And it will be good to be doing something . . . Are you going up to Usseby?"

"Yes. You go to the village I will go round that way, and leave you at the school room. Mr. Sveinse will see you safely home."

"But you will not stay at Usseby?"

"No, dear, for your sake, I will not, otherwise my place would have been by his bedside so long as any one was needed there."

The remainder of the evening passed as a dream passes. When Genevieve went into the shabby schoolroom at Murk-Marshes it was fast filling with eager people, who did not mind the smoky paraffin lamps, nor the dusty brick floor. No attempt had been made to decorate the ink stained walls. There were a few flowers about the extemporised platform. Mrs. Caton had lent her piano, which was a very good one, and Wilfrid Stuart had come up with his violin. There would be no lack of music and song, no lack of listeners, no lack of anything but the one voice, the one glance, the one presence that gave charm and guidance to all the rest. "How can I sing to-night?" Genevieve said to herself, going down to the farther end of the dim room to speak to Ailie Drew. Ailie rushed, and smiled the wan, unmeaning smile that was almost always on her face now. "You'll be singing that song, miss, 'The Land o' the Leal'?" she said. "I asked Mr. Kirkoswald to tell you to sing it, an' he said he would, but mebbe he's forgot, bein' badly. But you'll sing it, miss, all the same? My little Davy was 'good an' fair, an' I like it, think he's warin' I like to hear ya say so i' the song."

"Then I will sing it if I can," Genevieve said. Two or three women were standing near, listening, waiting for a word. The girl looked at them with weary, wistful eyes.

"I am glad to sing anything, to try any thing, if I may but help you to bear your troubles a little," she said, speaking in a voice that was hardly more than a low clear whisper. "Troubles are very bad to bear sometimes, are they not? They come so quickly and so thickly, one has hardly time to get over one stroke before the next falls, and it is so difficult for me to see any lovingness in all the time. We cannot see it then, it is impossible. We can only wait, and try to hope, and even trying is hope is not easy. . . . Nothing is easy that is good. You will think that I am not comforting you if I tell you that life that is all pain all suffering, all labour, all humiliation, all misunderstanding, is the best life of all. But it is so. I am learning to perceive that it is so, that I must be so, since it was the life that Christ chose to live. You know He might have been rich, and powerful, and have had the highest rank, and all the ease and luxury and importance that belong to rank and wealth. But He would have none of these things. He chose to live with poor people, fishermen, and suchlike, to live as they live, suffer as they suffer, because He knew that even He could not be quite humanly perfect if He did not suffer human sufferings. That is why we have to try to follow in His footsteps, to tread with bleeding feet over the same rough pathways, because He would have us perfect too. I may be that only He can see the crown of thorns that He has placed upon the brow of each one of us here, but He does see, and He knows the sharp pressure of it. He will take it away by and-by. If we only endure to the end He Himself will take it away. If we come to stand before the great white throne, having come there through great tribulation, He will give us other crowns for these of wounding thorn."

A few minutes later, Mr. Sveinse came in with Mrs. Caton and a group of ladies who had met at her house, and then, almost immediately, the concert began. It was a very pleasant and successful concert, the people thought, who were taking part in it. The listeners were always pleased, always grateful. It would have been hard to say whether "The Death of Nelson" or "The Brave Old Temeraire" was the more popular. The audience had risen on each occasion to a decided if unconventional encore. "Sing it over again!" demanded an elderly farmer from the moor edge. "Ay, let's hear that over again!" was the cry of support from the back benches. Accordingly the songs had to be repeated, to the great gratification of the singers. To have obtained an encore at Murk-Marshes was an honour to be rightly understood by no one outside the Ridings.

For Genevieve the only restful and soothing part of the programme was the violin-playing of Wilfrid Stuart. He had never played better, never with a more infinite pathos. Was he thinking of one who might even then be lying on the misty outer verge of life? ■ was as if the music came to him from afar; his face was the face of one who listened, listened through sounds of pain and sorrow for other sounds that were echoing beyond. Was ■ interpreting those other sounds? Were they messages of peace? Had some one spoken, saying—

"Write above thy cross this inscription.
'Be not afraid, only believe.'"

"And I am trying not to be afraid," Genevieve said to Mr. Severne as they went up by the stairly ways to Netherbank. She had spoken unreservedly of her sorrow, as her nature was, and something of her own remorse she had confessed also. But nothing was clear to him, and he did not ask that anything should be made clear. He was walking by contented ways. To night he was happy, this trust and confidence made him happier, and perhaps a certain purpose that was in him added to the feeling. He did not disclose his purpose till they reached the stile.

"You will come in for a little while?" Genevieve asked. "I expect that my father will have come back from Usselby by this time."

"Shall I come in? I wonder." Will it be wise?" Mr. Severne said musingly, as if he spoke to himself. "I think I will not. I will say 'good bye' ■ you here."

"Why say it so solemnly?"

"Was I saying it solemnly? Perhaps I feel solemn. I think I do, in a way."

"But you are not unhappy?"

"No, I am not unhappy," replied Sir Galahad with unusual readiness. "I am very happy. I have been growing happier for a long time. Life is very pleasant, very good."

"Life lived with Canon Gabriel must be good," Genevieve said, recognising quickly the source of this new happiness.

"Yes, it has been. I have always known that, always felt it."

"Why are you speaking of it as past?"

"Am I doing so? I did not know. I hope it is not past, but one cannot tell."

"One cannot tell for long. But you are going back to it now. Surely that contents you for the present?"

"It would content me if it were so," Mr. Severne said. "But though I am not going back ■ it now, I am not discontented. As I told you, I am very happy."

"You are not going back?"

"Not to night."

"Then you are going to Usselby?" Genevieve said, with a sudden feeling of mingled envy and satisfaction. The latter element changed in a moment to regret.

"Yes, I am going there," he said, "Canon Gabriel has given me permission to go. I had trouble in persuading him, but he consented at last. . . . You will believe that I am glad to go?"

Genevieve was silent for a time.

"Yes; I believe that," she said presently. "I should be glad to ■ myself, but I am not glad that you should go."

"Are you not? . . . I—I thought you would be very glad." There is no one else, and I cannot bear to think of him lying there with no one but Jack and old Charlock near him."

"You are sure, then, that ■ is very ill?" the girl asked in quivering tones.

"I am afraid he is. . . . Dr. Armitage doesn't say much, but what he does say isn't assuring. . . . But I must be off. . . . Can I take any—any message, or anything?"

Genevieve stood there a long time with her hand on the stile. She was quite silent. It seemed as if the tumult in her heart made words impossible. A dozen little sentences were chosen, and rejected for one reason or another. What could she say?

"Come with me to the door, and I will give you something that will speak for me," she said presently. Then she brought out the richest spray of myrtle that the plant in the window afforded. "Will you take that? Will you tell Mr. Kirkoswald that I asked you to give it to him? . . . He will understand."

Did Sir Galahad understand? He put the piece of myrtle carefully into the bag he was carrying. The lamplight from the window shone full on his upturned face, full into his wondering blue eyes.

"Good night," he said, holding out his hand, keeping Genevieve's hand in his for one moment. "Good night, and good-bye."

"Good bye for the present."

"Yes, only for the present!" he said with a great, glad, spiritual light coming into his face. "Thank you for saying that, ■ is only for the present!"

Genevieve stood a few moments in the calm, solitary twilight that was upon all the land. She heard his footsteps dying upon the upland. A soft sighing wind, gentle as a spirit's breath, stirred the ivy, it swept by like a whisper, saying, "Only for the present."

FAR FROM THE BEATEN TRACK.

Life in a Cottage.

By J. T. PANTON. AUTHOR OF "PICTURES OF RURAL LIFE." 1860.

I T would be difficult, verily, to find a more delightful spot than our cottage. It rests, solitary and alone, on a curious hump in the heath, looking over the wide spreading landscape that stretches away, away, until it is lost as it seems to us, among the hills that stand, noble, unchangeable, and grand, between it and the distant sea.

But although the ocean is very far off, some twelve or fourteen miles as the crow flies we can, at times hear the mysterious moan of the ground sea as it heaves to and fro on the pebbly beach and foretells unerringly the rising of the wind, that before morning dawns will come rushing swirling up the valley screaming and whistling finely as it throws itself against our walls, and shrieking round the chimneys while it casts upon our brown thatch and in at our latticed windows some of its vast burden of moisture, that enters everywhere unbidden, causes the walls and the rough stone floor to suddenly become wet, and accumulates in the worn places near the hearthstone, making puddles in which the children sail walnut shells gaily, or wickedly inveigle Madam Puss to walk, thus wetting sadly her four immaculate white shoes, of which she and we are perhaps a little unduly proud.

It is curious to watch how the wind lulls almost as swiftly as it rose, and how the vast white sheets of fog fill the whole space between us and the hills until we appear looking down upon a fluffy field of cotton wool, with queer black shadows

here and there throws in to accentuate the whiteness; and we can hardly clude those who turn from the melancholy depressing silence of the fog, half believing that thus revisit the earth, and in such forms as this, the souls of those many sailors who have fallen victims to the rough mighty play of the great breakers on the iron-armed coast.

It requires small imagination in form figures out of the wall-like mist that lies before our windows like a beleaguering army, ready to engulf us, and we are glad when it is time to light the dim strongly-smelling paraffine lamp, and draw the checked blue and-white curtain that hangs in damp folds over the window that somehow or other admits as much of the fog as we are fain to believe it keeps out.

But perhaps when we draw the curtain once more and look out on the waking world, the picture before us will well repay us for the depressing sadness of the night before. It is September, there is a delicious feeling in the air like new wine fresh from an ice-house, flecked of rosy cloud-like substances lie in the purple hollows on the hillsides, and all along the crest of the range before us, deep white mazes of last night's damp fog slowly creep higher and higher, which, as the day grows older, disappear entirely, sailing away like small ships adrift on an azure summer sea. The heath glitters under the rising sun, until every small bush or twig seems to possess its own particular chain of jewels. The purple flowers are just giving over, yet enough remain to show how glorious has been the autumn raiment, and the yellow blossoming French furze yet has some traces of the ample golden dowry she brought to her bridal in the quiet moorland.

Our rough brown thatch, made as it is out of thick clumps of heather, is literally steaming as the sun gains power, and gives us a foretaste of what it will be in the turnips about twelve o'clock; and we don our thickest boots and gaiters as we remember with a shudder the unpleasant manner in which the big swede or turnip leaves fill with water and turn over on us as we tramp through them in pursuit of our friends the partridges, closely accompanied by our dogs, who become entirely different creatures the moment the "first" comes in, and the guns are taken down from the well filled rack on the wide mantelpiece in the kitchen, where we love to sit and watch our friend the gamekeeper clean them the while we talk, and the blue peat smoke climbs slowly up the wide chimney into the clear air. So straight, and in so broad a manner is this same chimney constructed, that we do not need to open the door to see what manner of weather it will be, but can look straight up and gaze upon the twinkling stars, or watch the clouds hurrying over the sky in a manner that does not suggest pleasing prospects for the coming day.

Sometimes in the early morning we see the small roe-deer trotting regularly past our cottage away into the open heath, where they spend the day, returning as regularly at night for shelter among the trees behind us, and sometimes in the winter months, as we sit quiet for a few moments before going to bed, we can hear the foxes bark, standing on burrows in the heath and answering one another in the way puppies do, and much as if they were warning each other as to the locality chosen for the Meet, and laying plans how best to avoid the hounds when they are out scouring the country.

In spring the work of our cottage seems indeed unending, for all nature then is even fuller of interest, if possible, than at any other time; and then we perceive the use of the elevated position of our cottage, for no one can cross the heath, or wander therein, stopping suspiciously to investigate birds' nests, or low-growing tufts of "fussy," as our keeper calls the gorse, without attracting the polite attention of any one who may be inhabiting our country residence, and who is on the look out for poachers, or any of those delightful gentry who, possessed of a curious nondescript creature called a lurcher, wander as it would seem aimlessly, or in pursuit of natural history studies, but who are capable of sweeping off a pheasant from her nest in a net and pocketing all her eggs, which they sell to any one who is brave enough to buy them, for setting and hatching under the safe and motherly hen. And as just before the cottage, hidden except by those who know the locality, lies the small decoy pond, it is certainly necessary for some one to be here who can keep an eye on the landscape, and see that nobody enters the clump of alder-trees that look so very uninteresting to a passer-by, but that really hide the home and resting-place of many a wild bird that either remains here for shelter from the rough weather outside, or even at times breeds here and brings up her family quite respectably.

In the spring the peace and quiet of the place are irresistible, and if we enter silently, and as silently peer between the screens of furze and dried reed, behind which we wait in winter to shoot the birds as they fly over, we can notice a good deal of the ice entire of the birds, and see either teal or wild-duck with their "trip" of small ones, or else watch the water-hens scatter about, sometimes hurrying to their nests or young ones, sometimes basking in the sunshine and preening their feathers carefully, as if they were preparing for a tea party or a presentation at court. The decoy itself is too fair a spot, too replete with interest of all kinds, to be really the place of destruction it is. Traces still remain of the old style of "sport," in the wide tunnels covered by wire up which the birds used to be driven by a dog specially trained for the purpose, or by a man appearing suddenly just as they sailed to the mouth of the tunnel; thus having the desired effect of hurrying them to destruction, but now they are "lured in," or attracted by the tame birds reared and kept there, and are taught to "use" the pond, by being fed regularly at the sides as soon as they begin to appear, on barley or corn, falling victims in due time to the guns of those who stand hidden behind the tall screens, through which in spring we can look unperceived at the domestic arrangements of the water fowl, standing on softest, deepest moss, on which our footsteps are not heard, and noting at the same time, the lovely pink sheet of water-weed before us, the golden-brown hue on the alder, and scenting the aromatic odour of the bog-myrtle, that seems to contend with the spear for the honour of fringing the hem of the pond.

We who can hardly bear to see the destruction of the birds we have known, as it seems ■ us from the egg, can never make up our minds to share with our friend the game-keeper the delights of a good morning's sport at the small decoy, we remember sentimentally the beautiful blue eggs of the teal that we discovered in a sparrows' bed, and took home and placed under a bantam hen, whose motherly devotion and pride in the small creatures we can never forget, or the vigorous way in which she scolded and pecked ■ us, when we went lovingly to see if she had hatched out yet, or if she had had no luck. We cannot help recollecting the joy when one of the dogs found the black-cock's nest, or rather the nest belonging to his wife, the grey-hen—nor the amusement we obtained from the black-cock himself, who took up his abode on the arms of a stunted oak-tree, as if on guard while she sat, uttering ■ himself at times the curious harsh cry that sounds as if he wished to wage war on all his friends around. And so when the fat goes out for one of the celebrated day's shootings, to obtain an invitation to which is as good as a prize to most of the youths around, we make our way into the open heath, where there is yet another pond, where if the ice be on the mere we enjoy an afternoon's skating, while just as the sun suddenly beams like an immense red wafer stuck firmly on a grey expanse of paper, when the whole sheet of frozen water as suddenly attains a roseate hue, when the chill air becomes chillier, and the furze bushes that had thawed ■ the middle of the day become stiff and stark once more, we hear the quick reports of gun after gun; and towards our pond come flying, helter-skelter, whole flocks of wild-fowl, that at first are decidedly disorganized, yet finally resolve themselves into wedge-like battalions and make away for the river, a couple or three miles away, hoping for rest there until the decoy is once more free from their tormentors.

In spring and summer in the big decoy can be often seen wild-fowl resting close under the spar; water-hens disporting themselves in the centre of the pond, while a meditative heron stands looking at them for awhile, ere making for the mouth of the harbour, where is the herouery, and where he and his fellows fish the tides regularly as do the fishermen, who look upon them with evil eyes, and declare they destroy and eat so much that they ought one and all to be exterminated; but in winter there is nothing to bring them inland, and the whole place is given over to the skaters, who once used to gather there in companies, now all separated, some by distance, some by death, some by harsh and bitter feelings. Still as we look the whole scene rises again like a dream from the mist: we can almost scent the hot cakes from "Bennett's," with which we always came provided for luncheon. We hear the musical ring of the skates; very far above us we hear the quareck, quareck, quareck of the ducks as they pass, and then the scene changes: darkness falls, a big chill moon gazes down on the silent place, and in the night the frost gives, and we look upon quite a sea of waters when we open our blinds and come to see what manner of day it is.

Perhaps one of the greatest claims about our cottage is the fact that the interests around it seem ever changing, and that we come or go as it seems best to us. If we have the heath in front, is there not just at our back a wondrous silent wood, where we come yet again on another pond? In this one there are no birds, but if we lean over the bridge carefully, we can watch quantities of fish, small ones or big, that attract otters, who have literally made for themselves a pathway worn in the rough grass, as they come with a wonderful regularity to feed at morning and evening on any fish that they can catch, sometimes themselves being waylaid and killed because of the harm they do, and also because of the beautiful soft coat they wear, and which we long to possess for our own adornment. Here, too, is the real work of our gamekeeper carried on, for in sundry well watched, closely guarded corners he raises his many pheasants and partridges, assiduously tending them until they are old enough to do for themselves, when they are turned out in a vain attempt to render them a little less like the barn door fowls who have brought them up and cannot quite make out some of their peculiarities. On the boughs of some of the trees in the wood can be occasionally seen dummy pheasants, so extremely unlike life and so very wooden in their appearance, that we cannot understand how it is that they are able to deceive such cute hands as the poachers are, but they do—perhaps owing to the darkness of the night and the consciousness of their evil actions—and often a shot at one of these effigies brings the keeper down upon the poacher before he has got over his astonishment at seeing the bird still erect on his perch after receiving a good charge into his wooden body.

But the gamekeeper's children lead us away from the birds and show us many a secret warehouse of flowers that we might perchance have otherwise passed by, we climb a mossy dell, covered thick in last year's leaves, and where anemones lift up their wan, white faces abundantly, and the bolder hyacinth spreads his spear-like foliage, that often enough comes up with a dead leaf struck through his leaf, which he wears like a curious vinyl necklace, and we turn over and look suddenly down into the home of the daffodils. Never in any corner of England, surely, do these graceful flowers abound and flourish as they do here, and it is worth quite a journey to see them, in their own native place, as we see them in our wood, more especially if a soft south-west wind is noting along, driving the clouds over the sky, and giving a wonderful chequered effect as their shadows are thrown over the dancing golden flowers at our feet.

Only watch them sway first this way and now that, is not like a fairy court, bowing as the queen passes, invisible to all eyes save their own? First the deep yellow of the outer dress is apparent, then the primrose-hued petticoat is displayed just a little, and all the time we are impressed by the notion that the flowers enjoy as much as we do the lovely spring weather and the sense of life and growing bigger that they are experiencing, so exuberating are their movements, so full of joy and innocent delight are their graceful forms! Under yonder hedge grow white, beautiful violets, that would never have been seen had they not thrown out such a powerful scent as we pass, and then we have cowslips and oxlips with which to fill our baskets, that in turn give place to the somewhat proud and supercilious foxgloves, that the children call "poppies," because they pop loudly when blown into, and which they firmly believe are worn by the foxes as paw coverings, and they look vindictively at the earth in the wood, where, at early dawn, glimpses can be got of mamma fox playing with her cubs and enjoying mightily some of the chickens that she may have stolen from our cottage hen yard only the night before.

It is astonishing how much our children know of bird and beast and flowers. Living always as they do far from other human interests, they are thrown on nature's help alone for any amusements they may obtain.

The boys very rarely go very far from home. A gamekeeper is born, not made, and once the love of the country is fairly engraved on the soul of a boy, it is useless to try and turn his mind from the land, for he will never be fit for anything beyond it, but will only make a very indifferent anything else than a worker at the occupation to which he was born and in which he was brought up.

It is astonishing what power inanimate things obtain over the mind of man, once fall in love with the sea, and what can ever replace it in our hearts? Nothing. It is for ever calling us, through the calm of a summer night we hear it above every other quiet sound, in the winter we picture it to our selves in its thousand and one moods, and after being apart from it for any length of time, it is only the veriest shame that prevents us casting ourselves on the sand and touching the waves as they come towards us, so glad are we to know we can see its beautiful face again. It is the most perfect of companions, and never fails, but it is a subtle creature too, and so possesses itself of our inmost soul that we are never really happy unless we are within reach of the truest and most sympathetic friend we possess.

It is, too, extends itself to some natures to the land. None can understand it perhaps who has not experienced it, but it entirely accounts for the way in which, year after year, farmers persistently lose money, simply because fields and pastures that they have known from their youth are more to them, have more to give them of perfect happiness, than riches and plenty have among houses and in cities or in countries that they do not know.

Autumn is coming ■ our cottage near the wood, the leaves are beginning to change. Early in the morning dew lies heavily on the great sunflowers by the door, and drenches us as we put aside the wide-mouthed monthly roses round the porch. Presently the trees will be bare, and we shall be able to see the lake behind us, with the swan lazily resting among the brown, harmonious reeds, the tiny island will gleam golden in the thin pale sunshine. Our friend the keeper will be busy from morning until night with the dogs and guns and the big parties from the squire. Another daughter is going ■ service in the little town over the moor, where the big grey square tower of the church ■ apparent as we stand on the well-whitened doorstep taking a last look at the lovely view before us. And winter will soon be coming too, yet as we turn our back on our cottage we know that seasons come, each bearing their own appointed work in their arms for our comfort and occupation, and that, return when we may—and may it be soon—we shall find all this much as we leave it to-day. True, the keeper may be changed individually, but still some keeper will be there. Nature, ever young and beautiful, will still have pictures to display to us. Nay, if we never go there again, what would it matter? We should still know that, whatever happened, we still possess, still must always possess, our cottage near a wood.

MANASSEH BEN ISRAEL.

Quater and Distrust

WHEN the prophet of the Hebrews, some six and-twenty hundred years ago, thundered forth his stirring "Go through! go through the gates! prepare a way, lift up a standard for the people!" it may, without irreverence, be doubted if he foresaw how literally his charge would be fulfilled by one of his own race in the seventeenth century of the Christian era. The story of how it was done may perhaps be worth retelling, since many subjects of Isaac's moment have found more chroniclers.

It was in 1590 that gates, which in England had long been ominously creaking on their hinges, were deliberately swung to, and bolted and barred by Church and State on the unhappy Jews, who on that bleak November day stood shivering along the coast. "Thy waves and thy billows have passed over me" must have lost in tender allegory and gained some added force of literalness that wintry afternoon. Scarce any of the descendants of that exodus can have had share in the return. Of such of the refugees as reached the opposite ports few found foothold, and fewer still asylum. The most, and perhaps they were the most fortunate of the fifteen thousand, were quick in gaining foreign graves. Those who made for the nearest neighbouring shores of France, forgetful, or perhaps ignorant, of the recent experiences of their French brethren under Philip Augustus, lived on to earn a like knowledge for themselves, and to undergo, a few years later, another expulsion under Philip the Fair. Over the German States the Imperial eagle of Rome no longer brooded, now to protect and now to prey on its victims; the struggle between the free cities and the multitudinous petty principalities was working to its climax, but whether at bitter strife, or whether pausing for a brief while to recruit their powers, Lindgrave and burgher, on one subject, were always of one mind. To plunder at need or to persecute at leisure, Jews were held to be handy and sure game for either side.

Far northward or far southward that ragged English mob were hardly fit to travel. Some remnant, perhaps, made effort to reach the semi-barbarous settlements in Russia and Poland, but few can have been sanguine enough to set out for distant Spain in hope of a welcome but rarely accorded to such very poor relations. And even in the Peninsula the security which the Jews had hitherto experienced had by this date received several severe shocks. Two centuries later and the tide of civilisation had rolled definitely and cleanly back on the soil which Jews had largely helped to cultivate, and left it bare. Yet a little longer and Portugal, become a province of Spain, had followed the cruel fashions of its suzerain, and by the close of the sixteenth century a new settlement of the dispossessed Spanish and Portuguese Jews had been formed in Holland, and Amsterdam was growing into a strange Dutch likeness of a new Jerusalem.

Holland alone among the nations in this period gave a welcome to all citizens in the spirit of Virgil's famous line, "Tias Rutulæ suat, nullo discrimine habebit." And the refugees, who at this date claimed the hospitality of the States, were of a sort to make the Dutch in love with their own unfashionable virtue of religious tolerance. Under Moorish sway, for centuries, commerce had been but one of the pursuits open to the Jews and followed by the Jews of the Peninsula, and thus it was a crowd, not of financiers and traders only or chiefly, but of cultivated scholars, physicians, statesmen, and landowners, whom Catholic bigotry sent from those shores. The thin disguise of new Christians was soon thrown off by these Jews, and they became to real Christians, to such men as Vossius and Caspar Barlaam, who welcomed them and made friends of them, a revelation of Judaism.

It was after the great auto-da-fé of January, 1605, that Joseph ben Israel, with a host of other Jews, broken in health and broken in fortune, left the land which bigotry and persecution had made hideous to them, and joined the peaceful and prosperous settlement in Amsterdam. The youngest of ben Israel's transplanted family was the year-old Manasseh, who had been born a few months before their flight, in Lisbon. He seems to have been from the first a promising and intelligent lad, and his tutor, one Isaac Uziel, who was a minister of the congregation and a somewhat famous mathematician and physician to boot, formed a high opinion of his abilities. He did not, however, live to see them verified, when Manasseh was but eighteen the Rabbi died, and his clever pupil was thought worthy to be appointed to the vacated office. It was an honoured and an honourable, but scarcely a lucrative post, to which Manasseh thus succeeded, and the problem of living soon became further complicated by an early marriage and a young family. Manasseh had to trust about him for supplementary means of support, and he presently found it in the establishment of a printing press. Whether the type gave impetus to the pen, or whether the pen had inspired the idea of the press, is hard to decide, but it is, at least, certain that before he was twenty five, Manasseh had found congenial work and plenty of it. He taught and he preached, and both in the school room and in the pulpit he was useful and effective, but it was in his library that he felt really happy and at home. Manasseh was a born scholar and an omnivorous reader, bound to develop into a prolific, if not a profound writer. The work which first established his fame bears traces of this, and is, in point of fact, less of a composition than a compilation. The first part of this book, "The Conciliator," was published in 1632, after five years' labour had been expended on it, and it is computed to contain quotations from, or references to, over 200 Hebrew, and 30 Latin and Greek authors. Its object was to harmonise (avchader) conflicting passages in the Pentateuch, and it was written in Spanish, although it could have been composed with equal facility in any one of half a dozen other languages, for Manasseh was a most accomplished linguist.

Although not the first book which was issued from his press, for a completely edited prayer book and a Hebrew grammar had been published in 1627, "The Conciliator" was the first work that attracted the attention of the learned world to the Amsterdam Rabbi. Manasseh had the advantage of literary connections of his own, through his wife, who was a great-granddaughter of Abarbanel—that same Isaac Abarbanel, the scholar and patriot, who in 1490 headed the deputation of Ferdinand and Isabella, which was so dramatically cut short by Torquemada.

Like "The Conciliator," all Manasseh's subsequent literary ventures met with ready appreciation, but with more appreciation, it would seem, than solid result, for his means appear to have been always insufficient for his modest wants, and in 1640 we find him seriously contemplating emigration to Brazil on a trading venture. Two members of his congregation, which, as a body, does not seem to have acted liberally towards him, came forward, however, at this crisis in his affairs, and conferred a benefit all round by establishing a college and appointing Manasseh the principal, with an adequate salary. His ready use of some portion of their wealth has made the brothers Pereira more distinguished than for its possession. Still, it must not be inferred that Manasseh had been, up to this date, a friendless, if a somewhat impecunious student, only that, as is rather perhaps the wont of poor prophets in their own country, his admirers had had to come from the outer before they reached the inner circle. He had certainly achieved a European celebrity in the Republic of letters before his friends in Amsterdam had discovered much more than the fact that he printed very superior prayer books. He had won over, amongst others, the prejudiced author of the "Law of Nations," to own him, a Jew, for a familiar friend, before some of the wealthier heads of his own congregation had claimed a like privilege, and Grotius then Swedish ambassador at Paris, was actually writing to him and proffering friendly service, at the very time that the Amsterdam congregation were calmly receiving his enforced farewells. There was something of irony in the situation, but Manasseh, like Maimonides, had no littleness of disposition, no inflammable self-love quick to take fire, he loved his people truly enough to understand them and to make allowances had even, perhaps, some humorous perception of the national obtuseness to native talent unarrayed in purple and fine linen, or until duly recognised by the wearers of such.

Set free, by the liberality of Abraham and Isaac Pereira, from the pressure of every day cares, Manasseh again devoted himself to his books, and turned out a succession of treatises. History, Philosophy, Theology, he attacked them all in turn, and there is, perhaps, something besides rapidity of execution which suggests an idea of manufacture in most of his works. A treatise which he published about 1650, and which attracted very wide notice, significantly illustrated his rather fatal facility for ready writing. The treatise was entitled "The Hope of Israel," and sought to prove no less than that some aborigines in America, whose very existence was doubtful, were lineal descendants of the lost ten tribes. The Hope itself seems to have rested on no more solid foundation than a traveller's tale of savages met with in the wilds, who included something that sounded like the שמרג (Shemarg*) in their vernacular. The story was quickly translated into several languages, but it was almost as quickly disproved, and Manasseh's deductions from it were subsequently rather roughly criticised. Truth ■ say, the accumulated stores of his mind were ground down and sifted and sown broadcast in somewhat careless and indigestible masses, and their general character gives an uncomfortable impression of machine work rather than of hand-work. But the proportion of what he wrote was as nothing compared ■ what he contemplated writing. And perhaps those never written books of his would have proved the most readable, ■ might have shown us himself, his wise, tolerant, enthusiastic self, in them. But instead we possess in his shelves on shelves of published compilations of dead men's minds, only duly labelled and catalogued selections from learned mummies.

The dream of his authorship was to compose a "Heroic History," a significant title which shadows forth the worthy record he would have delighted in compiling from Jewish annals. It ■ as well, perhaps, that the title is all we have of the work, for he was too good an idealist to prove a good historian. He cared too much and he knew too much, ■ wrote a reliable or a readable history of his people. To him, as to many of us, Robert Browning's words might be applied—

"So you saw your life if you wished you were—
As you might have been if you could be—Let him tell led by things as they
And grow content in yet poorer degree."

He, at any rate, had good reason to grow "content in his degree," for he was destined to make an epoch in the "Heroic History," instead of being, as he "wished he were," the reciter, and probably the poor reciter, of several. Certain it ■ that great scholar, successful preacher, and voluminous writer as was Manasseh ben Israel, it was not till he was fifty years old that he found his real vocation. He had felt at it for years, his books were more or less blind gropings after it, his friendships with the eminent and highly placed personages of his time were all unconscious means to a conscious end, and his very character was a factor in his gradually formed purpose. His whole life had been an upholding of the "standard," ■ publicists who sneered at the ostentatious rich Jew, priests who ruled at the degraded poor Jew, were each bound to recognise in Manasseh a Jew of another type: one poor yet self-respecting, sought after yet unostentatious, conservative yet cosmopolitan, learned yet undogmatic. if he were in essentials what he claimed to be, fairly representative of the fairly treated members of his race. So the ■ way was prepared" by the "standard" being raised. Which, of the many long-closed gates, was to open for the people to pass through?

Manasseh looked around on Europe. He sought a safe and secure resting place for the tribe of wandering foot and weary heart, where, no longer weary and wandering, they might cease to ■ "tribal." He sought a place where "protection" should not be given as a sordid bribe, nor conferred as a fickle favour, but claimed as an inalienable right to be shared in common with all law-abiding citizens. His thoughts turned for a while on Sweden, and there was some correspondence to that end with the young Queen Christina, but this failing, or falling through, his hopes were almost at once definitely directed towards England. It was a wise selection and a happy one, and the course of events, and the time and the temper of the people seemed all upon his side. The faithless Stuart king had but lately expiated his hateful, harmful weakness on the scaffold, and sentiment was far as yet from setting the nimbus of saint and martyr on his head, some treacherous head. The echoes of John Hampden's brave voice seemed still vibrating in the air, and Englishmen, but freshly reminded of their rights, were growing keen and eager in the scenting out of wrongs, quick to discover, and swift to redress evils which had long lain rooted and rotting and unheeded. The pompous insouciance of the first Stuart king, the frivolous insouciance of the second, were being resented now in inevitable reaction, the court no longer led the fashion, the people had come ■ the front and were grown grimly, even grotesquely in earnest. The very fashion of speaking seems to have changed with the new need for strong, terse expression. Men greeted each other with old fashioned Bible greetings, they named their children after those "great ones gone," or with even quainter effect in some simple selected Bible phrase, the very tones of the Prophets seemed to resound in Whitehall, and Englishmen to have become, in a wide unsensational sense, not men only of the sword, or of the plough, but men of the Book, and that Book the Bible. Liberty of conscience, equality before the law for all religious denominations, had been the unconditional demand of that wonderful army of Independents, and although the Catholics were the immediate cause and object of this appeal, yet Manasseh, watching events from the calm standpoint of a keenly interested onlooker, thought ■ discerned in the listening attitude of the English Parliament, a favourable omen of the attention he deemed to claim for his clients, since it was not alone for political, but for religious rights he meant to plead.

He did not, however, actually come to England till 1655, when the way had been already prepared by correspondence and petition for personal intercession. His "Hope of Israel" had been forwarded to Cromwell so early ■ 1650; petitions praying for the readmission of Jews to England with full rights of worship, of burial, and of commerce secured ■ them, had been laid before the Long and the Rump Parliament, and Manasseh had now in hand, and approaching completion, a less elaborate and more impassioned composition than usual, entitled "Vindicia Judæorum." A powerful and unexpected advocate of Jewish claims presently came forward in the person of Edward Nicholas, the private secretary of the Protector. This large-minded and enlightened gentleman had the courage to publish an elaborate appeal for, and defence of, the Jews, "the most honourable people in the world," as he styled them, "a people chosen by God and protected by God." The pamphlet was headed, "Apology for the Honourable Nation of the Jews and all the Sons of Israel," and Nicholas' arguments aroused no small amount of attention and discussion. It was even whispered that Cromwell had had a share in the authorship, but if this had been so, undoubtedly he who "stood bare, not clad in euphemistic coat of mail," but who "grappled like a giant, face to face, heart to heart, with the naked truth of things,"* would have unhesitatingly avowed it. His was not the sort of nature to shrink from responsibilities, nor to lack the courage of his opinions. There can be no doubt that, from first to last, Cromwell was strongly in favour of Jewish claims being allowed, and just as little doubt is there that there was never any tinge or taint of "secret favouring" about his sayings or his doings on the subject. The part, and all things considered the very unpopular part, he took in the subsequent debates, had, of course, to be accounted for by minds not quick ■ understand such simple motive power as justice, generosity, or sympathy, and both now and later the wildest accusations were levelled against the Protector. That he was, unsuspected, himself of Jewish descent, and had designs on the long vacant Messiahship of his interesting kinsfolk, was not the most malignant, though it was perhaps among the most absurd of these tales. "The man is without a soul," writes Carlyle, "that can look into the great soul of a man, radiant with the splendours of very heaven, and see nothing there but the shadow of ■ own mean darkness."† There must have been, if this view be correct, a good many particularly materialistic bodies going about at that epoch in English history when the Protector of England took upon himself the unpopular burden of being also the Protector of the Jews.

There had been some opposition on the part of his family to overcome, some tender timid forebodings, which events subsequently justified, ■ chapel, before Manasseh was free to set out for England, but in the late autumn of 1655 we find him with two or three companions safely settled in lodgings in the Strand. An address to the Protector was personally presented by Manasseh, whilst a more detailed declaration ■ the Commonwealth was simultaneously published. Very remarkable are both these documents. Neither in the personal petition to Cromwell, nor in the more elaborate argument addressed to the Parliament, is there the slightest approach to the ad misericordiam style. The whole case is stated with dignity, and pleaded without passion, and throughout justice rather than favour forms the staple of the demand. The "clemency" and "high-mindedness" of Cromwell are certainly taken for granted, but equally is assumed the worthiness of the clients who make an appeal to these qualities. Manasseh makes also a strong point of the Profit, which the Jews are likely to prove to their hosts, naively recognising the fact that "Profit is a most powerful motive which all the world prefers above all other things," and "therefore dealing with that point first." He dwells on the "ability" and "industry" and "naturall instinct" of the Jews for "merchandizing," and for "contributing new inventions," which extra aptitude, in a somewhat optimistic spirit, he moralises, may have been given to them for their "protection in their wanderings," since "wheresoever they go ■ dwell, there presently the traffic begins to flourish."

Read in the light of some recent literature, one or two of Manasseh's arguments might almost be termed prophetic. Far sighted, however, and wide-seeing as was our Amsterdam Rabbi, ■ could certainly not have foretold that more than two hundred years later the race would be taunted in the same breath for being a "wandering" and "homeless tribe," and for remaining a "settled" and "parasitic" people in their adopted countries; yet are not such ingenious, and ungenerous, and inconsistent taunts answered by anticipations in the following paragraph?—

"The love that men ordinarily bear to their own country, and the desire they have to end their lives where they had their beginning, is the cause that most strangers, having gotten riches where they are in a foreign land, are commonly taken to a desire to return to their native soil, and there peacefully to enjoy their estate, so that as they were a nation to the places where they lived and negotiated while they remained there, so when they depart from thence, they carry all away and spoil them of their wealth, transporting all into their own native country. But with the Jews, the case is farre different, for where the Jews are once kindly received, they make a firm resolution never to depart from thence, seeing they have no proper place of their own, and so they are always with their goods in the cities where they live, a perpetuall benefit to all payments."

Manasseh goes on to quote Holy Writ, to show that to "seek for the peace," and to "pray for the peace of the city whither thou art led captive,"† was from remote times a loyal duty enjoined on Jews, and so he makes perhaps another point against that thorough-going historian of our day, who would have disposed of the People and the Book, the Jews and the Old Testament together, in the course of a magazine article. To prove that uncompromising loyalty has among Jews the added force of a religious obligation, Manasseh mentions the fact that the ruling dynasty is always prayed for by upstanding congregations in every Jewish place of worship, and he makes history give its evidence to show that this is no mere lip loyalty, but that the obligation has been over and over again faithfully fulfilled. He quotes numerous instances in proof of this, beginning from the time, 900 years B.C., when the Jerusalem Jew, High Priest at their head, went forth to defy Alexander, and to own staunch allegiance to discredited Darius, till those recent civil wars in Spain, when the Jews of Burgos manfully held that city against the conqueror, Henry of Castile, in defence of their conquered, but liege lord, Pedro.

Of all the simply silly slanders, such, for instance, as the leading Passover biscuits with the blood of Christian children, from which his people had suffered, Manasseh disposes shortly, with brief and distinct denial, pertinently reminding Englishmen, however, that the like absurd accusations crop up in the early history of the Church, when the "very same ancient scandalls were cast of old upon the innocent Christians."

With the more serious, because less absolutely untruthful charge of "usury," Manasseh deals as boldly, urging even no extenuating plea, but frankly admitting the practice to be "infamous." But characteristically, he proceeds to express an opinion, that "inasmuch as no man is bound to give his goods to another, so is he not bound to let it out but for his own occasions and profit," "only," and thus he adds emphatically—

"It must be done with moderation, that the usury be not being or exorbitant. The sacred Scripture, which allows usury with him that is not of the same religion, forbids absolutely the robbing of men, whoseever religion they be of. In our law it is a greater sinne to rob or defraud a stranger, than if I did it to one of my owne profession, a Jew is bound to shew his charity to all men, he hath a precept, not to abhorre an Idumean or an Egyptian, and yet another, that he shall love and protect a stranger that comes to live in his land. If notwithstanding, there be some that do contrary to this, they do it not as Jewes simply but as wicked Jewes."

The Appeal made, as it could scarcely fail to do, a profound impression, an impression which was helped not a little by the presence and character of the pleader. And the whole question of the return of the Jews to England was presently submitted to the nation for its decision.

The clergy were dead against the measure, and, it is said, "raged like fanatics against the Jews as an accursed nation." And then it was that Cromwell, true to his highest convictions, stood up to speak in their defence. On the ground of policy, he temperately urged the desirability of adding thrifty, law respecting, and enterprising citizens to the national stock, and on the higher ground of duty, he passionately pleaded the unpopular cause of religious and social toleration. He deprecated the principle that the claims of morality being satisfied, any men or any body of men, on the score of race, of origin, or of religion ("tribal mark" had not at that date been suggested), should be excluded from full fellowship with other men. "I have never heard a man speak so splendidly in my life," is the recorded opinion of one of the audience, and it is a matter of intense regret that this famous speech of Cromwell's has not been preserved. Its eloquence, however, failed of effect, so far as its whole and immediate object was concerned. The gates were no more than shaken on their rusting hinges—not quite yet were the people freely to "pass through."

The decision of the Council of State was deferred, and some authorities even allege that it was presently pronounced against the readmission of the Jews to England. The known and avowed favour of the Protector sufficed, nevertheless, to induce the few Jews who had come with, or in the train of, Manasseh to remain, and others gradually, and by degrees, and without any especial notice being taken of them, ventured to follow. The creaking old gates were certainly ajar, and wider and wider they opened, and fainter and fainter, from friction of unrestrained intercourse, grew each dull rust and stain of prejudice till that good day, within living memories, when the barriers were definitely and altogether slung down. And on their ruins a new and healthy human growth sprang quickly up, "taking root downwards, and bearing fruit upwards," spreading wide enough in its vigorous luxuriance to cover up all the old bad past And by this time it has happily grown inspersious ■ any wanton unfriendly touch which would thrust its kindly shade aside and once again lay those ugly runs bare Münasser, however, like so many of us, had to be content to sow seed which he was destined never to see ripen. His petitions were presented in 1655, his "Vindictæ Judæorum" was completed and handed in some time in 1656, and in the early winter of 1657, on his journey homewards, he died. His mission had not fulfilled itself in the complete triumphant way he had hoped, but life "fulfils itself in many ways," and one part at any rate, perhaps the most important part of the Hebrew prophet's charge, had been both poetically and prosaically carried out by this seventeenth century Dutch Jew. He had "lilted up a standard for his people."

"LET LOVE ABIDE"

In the gardens at Formello in the early 15th century, it is very easy to understand "I et l'ore alido"

I STIF the house in dreams, and know the chime that haunts each silent room
Where I cloy & bewitch smile and glow, and triumph in unmetamorphosed bloom,
And old dead loves and joys of yore come back to live their lives once more

Deep in the ivy on the walls the peacock sinks his purple bicast,
The place is full of wild bird-calls, and pigeons coo themselves to rest,
While tunefully, through rush and brake, the streamlets tinkle to the lake.

Across the long grey terrace sweeps the subtle scent of orange flowers,
And through the stately portal creeps a sigh from honeysuckle bowers,
To blend, in chambers dim and vast, with fainter sweets of summers past.

Do shadows of the days of old still linger in the garden ways?
Long hidden, deep beneath the mould, they found a ring of other days,
And faith, and hope, and memory cling about that simple wedding ring

It bears a posy quaint and sweet (and well the graven letters wear),
 "Let love abide,"—the words are meet for those who pay love's endless prayer,
 The old heart language, sung or sighed, for ever speaks, "Let love abide."

Oh, noble mansion, proud and old, and beautiful in shade or shine,
Age after age your walls enfold the treasures of an ancient line,
And yet—let time take all the rest, if love abide, for love is best

SARAH DOUDNEY.

THE LAW OF LIFE IN CHRIST JESUS.

BY THE REV. A. GOODRICH

AMID the many shades of meaning in which the term law is used we may distinguish two—the legal and scientific. The legal meaning we have in such phrases as,

"the laws of our country," in which the word law designates a rule set forth by authority and enforced by sanctions. The scientific meaning we have in such phrases as the "laws of nature,' in which the word law designates an observed order of facts, or a force regularly operating. I both meanings unite in the idea of regularity or uniformity.

A careful reading of the seventh and eighth chapters of the Epistle to the Romans will disclose the fact that the apostle, possibly unconsciously, used the term law in both these senses. When he speaks of the law of Moses he uses the term law manifestly in its legal sense. But when he says, 'I find then a law that when I would do good evil is present with me,' he uses the word law in its scientific sense. There is no such utterance set forth by authority and enforced by sanctions as when we would do good evil is present with us. But there is this order of facts constantly recurring, 'The presence of evil when we would do good' is in certain conditions, so much the established order so much the regular succession of things that we may call it a law. For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made us free from the law of sin and death,' in these words, 'sin' we have the term law used in its scientific sense. It cannot be here used in its legal sense, for it was quite contrary to the apostle's thought to call the law of Moses a law of life and free as he was in speaking of the Mosaic law, he would never have spoken of it as a law of sin and death. The scientific meaning of the term law gives the sense of the passage. The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, i.e., the regular order of facts which the spirit of life in Christ Jesus calls into existence, hath made me free from the law of sin and death i.e., the regular order of facts which the power of sin and death calls into existence. The higher supernatural force of the gospel regularly operating in the direction of life, hath made me free from the lower force of sin, regularly operating in the direction of death. The higher law has subordinated the lower law.

The apostle thus puts forth the gospel as an instance of the great principle which holds all being in life and order, viz., the operation of law and the subordination of the lower by the higher law. By this principle nature maintains its exquisite balance and beautiful order. A very drop of water is an example of certain chemical laws subordinating certain mechanical laws. Every plant and every animal maintain their being by the higher law of their life subordinating certain mechanical and chemical laws. Our civilisation advances only as we come to know the laws environing us, and become expert in adjusting and subordinating them so as to produce new and useful results. The great triumph of civilisation, the steam engine, be it in propelling the ship or speeding the train with the train, is but a human combination of mechanical and dynamical laws, so as to subordinate and so far free the vessel or train from the first law of motion, or the inertia of matter. Like manner the spiritual life is maintained by the subordination of the lower law of sin by the higher law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus.

But to be more explicit. The earth revolving round the sun has like all bodies revolving round a centre, a tendency to fly off from its centre, which doing it would go rushing through the heavens destroying and being destroyed. But from the destructive power of this centrifugal force the earth is made free by the operation of another force the centripetal, which draws the earth to its centre. The life of the earth is thus maintained by the subordination of one law to another. The tendency of man is to fly off from the orbit of duty to which God has appointed him which to man is to the earth would be darkness and destruction to self and to others. But when man comes under the attracting power of Christ Jesus the sun of righteousness, another force, the spirit of life comes into regular operation in his being, subordinating his natural tendency and keeping him in the appointed orbit of his being. 'The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made him free from the law of sin and death.'

From this view of the Christian life some things follow. It is plain therefore that the life in Christ Jesus is one of freedom from the law of sin, freedom not from the temptations to sin not from being overtaken in the fault but from the law of sin the dominant, regular operation of sin. We so speak in analogous cases. A diseased man places himself under the care of the physician who, continuing to bring certain laws of healing into play, makes the man free from the law of disease and death. The man, it is known, is still very feeble he is subject now and then to twinges of pain, perhaps he is attacked by slight forms of the disease, nevertheless, the disease being arrested, and the order of health being operative within him, so that in due time he will be perfectly healthy, he is rightly pronounced to be cured, freed in this particular, from the law of disease and death. So though in the soul of man, ministered by the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, there is a painful weakness in the attainment of spiritual grace, though by temptation from within or defeat without, he may be overruled in the thing, the man nevertheless, his mortal disease being arrested, and the forces of spiritual health being in regular play within him, is free from the law of sin and death. In due time, through the operation of the law of life he will be absolutely free from all spiritual weakness, and presented faultless before the presence of Christ's glory, he will for ever more do the will of the Father with the ease and completeness of perfect spiritual health and strength.

It also follows from the view before us that the life in Christ Jesus is most orderly.

The wind bloweth where it listeth, so is every one that is born of the Spirit. "Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself according to the good pleasure of His will. From these and similar passages, some have drawn inferences contrary to the view of the Christian life now before us. They have spoken of God's working in the kingdom of peace as irregular and capricious. They have confused His sovereignty with arbitrariness, the good pleasure of God's will with caprice.

This confusion of thought has involved them in serious practical error such as standing outside the kingdom waiting for some great sermon or some exciting service, or some unusual experience, or some wondrous work of spiritual influence which should bear them irresistibly into the kingdom. The view of the Christ in life as the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus rules all such. This view is not opposed to those Scriptures which teach that the life in Christ is supernatural mysterious sovereign but from the life in Christ Jesus it does vigorously exclude the notions of caprice and irregularity. Surely the kingdom of grace is no less orderly than the kingdom of nature. In both there is the wind that bloweth where it listeth there are phenomena whose law is not yet known by us, but that these phenomena have their law, that the wind &c., in both kingdoms has its law, few will deny. There is uniformity of order, a regularity of sequence in the kingdoms of life as well as in the kingdom of nature. If in either we would win the crown, we must strive lawfully. If in either we would be freed from the law of death, it must be by the operation of the law of life. If we would become men in Christ Jesus healthy and vigorous we must breathe a pure atmosphere of prayer, we must feed duly upon the bread of life, we must take liberal exercise in good works. If we neglect these laws our spiritual man can no more be healthy and vigorous than can our physical man if we fail to breathe a pure atmosphere and to eat wholesome food. Delivered from the law of Moses, we are thus in deepest divinest sense under law. 'Our gospel establishes law.' It is the perfect law of liberty. It is the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus freeing us from the law of sin and death.

And because the life in Christ Jesus is thus under law it is most secure and serene. If our life in Christ were in any manner subject to caprice, how could we have any sense of security? I once heard a scientific friend speak in the pages of science something like the following—When in the pursuit of science, I see that the infinitely complex phenomena of nature are held and ruled by laws invariable in their operation, when I see that even sets of phenomena, which at first sight appeared most irregular, are found upon closer observation to be also under law, when I observe how surely and exactly, without one hair's breadth of deviation the same phenomena are repeated under the same circumstances, when thus I see order, uniformity, invariability in all the workings of nature, I have great calm and confidence for the element of chance a constant source of fear, is eliminated. This witness is true there is indeed a peace coming from the knowledge of the divine order in nature, especially when we recognise in the laws of nature, not the operation of an impersonal force but the regular working of the Heavenly Father who works in the same way all through the ages because what He has once done has been best done and cannot be amended, and so in the same circumstances must it run and run and yet run be repeated.

Now we have seen that the motto in speaking of the Christian life is the law of the spirit of life. Christ Jesus uses the term law according to scientific usage for uniformity of operation. After the manner, therefore, of the scientific friend we may say. When we observe that all through the Christian ages the invariable result of a soul being united by a living faith to Jesus Christ, is its receiving the forgiveness of sins and the spirit of life, when we also observe that this spirit of life in the soul of men ever works most uniformly in the direction of freeing the soul from sin and death, when we still further observe that this spirit of life works in the soul with ever increasing power, slowly and with some checks, it may be, yet surely and persistently taking deeper and yet deeper hold of the being, when we thus observe uniformity, continuity in the workings of God's grace, we also have calm and confidence, for the element of chance, a constant source of fear, is eliminated from our spiritual life. We have a very blessed sense of security and serenity. We now see that it is contrary to law that he that believeth should perish, and according to law that he that believeth should have everlasting life, contrary to law that sin should reign over him that hath the spirit of life, and according to law that he that hath the spirit of life should abide for ever. "Sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under law but under grace," said the apostle, meaning by law the Mosaic law. But using the term law in the sense before us, we may say, Sin shall not have dominion over you, for in the deepest, divinest sense ye are under law, because under grace.

From the view of the Christian life before us, it follows also that union with Christ is absolutely necessary unto life. The law of the spirit of life is in Christ Jesus. Imagine a circle—that circle, however, is vaster far than most imagine—filled with the grace and truth, the spirit and power of Christ Jesus. It is only within this circle that the law of the spirit-life exists and operates. If a person will stand outside this circle, as every one does who rejects Christ's truth and grace, he stands outside the weep of the blessed law of life, and how can he live? If a person enter the circle, as every one does in the measure in which he receives the truth and grace of Christ, he comes under the power of the law of life, and how can he die? This requirement of faith in Christ Jesus in order to our coming under the power of the law of the spirit of life, is no requirement which may or may not be dispensed with; it is no clever expedient or happy thought which meet an emergency. It is a law existent in and flowing out of the very nature of the case, just as it is a law that we have physical life only as we dwell in and breathe the atmosphere. Death to the unbeliever is not an arbitrary penalty, it is a direct consequent, a necessary effect of his unbelief. If we entertain the hope of the salvation of the righteous pagan, it is because either this life they discerned and received the truth with which Christ Jesus identified himself, when he said, "I am the truth," or because in the world to come the truth is preached to and received by such spirits in prison. He who believes in the ultimate salvation of every individual soul, misses, it seems, the significance of many facts, but he appreciates the order of facts, or law that binds salvation to the soul's union with Christ, since he affirms that every soul will be saved, because all who do not here, will hereafter receive Christ Jesus. The law of life being thus inseparable from Christ, God is not harsh or severe in publishing the word, which really exists whether He publish it or not, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life." The promise and the warning are both of the gospel. As says Browning—

"I speak as I see
I repeat as I can may of God's work—alike Love, yet all's

III.—THE QUEST FOR THE OSMUNDA.

I COULD not help asking myself, as I mounted the hillside this morning—is it possible that life can be more perfect anywhere than it is among the Western Islands during the summer and autumn months? I am staying at a little inn which looks out across the stormy sound where the fugitive Bruce was driven by stress of weather into his enemy's stronghold—as we learn from that altogether delightful and authentic history, "The Lord of the Isles." We have been recently assured by Mr. Matthew Arnold that Sir Walter's poem is not poetry, and that it is only old-fashioned people without any ear for music who can admire the jungle of his rough and ready rhymes. Surely, this is the merest fatuity of criticism. I am certain at least that every yachtsman and fisherman will tell us that the run from Skye to Arran in the Iouth Cantor is one of the breeziest bits of writing in the language, that nowhere else has the joy and gladness and sparkling merriment of "Old Ocean" been more rhythmically rendered. And I should like to know where we shall find stronger and more dramatic action than at the interview of the old gistle over yonder, between the aged Abbot of Iona and the outlawed king—

"De Bruce thy words gous blow
Hath at God's skye slain thy foe,— (Unmannered yet by high behest,
I than thee, and thou shalt be blest!"

We had our trout rods with us; but fishing was only a subordinate and incidental sport to-day; we were in quest of nobler game

The old Ross shire shepherd had solemnly assured us while we were smoking a pipe in the harness-room the day before (it was a wild day of wind and rain, and we had turned the harness-room into a smoking-room pro temp), that the great Osmunda Regalis was to be found in profusion within five miles of the inn door. There was a stream in the heart of the hills along which it grew in thickets—as high as a man's head, he said. His directions were rather indefinite, and his Gaelic abnormally vague; but we could not doubt that somewhere among the hills round about—two feet, or four feet, or six feet high—the Royal Fern was to be found. To some of us the news that this noble plant, which in a few years will be as rare as the Great Auk, if not as extinct as the Dodo, might be seen in a state of nature within easy walking distance, was great news, and caused such a thrill of excitement as the discovery of a big nugget causes to a colony of Australian or Californian diggers. In this age of grandmotherly legislation, when the Home Secretary has become a sort of head nurse, and we are drilled without mercy or pity into virtue and happiness, I am astonished that a Bill to protect wild flowers, and to punish their unscrupulous enemies, has not been thought of. There is a statute for the protection of wild birds, and, between ourselves, wild birds are by no means so innocent as wild flowers. Gulls, solan geese, herons, and various other sea and water fowl have prodigious appetites, and when they get among a shoal of young fry work wholesale havoc. Still the Act is a good one—only I should like to see it extended. The brute who shot the last Great Auk on our coast cannot have been more hopelessly wicked than the wretches who extirpated the Kullarny fern. The bones of the Great Auk may still be seen in our museums (the skeleton is as costly a rarity as an Aldine or an Elzevir), but what a splendid fellow he must have been in the water—through which he could dive with the ease that a swallow wings its way through the air! It is a thousand pities that the Act for the Protection of Wild Birds came a few years too late, and after he had been finally worried out of existence. But unless some such Act as I suggest is speedily passed, we shall be familiar with the Osmunda and its kindred only as we are familiar with the Great Auk and the Dodo. The poacher who is found on the public highway with a hare or a pheasant up his coat sleeve is sharply punished—as he deserves to be, no doubt, but the rascal who has stolen the only root of Woodus hyperborea in a county escapes scot-free. What is a hare or a pheasant more or less in comparison with a crested lutea or a plant of Cystopteris montana? When we nationalise the land we shall, I suppose, have neither deer nor hare, grouse nor pheasant, and when in addition we have cut down our last wild rose and uprooted our last fern, we shall have reached a dead level of dullness that cannot in any direction, it is to be hoped, prove obnoxious to republican simplicity.

In the meantime, however, in the remoter islands the Osmunda continues to flourish, and, inspired by the shepherd's narrative, we started this morning on a voyage of discovery.

The long sea loch or fiord is, perhaps, the most attractive and characteristic feature of our Atlantic seaboard. Brilliantly blue, it winds among purple heather or greenest bracken. This is a bracken country—from the water edge to the hill top we wade through a forest of fern. The turf beneath the wavy branches is short and sweet, and here the blue hare burrows and the curlew nests. The whaup, indeed, is the quintus quintus of the night, if we are wakened, we hear its melancholy wail, a wail in which all the pathetic loneliness of solitary places finds voice.

'The wild buck bolls him hony lute,' and the rabbits scuttle past our feet. Below us the water is enchantingly blue and breezy, and when we reach the summit the great Ben More range opens away to the Atlantic.

We keep to the hill path that leads to the upper loch. It skirts the moor, crowning in many a deep gorge where the burn leaps from ledge to ledge, and where, among birch and hazel bushes, and the red berries of the mountain ash, the pensive Lady Fern spreads a fan-like her drooping fronds.

'Where the copewood in the green is,
Where the fountain glimmers gleam of
Where the morning dew lies low,
There the Lady Fern grows strongest.'

There are oak and beech and filmy ferns besides, and wonderful patches of green and yellow and orange moss, a black cock rushes up like a rocket, a spotted snake steals away among the stones, but we search in vain for the Osmunda. Has our shepherd, with his natural Gaelic affability, and Celtic anxiety to please, sent us on a wild-goose chase after all?

One of us knows of a perennial spring among the heather, and there, on a natural terrace that faces the cloud capped Ben More, we lunch royally on whisky and oat-cake—a few marmalade sandwiches being provided for the weaker brethren. It is the unexpected that always happens, says Lord Beaconsfield, and it is quite true that the big moments of life are not announced beforehand, or ushered in by any preliminary flourish of trumpets. There is no overture to our opera, no prologue to our play. When least looked for, what we had vainly and eagerly pursued steals quietly in. We had been on this very spot before, more than once, we were satisfied that no fern sarer than a marsh or a mountain lastrea was to be found in the neighbourhood, and all at once, as we sauntered about with pipe and cigar—to the Osmunda! One or two dwarfish plants were growing along the open stream, but following them into the copse-wood which fringes the burn, where it dashes through a cleft in the hillside, we came upon it at last in all its glory. We had seen it at Muckross; we had seen it at Derron, we had seen it at Ormsay, but we had never seen anything like this. As we picked our way up the slippery staircase it fairly met above our heads. In this inviolate solitude, where, since the creation of the world, it had probably never been disturbed, it had attained positively tree-like dimensions. It was possible now, as we gazed at the glorious sweep of its spreading branches, to understand the enthusiasm which it has roused. The poor Auk has left the world without even an elegy, but even if the Osmunda should finally perish by the hands of miserable Cockneys, it has lived long enough for fame. It is enshrined in imperishable poetry, preserved in some of the most monumental verse that even Wordsworth has written.

"I flower in the word too fast,
I flatter to divide from the place
On which it grows, or to lift above
To its own in very. All my such then was
I in ferns and flowers, and chiefly at all here,
So closely of the green Osmunda's name,
I first lower in its own retired of ends
The lawless to be with this Nod by the side
Of the can break, or the side of the Nod,
So sitting by the shores of a hill from sea."

Think of that! Is not that Immortality? Was finer epitaph ever composed for poet's Laura or Beatrice or Lycidas? What great general or statesman or orator would not be happy to be so commemorated?

"Ah," said one of our party, who has a fancy for being in the minority, "I detest all you popular favourites. It seems to me that you are bewitched—the victims of some malign enchantment. What a spectacle at this very moment do we present to a scandalised and astonished universe! Our high Abbot of Unreason!—and the whole community, like a pack of frantic Maenads, dancing and piping and fiddling after him to destruction! A mad world, my masters! But on this Osmunda question I go, as it happens, with the majority."

Up till this moment the morning had been breathlessly calm, and even our most inveterate angler was content to leave his rod in its cover. But now clouds have gathered, and a fresh breeze is rising. The tempting change of weather is, of course, irresistible, and we clamber up the hillside to the loch. We are just in time. Scarcely has the boat been launched before the big trout begin to bite. We drift along the northern shore within a cast of the rived rocks, which race sheer from the water. Among the huge boulders which cover the bottom, and occasionally show above the surface, the sweetest and gamest of the loch trout lie. The breeze has risen to a gale, and delicate steering is required. But Angus knows his ground, and we work back and forward in first-rate style—at every second or third cast raising a good-sized trout, which, as often as not, swallows the fly (a Zulu is as deadly as any) with hungry avidity. An hour or two of such fishing in a wild Highland loch in a gale of wind (with an occasional sea-trout while the swollen stream enters the loch) is about as good a time as a modest-minded angler can desire.

Then we walk home in a beatified twilight—Angus being dispatched across the hill with some of the biggest fish—for these mountain trout should be cooked and eaten without delay. The homeward talk in the twilight turns, as is meet, upon trout and flies and ferns. Is a Zulu or a worm fly the deadliest lure? Would Mr. Ruskin be good enough to supply a new classification for ferns as well as for flowers? Can anything be more absurd than the present system—which puts the beech and the oak and the common polypody together? Is the passion for ferns, like the passion for mountains, of modern growth? Was not the bracken once a sacred flower—regarded with a certain mysterious awe? Who is the old herbalist who declares that its root, boiled in oil, "makes very profitable ointments to heal wounds," and is, moreover, "good for them that have ill spleens"? How much is fancy and how much is fact in the legend that on one night only of the year was its mystic seed made visible to mortals? And stay—is not this the very night when the marvellous vision was vouchsafed?

"But on St. John's mysterious night, bared to many a wizard spell,
The hour when, first to human sight
Landed, the mystic fern seed fell."

PASSING MORVEN.

July, 31, 18

DOWN Mull's dark sound, from port to port,
The vessel holds upon her way
I ran green Lochaline & wooded shore,
To yonder castle crown'd bay

And silent, mid a motley throng
Of strangers, on his deck I stand Watching, with thoughts unutterable,
The glory of the fading land

■ land of Morven's denser fur
To me than fairest spot of earth
O land on which my eyes first look'd,
The land that gave my fathers birth

Scanning to day thy winding shores
Although 'twas through a haze of years,
I feel anew thy wondrous spell
Rich herloom of a hundred years

I see the kirk-crowned sword of Kial
The old grey cross against the sky
The eastward ordered gravey graves,
Where holy generations lie

I seem ■ see in visions fair,
The summer Sun [yrs] long ago
The little church—his kingly head
Stooping to gaze its fatal low

I hear the old, familiar sounds
That broke but did not mar the calm
The clear sweet piping of the lull
The plaintive cadence of the fiddle

But past the shores of Achaberg,
By craggy Dhuicrae— I know—
By Strava's beach and wooded knoll
We swiftly, sweep, and nearer draw

To where, the midmost channel reach'd,
Rise I'm sure I behold once more
The double gables, flanked with trees,
The gleaming arch above the door

And every spot on which I gaze,
I rom'vly reach to call happy Ben,
Islands and cottages, fields and burns,
Green I saw's hill, the bridge, the glen

All—all—to day but speak me,
Of that bright past for ever hid,
Of him whose presence haunts them all
A year past numbered with the dead.

Lo—the "Grey Isles"—our paddles forge
Through rushing tides a track of foam
The talk's shores of Mull are gained,
And I once more have lost my home

JOHN MACLEOD

MEN AND MOUNTAINS.

Short Chapter of Swiss Anecdotes

SOME years ago I fell into a crevasse on the Mer de Glace—not at all a place where such accidents usually occur. With me were my son, a pupil, and a guide, and we had foregathered with a pleasant party—a French gentleman, well known not only at Chamonix and Geneva, but in London, as a painter of Alpine scenery, his daughter, who had already been up Mont Blanc, a young lady friend of hers, and a bonne. The guide with the young men was a little ahead, I talking to the Frenchman came next, the girls were in the rear, when suddenly we heard a scream, and looking round saw only two girls gesticulating wildly. Of course we rushed back, and as I ran I saw the bonne apparently sinking into the earth. An instant more, and I was up to the hips in the same crevasse into which she had fallen. Fortunately, the snow was closely packed, and neither of us fell through into space but in pulling me out they gave my weak knee such a wrench that my mountaineering was over for that year, and from Chamonix I went by diligence to Geneva, and thence to Gernau Herr, during my enforced idleness, I amused myself with reading a big illustrated Swiss history of Switzerland. The result is given in the following pages.

Swiss history must always be interesting, and just now, when they tell us that Switzerland will be the battle field in the next struggle between France and Germany, and may possibly at the end of that long talked of war be divided between those two powers and Italy, it is specially interesting to note why Burgundy, which was to have been a barrier between France and Germany, proved a failure. What a difference such a barrier would have made to the culture and progress of Europe!

Of course ■ is her mountains that built up

Switzerland into what she is, that enabled her to hold her own against fearful odds, and to become a power in Europe at a time when first-right (as the Germans call it) was the only acknowledged law. Her mountains were her bulwarks, but not the mountains that autumn tourists love to run about amongst Swiss freedom owes nothing to

Grindelwald, or Zermatt, or Chamonix. "Peaks, passes, and glaciers" are very fine, and it is good to get as much of them as you can—they are such a thorough change from home; but Swiss independence was not nursed among them; it grew up, thousands of feet below the snow line, in the rich little valleys of Schwytz, Uri, and Unterwalden. Glaciers I like very much, but I like men better, and so, my mountaineering being stopped, I decided to end my tour with a few quiet days somewhere on the Lake of the Four Cantons, either at Lucerne itself, or at Gersau, which till 1817 was a little independent canton of some 1,500 souls, with a territory as big as St James's Park (plus a slice of the mountain on each side); or at Brunnen, where Stauffacher was building the house that made Governor Gesler so angry; or at Sonnenberg, on the cliff above "Ruth, where "the three" met and founded the Federation. All round the lake there are pleasant places, and every one has its history. It is there, and not in the Oberland, that the human interest of Switzerland is concentrated. Men won't fight for ice fields and moraines, even merry Swiss boys must have food, and remember, Mr Tourist, that some of the places you so much admire—villages with fields and houses close to the glaciers' edge"— owe, if not their existence, at least their prosperity, to you and those like you. Why, Chamonix, for instance, was barely known—just a poor monastery of Benedictines, till Wyndham and Pocock "discovered" it in 1739. It is exactly the same in Scotland, the great fights with England were fought not up in the far Highlands, but just where the country is hilly enough to help its defenders without being so barren as not to give them sufficient sustenance.

Swiss freedom, then, was cradled on the shores of the Lake of Lucerne. It is rough ground to a man fresh from the Lower Rhine or the plains of France, but it is not like the bare rocks and torrent-seamed marshes of the Valais. You may go for days without seeing a snow-peak, and for glaciers, you must get up the Rigi to have a look at them. Looking down from little Gersau towards Lucerne, I am always reminded of the Patterdale end of Derwentwater. It is not that the mountains are the same shape. Pilatus, who blocks up the Lucerne Lake, is like himself and none else. But leaving Pilatus out, the rest of my view has something Patterdaleish about it. What the other arm of the lake—the Uri branch, from Brunnen to Fluelen—answers to in England I cannot tell you. It is grander than anything we have to show. Imagine the highest part of the Clifton rocks (higher, and with the Salisbury strata sometimes wildly contorted, sometimes carried along in narrow horizontal bands like courses of brickwork) continued for some three miles, with only one or two little gaps, where a few fields and a village and a torrent behind just manage to find room. The Gruth side is the finer, but, opposite, where Tell sprang ashore when they had cut his bonds, that he might steal them in the storm, it is almost equally grand, though man's works—the military road running on to the St. Gothard, which the Swiss made when the annexation of Savoy forced them to draw their different cantons together, and the new railway which is to meet that which runs through the St. Gothard tunnel—take off from its wildness.

But if you stay about the Lake and care at all for Swiss history, you will be sure to go a little farther and see for yourself some of the famous battle-fields. Why, you cannot take the homeward line from Lucerne to Berne without passing Sempach, you can hardly go from Zug to Schwytz without seeing the Eger Lake, on which is the pass of Morgarten.

It is an old story, but I shall try to tell it again, picking a few new facts (new to me, and perhaps to some of you) out of the large volume of Swiss history, which has been my consolation during these rains.

Switzerland at the beginning of the fourteenth century (at least that part with which we are concerned) was under the Counts of Habsburg, ancestors of the present royal family of Austria. When we speak of its earliest inhabitants, we must not think of those Helveti whom Cæsar so mercifully cut up. They no doubt inhabited the more open parts—from Berne westward, for instance. Their pile villages and other remains are found abundantly in the great peat-bogs to the east of Bienné Lake. But Swiss archaeologists are of opinion, from the absence of any traces of man, that great part of what I have called the cradle of Switzerland was uninhabited till near the close of the fifth century, when Alemanni, flying from the Franks, settled here and there where they found soil to till and water to drink. A century later Christianity was brought amongst them by Columbanus and Gallus (St. Gall), Irish missionaries, who seem in Switzerland to have had the same fancy for the most outlying places which their brethren of Iona had in the Highlands. This was long after there were bishoprics and fat monastries at Chur in the Graubünden, at Geneva, and in the Valais, and it is significant that Switzerland proper should have been Christianised not from these Welsh or Romance parts, but by men from a distance. Christianity in those days meant monasteries; and very soon the great hermitage, Einsiedeln, arose, in rivalry of that named after St. Gall, as well as a crowd of lesser monasteries, which continued to bring much of the neighbouring country into dependence on them. Continued, did I say? Nay, those were days in which no little man or little place could stand alone, everybody for protection's sake made himself some stronger man's vassal, and vassalage to an abbey was popular for two reasons—first, the monks were good landlords, next, being men of peace, they did not often call out their vassals to do battle for them. The Germans, however, were never so religious as the English or the Franks, and the Church never had so much power among them as it had elsewhere. Side by side with the monasteries grew up the nobles—many of them at first lay-stewards of some monastery; and a good deal of Church land passed into their hands. The great kingdom of Burgundy, one of the fragments of Charlemagne's huge empire, though taking in Savoy and Western Switzerland, did not reach so far east as the Lake of Lucerne, besides, great as it was for a time, it was reabsorbed into the German Empire less than a hundred and fifty years after its foundation. And, whether it was kingdom or empire, of course, from their position, these nobles were practically independent of it. Otho and other emperors might batter down the holds of robber-knights along Rhine and Danube, but they could not get at Kyburg and Lensberg and Regensburg and suchlike fastnesses. On the Wulpelsberg, near Brugg, just where the Aar and Reuss meet, lay the ruins of the once famous Roman settlement of Vindonissa, the name is still preserved in the wretched village of Vindisch. The position is strong—the Romans had an eye to strategic positions, and one Radbod, brother of Bishop Werner of Strasburg, thought he would build a castle there and become a Count like the rest. He did so (in 1018), and named it Habsburg, the hawk's castle. His descendants were shrewd fellows, who managed ■ keep well with monks and peasants, while taking care to enrich themselves. One Rudolf, born in 1218, found himself, by conquests and intermarriages ("tu, felix Austria, nube" was true even then) heir to nearly all Eastern Switzerland. One of his last annexations was the Uethberg, near Zurich, Freiherr Luthold's stronghold. This Luthold looked on Zurich as his natural prey. The Zurichers wanted ■ place them selves under his protection, but he replied "My good fellows, you're in my hands already as completely as fishes are in a net. Let me see you trying to get out, that's all." So the Zurichers turned to him of Habsburg, and he undertook ■ be their lord. Now Luthold was a great hunter, and always went afield with twelve white horses and twelve white dogs, hunting boar and deer when he did not, for a change, take to harrying the Zurichers. So Rudolf prepared him likewise twelve white horses and twelve white dogs and, waiting till Luthold had got well into the valley, rode up the Uethberg pursued (by arrangement, of course) by a large body of Zurichers. The wardens thought it was their master driven home by the justly-angered townsmen; they opened the gates, and Rudolf dashed in, followed indeed by the Zurichers—but not as enemies. Very soon after Rudolf was elected Emperor of Germany. He owed his election mainly to the Prince-bishop of Cologne, who had heard of dying man, and who also, no doubt, had heard of his cleverness and prowess. His son, Albert (murdered at Konigsfelden), was a very different character. Under him oppression thrived. His stewards (Vogts) Gessler at Altorf, Landenberg at Sarnen, &c., were cruel tyrants who prepared the land for revolt, so that the raising of the Habsburgs to the empire was indirectly the cause ■ bare freedom. Even a good emperor could not know all that went on ■ such out-of-the-way corners of the empire, and Albert was not ■ good emperor. Werner Stauffacher's new house was "the last feather on the camel's back." "Whose is this house?" asked Gessler in a rage. "It is my Lord's of Austria," was the meek reply, "I'm only tenant." "I don't mean peasants to build houses without my leave, just as if they were noblemen," snarled Gessler as he rode off. But Stauffacher's wife had heard it, and she cried. "Why, Werner, you don't mean to put up with that! When there's no justice to be had, one must help one's self. Have not you got any friends near, in Uri or Unterwalden? For God's sake go and look them up, and see what's to be done. What are you men of the mountain worth, if we mothers are to bring up our babies to be slaves to the foreigners?" So spake Margareta Heilobig, whom the Swiss to this day reverence as "the mother of the Federation." If it is your lot to be near by on Ascension Day, go to the little chapel on the Tellen-platte, and you'll be sure to hear all about her in the sermon that's preached there.

Tellen Chapel

Of course, Stauffacher went off, and meeting with Walter Furst, of Uri, and young Arnold von Melchtal, of Unterwalden, bemoaned with them the Austrian oppression, and they agreed to bring each ten sure friends to the Gruth, the smallest of the little gaps which I have described as lying between the cliffs round the Uri Lake. The thirty-three met ■ night, and swore "to be free like our fathers, to drive out the Vogts and their his piety in giving up his house ■ a poor men, but still to hold to the Empire, and not priest who was carrying the Sacrament to a to rob the house of Habsburg of its possessions." This was in December, 1307, and by New Year's Day the three Forest Cantons had thrown off the yoke, and, as Emperor Albert was murdered in 1308, they fortunately had time to consolidate their freedom.

Of Tell and his connection with the revolt I won't say anything. They tell us ■ is a "myth," his arrow story is found alike in old Iceland sagas and in tales still told among the Kughars. Mythical folks do get mixed up with true history; King Arthur is doubtful, but there is no doubt about the long struggle between Briton and Saxon with which his name is connected. Some say William Wallace is a myth, others, like Mr. Freeman, give us a Wallace so unlike him we used to believe in that we'd rather have none. The matter of Tell seems very uncertain, the chief fact in his favour is that the chapel was founded only one generation after the date given for his death.

Myth or no myth, the Swiss have shown their regard for Schiller's drama by putting up in huge gold letters on the Wytenstein, an insulated crag at the opening of the Uri Lake, Dem Sanger Tells die Urkantone, 1859. The Empire now passed out of the Habsburgs' hands, and so, in 1315, it was Archduke Leopold (the Counts had risen in rank) who gathered a great army, not only of his own lands, but from Schaffhausen, Zug, Aargau, Lucerne, &c., and laid his plans for a simultaneous invasion of the Forest Cantons from three several points. "You're taking desperate pains to get in," remarked his court jester, "did it ever strike you to consider how you are ■ get out?" He himself, with the pick of his army, chose the pass between the Fgen Lake and the Morgarten Mountains, just the only one which the Confederates had never thought of defending. Happily for them, Henry of Hunsberg, leader of the Austrian advanced guard at Arth, shot an arrow into the Schwytz lines warning them to be at Morgarten on St. Othmar's day. There was barely time to get there; and the 600 Schwytzers, 300 Unter-walden men, and 400 men of Uri, seemed such a handful against Leopold's 20,000.

Just beyond the frontier they were met by fifty banished Schwytzers who had begged to be allowed to join in the expedition, but had been thrust aside with the reply "Because danger threatens we must not, therefore, break our laws." These now did good service. They showed the enemy's whereabouts, and led the way ■ a vast pile of rocks and tree-trunks which they had made above the narrowest part of the pass. On came the Austrian host, all order lost for only two knights could ride abreast, and the foot who formed the rear never tried to keep rank; when suddenly on the heads of the foremost it rained rocks and trees, and amid the wild confusion the fifty outlaws, quickly followed by the rest, rushed down the hillside, laying about them with bill hook, axe, and that specially Swiss weapon, the "morning star." There was no escape, for their own foot blocked up the rear. Many dashed into the lake and were drowned, some dismounted and tried to run away up hill, but were easily overtaken by their nimble foes. About 1,500 knights and men-at-arms, the two Gesslers, and Landenberg among them, were slain, Leopold narrowly escaping. The Confederates only lost sixteen men. Of course the fifty were reinstated in their civic rights, and the Lucerners also, coming up a day too late to help them. Archduke, got a severe beating from the Confederates.

Eighteen years later, Lucerne sought to join the Federation. The nobles round were indignant, and there was a strong Austrian party in the town who met one night at the Tailors' guildhouse and arranged to murder the chief of the opposite party. They caught a boy listening, and made him take an oath not to say a word ■ any living soul. The boy ran off to the Butchers' guild, and standing before the fireplace, cried "O fireplace, fireplace, what a terrible business this is that I've got ■ tell you! I mustn't tell ■ to any living soul, but do you hear it, and take pity on our poor town' The men who were drinking round thought he was mad, and were kicking him out but they soon saw the matter was serious, and going to the Schulhaus they got him and the townsfolk to gather and seized the Austrian sympathisers. It was made death from thenceforth for any Lucerner to attempt to sever his town from the Federation.

And now we must run some what farther off. As you come from Neuchâtel to Berne, you can't help seeing, at the head of J. J. Rousseau's Bienné Lake, the castle of Nydau. It is now a government salt ware house, with "the bear" painted large on its front, as if in mockery of its old lords, hereditary foes of the free city of Berne. For Berne had from very early times been a free imperial city, in close alliance with Solothurn (Solcure), though it did not join the Federation till quite the middle of the fourteenth century. Berne, I am sorry to say, was as encroaching and tyrannical as any noble Free cities can be tyrannical, I assure you. Up till 1798 it kept Argau and Vaud in close subjection, and at the time of which I write (1339) no wonder the Count of Nydau and his neighbour lords took alarm. Some, like Erlach, Count of Reichenbach and Spiez, made themselves burghers of Berne, for the sake of holding with the strongest. But the majority took counsel got allies out of Swabia, Savoy, and Burgundy, and came on with 3,000 men at arms and 15,000 foot, vowing to raze the free city to the ground. Then Erlach did a bold thing, coming to the lord of Nydau he claimed, by the laws of chivalry, the right to go and help his fellow towns-men. 'Go said Nydau 'I can well spare one like you. Why I've got 700 coronetted helmets and 1,200 knights with me. What's one man to me?

I'll try to show you what one man may be said Erlach, and off he went and was chosen general by the Bernese. 'I'll take the office (said he) only on condition that you free fellows obey me to the letter.' He posted his little army (with the Solothurn allies and 900 volunteers from the Forest Cantons) on a hill near Laupen, which little place Nydau was besieging. You see the ground, with the white monument that marks the fight, from the line between Berne and Freiburg. The volunteers begged to be allowed to tackle the knights, the Bernese were to fall on the infantry. First they pelted them well with stones, from hand and sling, then Erlach drove down among them a number of iron-bound war chariots with scythes at their wheels. These threw the whole infantry into disorder, and then one good charge put them to flight. Meanwhile the Forest men were hard pressed by the knights, but when the Bernese came and took them in the flank, banner after banner went down, Nydau was killed, twenty-one banners taken, and the mailed chivalry were glad to get off as fast as they could. Erlach came back triumphant, and, Washington like, gave up his dictatorship next day. This battle in the west over Burgundians, forms a good pendant to Morgarten in the east over Austria. It vastly increased the power of Berne, which went on annexing town after town, castle after castle, once very nearly succeeding in conquering Freiburg.

With Laupen I may end the first of these sketches of Swiss history, only adding that, a few years after, Zug and Glarus both joined the Federation. Zug, a strong Austrian arsenal, wanted ■ be faithful to its masters; and, hard pressed between Zurich and the Forest Cantons, sent to Archduke Albert to say it could only hold out a fortnight. Albert was talking to his falconer, and went on discussing his hawks whilst throwing in a word now and then to the envoys. "God help us, Lord Duke," said they, "if you think more of your birds than of us." "Oh, you must surrender, must you? Well, surrender away; it will be only one more town for me to take from those peasant fellows." The Zug folks at once joined the Federation; but Archduke Albert was never able to recover either Zug or any other place from the peasant fellows.

I am sorry that Erlach came to a bad end. His daughter married a scapegrace, who some twenty years after the battle of Laupen came worrying to have his debts paid. The old man reproached him with his loose life, when the wretch took down Erlach's two-handed sword and cut him down with it. He then ran off to the woods, and was never more heard of. How much luck there is, in families as in men. The Erlachs are still extant like the Habsburgs, but they never rose above simple counts; the present one lives in his castle of Spiez. If you go by boat from Thun to Interlaken, stop at Spiez, and lunch at the princely hotel, which the Count has built close to the water's edge. Better still, stay there the night; get the beautiful evening glow on the Oberland range and walk next morning up the Niesen—a curiosity among mountains; for despite its height it has in summer (owing to its position, far away from glaciers), not a trace of snow. Its richness will remind you of what I said at the beginning, that glaciers do not breed heroes; men thrive best in the middle land, rich but not level.

HENRY STUART FAGAN.

THE POTATO DISEASE.

3. Medical Side.

IN devoting a special paper to the subject of the Potato Disease, my hope is to be enabled to give a clear idea of its causes in language so little encumbered with technicalities as possible. Perhaps little further is required as to what is known ready known will ever be discovered. The main point is that this knowledge should become more widely diffused among farmers and agriculturists than it has yet done. We might then expect more successful practical results to crop each year of the case, perhaps ultimately almost clear of it. Every one must admit the importance of such a gain of food in a populous country. ■ is worth while making an effort to attain a result like that, and it lies with the farmers of the land to give effort in their systems of culture to those discoveries which have been made by scientific men as to the best means of restricting and preventing the disease. He who succeeds in saving food from destruction ■ ■ much a benefactor of the race as he who makes two grains of corn to grow where only one grew before.

Against a good man many shafts of envy and malice are levelled. Against a whole some plant comes a whole army of plunderers. The potato has been especially unfortunate. About a dozen different parasitic plants have been described as prey-ing on it, while whole hosts of insects attack it—Colorado beetles and the like. The disease ■ occasioned, however, by two distinct fungi of microscopic size; the one producing a spindle-shaped spore at the end of each minute thread that branches out into the air, the other characterized by knot-like swellings of these branches and roundish spores attached to the tips. Both work together in seeking to destroy the potato, but for all practical purposes we may regard the latter of these as the cause of the disease and restrict our remarks accordingly. This destructive parasite is known as Phytophthora infestans. It is a minute kind of mould, having very fine root-like threads that run all through the interior of the leaves, stems, and tubers of infected plants. These threads possess the power of destroying the starch and other substances in the tissues of the potato and using them for their own growth. Thus the potato is destroyed and the disease goes on. But, of course, this blight could not spread from plant ■ plant, from field to field, could not be found all over countries and continents, unless there was something more than these little threads creeping through the interior tissues of the potato. You are already aware that tiny branches are sent through the pores of the leaf into the air which bear fruit at their tips. This fruit is of two kinds. In the one case ■ consists of a simple spore, which, when ■ falls on a potato leaf, sends a fine little thread through a pore of the leaf into the interior, and then goes ahead growing all through the plant. In the other case, the matter ■ still worse. When the fruit is ripe and dew or rain falls on it, it bursts and sets free a swarm of very minute bodies, generally from half-a dozen to a dozen, each of which ■ furnished with two lash-like threads, and is, in fact, a moving spore, similar to that described in my article in GOOD WORDS of last November, in connection with the white rust on the cabbage. It swims about energetically in moisture like an animalcule for at least half an hour, when it quiets down, and if ■ has alighted on a potato leaf sends a little thread into that leaf and extends its destructive operations through the plant as in the case of the simple spore. In about eighteen hours these internal threads succeed in sending out branches into the air and perfecting fruit again at each tip. It will be readily understood from this how it comes that the disease spreads so rapidly. One square line of the under surface of a potato leaf is calculated to be capable of producing 3,270 fruits, each of these yielding at least six of the bodies with lash-like threads, so that we have 19,620 seeds from that one-eighth of an inch square. I think I have made it clear what countless myriads can be produced in this way from one single germ, and how it is that the disease goes on so rapidly. The spores are not only diffused in moisture, but are carried about by the wind for long distances in every direction. They are so small and so light and so numerous that they cannot fail to be disseminated in many ways. Mr. W. G. Smith, one of our greatest English authorities on this subject, who some years ago made in this connection a most important discovery, to which I shall refer immediately, says, with reference to the countless ways in which these spores are carried about — "suppose a fox or hare runs through a field of infected plants, and then goes off to non-infected districts, he will carry tens of thousands of spores in his coat. Suppose a bird alights amongst infected potatoes, when that bird flies off he will carry tens of thousands of spores in his wings, and discharge them into the air as he sails over the country or the sea. The innumerable beetles, flies, moths, butterflies, and grubs found amongst potato plants commonly swarms with spores.

It then first sends which the on it.

The brown spots on the potato haulm and leaf are produced by the little bodies with the lash-like threads. By placing a quantity of these in a drop of water on the leaves, stems, and tubers under an inverted glass, the brown spots will be produced and the progress of the disease can be traced. The brown spots will not appear until the little bodies are brought into contact with the potato, thus showing that these do not result from the disease, but that they produce it.

But how are the germs of this destructive little plant preserved from year to year? Neither the simple spore nor the tiny moving bodies can be supposed to be able to survive the cold and wet of winter and the delicate threads which they produce can hardly withstand onsets of weather which destroy the leaves and the haulms. Under favourable conditions these threads may live over the winter, and resume their activity with the return of milder weather, and some botanists have considered this sufficient to account for the survival of the fungus from year to year. But such prolonged life in the case of these threads is a rare occurrence, partaking more of the character of accident than of natural law. In the case of the wheat mildew and the white cabbage rust the existence of a "resting spore" was referred to, that is a spore constructed for the very purpose of surviving from season to season. It seemed reasonable to suppose that the potato mould was indebted to some similar mode of reproduction for its perennial continuance, but till 1875 no such resting spore had ever been observed in connection with it. In that year, however, a great flood of light was thrown on the whole subject through one of those fortunate accidents that are only turned to account by skilled and observant men. Early in that summer what was considered a new potato disease made its appearance. Mr. W. G. Smith's attention was directed to this circumstance, and his investigations led him to the conclusion that it was only the old enemy after all. A more important result of his inquiries was the discovery of the resting spores, and in fact the whole life history of the peronospora. To become thoroughly acquainted with such a life-history is a great victory in the struggle with the foe. A hope of ultimate triumph begins to dawn, nor does such a hope appear baseless when we consider what has been accomplished in other fields of research. For instance, the souring of wine, the turning of alcohol into vinegar and the spoilage of vinegar itself were known to be occasioned by minute fungus, and a remedy was found by one of the greatest of French scientific men, Pasteur. In other cases similar success has crowned human endeavour. Shall man be ever baffled and beaten by this potato mould—this tiny foe, the life history of which he now knows so well? Better things are surely to be hoped of the rice.

Mr. W. G. Smith discovered after long and careful investigations that two kinds of small macroscopic bladders make their appearance on the root-like threads that ramify through the interior of the diseased potato plant. These two kinds of bladders differ in size, the smaller one being equivalent in function with the stamens of a flowering plant, and the larger ones with the pistils. If one of the smaller bladders comes into contact with one of the larger, it sends out a very short tube, through which its contents are transferred into the other, and then it shrivels and perishes. The larger one now matures into a resting spore in the same way as the ovary of a flower becomes the perfect fruit. When this resting spore is ripe it separates from the delicate threadlets, and lies free among the cells of the tissue of the potato plant. These resting spores are not fugitive and unsubstantial bodies, like the spores produced at the tips of the flocculence on the leaf, but become at length dense, hard, dark, and covered with reticulated warts. You must recollect, however, that they are exceedingly small—only to be seen under a powerful microscope. The leaves and haulm of the potato decay during winter, but these resting spores survive, and are washed by the rains into the soil. When the proper season comes round they burst, expelling a number of moving spores, or germinate in the damp earth, or on any ordinary natural substance on which they chance to rest, sending out threads, which produce simple spores and moving spores of the same kind as those on the ordinary flocculence of the diseased potato leaf. ■ has been proved that they may be dormant for at least three years, and then wake up to their work. These resting spores are very abundant in the old exhausted seed potatoes in the autumn, at the time when the crop is lifted. They are equally common in decayed potato refuse. Farmers have often unwittingly done everything possible to facilitate the progress of the disease. Many of them, laudably desirous of making the most of everything, have the haulms, decaying tubers, and other refuse of their potato crops removed to their manure heaps, where they rot and become manure. But the little resting spores do not rot, they lie quiet with all their vitality shut up in them till the spring, and when the farmer has his manure spread thick over his potato fields he is sowing broadcast myriads of these little germs, which will yet grow up in a mischievous crop. If he feeds his stock with unboiled diseased potatoes he is only taking another way of preserving the germs. Boiling destroys, however, the vitality of the resting spores. On the other hand, if he allows the decaying haulms to lie about his fields the resting spores will be washed into the soil and into ditches and drains, and such moist situations are especially favourable for their preservation and germination. It is thus of first importance that the diseased tubers given ■ cattle should always be thoroughly boiled, and the other refuse of potato fields effectually destroyed by burning. In this way the resting spores are killed. Further, as they have been proved to be able to survive for at least three years, potato crops should never be planted in the same ground unless at intervals of four or five years. ■ the farmer were to adopt these precautions he would at least have the consciousness that he had done his duty, and that, so far as lay with him, ■ had taken the steps requisite to prevent disease. If all the farmers of the country were to adopt such precautions there can, I think, be little doubt that the disease would be greatly reduced, and would finally become, in all probability, nearly extinct. But all farmers are very unlikely to prove so wise. Many will stick with false conservatism ■ their old ways, many will be too wise in their own conceit to pay any attention to this nonsense—as they think it—about spores. Most of them will never read anything about the subject at all. The report of the select committee of the House of Commons on the potato crop was published in 1880, and ■ to be had at a very low price, yet among scores of farmers whom I have met since then I have only known one who possessed a copy. This ■ partly owing no doubt to the difficulty of sifting the wheat from the chaff, in forming a correct estimate of the value or worthlessness of the opinions expressed. Without special knowledge one is apt to be bewildered by the conflicting evidence. Then the language used by scientific witnesses, simple as it may seem to them, becomes something like a hard nut to crack for practical farmers. There is besides the English horror of the man who farms by books, "and—then think of it—by preliminary blue books." I have striven hard to be plain, so that men without any special scientific knowledge may comprehend the facts. I shall now give shortly a few suggestions as to the cultivation of potatoes that may prove useful in checking the disease. I deal now not so much, it must be recollected, with ascertained facts as with probabilities that are worth testing.

In the first place it would seem that all varieties of the potato become more liable to attacks of the disease after cultivation for a number of years. The champion, for instance, has at present great disease-resisting powers, but in a few years it may be expected that it will lose this quality and become as subject to the attacks of the fungus as any other variety. It is hence of importance that new varieties should be introduced as much as possible, and that farmers should avail themselves of every opportunity of obtaining such raised from the true seed. Great care should further be exercised in the selection of the tubers for planting.

It is not by any means clear whether the planting of potatoes whole, or cut into sets, is preferable. The experience of practical men on this point would be very valuable. It has been recommended that when the potatoes are cut, the sets should be dusted over with dry quicklime in powder, or scorched on the surface with a hot iron, but it remains to be seen whether this would prove of any considerable effect as a means of warding off the disease.

As many resting spores usually exist in ordinary farmyard manure, it seems a very objectionable system to plant potatoes directly on such manure, as thus everything is done to facilitate contact with the germs of the disease. It would appear to be better to have the manure thoroughly incorporated with the soil before the potatoes are planted.

To have the potatoes ripe early in the season seems to be an important matter. The spores of the fungus rarely appear before July or August, and to have the potatoes ripe before these spores, might serve to keep the crop clear of the disease. The fungus has its season of development, which in all probability depends on the weather, and not so much on the state of advancement of the potato. Varieties of potato that ripen early ought always to be preferred.

The storage of potatoes during winter has very rarely been properly attended to. They would be kept in a healthier condition, and thus be enabled to resist attacks of the disease, were they laid up in a cool and perfectly dry place, instead of being huddled into moist pits as is usually the case.

To sum up to destroy the resting spores as effectually as possible, to choose the best and earliest varieties of potato, and to keep the seed tubers healthy during winter, are the main points to be aimed at. Were these properly attended to, the disease would in all likelihood dwindle to insignificance in a few years or disappear, perhaps not so mysteriously as it came, but at all events with satisfactory results in the increased production of food, with all the accompanying advantages that such a desirable consummation would bring to the farmer and the general community alike.

CHAPTER XXXII.—MARIANNE DUGDALE

ANY faint hopes of amnesty which Iris might have entertained were extinguished, her face fell and was dyed with a crimson blush of shame and confusion, at the reception she met with from Marianne Dugdale. The young lady had been riding with some country companions who had turned up in town, opportunely for her. She had come back almost simultaneously with her grandmother and Iris, so that Miss Dugdale was still standing in the hall, holding up her habit with one hand and releasing herself from the burden of her hat in the hot weather with the other, when Lady Fermor called out, "Are you there, Marianne? Come here, I have brought you Iris Compton. Let me see if you two cousins have any look of each other."

Marianne turned round and showed a short but well balanced, well earned figure, a face from which all the dusky, not particularly tidy hair, was swept back from the good forehead, a pair of the darkest brows, keenly inquiring, nay, haughtily challenging eyes, an ivory complexion, as if pale with passion, a straight nose, a mouth so shaped to pout that one could hardly conceive it peacefully straight, or drooping lugubrously at the corners.

Marianne Dugdale was one of the pale roses so much in fashion, well set in thorns, if ever roses were so set. She made a queer half-mocking little bow, touched the tips of Iris's fingers with her own, and saying decidedly, "There is not a shade of likeness between us, Granny," turned away and ran lightly up a flight of stairs.

"How she detests me, at first sight! Though I cannot help it, I need not wonder at it." Iris took the manner of the reception to herself, in distress and humiliation, and asked in nervous apprehension with what show of friendship and enjoyment the two could live together, and go out together, certainly for the next month or two, possibly for years?

For half a week Iris remained disabused of the impression that she was an object of half-righteous, half-vindictive abhorrence to Marianne Dugdale, who was watching everything Iris did and said with a hawk-like alertness which Iris felt far transcended her own mortified well-nigh timid inspection of her cousin.

The first thing that shook Iris's belief in her kinswoman's rôle, was her observation of the inherent youthfulness which clung to Marianne Dugdale. Iris knew they were much of the same age, but she had been feeling a woman for years now, she was certain she presented no such juvenile traits as were constantly peeping out in Marianne Dugdale, and largely qualifying a nature that even in early womanhood was shrewd, shrewd, and full of self-reliance. There was the oddest mixture, the result of early forcing and contemporaneous neglect, of strength and weakness, boldness and shyness, confidence and distrust, tenacity and collapse, in the little square-shouldered person who was to divide with Iris the claims of the young ladies of the family and the filial duties of grandchildren to Lady Fermor, both in the house at Kensington Gate and elsewhere. The double temperament and training betrayed itself even in Marianne Dugdale's physique. Her little chubby hands were dumpled like a child's, and while they were tolerably useless in some things—notably in woman's work, in others they displayed the dexterity of an intelligent mechanic. The owner of the hands had been very irregularly educated, but she had a scientific, particularly a mechanical bias. She preferred mathematics and chemistry to history and literature, while she had a taste for fiction and poetry, with a greater resemblance to men than to women in this respect, she relished an opportunity of working with wire and wood, she bored and whittled like a boy, put all the bells right in the house at Kensington Gore without the assistance of a workman, ■ the amusements, amounting to consternation, of the strictly conventional London men servants and maid-servants, rectified the unevenness of various articles of furniture, and set straight every picture that was hung wrong by a hair's breadth.

Her voice, in the style of her hands, was furnished with a singular variety of tones, some of them strident and self-assertive enough, others—mostly addressed to children and animals—wonderfully winning and sweet, full of childlike vibrations, and an irresistibly coaxing ring.

But Marianne Dugdale's attitude to her grandmother, Lady Fermor, was the most puzzling and characteristic of any. In one sense the girl openly defied the formidable old woman and took the control of herself, Marianne Dugdale, into her own hands, where she had been early accustomed to keep it. She proposed ■ do in London and at Lambford exactly what she had done in her father's country house, in the depths of Devonshire—and that was, very much what she liked.

In another sense the strong, ardent, rejoicing youth of the girl had an underlying fund of generosity and pity for the old woman's position, fighting against infirmity on the brink of the grave. After a conspicuously self-willed action or flippancy speech, Marianne Dugdale would suddenly turn, as if moved by a different spring, and speak the gentlest words she had uttered that day, refrain from resenting a jeering rejoinder, refuse to be held back by any chilling repulse from offering soft, chenshing aid to the stout-hearted, thankless rebel against her own needs and other people's devices.

Iris looked from one ■ another in marvel to see how Lady Fermor would stand it—the open, sincerely seemingly, contradiction—the sudden sweet, tender amends, and if anybody had presumed to observe and applaud the relenting, the likelihood was that Marianne Dugdale would have gone off at a tangent, harder, sharper, more dogged than ever.

"Iris welcomed it gladly."

Lady Fermor's looks and words offered a new field of conjecture ■ Iris. There was a strange, suspicious forbearance and obliviousness about Lady Fermor's dealing with Marianne Dugdale's behaviour, which Iris suspected was made up of new sensations—considerable amusement, and an abiding conviction that in spite of all the reticences and waywardness, she, Lady Fermor, was mistress of Marianne Dugdale, and could easily crush her opposition whether in great matters or small. There was no coherence as yet in the warring qualities in the girl's disposition, no principle of steadfastness to enable her to pull herself together and resist any impulse, whether for good or evil, advisedly and ■ the end. She was physically fearless to daring, but she might prove morally weak as water.

Iris was not thinking of herself, but she was as a still, deep stream, obeying a great law, which, however ruffled, could not be diverted from its course and was full of reserved power.

Marianne Dugdale was like a brawling brook, spending itself in foam and noise, rushing hither and thither, in wandering channels, either to lose name and identity, or to discover itself suddenly turned aside, and notwithstanding its raving, carried where it would not, to serve some foreign purpose for which it had not the slightest inclination. Iris arrived at the sound conclusion that, however indifferent or even averse to her a girl like this might be, it was hardly probable that she would figure in the light of an avenger of hereditary injuries. Marianne was not made of the stuff that constitutes an old supporter of the Vendetta, or a modern Nihilist.

■ was on the occasion of Lady Fermor's persistently twitting Iris, according to an old bad habit, which their recent compact had not interfered with, that Marianne Dugdale abruptly declared herself on the side of her cousin, called her "Iris" in those accents which when they were friendly at all, sounded as if they came fresh from a warm, true heart, and might wile a bird from a tree. She walked over to Iris's side, where she sat in one of the windows looking out across the crowded traffic of the road to the grand alleys of the gardens. Marianne knelt, or as she would have called it, in her scorn of sentimentality, "plumped," down before her cousin, leant her crossed arms against the frame in which Iris was working at the Arachne, amidst altered surroundings, and began to chat over the events of the day in which the girls were mutually interested.

The action was the nearest approach to a caress in which the least caressing of girls was likely to indulge. It was also a pretty, unaffected movement, at once confidential and implying more or less voluntary allegiance.

Iris welcomed it gladly, and with as much cordiality as it was wise to display to a wild bird that might take alarm and start off on the smallest provocation.

Lady Fermor had never known the love of woman to woman, and had been as incredulous of it as many men are, or pretend to be. She had never looked upon her own sex otherwise than with a mixture of dislike, suspicion, and contempt, as natural enemies and rivals, or as poor inferiors. She now regarded the little group before her with a snort of exasperated scepticism. "Well done, young ladies!" she said sardonically, as she rose from her chair with an effort, "the pose is very pretty, but it is wasted upon me. You ought to keep it for les jeunes ingénues like yourselves. Oh dear, no! don't, I beg of you, disturb yourselves on my account," as she stumbled and recovered herself on the way to the door, and both of her granddaughters were starting up to her assistance. "I hear Soames coming to tell me I ought to be lying down, but if she proposes to hug me, or even to kiss my hand, I'll dismiss her on the spot. I make it a principle not to encourage humbug."

"Don't be too affectionate, Charlotte, or I'll kick yer," Marianne quoted audibly from "Oliver Twist." Then, as the door closed, she appealed to her cousin. "Now, Iris, you've known Granny a great deal longer than I have but I have seen enough of her to dare you ■ contradict me, if you are in the habit of speaking the truth, when I say she is an abominable old woman."

Iris looked down into the clear, searching, imperious eyes fixed on hers, then before she answered looked away into the green gardens. Happy little children played there from morning till night. Invalids in Bath-chairs were pulled along, that the sick folk might look with their dim, faded eyes at the sunny sky and the flowery earth, and know summer had come again, and dream for a brief moment that health and strength were not fled for ever. Men of business pursued by cares and worries undertaken for women and children, trudged home from their offices. Lovers sat on the benches, and looked into each others' eyes, and exchanged a word now and then, as if they had sat there since Adam and Eve walk in the garden of Eden, and could be content to sit there for ever. Iris left her needle sticking in her work, clasping her hands, and spoke piteously, "She belongs to other times and other manners, so that we cannot judge her and her temptations. She has lost all she loved and honoured, and she does not care any more for love and honour." Her voice fell as if this were, what indeed it was, the crown of human wretchedness.

A passing shade of awe crossed Marianne Dugdale's dauntless face, but she did not refrain from proclaiming triumphantly, "Then Iris Compton, we can be friends. I agree with what you say. She is a miserable, old, old Granny, and sometimes I would give anything to help her. But I was trying you to see if you were goody-goody, as she said. She told me it was because of your goody-goodness you ran away; and if you had begun to preach me about reverence, and the duty and privilege of respecting and loving that dreadful old woman—though she is a poor old soul all the same, to whom we have the misfortune to be related—I should have given you up at once, since I won't be preached to. Luckily Granny, however horrible others are, never tries on that, and, like her, I make a principle of never encouraging humbugs."

"Everybody is not a humbug who does not go about proclaiming all the truth, who even keeps back as much of it as is possible sometimes. You would not expose a wound to shock your fellow creatures," remonstrated Iris.

"No—yes. You are talking of a different thing. I shall always speak the truth—I have never told lies. I should not know how to hold my tongue. And you—you were not altogether silent in your conduct, I mean when you ran away. Ah! I have you there, Iris."

Iris winced before this very plain speaking. "I thought I was forced to leave grandmamma," she said, "but I did not go clandestinely. I dare say she told you that also, for whatever she has done, she is a truthful woman, Marianne. I was not a pleasant experience. I do not like to speak or think of it, and I do not care to speak ill of Lady Fermor when I am eating her bread. Remember, she has brought me up. I have lived with her all my life, as you have not done."

"The more shame to her, then, to sprak to you as she did a little while ago—as she is constantly doing," asserted Marianne Dugdale roundly, "and the more fool you to let her. I shan't run away, see if I shall. I shall stay as long as she will keep me, or till I make the place too hot to hold me, since I have come—for the good of the other girls, and because papa scolded and mamma cried about our poverty. But she shan't take me off or put me down, or domineer over me, you notice, Iris. I will manage better, and neither shall she ride rough shod over you any more if I am here," declared Marianne, in the tone of a gallant little cavalier who means to fight in defence of his lady. "You are really a great deal too good for her, instead of thinking only of yourself and preaching to every other person in the goody goody fashion I feared, and have been looking out for every day since you came. But it is not true, you are quite an honest, reasonable, jolly girl. I shall do what seems best to me, and you will do what you think proper, and if Granny will only consent to behave herself tolerably for an old woman, we'll do all we can for her."

"I am much obliged to you, my dear cousin," Iris was forced to laugh, "but you must not mind me. Lady Fermor and I understand each other, and I am not often vexed by what she says. People at her age are privileged. It is only her way of joking. You must mind yourself. You may not find it so easy for you as you suppose, though I need not say I will do all I can to help you."

"I do not see how there can be any difficulty," said Marianne, a little offended in her extravagant independence and self-confidence, as she rose to her feet and prepared to stroll away. "I have always got my own way, at least, almost always. Papa is constantly up in his ears in business, and a very bad business it is, with the agricultural interest gone the dogs. Mamma is too lazy, and reads too many novels to take the trouble to call me to order. She never had a mother of her own—at least the one she had was as good as none, and her father was soured with his misfortunes, so that her spirit was broken when she was still a girl, but I am not going to lose my spirit. The other girls, Cathie and Chattie, are younger than I am, and I rule them instead of them ruling me. There are the boys, to be sure," said Marianne, with a momentary pause.

"I thought you had no brothers."

"Oh no! not brothers, but as good—rather better—five cousins, Tom and Ned, and Dick and Harry, and Charlie. Tom and Ned are going to India, and Dick and Harry are at Cambridge. Dick is to be a barrister, and Harry an engineer. Charlie has had thoughts of the Church. The rest of the boys say he has plenty of 'jaw' if his mind were made up, but I don't believe he ever will make it up. My mind is made up that he will choke on the Thirty-nine Articles. He is the only sop among our boys, and he is dreadfully spoony on Cathie, which is a great bore both to her and the whole of us; to me more than anybody else, for I was understood to look after them and keep them from running into mischief—at least till Sir George came home."

"What a responsibility!" exclaimed Iris, with proper sympathy, "and who are all these boys you have on your mind?"

"Of course sons of papa's brother, Sir George, out in India. He has been a widower ever so long, and sent all the boys home when they were young to papa and mamma's care. She and papa were glad to have them, both for their own sakes—since boys are so much nicer than girls, and because their father, Uncle George, is a great swell in the civil service, who can not only make good allowances to his sons, but is coming back to provide for us all when his time is out, only he may die, no doubt, or marry again, or do something out there before he is able to think what he is about. I have been a great deal more with the boys than the girls. Even Cathie, the sister next me, is three years younger than I—a soft little mortal, who can't say bo! to a goose, or to Charlie. I flatter myself I can play cricket, and take a fence, and drive, and row, and chaff. Boys will chaff and criticise, but I didn't often give in to them, I assure you."

These were advantages of education of which Iris could not boast, before which, with their results, she must often sit dumb, though she had not been used to regarding herself, or to being regarded by others, as a particularly weak and helpless young woman.

CHAPTER XXXIII.—LADY FERMOY'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

THERE WAS a budding phase of life of which Iris in her isolation had known little or nothing. Except at the Rectory she had scarcely come into familiar contact with a gay, accessible, yet engrossed and restless group of young people like herself. And life at the Rectory had consisted simply of a family party, into which Iris was admitted by special favour. It was her fortune in the weeks spent at Kensington Gore to form one in a cluster of young people of more varied elements, not related, not like, for the most part only recently known to each other, yet who seemed suddenly, in spite of what might have been regarded as insurmountable barriers, to wax well acquainted, and to a certain extent intimate. The result was produced largely by the freemasonry of youth, and by a certain simplicity of character which distinguished more than one of the number. Perhaps something was due also to that curious fusing influence of London, or any other great city, on individuals who, however dissimilar otherwise, resemble each other in having been brought together unexpectedly, and making a common experiment in a new, complex, manifold life. The group was so far well matched that it consisted of two girls and two young men—Iris Compton and Marianne Dugdale, Sir William Thwaite and Ludovic Acton.

Ludovic was doing nothing more heroic at this time than studying the science of the sea and its ships, with their work and warfare, at Greenwich Hospital, converted into a college for aspiring able-bodied lieutenants, as well as for more juvenile naval recruits. Iris and Sir William Thwaite met as friends of old standing, and they also met more as contemporaries and equals than they had ever done before. Iris had fallen into the habit, in the past, of classing him among middle-aged and elderly people. Doubtless this was the consequence of the gravity and formality of manner conspicuous in a man bent on fulfilling his obligations to society while doubtful of his power to fulfil them.

It surprised Iris to hear Marianne Dugdale, who, after she had found her tongue, was frank and free in expressing her opinions on every subject, mention Sir William casually as "a nice young fellow."

"Oh! I know what you are thinking of," Marianne cried, in answer to Iris's bewildered look. "He was not always a gentleman, and he made a foolish marriage, and went to the bad for a time. I know all about him," continued Marianne. "But what of that when he has redeemed his character? Down where I come from we would say he could not help the first, and was very much to be pitied for the second. Men are not perfect. If they are manly, honest fellows, and do their best, we need not wonder though some of them have a fall or two We may be glad when they can pick themselves up again, as they do after a spill in the hunting field, and we should be ready to lend them a hand, and expect them to give us another, if we come to grief. Oh! we are not so starched and severe, and, upon my word, I do not think we are the worse Christians for it down in my part of Devonshire. Neither are we such prigs of scholars or such very fine ladies and gentlemen as to refuse to forgive a man for a false particle, or even for a verb or an adjective out of joint, or because he keeps on his hat, or does not take off his muddy boots, or bolts his knife, or puts his feet on the chimney-piece—not that Sir William I have commits these enormities to my knowledge, I merely used the similes to give point to my asser-tions. What would a host of them signify if he were a man and a gentleman at heart, as I am sure he is? Yes, I know all about him, and I say he is a nice young fellow, fairly handsome with a fine carriage. He is not stupid a bit, for he has told me ever so many things I wished to hear about India, where I am and Ned are going.”

Whatever Marianne Dugdale had learnt she had certainly not been informed that the squire of Whitthills had been a rejected suitor of her cousin's, an amount of ignorance for which Iris was thankful, and that she earnestly trusted would receive no enlighten-ment.

Lady Fernor had made a supererogatory statement that Sir William entertained a fancy for her other grand daughter. Marianne on her part openly professed an interest in him. Iris, too, had an interest, different in origin and kind, which included thoughts of poor Honor Smith, and a wonder whether she were altogether forgotten. Iris tried to look at Sir William in a new light and with impartial eyes. He was certainly a young man, not over thirty, although he looked old for his age, strong and comely too, in spite of a certain way worn look, a trace of trouble, and a shade of sternness, which lent him a kind of dignity. Yes, there was a homely dignity about him, and his manners, though blunt and unsophisticated, were no longer laboured and artificial. Other and infinitely heavier considerations had totally outweighed social dogmas, and from the moment that he had regained his liberty in this respect, the man and the gentleman at heart shone out in his words and actions. Iris was able to comprehend how a young gentleman, a little rustic herself, rather masculine, after the fashion of the generation, in temper and training, with a natural impatience and scorn of forms and ceremonies, should fraternise with Sir William, and hold him in sincere esteem, in defiance of what carping people persistently remembered and chronicled against him.

It was impossible for Sir William not to respond within limits to the generosity and kindness of this girl, ■ he had done long ago without bounds in more difficult circumstances, ■ the generosity and kindness of another girl. ■ was therefore quite true that he was on very good terms with Marianne Dugdale, to the extent of submitting to ■ chafed by her, as if it were a pleasure ■ him, and of bluffly chiding her in return, as he had never dreamt of chafing Iris Compton. It was perfectly possible that something serious might come out of these terms.

But Iris soon discovered that another puppet was to play his part in the little drama, a puppet with such strength of feelings, hopes, and wishes, that he threatened to produce a serious complication of the plot. Ludovic Acton had been at Greenwich before the date of Lady Fernor's arrival in London. He had been commanded both by his mother and Lucy to call immediately on his father's most difficult parishioner. Being greatly under female commanders from the moment he put his foot on shore, he had reported himself at Kensington Gore before Iris was transplanted there. He had done it in the way of duty, and with the usual failure of poetic justice in the affairs of men, in the very act of filial, fraternal, and neighbourly good-will he found himself, as he had soon to own with a groan, “completely done for.”

King Lud had happened to pay his first visit while Lady Fernor was not out of her room, when he was handed over to a wonderful dark eyed girl, with a little mouth, a square chin, a square yet symmetrical figure and habited in a sort of workwoman's blouse, in which she did not seem to feel the least put out. She stepped briskly from the conservatory, where she had been knitting her brows and pouting her lips over the dilapidated rock work, the rolled up tarpaulin which ought to have shaded the roof, the syringes which would not spout water, the sickly plants ravaged by the green fly. She scarcely waited to hear his name, and to listen to his modest explanations and apologies for intruding on an unknown young lady, before she told him—

“Oh! I know who you are” (it is a wonder she did not say, “I know all about you”). “You are the son of the Rector down at Lambford. Your people said you would call, and I am glad, because sailors are handy, and you may be able to help me. Come and see the disgraceful wreck of a London conservatory."

King Lud went and saw and worked with Marianne Dugdale for half an hour, and did not conquer, unless in the trifles of nailing up some of the higher dropping down cask rock work, erecting the tarpaulin in its proper place, clearing out the pipes of the syringes and playing them on the astonished green fly. As if that were not enough for the entomological specimens, Marianne gave her order, "Smoke, Mr. Acton, smoke."

King Lud, too, complied forthwith, consoling himself for having to light and puff a cigar in such a presence by the true conviction that those pretty fresh lips, frank and fearless as they were, had never been soiled by so much as a cigarette, for the country Amazon of high degree is more innocent and unsophisticated than the same Amazon belonging to the town. He was conquered himself, hard hit, beaten to the wall at the first bout. He had never seen such eyes, or worked in company with such clean baby fingers. He had never met a girl so genuine, so original, so unconscious, so bright. He might have added he had never been so warmly congratulated for small achievements, or so soundly rated for sundry little mistakes committed in the height and flutter of his admiration.

In his entire subjugation her Majesty's officer called again at Kensington Gore on the following day, under the poor pretext of renewing his smoking operations against the green fly. On his second call Ludovic saw Lady Fermor, and she who had never been deficient in hospitality to young men made him free of the house during her stay in town. She did not withdraw this permission as she might have done, when she found that the Rector's son availed himself of it on every possible and impossible occasion, until his visits to town must have made a tremendous inroad on his studies at Greenwich. In fact it came to this, that King Lud, who had been heretofore the most diligent and devoted member of his profession, appeared to be living in the College at Greenwich for the sole purpose of paying court to somebody in a house at Kensington Gore.

Lady Fermor was very old, but she was neither blind nor deaf to the extent of these infirmities interfering seriously with her intercourse with her fellows. She was not a fool and she had other plans and projects for her grandchild, but she was "a cool brud" and a bold player. She was fond of a fan field and no favour in the game of life, and it is to be feared she had downright satisfaction in making mischief between men and women. She let Ludovic Acton call or come to dinner or form one of the escort to the girls as he and they chose. Lady Fermor let Marianne Dugdale talk to the lieutenant by the hour, satisfying her inquisitiveness, which was immense, about all the ships he had been in, and all the service he had seen, about the North Sea and the Coast of Africa, about the dockyards at home, about his experience of the different modes and rules for cricket and foot ball and lawn tennis.

Lady Fermor never interfered. She seemed to suffer the young people to take their swing in the easiest, most inconsiderate manner. Yet when Iris came to think of it afterwards, she could not recall one occasion when the old woman, apparently doing nothing, had not so held the shuttle and chequered, twisted, turned back and directed anew the threads which were to weave the pattern in the web of destiny, that Marianne Dugdale, who imagined herself a free agent, did not stay at home when she had promised to go out, walk with Sir William when the arrangement had been that she should walk with Mr. Acton, did not wear the one man's flowers and sing the one man's songs when she had accepted the other's bouquets and undertaken to warble his ditties.

The policy might be Machiavellian, yet it was simple enough, and it had a foundation prepared for it in a headstrong girl, calling out for her own way and getting it, but swerving aside and giving in because she had still those troublesome commodities, a conscience and a heart, not to speak of a vanity and a temper even more susceptible and easily played upon. She had also a large supply of what old-fashioned books call "forwardness," which owned no control, and could be reckoned on to influence Marianne according to the principle on which some pigs and donkeys are driven, if one may be forgiven the inelegance of the simile—start them with their faces due north and they are safe to back due south.

Still more ready-made material for an enemy of Marianne Dugdale's to employ to her detriment, was to be found in the fact that she was a born coquette. Without doubt her rearing among the tribe of boys who were as good as brothers, yet who were not brothers, gave early stimulus and scope to the bent, for she liked attention, not from one squire alone, but from all who came within her orbit. Without thinking what she was doing, without any conscious motive, especially without a set aim to an end, Marianne had an instinctive, exquisite enjoyment, inscrutable to Iris, in smiling and frowning, praising and blaming, pleasing and teasing, coaxing and vexing, now Sir William, now Ludovic Acton. This was done in a manner calculated to set the two young men, who had always been on civil terms, and when left to themselves were growing friendlier every day, as much by the ears as if they had both been their tormentors devoted slaves.

That one of the gentlemen was Marianne Dugdale's devoted slave neither she nor any one else could long deny, while she was in fictitious alternate ecstasy and misery upon him. But jesting at scars because she had never felt a wound, Marianne did not mind the responsibility in the least, if anything it added zest to her entertainment. Thus she never ceased laughing at poor King Lud's moon of a face and his tow-coloured hair, apparently without any clear and forcible conviction that these, not strictly picturesque attributes, belonged to a brave, honest gentleman on whom it was a shame and disgrace for any woman to inflict an unnecessary pang.

In her thoughtlessness, her gaiety and kindness degenerated into careless selfishness and positive cruelty. Iris could utter no protest, though her heart waxed hot within her, because there were considerations which stopped her mouth, and because Marianne would not be preached to, and must be taught neither by precept nor example, but by what is frequently the grimmest, as it is certainly the most efficient, teacher of all, bitter experience. Hers was really a fine, open, even loyally affectionate nature, but in the meantime it was in a state of chaos not cosmos. There was no reign of duty in the soul, no supreme sovereignty tending to bring every thought and affection into noble subjection, though she had been baptized and confirmed, and believed herself a Christian.

■ was a lively surprise to Iris at first, when King Lud presented himself day after day at Kensington Gore without a single musical instrument in his pocket, and never asking for music more than once in the twenty-four hours, since Marianne Dugdale, though she could sing like a lark when she chose, was only moderately fond of the joyous science and had been heard to speak disparagingly of musical men.

Accordingly Ludovic Acton was resentful to the verge of repressed fury when Iris referred without malice ■ his stock of musical instruments, and expressed innocent surprise that he no longer cared ■ accompany anybody on the piano. "Why did you say that?" he took her to task as if she had been one of his sisters, and with as much indignation as if she had accused him of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. "I am not fonder of music than other fellows." Then in answer to her "Oh! Ludovic," "I mean than other fellows who have idle time on their hands which they do not well know how ■ get rid of. I say, Iris—Miss Compton, ■ was rather nasty to you, I mean it was hard upon me, to bring up that about my flutes and guitars. I am sick of them and shall have a private sale the next time I am afloat. You have heard her—Miss Dugdale, laugh at caterwauling fellows, and no poor beggar likes to be an object of ridicule in his set."

The season was approaching its close when Lady Fermor came up to town, and she made that an excuse for no formal bringing out of her grand daughters. However, they came in for the fag end of the gaieties, which were still fresh and agreeable to them. Country neighbours of Marianne Dugdale's fortunately in town, and one or two Leatwich families that had condoned Lady Fermor's offences long ago, supported the two girls, stopped them when they were driving with Lady Fermor in the park, offered in the persons of the matrons to chaperon the cousins, and invited or procured invitations for them to the last plays, operas, flower shows, breakfasts, and balls. These invitations by Lady Fermor's desire included Sir William Thwaite and Mr. Acton.

Iris waltzed again, as a matter of course, with Sir William, and if either remembered the former occasion he or she made no sign. ■ was no business of hers, neither did she know it at the time, but one of the balls happened at a great house which had given a similar rout years before, when a member of the present company had stood among the rabble round the door and envied the very footman whose flesh-coloured calves were so much at home on those stairs, and asked desparingly whether he could ever be at ease in such regions?

Now, so far as that went, ■ was as undisturbed in mind as when he traversed the old barrack yards, and sometimes Iris Compton hung upon his arm, but the spirit of the dream was changed.

In addition to the good things of the season, there were many sights for Lady Fermor's young people to see, and thus business they prosecuted with commendable assiduity and considerable satisfaction. The list would have been still greater if there had been no such disturbing element as the rival claims of Sir William and King Lud, with the rapidly developing moon-struck madness of the lieutenant.

Still there were exacting, engrossing hot days and nights when there was always something to be done which could not be put off, whether it were an excursion to Kew or Richmond, an old-fashioned survey of the Tower or the Mint or the Mansion House, services at Westminster or St Paul's, visits to the ladies' and the strangers' galleries in St. Stephen's, an enterprising hunt for old china, dawdling at Morris's or Burnet's, distributions of prizes for window gardening under difficulties, mornings at the crack training school for nurses, the Hospital for Incurables, the last best crèche. ■ was a marvellous jumble, and though Iris was tempted to think the unlooked for holiday was alloyed by the sport which Marianne Dugdale could not resist making with her two Samsons, perhaps without it the whirl would have lacked some of the eternal play of human passion and warfare of mortal life. There would have been a certain spice to the intercourse absent if it had not been for the sentiment that manifestly pervaded the contending factions. To say nothing of the under currents which might be doing their own work, there was something rousing in the spirit of indignation which filled Iris when she saw one or other of the victims specially ill used.

Iris, without a severe analysis of motives, acted as consoler to each of the young men in turn, for wounded pride, and mortified masterfulness, and sheer irritation caused by an exasperating process, require soothing, as well as outraged love.

But Iris was angriest and sorriest for Ludovic Acton. Sir William might put in a claim as having borne the brunt of repeated disappointments and trials, but he had learnt at last to wear a calm front to the world. And if he were proposing again to marry on the prompting of a third person, after all he had suffered, because a suitable alliance was desirable for a man in his position, then there was a good deal that was inexcusable in his conduct which, though it encountered loss, could not command sympathy.

Sometimes Marianne took it into her unaccountable vagrant fancy to take umbrage at all the three others, and would as good as quarrel with them so far as they would let her.

It was then a pitiable case with the poor fellow, who gave himself up to uncalled for self-reproaches and desperate apprehensions because of his mistress's inexplicable displeasure. But in spite of his groans, there was a considerable amount of fraternisation between the deserted members of the party, and a good deal of pensive and humorous enjoyment—not so much in airing their grievance, for they were too true and too much inclined to be attached to Marianne Dugdale to take that course, but in enduring her capricious humour and the temporary banishment from her good will and merry conversation. When the affair was hopeless, the company would let her go off by herself as she insisted on doing, stamping about the back drawing room or sulking in the conservatory, while those in disgrace would linger apart in the furthest window, or would pluck up spirit and take it upon them to get their hats and stroll across the road to the adjoining gardens. There the three would walk up and down beneath the trees, carefully keeping in sight of the house lest Marianne should return to her right mind in a twinkling, as was her wont, forgive them in a body without telling them their offence, and come out after her brief eclipse, the blithest of them all.

The promenaders would talk of Lambford and Eastwich assiduously. It was then that Iris found out how Sir William had come to know and to love every hazel copse and sunny sloping field and rushy brake on Whitehills. She and Ludovic who had been brought up in the parish were not better acquainted with its dear old holes and corners or fonder of them than this comparative new-comer. Neither could she fail to perceive, little as it was intruded upon her, the interest he had learnt to take in the people, especially in those who were most dependent on the consideration of their neighbours, how much sympathy ■ had for them, what good sense and good feeling and dry humour into the bargain he showed when he talked of them, how attentively he listened to every suggestion on their behalf.

And how many notable books he had been reading! Books of which King Lud had not even heard the names, books which she had longed for, but had not yet been able to procure. To think that Sir William, to whom she had tentatively lent "Tom Brown's School Days," to encourage a literary appetite in its infancy, should have got ■ advance of her in sundry original, intelligent investigations he had instituted, mostly in the track of natural history! His occasional half-eager, half-thoughtful references to those experiments sounded as if he might live to attain some distinction among the students of nature.

What advances he had made in true manhood! How he was casting off the slough of the lower animal! How fast he was growing in his solitary life at Whitehills! What would Honor have thought of him if she had lived to see him now? Ah! poor Honor, her life could hardly have been his gain. Her death was part of his emancipation. But if she saw ■ all from beyond the golden gate, would she not ■ more than content?

CHAPTER XXXIV.—GREENWICH AND THE ACADEMY.

KING LUD was almost frantic with delight on account of an ovation which was to be paid to him—not by the multitudes of the city which his great namesake is said to have founded, but by two or three quite private and obscure persons, one of whom, a square-shouldered little individual with a strong dash of the child still in her wilful girlhood, had turned the unfortunate fellow's head. His friends, with Marianne Dugdale among them, were to go down ■ Greenwich to spend an afternoon there under his leadership and drink tea in his room. Lady Fernor too declared herself equal to the effort, even though it had been a dinner in the Trafalgar.

The day was as fine as could have been wished for "a family party," as Lady Fernor called it, complaining that there was a danger of its being as dull as family parties generally were. They drove down to the dirty little old town of Elizabethan and naval memories and made their way to the grand terrace before Queen Mary's and Sir Christopher Wren's Hospital, which time's changes have converted into a college. Everybody's spirits rose. How could he or she help it under the inspiring influence of the blue sky and the wide flowing river—the great watery highway to the largest city in the world? A brown "streak" turned up with silver, it swayed and rippled and throbbed, with its fringes of tall masts and flapping sails, from Gravesend to Wapping, its Isle of Dogs converted into a custom-house station, its Deptford ringing with hammers ■ when Peter the Great riveted a bolt there, its Woolwich Mares bounding the Arsenal where Woolwich Infants are cradled and rocked. Barges laden with hay and coals crept lazily along with the sunlight red in their amber-coloured sails. Steamers churned the water as they darted by, puffing out grey smoke and wreaths of white vapour. Here was the column erected ■ the gallant young Frenchman Bellot, who earned the gratitude of a foreign nation by the fruitless attempt to discover its lost heroes beyond the terrible barriers ■ everlasting snows and huge glittering icebergs. He left half his tale untold, but there was a living man—sandy-haired, moon-faced, large limbed, standing there, among the every-day group, who, if he were permitted to leave out his own doings, could add something to the fascinating ghastly story.

Within the big domed building was the Painted Hall, with the portraits of all the Captains bold of whom the best artist in their day could leave tokens. There were Drake and Blake, Rodney and Anson, Cloudesley Shovel and Benbow, and in a shrine by himself the various representations of "Harry Bluff," of whom, when he was a fearless middy, the old salts had sworn—and here he was, from the maimed lad still foremost in the bay, to the man with many orders on his breast dying in the cockpit of the Victory.

"One day he'd lead the van ;"

For once King Lud was the most favoured of men in his surroundings and he rose to the occasion. He descanted, all the more tellingly that it was with modesty and sincerity, on the true glory of his profession, its adventures, exposure, self-denial, and self-sacrifice. Who could think of the advantages of a good English estate, even of a fine old English manor-house and an ancient title, at such a moment? Not Marianne Dugdale, who was cutrunced with all she saw and heard, until she envied the little boys climbing the rigging of the training-ship and the very invalids in the floating hospital of the Drumhought. She had the different parts of the vessels, the science of their steering, the method of their logs, the movements of their compasses explained to her. She did not tire of hearing the curious details of their flags and signals, she was not at rest till she had walked across the park where Greenwich Fair was wont to be held, as far as the Observatory, ■ have her watch set by the great dial, and she honoured the lieutenant by appointing him to conduct the operation. Iris and Sir William were strolling among the English elms and Spanish chestnuts, past the milled-in stump of a tree garlanded with ivy, which ■ said ■ have been a strapping when William and his Normans conquered Saxon England, to One-tree Hill in order not to miss the second of the three finest views of London, rising dimly out of the haze and extending in a grand sweep from the water towers of the Crystal Palace to those cupolas of Sir Christopher Wren's, while all the time the faint hoarse murmur of the terrible mill which grinds—not corn, but human hearts and brains, was heard without ceasing, uttering its ■ accompaniment to the scene. As for Lady Fermor she was long ago under the sleepless guardianship of Soames, being made as comfortable as circumstances would permit in the lieutenant's room.

King Lad might live ■ perform more lion-like actions than he had yet accomplished. He might be a full-blown admiral, with his sandy hair powdered with white, while he halted on one knee after the fashion of Horatius Coclès, from spent shot or baser rheumatism, but it was hardly likely that he would ever spend a happier afternoon than that which Lady Fermor and her party passed with him at Greenwich.

Everybody awarded a tribute of praise to the owner of the room in the Hospital College for his expert contrivances where space and convenience were concerned. Everybody turned over his books and admired the flowers—Kent dahlias and gladioli, fragrant jessamine and heliotrope, with which Ludovic had promptly provided himself to do honour to the occasion, and to dispose lavishly on every side, ■ order to embellish his plain bachelor's quarters and poor lieutenant's equipage.

Sir William Thwarte leant his back against the chimney piece, thinking honourably and humbly how nice and pretty it all looked, wondering how Acton could manage it, if he were naturally “a dab” at arranging his cabin, or if the inspiration came with the visit of his queen to his small lodging? He—Sir William—did not believe he could have done anything like it, to save his life, with all the will in the world, and the accumulated materials ■ Whitehulls. The only time the place had been ex fet in his day, Sir John's widow was in command, and she had produced nothing so spontaneous and refreshing as this, but ■ was too late to take a lesson.

Lady Fermor had the seat of honour—the single easy-chair in which the lieutenant was wont to lounge, smoke, and read. The two girls lingered by the high window looking down on the water, with its never-ending charm.

The little sobering sense which was left in King Lad was all but ravished from him by Marianne's gracious offer to make tea, asserting brightly that ■ was just like doing it for “our boys at home,” and summoning him, ■ if he had been her special boy, to stand at her elbow with the camp kettle—in itself a pleasant courtesy to her.

The close and collapse of the gala—for all happy things come to an end here, and not a few of them, alas! collapse in the very process of enjoyment—was brought about by the intervention of Lady Fermor. Even she had been taken captive for the moment by the fresh, heroic, homely elements of the entertainment, to the extent of being subdued by them for a little while. But when the party were taking a final saunter down the Painted Hall, in which the shadows were gathering, so that the painted warriors were growing obscure on their stations, and only one flaming yellow and red picture, indicating a ship on fire, stood out from the dull darkness of the others, like a portent of evil, Richard was himself again.

Marianne Dugdale was walking as if in a dream, wonderfully silent for her, with her brown eyes a little downcast, beside Ludovic Acton, who, though he wore no uniform, seemed for the moment transformed—sandy hair, shyness, softness to women and all, into one of the heroes on the walls stepped out of the canvas, and reflecting glory on one proud girl.

Lady Fermor was stamping along by the aid of her stick on Marianne's other side. Suddenly she raised her harsh, highly pitched voice, and at the same time cast a meaning, satirical glance at her grand-daughter. “I think I miss a picture which ought to have been here too—that of blubbery Black-eyed Susan, following her tenant ‘sweet William’ on board the fleet in the Downs.”

Marianne started, wide awake, flushing to the roots of her hair. “Oh! she was an odious creature,” she said. “Thank goodness, she is not here. Indeed, I think a sailor should have nothing to do with miserable, whimpering sweethearts and wives. His ship should be his mistress, as a priest should be wedded to his flock.”

“My dear Marianne, I never knew you had adopted the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church,” remonstrated Iris, laughing at her friend's vehemence, and felling for King Lad, at once lifted from a pinnacle of exultation and dashed into the depths of despair.

His very rival commiserated him. “I thought blue jackets carried all before them when they went a wooing," said Sir William, without any suspicion of cynicism.

"They are no better than red jackets, or any other jackets," answered Marianne rather testily than with an implied compliment.

Very likely she had forgotten Sir William's former connection with the army, and in good truth he had no reason to recall it with pride, but the most sensible men are silly on some points, so he blushed a shade with gratification, though he maintained magnanimously, "You don't mean to say any woman could have resisted the French chap com memorated out yonder, or the boy whose statue we saw in marble, the great statesman's son, who spoke of his mother and his native town, and how happy they would be to welcome him home, when he lay a dying through volunteering to carry succour to the forts in the rebellion? That was before my time, but I've some notion what it meant. Supposing either of them had lived to come back and lay his laurels in a woman's feet, do you suppose she would have spurned them?"

"The laurels have to be gathered first," said Marianne dryly, "and when I come to think of it, I am sick of what people call the pomp and circumstance of glorious war. What did all these battles and all these bloodthirsty commodores and rear admirals come to? I mean what lasting good did they do, unless to their blustering, strutting selves? Who were really the better for them? I believe it would be easier to say who were a great deal the worse. What hearts they broke! How many widows and orphans they made! I think I shall go in for the Quakers and the bloodless victories of peace."

"But some men must fight that peace may be preserved, and the helpless defended from injury," remonstrated King Lud, recovering from the vicious snub administered to him, with the attendant amazement and discomfiture. "A sailor's life is far from all fighting, especially in these days. Our squadrons be along many a shore to check more powerful rascals than slave dealers. We crush, in their infancy, aggressions and outrages to which the barbarities of the slave-trade are a trifle."

"A sort of water-police," said Marianne contemptuously.

"And sailors are still finding new lands and helping to civilise wild states," suggested Iris a little injudiciously.

"Not in my opinion," alleged Marianne, with her neat little nose in the air. "My conviction is, that frigates and gun boats float about in disgraceful idleness, in order to keep up the taxes, which papa is always growling over. Besides, we must maintain a navy which is no longer wanted, in order to provide genteel sinecures for the younger sons of gentlemen—fellows who cannot get along on shore. For my part I would rather herd sheep in Australia or hunt ostriches in Africa, or turn a vulgar, respectable shop-keeper at home."

The attack was so outrageous that it became laughable. The eclipse of the sun might nevertheless have come to one person through a girl's spirit of contradiction and craven susceptibility to ridicule.

But to the others the sun declined in its ordinary fashion as they skirted the shoulder of Blackheath with its girdle of villas. It was a mere sunset, but it was such a sunset as the neighbourhood of London renders unrivalled in its kind. Iris was compelled to acknowledge that the misty flats of East-wich, or of Holland itself for that matter, could do nothing to those marvellous shades of saffron and gold, faint coral, dusky sorrel, the dim lilac of the autumn crocus, and a grey steely blue. Was there something human in the pathetic glory of the skies above the great city of vast wealth and grinding poverty, foulest sun and fairest righteousness, many crimes and many sorrows, much nobleness, much holiness, and much innocent, grateful gladness? Did the groans and curses, tears and sighs, smiles and laughter, go up from tens of thousands of hearths to paint themselves in that solemn, subdued glow?

The Academy was not yet shut, and out of many visits one stood out in the remembrance of the little company that so often met together in these weeks. They had all been tolerably united in their criticism. They had agreed that English landscape painting held its own in the days of Gainsborough and Constable and old Crome, that the mantle of Sir David Wilkie still fell, here and there, on the painters of the ruggedness and the humour, the exquisite tenderness of peasant life with its homely affections. These were no more sordid and petty now, to the hands that could draw and the eyes that could read them, than they were nearly a century ago to the brave, gentle son of the Fife manse. Heroism quailed a little before the cynicism of the generation, but picturesqueness and passion made a vigorous stand against the learned affectation of burning incense to colour and form, and rejecting all humanity as devoid of dignity and interest unless it came in the shape of pagan myths, sensuous and sensual, petrified in their passion, cold in their exaggerated repose, because the faith and heart of man have alike forsaken them.

One at least of the visitors was sorry, with a yearning regret and a shamed mortification, that the sacred art which once made Italy, Flanders, and Spain glorious—on which men spent their lives—into which they could then throw their hearts—was so feebly and scantily represented in Christian England. Iris was inclined to ask, will there come a renaissance here also? and will the Christ on His cross, the Virgin Mother, and the noble army of martyrs replace once more Apollo and Venus with their votaries?

Most people will allow that it becomes in time weary work for eyes and brains to study even the flower of the year's pictures. But it is not so universal an axiom to the many, to learn that it is possible for bodily fatigue to end in crossness of temper even with the young and strong, the ardent and intelligent.

Will it be believed that Marianne Dugdale, after having entered with much enthusiasm on this as on other rounds, by the time she felt a falling to pieces of the backbone, a heaviness and ache of the brows, a slight swimming of the eyes, and giddiness of the brain, was about as much out of humour as could be said of an impatient-tempered girl who, if she were not arrested in time, would develop, without fail, into a hard as well as a true, a fiery no less than a warm-hearted vixen?

As it was, however, Marianne commenced to snap up her companions' harmless remarks and execute half-comical, childish growls at which no one ventured to laugh, to flout the others, to flounce about by herself.

Soothing was tried in vain, compromises were disdainfully rejected, proposals to bring the day's visit—the final visit to the Academy, a summary close scouted at, humble suggestions of an adjournment to the refreshment-room for a glass of claret and a slice of chicken, or a cup of tea and a stale bun, treated as a positive insult. When it came to this pass, Marianne's adherents drew discreetly apart, freed her from their observation, and sought to occupy themselves with what remained of their morning's work. Only King Lud was too miserable to accomplish the assumption, or practise the restraint of indifference. He feared his mistress might be ill, for it was quite possible that Marianne would only display her bodily distress in this perplexing, mental fashion. He knew at least that she was unhappy for the moment, and he could not endure the thought of abandoning her to her unhappiness. He followed her at a respectful distance, patiently waiting for any sign of relenting and recovery, when he would gladly take upon himself the blame of having been stupid, tiresome and positively cruel in inciting an unfortunate girl to do too much and exert herself till she was half dead.

Iris and Sir William were together at the farther end of the room. He was pausing and brightening at some Indian scenes, showing his companion where the cane brake or the mangrove swamp was trustworthy or at fault, explaining the native costumes and indicating the castles. He stopped at the occasional portraits of military officers as pointedly as if he were going to salute them and became excited and exultant over the likeness of one who had been a chief in Sir William's campaign. It was clear that he bore no malice against the service, that the disgrace with which it had threatened him had faded away from his mind, from the time that he had confessed and acknowledged the justice of the sentence. It was the scar on his neck and breast, and the sword cut across his arm, which for a moment burnt again with the proud consciousness that he too had been a soldier, and had fought and bled for England and his colours.

Unexpectedly the couple came upon a picture hung low which they had not observed on their previous visits. It was not a striking picture in size and situation, or in more than a moderate degree of artistic merit. It was the subject which arrested the two gazers, paled their cheeks, dimmed their eyes, brought a quiver to their compressed lips. The painter unknown to fame had represented a drowned woman, washed gently enough on a pebbly shore by the rippling waves of a sea no longer raging in the fury of a storm. The limbs, those of a fine, strong young woman, were disposed decently and peacefully, as if a friend's hand had laid them to rest; the face turned up to the summer sky was unmarred in its still serenity. The head lay cushioned as it were on the wealth of brown hair which had broken loose and streamed like so much seaweed back from the bare brow and blanched cheeks. So had Honor lain on the Welsh beach. The thoughts of both spectators flew back to the disaster. Then the attention of the pair became concentrated and fascinated by a likeness—a double likeness. It was not wonderful that with their minds full of a similar catastrophe and its victim, Sir William and Iris should see a resemblance to the late Lady Thwaite in everything, save in the rich warm colouring which, to be sure, the cold sea and colder death had already stolen from her cheeks and lips before the husband was called upon ■ identify the body of his wife. But there was no reason why either of the two looking fixedly and silently at the picture, should simultaneously, as if by contact of thought, detect traits, the same as those with which they were familiar in a living face in that very room. Sir William and Iris had never before compared Honor Smith to Marianne Dugdale size, colouring, circumstances were all so different, that the comparison sounded absurd even now, yet there were the friends of both, marking it decidedly and unmutably until the eyes which had been averted, looked into each other and claimed the wondering admission "You see it also? Poor Honor and Miss Dugdale!" exclaimed Sir William, half under his breath, "I never once thought of it before."

"Nor I," responded Iris, as low as if she were exchanging secrets with him.

They did not say another word. She glanced at him and seemed to find a shadow or half-superstitious awe on his manly, ruddy face. Was he revolving the curious undefined law, that what has been shall be again, on which gamblers base their calculations—the unexplained but acknowledged fact that, in the history of man as of nations, events often repeat themselves, against all reason, against all warning, in a mysterious, well nigh gruesome, fashion? Was he judging rashly that it was vain for him to struggle against his fate? Did he seek to persuade himself that in this direction after all, might lie at once the atonement for his past errors, and the building up of a new and higher character?

When Iris and Sir William rejoined Marianne Dugdale, she had so far come to herself as ■ suffer the companionship of the faithful lieutenant, and was no longer treating him worse than dog or mouse before she could consent ■ dote on him for ever. But the union was not indivisible. Sir William Thwaite approached her with a forcible appeal and a pathetic reverence expressed in an eager concern for her welfare.—"Are you tired out, Miss Dugdale? will you not allow me to find a seat for you? I will manage it, never fear, though I have to turn out by force that stout old gentleman, and that puppy-dog of a lad on the next sofa. I see you have your fan, let me fan you. I have a long, strong, steady arm, I could work a fan or a punkah without much effort. After you're a bit rested and refreshed, we'll drive straight home and do no more to-day."

Iris knew that Sir William was moved by the recollection of his dead wife, whom he was confounding in a manner with Marianne Dugdale. But Ludovic Acton had no such clue to the problem. He was compelled to believe that his passive rival had suddenly become active and dead in earnest; while he was at the same time—from the support of Lady Fernor, doubtless—so well assured of the success of his suit, that ■ was already appropriating the tone of an accepted, privileged lover. He was proceeding to take care of Marianne, to control, and even gently reproach her, in a manner which she would certainly not have stood from another person, however much his unbounded devotion might have entitled him ■ forbearance. But, alas, alas! Marianne was not offended or aggrieved in this instance, she smoothed down her ruffled plume and submitted with a good grace to be looked after and comforted. She glanced with shy, puzzled inquiry into Sir William's intent face. Her compunction for something like a child's naughtiness, her swift brightening up again were for Sir William and not for King Lud. She was a woman, therefore she was caught by novelty and mystery, she was a woman, so she was fickle as the inconstant wind. She looked ready to be wooed and won by the altered aspect of the suitor whom Lady Fernor had provided for her grand daughter, as King Lud had known all along to his sorrow and dread.

CHAPTER XLV.—ON THE BORDERS.

LONDON was fast becoming a high class social desert, a hot wilderness to be abandoned to its tradespeople and its poor, even they were contemplating excursions ■ Margate, and trips to the hop gardens.

Lady Fernor was about to carry out the second part of her programme, and to save herself from the danger of being left ■ the insipid society of two "bread and butter muses," she determined to journey by short stages as far as the neighbourhood of the first Scotch moor with unlet shootings ■ which the young men in her train might be induced to accompany her. No doubt Ludovic Acton was in daily expectation of an appointment to a ship, and might have to leave at a moment's notice, but in the meantime he served as well as another. The old despotic schemer, whose excess of worldly wisdom sometimes led her astray, was of opinion that the poor lieutenant with his frantic passion, at which she was able to jeer and laugh, served in some degree as a foil and stimulus to Sir William in what must prove his suit.

King Lud had not given up in despair. No man worthy of the name will easily do so, when the prize ■ he resigned is the centre of his fondest hopes and aspirations. He had fallen out and made it up again with Marianne Dugdale many times since the day at the Academy. He was still not without a lingering hope that the privilege of travelling with her might do something for his cause. At least ■ afforded desperately delightful opportunities for being at once the happiest and the most miserable fellow in the world, happy with a delirious satisfaction in the mere consciousness of being in her presence, of watching her and serving her—miserable in knowing how soon the close proximity to bliss would come to an end any way, and what a grievous probability existed that by indulging his inclinations and feasting his passion, he would only reap additional disappointment and wretchedness in the end when the suspense was over, Marianne was Lady Thwaite presiding at Whitehalls, and he a broken-hearted lieutenant far at sea.

In the beginning of the trip, King Lud's star was in the ascendant. Marianne was radiant and gracious in the enjoyment of all the pleasurable excitement and constant change of scene characteristic of an excursion such as she had never taken before. Since it was conducted to suit the requirements of a woman of Lady Fermor's position and age, there was not the slightest strain on any young person's powers. Indeed Marianne used her Englishwoman's privilege of grumbling, simply because she had that most charming of all Adventures of a Phaeton running in her head, and was possessed by a rufous persuasion that she too could have driven many a mile under sunshine and shower, and the merry moonlight, and if she had not been equal to playing on a guitar and singing appropriate songs under difficulties, she would at least have been quite fit for the gay scramble at bezique and the judicious balancing of two encroachers on her freedom at the end of the day. But even a journey in first class railway carriages by short stages was not to be despised, when the destination of the travellers was the land of the mountain and the flood, of romance and canniness.

The shortness of the stages and the breaking of the jogress ■ by a day's rest occasionally, to enable Lady Fermor to dine deliberately at her usual hour, to go ■ bed early and rise late, in order ■ recruit her forces, also permitted exploring strolls in every direction, and subordinate excursions in the interest of the younger members of the party. Thus the banks of the Severn were visited, the ancient streets of Chester perambulated, a road made into North Wales, and merry Carlisle with its castle and cathedral learnt off by heart. The travellers were then not far from the Scotch borders, and the final halting-place, the heathery wells of Moffat, did not lie much beyond the Marches. But unluckily Lady Fermor caught cold, with a little cough, which teased her in the next stage of her journey, so that she adopted the resolution of stopping short and staying for a couple of nights at an old fashioned inn in which she recollected having been fairly served many years before. It lay at the junction of the sister countries and had originally stood on a great coach road a good deal frequented in its time. But since the establishment of railways and new routes, and the withdrawal of the coaches from the old tracks, nearly the whole of the traffic had departed from the place, still the old inn stood, and continued a house of lodging and entertainment for man and beast on a new foundation, its later energies having been directed to affording board and lodging to families seeking a summer retreat, and to furnishing a resort for the anglers who frequented the "hecks" and "burns" in the vicinity.

Lady Fermor declared that her old plain comfortable rooms, which were fortunately vacant, had not fallen off appreciably, and that she was satisfied she could have all she wanted, till a little rest enabled her ■ get rid of her cold.

It was a matter of congratulation to Mrs and Marianne especially that they should make this halt in an out-of-the-way corner, and begin their acquaintance with Scotland by an entrance which might be made on foot, and was not much frequented to the destruction of all original traits and native simplicity and individuality.

As for the male animal, usually so impatient of delay and restive under what ■ a purely soothing and agreeable element to the female, the two young men were in that normal condition which occurs or ought to occur to a man only once in his life. They were at the beck and call of the woman, the young fellows were meek and docile ready to assent cheerfully to any arrangement, eager to display themselves in their best colours as they would never be again. For anything more, Sir William showed himself less drawn ■ Marianne when she was full of glee and enthusiasm, than when the shadow of a trouble, however groundless and self-made, hung over her. He left her to a considerable extent to enchant or plague King Lud, who was thus still hovering on the confines of gaining or losing the prize of his life, while Sir William nursed Lady Iermor, made his own observations, or walked about soberly with Miss Compton.

There was something of quaint dignity in the rural aspect of the inn. It was a steep-roofed stone house of considerable pretensions. The walls were rough-dashed and whitewashed, and further covered by honey suckle in blossom, and the first "red red rose" of Scotland which the English visitor had seen. They were told the house was an old Border mansion house, much more recent in date than the crumbling grey tower and town they had recently seen in Cumberland, but still old enough to have been beheld by Prince Charlie, had he looked that way in his memorable marches to and from Carlisle. The house stood in a rough paddock shaded by a few gnarled old trees, and the whole lay in the shelter of the four sentinels—Skiddaw and Scafell rising to the south, with Criffell and the Lead Hills starting up ■ the north.

The party had private rooms, and so did not come in contact with possible dukes, and probable bagmen, chatty or frigid, kindly or selfish old and young ladies. But Mrs and Marianne made their own of a modest yet frank young chambermaid, the daughter of a neighbouring Scotch ploughman. She had lived all her life in the vicinity, and could tell her eager questioners the local names and identify ■ their satisfaction the meiest purple crown of every peak and the misty flash of all the "wan waters" far and near. She was more intelligent than the generality of her compatriots in England—the three hundred years or so of parish schools in Scotland having had their effect on the brains of the population. She took evident pride in her birth place and country, and proceeded, on a little solicitation, to pour forth all the old stories which had gathered round a famous locality. "It was a weel kenneed part since, mem. A bawle bonnie English leddies and wif's English lads sought it out, while there were Scotch leddies and gentlemen came in secret as far as the bounds o' Dumfriesshire an' ■ Kirkcudbrightshire, and rode cockin' awa ■ the in braid day. But there was nae necessity ■ me for the like o' them taking sic a tramp, they ■ armist did it to be neebour like. What for d' ■ and they come, young leddies, are you askin'? ■ Losh! div you no ken this was aye o' the ■ preoons* —my father ay maintains it was the c' hief—where m-awa' marriages were ca'd a' ■ the knot tied and the couple buckled, so ■ what neither father nor mither nor law lord, ■ interior minister o' the huk, nor the king hussel' cou' ■ d' neive man and wife asunder again."

"Oh! how nice! how funny!" cried Marianne, "that we should have come by chance to such an inn. Tell us about these run away marriages, Jeannie. Did any happen in your time? Did you ever see one?" while Mrs prepared to listen with interest and amusement.

"Weel, I cannot just say I have, mem." Jeannie was forced to admit, a little crest-fallen at having to fail "fine, lightsome English young leddies" in such an important particular as would have been supplied by her having been an eye-witness to the deed, and so able to give personal evidence with regard to all that happened. "Leastways I have never seen sic grand turnouts as I have heard my father and mither, and still mair, my grandmother, wha's living to this day with a' her wis about her, crack about to their cronies mony a time. Sic marnages hac been going out o' fashion amang gentle-folks for mair than ae generation. But I hac seen a wheen ploughman bilbies, after a hiring-market, the warae o' drink for the mairt part, and as mony tapnies o' field workers—bondagers, folk ca' them here—and servant lasses, gang afoor auld Fernie who had learnt the trade when it was flourishin', and still wasna unwillin' to win a shillin' or twa by trying the auld trick, though the ministers on ilka side, o' a' denominations, are wild now against ■ and fit ■ ring the head aff onybody that does siccan work. And, mem, it wasna a' fun," continued Jeannie solemnly, for like a good conscientious lass she was exercised ■ mind by the minister's condemnation every time ■ recuried to her memory. 'Fule lads and silly lasses have been carried off their feet, and had to find them again an' rue their madness ower late. I hac seen a puir lad that wasna villain enough tae forsake even the licht lass that hadna been ill tae coort, and was his married wife from the moment they had joined hands, come up next morning, a' shaking, to the farm toon where I was heving in service, to seek his wife an' hae to be telled whilk o' the glaiket lasses was she; and I mind a daft lassie, fit to greet her heart oot, because she had to gang her ways—for life, mind ye, men, wi' a lad she nether kenned nor cared for, seein' that she had only drawn up wi' him the day afore, for naething save to vex her an' lad, whom she had quarrelled wi' nae further gane than the market mornin'."

* The term "toon" is used freely in primitive Scotch for any betterment of house—like house or manor-house, as well as for a "burgh toon."

"Ah! that was bad," said Marianne, disappointed in her turn. "I am afraid your ministers are right, and runaway marriages are not what they should be."

"Weel," said Jeannie, with her amor patriæ and her Scotch logic resuming even her loyalty to her minister, "I'm thinkin' there's something to be said on baith sides. The brawest bridegroom I saw here was nae mair than a writer laddie, an' ■■■ run awa' wi' his auld maister's dochter—a lassie wi' siller. But her father was dead and she was a soft snool, and had a lang headed brither who wanted ■■■ keep the siller in the family—that was to him and his barns, see he was guardin' her day and night an' would hae hindered her frae being married awa, and they said the writer lad, whether he had the siller in his ee or no, was douce and decent, and would be gude enough till her—far better than her an' dach an' blude. Noo wassa that a deliverance wrocht by a rin awa' marriage?" demanded Jeannie triumphantly. "My granny minds o' a saur fracaw about a wicket yerl whom naething would serve but that husegenty* bit dochter should marry as auld an' grand an' wicket a sinner as hissel'. Her true love would na see the shameful sacrifice see he up and fled wi' the lass. He was a sailor or a sodger lad—an' o' the twa, I forget whilk, a bonnie, brave young man, and he brocht the lassie here. They had but to say twa words to be beyond the power o' any fathers, to belong to ane anither as was ordained, so that she could follow the drum or sail the seas wi' him, and only death nicht part them."

"Come, this is better," cried Marianne with a bright colour in her pale cheeks. "Tell us more about it, Jeannie. What excitement there must have been! Did the couple come dashing up ■■■ the door, their horses covered with foam, and the parents and guardians in hot purmut?"

"Na, that wassa the way ilka day. Sic wild wark and desperate risks were not tried often, though I hae heard o' horses bein' shot dead frae the foremost carriage, and drivers unhied to lame the poor senseless beasts, or to tint the road and whummle ower their cary in the middle o' a peat bog, that took ilka man, that tried to stand up, to the houghs in water-holes, wi' nae means o' gettin' on, except by shank's naigie. But whiles, as in the story I'm tellin', the father was sae close that the lovers daured nae drive up to the front door lest they should be overtaken afore they were made one. They left their empty chaise in a dip o' the road mair than a mile awa', as gun there had been a break-down. The driver galloped on his best horse—and they said it cast ilka shoe within the mile—to gie warning here, while the pair turned into a road—Cambus Road, and junked by a foot-path to the auld Cambus doocot, that as a' the world kens is just ower the Borders. There was in this parish a mass-John—that I suld be so far left to mysel' as to gie him sic a name, for he was a godly minister o' the gospel, in days to come. But he didna set his face against rinawa' marriages in his youth, leccensed and placed though he was. What suld hinder him frae hurrying out to meet and marry the lad and lass in the doocot, as gun they had been twa doos? They were yoked together as sure and fast as if they had been a leddy and gentleman surrounded by a proud and blythe wedding company, in a fine house, and blessed by a man wha had maybe christened her and catecheesed him. The driver and the leddy's maid, wha had come wi' her mistress, served for witnesses. There was a wild set at Cambus Ha' at the time, but they were aye hearty and hospitable, and were gude to weddingers, whom they wadna thwart, an' some o' themselfs had made rinawa' marriages, wi' sma' credit, if the truth were told. Ony way the Cambus Ha' family took in the fugitives and gave them quarter for the night. They cam' ower here the next day to face the yerl, wha cursed and blackguarded them, but kennin' he could do nae mair, though he lived ■■■ be a hunder, suffered them to tak' the high road, while he took the lugh."

"I dare say he thought better of it, and was reconciled to his daughter in the end," said Mrs demurely, "we are not so clever on our side of the Border as you are on yours, Jeannie."

"So I hae heard say, mem. But the sock o' the couples were mair crafty than to let it be touch and go like that, whiles they would come dressed up sae as their an' nuthers could hardly hae kenned them, or they would travel here by opposite roads and at different times. The bridegroom by hissel' or wi' a frien' would ride by a coach, and the bride would come, sometimes her lee lane—eh! but she maun hae had a stout heart and a hantle faith in her lad—at nicht be in the dead o' nicht, by anither."

"And how did they do it, Jeannie? out of church, without a regular clergyman always. Did they never forget their prayer-books and the rings?" pressed Marianne, with the keenest curiosity.

"Prayer books!" cried Jeannie, her trim figure, in its dark stuff gown, white cap and apron, swelling at the very word. "We haena had a service book sin' auld Jenny Geddes flung her stile at the head o' the minister for douring to pray in the kirk aff printed paper. As for the ring, it is but the bridegroom's gift to the bride; it can be given at any time. Na, we're no married wi' rings."

"What are you married with then, in the name of wonder? Did you ever hear anything like it, Irv?" cried Marianne, as at an incredible but surpassingly ludicrous joke. "I dare say you don't vow to love, honour, and obey your husbands, when you take them for better, for worse?"

"Na," said Jeannie again with a canny sense of humour, "we say as little as we can, bairn lads and lasses. Ye ken that least said is soonest mended. But there are waur husbands and wives than some you'll find in Scotland, mem."

"I believe you," said Marianne. "I think you are a remarkable people, with charming institutions. If I ever marry, I'll come and do it in Scotland. But in order 'hat I may know what I'm about, you must tell me what really takes place, what you can find to say, when it can be said, in so few words, either in a church or a house, or a 'doocot,' or wherever you may find yourselves."

"Weel," said Jeannie, slightly offended by the tone and the laughter, and defending herself with some dignity, "we dinna believe that the Lord's confined ■ temples made wi' hands. We think the earth is His and the fulness thereof, and that His een are open to what's doing ower the whole world where ilka place ■ His temple. When all is richt and ■ order for a Scotch waddin', our minister puts up a bit prayer out o' his head, and there's a sma' discourse, o' his own composition," Jeannie explained with emphasis, as if she set great store on the originality of the performance. "The discourse may last for ten or twenty minutes, then there's another prayer ■ the end. But the cery mony itself which does the business needna tak' three minutes."

"Then what on earth does ■ consist of? It sounds exceedingly like the waving of a magician's wand."

"Na, there's nae magic about it. It's just the speerin' and answerin' o' twa reasonable questions. The minister, or it might be anither man ■ a rinawa' marriage, asks the lad afore ane or twa witnesses, will he tak' this woman to be his lawfu' wedded wife, and he says 'Yes,' or he only boos if he's blate. Syne the minister spears at the lass if she'll tak' this man to be her lawfu' wedded husband, and she curtshies. Then the minister or the man ackin for him says, 'Join hands,' and the twa clack their fingers together. Neist the minister or the man proclaims, 'What God has joined letna man put asunder,' and that's a', unless the signin' o' the lines that certifies the fac'."

"Do you mean to say you marry as an anonymous man and woman? Do you not even say 'M' or 'N'?" inquired Marianne, still full of interest and diversion.

"What's your wull, mem?" Jeannie questioned in her turn, using an ancient phrase which signified that she had not the most distant idea what her interrogator meant.

"It is not my will, it is yours to marry in this odd mysterious fashion."

"I beg your pardon, mem, but there can be nae mystery—or mockery either, about honest folk," protested Jeannie indignantly. She felt strongly on such subjects as her nationality and her kirk, and had a settled conviction that she did well ■ be angry when they were attacked.

Irv interposed as a peace maker. "We only wished to know if you used no Christian name, such as Jeannie or Donald, in your marriage service."

"Donald is a Hielant name," said Jeannie a little disdainfully. "We hae nae Donalds among our Lowland Scotch—ony way none here awa on the Borders. Na, we mention no names, at least we were na wont to bring them into the ceremony, though some new-fangled ministers say bairn names, and would put it to me as Jean Maxwell, whether I would take Tam Riddel or Allan Elliot for my man?"

Apparently Jeannie had not the guile to use assumed names for her illustration, since she coloured violently, and added that she did not think the new fashion "se manneily and modest" as the old. "But there's the suster's ring o' the bell. She'll say I've

"Ten clamerin' instead of minding my wark, and deed she'll no be far wrang," cried Jeannie in self-condemnation, as she caught up her broom and dust pan and made a hasty retreat to the door, before Marianne could call after her—

"Say we kept you for the enlarging of our ideas. It is quite true, and she may put it in the bill."

Marianne Dugdale was much struck and greatly enlivened by what she had heard of the runaway marriages, once of frequent occurrence in the house, and of the simplicity of the ceremony of marriage according to the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. She ran the two subjects together, and mixed them up inextricably in her mind, while she retailed the information she had got from the chamber-maid, with great gratification, for the edification of the whole party. The topic was a promising one, full of sentimental interest, and yet fertile in jokes. Even the quietest and shyest person there, not to say the oldest, who was never behind with her joke, but as being a little of an invalid ■ present resigned herself to performing the part of a listener, could not resist expressing an opinion, and calling forth a laugh. But none was so full of the stories as Marianne Dugdale. Even after the girls had retired for the night she kept reminding Iris, "what throbbing temples and beating hearts must have sought refuge in these rooms! I wonder if ■ bride ever gave in at the last moment, fainted dead away, or said she would go back as she came, and try to be patient, and obey the law."

"A runaway marriage was not breaking the law—the law of the land, I mean, that went with the couple," said Iris. "I think, like sensible Jeannie, that in extreme cases the remedy was open to trial. I have no doubt that the law existed for these, and to prevent weak women being hardly dealt with. It strikes me that there was a certain manliness and honesty in the law, though, of course, it might be much abused."

"Of course," echoed Marianne, without having paid much attention ■ what her companion had said. "Don't you think it would be dreadful, horrible, to marry without love, Iris, even if the man were not a high-handed sinner, such as the girl described?"

Iris had never heard Marianne speak so seriously before, and even yet she was not sure that a jest might not lurk beneath the seriousness, till her cousin added in a tone of suppressed excitement—

"I would not do it for all the world, I know it would be a terrible danger for me.

It is another thing with you. I believe you would be good, and do your best under any circumstances. But I—Iris, did ■ never strike you that there was something of—granny in me?" Marianne broke off and asked in a low tone with a slight shudder, but looking Iris full in the face all the time, as if to surprise her answer.

"No, no, nothing at all," said Iris, startled and shocked, "except that ■ goes without saying we are both of her blood, and in some physical points—features, tones of voice, tricks of gesture, we may bear a resemblance to her, as doubtless we do to each other," added Iris, seeking to widen the chain of relationship to which she was referring.

"Ah! I know better," said Marianne, drawing a long breath. "I am hot-blooded, impulsive, headstrong, as she has been. I, too, could be brought to stand at bay, and to break through every obstacle in the path of my will. I know I am a weaker woman than she is, but sometimes I think ■ is not only because hers is the stronger nature, but because I am really like granny, that she can turn and twist and make a tool of me. I see perfectly well what she is about all the time, how she is touching every sensitive spot in my composition, stirring me up and egging me on to be vain, headless, and treacherous. But I cannot resist her—I defy myself to do it. It is the same as bringing fire to tinder. I kindle up in a blaze in a moment, and become a puppet to be played off according to her pleasure. It is easy to guess what you will say, that I can strive and watch, and pray ■ hold my own, but I am afraid I cannot. There is some sympathy between us. No, don't let us speak of it any longer, Iris, for even to allude ■ it in a whisper seems to make it a greater reality, and to render me more in her power."

Thus impatient and, as it seemed, cowardly turning of Marianne's back on a cause for apprehension, with the avoidance of all present reflection and future resolution on the point, was a new practice ■ Iris Compton. She had faced each foe that stood in her path, whether or not she had been worsted in the contest.

But there was no room at this date for rational remonstrance with Marianne Dugdale. The moment her humour changed, which it was apt ■ do in the twinkling of an eye, she would put her small hands over her shell like ears and call out pettishly she was not to be preached to, though she had just challenged and almost solicited the sermon. She would prefer to advance partially blind-sold to threatened destruction, rather than endure the sharp pain, acute self-reproach, and mental trouble of opening her eyes, counting the cost, and making a determined stand and an abiding choice as to what was to be her conduct and fate. At the same time poor little square-shouldered Marianne was far less unstable by nature than from defective training and untoward circumstances.

SUNDAY READINGS.

By the EDITOR.

OCCURRENCE.

Read Isaiah lxvi., and 1 Corinthians xvi.

WE have probably all experienced moods when we feel weary of the endless warfare of different ecclesiastical parties, and when we are willing to exchange almost any form of opinion for some good work accomplished, or for some virtue of gentleness or charity that has been attained. Such moods often lead us to understand better the real purpose of religion and to put at their true value many of the disputes which occupy the interests of the religious world, but which are not of the essence of Christianity. We are then brought to think of the will of the Master, and of how He must regard the state of Christendom.

That warfare of some kind should characterize the advance of the kingdom of Christ, is plainly taught us by Himself, but it may be well to inquire of what nature ought that warfare to be. When Christ says, "To him that overcometh will I give to sit on my throne—even as I overcame, and am set down of the Father upon His throne," we may ask, what is it that He wishes us to overcome? What is the contest to which He calls the Church and the individual? We shall this evening consider this question in reference to Churches.

There can be no doubt as to the intensity of the warfare which has raged within the Church of God, and which rages at this moment between the different sections into which the Church has been divided. Without going to other lands we have abundant proof of this at home. No language can well exaggerate the keenness with which the strife of religious parties has been urged in our own country for centuries. It has not been confined to a contention between the various denominations into which the Protestant Church has been divided. The evil spirit of schism, in the sense in which St Paul condemned it, has frequently been as violent within the same communion, as against those who do not belong to it. There can be no doubt as to the enormous expenditure of energy, learning, soul, money, and of temper also on the part of different factions for the special dogma, form of worship, or of government which they have adopted. Sometimes it is in regard to the polity of the Church, whether its government should be by bishops or presbyters, or whether either of these are necessary, sometimes it is about the relationship of Church and State, or it is about the terms of some article in a creed; or about the forms and attitudes to be employed in worship, or about the use or non-use of a prayer-book in the Service of the house of God. And on matters like these we have beheld not only the community, but even families split up into bitter sections, and millions of money spent, and tons of literature disseminated, in support of the opposing claims. To such a length has it gone that the interest with which this clergyman or that, this congregation or that is primarily regarded, refers not unfrequently to the side which may be taken by them in some such ephemeral dispute.

Now if this picture is even approximately true, we may ask whether such points as these are the issues that are at stake when Christ says, "To him that overcometh will I give to sit with me on my throne." For consider for a moment the nature of a contest between Church parties. It is not a struggle against vice or immorality or infidelity. It is not a competition in the attempt to mitigate the sufferings of the poor or the sick. It is as between my understanding of a verse of Scripture and yours, between the form of Church Service I am accustomed to and the one you prefer; or between perhaps nothing more than the influences of different associations and prejudices. Now, suppose that one party should be able to outstrip its competitor, and that one section of the Church should succeed in eliminating another. Suppose that the so-called "Evangelicals" are able to crush the so-called "Broad Church," or that the Broad Churchman vanquishes the "High Churchman," suppose the Dissenter should gain his point against the State Churchman, or that the State Churchman should banish the Dissenter from the field; I ask whether any or all of these victories can be the kind of victory that ■ intended by Christ when He says, "To him that overcometh will I give to sit upon my throne"? Are not these various contentions destructive of the true idea of the Church as a body with many members and embracing a vast variety of form and function? Do not these absorbing conflicts present side issues for the seal of the Church instead of the aims that are vital? For ■ but a very small proportion of the devotion given to these minor points were but expended on the moral and physical evils which affect society; if our keenest anxieties were bestowed on the ignorance and vice which are degrading vast masses of the population; if the miserable houses and miserable lives which are the disgrace of our civilisation received but half the attention now given to our various Shibboleths, then we should have some victories for which we might thank God. But it is the shame of our Christianity that it has treated duties in the inverse ratio of their importance. We can have no doubt as to what the will of Christ is in regard to the relative importance of the practical and theoretical. For He indicates the kind of victory He seeks at our hands when He says, "Even as I overcame." The work of Christ was not the promulgation of a series of abstract theological propositions for the intellectual assent of all men of all ages. He did not set up any sharply defined ecclesiastical system to be alone binding and authoritative for all times and countries. His contest was essentially with the evil and suffering of the world. His victory was that of love sacrificing self for the good of man. His struggle was against the sins and sorrows, the passions, hatreds, class distinctions, and ecclesiastical bigotries which cursed the time in which He lived. It was man that He loved and not any party. It was pride and unlovingness He opposed and not any sect. ■ was God the Father He glorified, and in that great Name He went forth to win back the lost children. And it was just such a grand "enthusiasm of humanity" which gave to the early Church its victories—an enthusiasm fired by the belief that man is redeemed, and burning with the desire to bring all the healing, love, hope, and courage which the eternal life and victory of Christ inspired to bear upon the many-sided wants of society. And men felt the power of a Church life like that, which could change poor slaves and the outcasts of heathen vice into heroic martyrs and saintly confessors.

Now when we weigh, however casually, the meaning of all this, does not the ecclesiastical history of Europe appear in strange contrast? And does not the possible victory of one Church party or another in the many conflicts which ■ this hour affect so greatly the interests of Christians seem to be really quite beside the one question for the solution of which the Christian Church exists?

OCTOBER 18TH.

Read Mark vi. 7-8, and Matthew vii. 23, to end.

Last Sunday evening we considered the kind of victory which Christ seeks His Church to win. This evening we shall apply the same principle to the individual Christian.

When we turn from Churches to persons we find that certain aims are often set before the mind as being of the essence of religion, which have only a secondary relation to it. We may take one or two illustrations of what is thus meant.

(1.) There is the mistake of the pietist, who identifies religion with his feelings and experiences. Salvation is with him security after death, on account of certain opinions held by him respecting the atonement of our blessed Lord; and as the evidence of these opinions—or as he terms them, his "faith"—being genuine is found by him in the sense of "peace" which he enjoys, he endeavours accordingly to maintain a hot-house growth of certain feelings, on the presence of which he leans for assurance. Of this character is the luxurious piety of many useless men and women, who, if their every-day life be tried by the standard of the Christian spirit as revealed in Jesus, painfully surprise us by the contrast therein presented. For how intolerant and harsh ■ their judgment of others are such persons frequently found! how bitter in their antipathies and petulant ■ their tempers! They are almost impossible comparisons for their equals, and exacting towards ■ inferiors. The mind of Christ, which is of the essence of His religion, is not, therefore, necessarily attained by the pietist we have described, and to that extent he ■ unchristian.

(2.) ■ another class is the formalist. His religion consists ■ the "soundness" of his belief in Church or creed, in priest or presbyter. He attends with regularity and becoming reverence upon all the recognised "duties of religion." He may be enthusiastic as to ritual, or keen in its condemnation.

Nevertheless it would sometimes be difficult to determine in common life whether the man is a worshipper of the holy, loving, pure, self-sacrificing Saviour, or a worshipper of fashion, social influence, material comfort, and success, or it may be of Mammon and of that accustomed "order of things," which does not disturb the "goods" that he would "keep in peace."

(3) Or the religion of another may practically consist in the interest which attaches to speculative opinion, to the questions suggested by Reason and Faith, the relation of Science ■ Revelation, or to matters of criticism and evidence.

Now, without multiplying instances, it would be foolish to deny that each of these types of character presents aspects which are not without religious value. The region of feeling and sentiment, the sphere of dogmatic truth or of worship, the outworks of criticism and evidence, have each an important function to fulfil in the kingdom of God.

Nevertheless the true conflict of the Christian soldier, and the victory which is essentially the one that is recognised and crowned by Christ, belong to a different field and to another warfare. It ■ in the sphere of character, in the growth and activity of the Christian spirit, that the real conquests of the Christian are won. Church and dogma may be closely connected with the quickening and fostering of that spirit, but if they produce it not then they fail of the true ends of religion. We are to overcome even as Christ overcame, and that must be by living out the Christ-like character. If that is not in a measure reached, then no occasional fits of pious feeling, no degree of faultlessness in creed or observance, no amount of intellectual acumen or of "insight" can be taken as a substitute for the "one thing needful." Character ■ the great demand of the gospel, and to produce ■ the gospel ■ the one great power. It was to make us sons of God, like Himself, that Christ came, and "If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of His."

And so when it is asked, What is that which we are to overcome ■ order to be set down with Christ upon His throne? the answer to the individual ■ similar to that which is given to the Church. It is your own evil and the evil you are finding in the world around you that you are to vanquish ■ must therefore be yours to seek after the personal fruits of the Spirit, such as love, gentleness, considerateness, and peace, and in doing so to overcome irritability, vanity, and selfishness. It must be yours also to endeavour to do good to others, and for that end to overcome sloth, false delicacy, and pride. You need not look to the ends of the earth, or to the world beyond the grave, for the opportunities of saintship. Everyday life, your friends, your business, will afford ample scope for a noble struggle and a glorious victory. A man's spiritual foes are, indeed, most frequently "those of his own household," discovered in the difficulty of dealing with the common details of life in a truly generous, patient, and Christian spirit.

And such a victory cannot be gained ■ without Christ. It is the love of Christ which can alone inspire the desire so to live, and His grace can alone give the power to live it. But we must beware of substituting in the name of Christ a religion which is but the reflection of our own selfishness and unfaithfulness. If we are to be "set down by Christ on His throne" ■ can only be by fighting His battle, through sharing His mind and character, and thus possessing His joy.

Read Job 12:1; and 1 Peter 1:1-9

Is it possible to love a person whom we have never seen, or who has not been seen on earth for eighteen centuries? We may admire the character or writings and rejoice in the noble histories of the great men of the past, but it would be an unwarrantable stretch of language to assert that we loved Plato or Shakespeare with such an absorbing passion that it was the thought of their presence which cheered us in our sorrows, and the consciousness of their approval which inspired our virtue. This would be worse than paradoxical. And yet ■ is such language as this, used in the soberest manner, which has expressed the sentiments of believers towards Jesus Christ, "Whom having not seen, ye love, in whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

The form of expression used by St. Peter is suggestive, when he says "■ Whom believing." We do not base the distinction between believing Christ and believing ■ Christ altogether on a verbalism ■ rests on a wider foundation. For there is a common distinction between believing what a man says and believing in the man who says it. In the former sense we may accept the teaching of Christ and acknowledge the unapproachable excellence of His doctrine, we may also, in a similar sense, believe all that is said about Christ and of His claims. But it is a different kind of faith to believe ■

Him, for it implies a certain experience of His guidance and grace. Taking a familiar illustration, we may distinguish between the historical faith of the student who is acquainted with the life and character of Napoleon, and who may accept his ideas as authoritative, from that kind of faith in the man possessed by the soldiers who fought under his command. They may have known little of his policy, but they had the enthusiasm of such faith ■ their leader ■ made them ready to brave shot and shell in obedience to his will. This may help us to understand the character of that glowing faith in Jesus Christ which transcends belief in a theology and becomes a transforming power in life and character. For it is trust in a Person, who is alive and cares for us, who is our Shepherd, Saviour, and Friend. It ■ that which translates an abstract creed into a commanding enthusiasm. ■ ■ is precious to say, "I believe ■ the incarnation, or the atonement, or the resurrection," it seems infinitely more so to have such abstract doctrines vitalized by changing the creed into the more personal one—"I believe in Jesus Christ, who lived and died and rose again, and is alive for evermore, Who is now reigning over us and all men, to Whom I can unburden every desire, and Whose path I will follow, however dark and mysterious it may now appear."

And Christian life is more than faith. "Whom having not seen, ye love," wrote St. Peter to the believers of the dispersion who, unlike himself, had never beheld Jesus of Nazareth. The best test of faith is to measure the extent to which it has led us thus to love Christ. When that love comes in with power it changes our motives and revolutionizes our aims. Money, pleasure, position, influence, sit no longer on the throne. "To us ■ live is Christ." Whatever is contrary ■ His will, will then affect us ■ with a shock of pain; we then instinctively care for the advance of His Kingdom, and the poor, the ignorant, the suffering, for whom He died, cannot be treated with indifference. Such love becomes our very nature. ■ possesses us, it vitalizes our sympathies, kindles our enthusiasm, consecrates our lives. And yet it is all the while love ■ a Person whom we have never seen. The paradox becomes a fact of experience. The invisible Lord ■ more really present to the soul that loves Him than earthly father, or mother, or wife, or child.

Some may feel as if all this were a fanaticism and a dream. They may say, "No practical man, far less any man of scientific training, can receive this as his religion. He may confess the exalted morality and accept the hopes of the gospel, but in this world of fact, ■ is impossible ■ expect one to have, as the chief motive for all his conduct, love to Jesus Christ, Who is invisible."

One fact however we do know, that when we turn to the loveliest lives this earth has seen, to the gentle and wise, the pure and devoted, the sweet maidens, the manly soldiers and heroes of the Cross, who have been the very flower of our humanity, we discover that what inspired and sustained and sanctified them, was their love to the invisible Lord. And this is the secret power which consecrates the service of every one now, who "counting not his own life dear to him," labours for the redemption of humanity from sin and selfishness to the knowledge and joy of God. You cannot account for the undying enthusiasm of the Church as she sends forth her labourers into ■ lands, on any other ground than unquenchable love to Christ. And in other spheres we see its power burning with an intensity still more arresting. So have we beheld it amid poverty and weakness, and the agonies of mortal suffering, giving an intelligent and calm patience, a sense of strength, and a blessed hope which death itself could not assail. Love for the unseen Saviour may be a paradox, but it is also one of the most potent factors in actual life.

OCTOBER 30TH.

Read Psalm cxi., and Ephesians iii. 4, to end.

The reign of law or universal order implies a unity of principle so complete that we are justified in looking for the universal in the particular. It was because he could calculate on the universal applicability of the principle discovered in a minor incident that Newton expounded the law which determines the course of the planets. ■ ■ the security of this method of reasoning which often makes analogy our sole instrument for constructing a theory of the next life. We believe God works on principle; and when we have discovered the principle of His activity in one sphere of interest, we are emboldened to rise into a survey ■ other possible worlds where similar laws prevail. The permanent facts of ethics or of social life may thus be regarded as indicative of higher relationships, for a moral instinct ought to be as sure an index of law as the swing of a pendulum or the shape of a rain-drop. Family life, which ■ the basis of social life, is as much a fact of nature, or, in other words, a principle of God's government, as the law of gravitation. The names parent and child, brother and sister, which belong ■ the primary social nucleus, express principles which widen out into the larger organisms of city, nation, and race; so that in every home we can behold a microcosm, or little world, governed by laws which reach to the very throne of God. We feel warranted to rise from the earthly relationship to the heavenly, and can say with confidence, "Our Father which art in heaven," finding in our earthly thoughts of fatherhood a true prophecy of the eternal. For if these earthly ties are the work of God they reveal principles that cannot perish. There is therefore nothing ■ startle us in the saying of St. Paul, "The Father, of whom the whole family," or rather "every family in heaven and earth is named."

Two thoughts, among many, are suggested. (1.) Separation, and (2.) Unity. Some are in heaven and some on earth, but the whole belong to the family of Him who is the one Father.

(1.) There are few families in whose ranks there are no gaps. Most of us can understand what it means to see places empty, the occupants having passed "within the veil." And we still feel bound ■ them. They are "our" father or mother, "our" brother or sister, "my" husband or wife still. And we believe that they also feel similarly towards us. He who kindled those earthly affections which have been the source of so much good, could not have done so merely ■ quench them for ever after the few years of their existence here. We can have no doubt that they who live still, also love still. We can therefore feel the beauty of the phrase, "the whole family in heaven and on earth." Indeed, as we grow older the family in heaven seems the more real as well as the larger. There are many firesides at which the thoughts of those who are yet seated round the hearth are more with those who have entered into their rest than with the friends, however precious, who remain.

But the sadness of separation is not the only burden which those who remain have to carry. There is no one who has deeply loved another, and who has felt the closeness of the links which have bound soul to soul, to whom the fact of being parted does not suggest other and sometimes most trying reflections. We cannot but wonder regarding the conditions of the life which is now theirs. Where are they now? What are they doing? What are they feeling? The mother asks it about the little child which has been taken from her arms to be educated in a higher school and under an infinitely better guidance. The child asks ■ regarding the parent without whom it once seemed impossible to live. The husband or wife asks it about the one who but yesterday shared their every care. Such thoughts press upon us whether we will it or not. In vain do we cry to our beloved ones for an answer to our questionings—"Do you ever think of us now? Do you love us still as you loved us then?" All is indeed terribly silent. Custom and time may with their healing ministry deaden the first keenness of our sufferings, and may even lend a placid and chastened grace to the sadness they conceal but cannot cure. And yet the gaps are there, and the old mystery still lingers beside the grave.

(2.) But, thank God, there is another side presented, when we read of unbroken unity in the words, "The whole family in heaven and on earth." If there is separation, there is continuity. And this unity is based on His own eternal Fatherhood. Every family on earth has been constituted in virtue of that great name "Father," with which we call upon God as the source of all our blessedness. And that name is the foundation on which we build our hopes of the continuance of the same blessedness for ever. For if it is God who has made the earthly home so precious, and given to the parent the child that nestles in the breast, and given to the child the parent who is its gentle protector, if ■ is He who has inspired the love which unites the members of the family here in ties that death cannot sever, we may rest assured that all which belongs to the unseen world will be in harmony with what He has thus bestowed in this present world—which is God's world as truly as that other that we call heaven.

And so it is that the earthly names which are so dear ought to lead us up to that one Name, from which they derive their significance, and as we say "Father" we can rest in peace as to all else. For it ■ the same Hand which guides us here that is guiding them there, who have gone from us ■ is the same loving and wise Will which gives us our good things richly to enjoy, that is sustaining and meeting in higher and richer ways the wants of those who have entered on a far grander range of existence. ■ there ■ separation, there is also unity—perfect unity—for every family in heaven and on earth is named after the one Father, and all rest equally on the same good and perfect Will.

BETWEEN THE HEATHER AND THE NORTHERN SEA.

BY M. TINSLEY

AUTHOR OF 'CLYDEBANK HALL' 'RIVER HOLE'S HILL' 'ETC.

CHAPTER LX—A WINTER TIDE.

GENERAL sympathy is apt to be a very disproportionate and unreasoning thing, but all the same we acknowledge it to be priceless when we need either its consolation or its congratulation. Whether a great joy be yours or a great sorrow, you shall find your heart expanding to a general and genial fellow feeling if the felicity be yours to win the same.

Not only in the walk district known as Muik Marshes, but far beyond the knowledge that the master of Ussellby was huddled by sickness awoke a spontaneous and intensely anxious interest—an interest that seemed almost unaccountable on the surface of it. It was hardly more than a year since he had come to settle in the neighbourhood and he had not made himself especially prominent in any way. It might truly be said of him that his right hand had done any good his left hand was unwearied of it.

What is that subtle power by which souls recognise their peers? What is that strange personal attraction which is so much more than personal? What is there in the complex depths of human character, human nature that betrays, without word or deed, the elevation of soul which is the habitual breath of this man's life or of that? All our best will we are reduced to the confession of Shakespeare's Lucius:

'It hath so I come I shall know'

Though the December days were bright and keen, they yet dragged heavily at Netherbank. Noel Bartholomew was working perceptibly not all his wearing anxiety for his friend might stay him from working. It was as if he were impelled by some motive outside his own consciousness. Not till the last hour of sufficient light had gone by did he lay aside his palette and make his way rapidly over the bleak lone heights of Ingharburgh Moor to Ussellby. He might not enter—Dr Armistead had forbidden that, but the duty message was something—whether it came from Mr. Swayne or from George Kirkoswald himself, it was something. Of course it came from the latter, and then the painter's heart was made glad, and the gladness passed from him to another heart. Frequently Genevieve stood on the edge of the moor above the house while her father was making his inquiries, waiting there patiently, watching the dim window where the light burned and watched, prayerfully. He laid his cross its inscription? 'Be not afraid.'

But the days were fast coming when her faith's whole strength was to be tested. The crisis was at hand. Dr Armistead rode to Ussellby three times daily and three times daily his words went abroad over the country side. They amounted to the same each time. 'The crisis is at hand, a few days a few hours may decide.'

'Decide what? His life or death, and my life or death?' Genevieve said to herself passionately when the words were repeated to her. 'If he die his death will be at my door, and I cannot know it in life. There will be a curse upon my forehead, his voice will cry from the ground, and from the heaven above me there will come the cry, "What hast thou done?"'

What had she done?

Her mental attitude on that evening after her return from Yurill was a surprise, a mystery to herself even yet. The development of a new phase of her own character had astonished her, and that that phase should have been one of scorn and hardness was surely sufficient for a pun. It seemed now as if nothing could ever wholly do away with the recollections of that evening's bitterness. If the wound were healed ever so happily, would not the scars remain? Supposing this crisis passed and passed as she hoped and prayed then would there not still be a certain stiffness born of the fear of recurrence to be dreaded? Was a restored love, a restored friendship ever quite the same as one that had needed no restoring?

These were no idle questions.

It is a great thing to be forgiven.

and the forgiveness may be full and precious, even sweet—sweet in the memory for ever more. But behind there will be that other memory, the memory of the thing that made forgiveness necessary. It is not in human power to erase the heart's records, and the wise man prays unceasingly that the records of no heart may be the darker for any word or deed of his.

It had been impossible for Genevieve to go to Havilands. She was sorry, and Miss Winterford was sorry, but it might not be. There were other reasons besides the illness of George Kirkoswald.

No letter had come from Mr. Montacute. Bartholomew had heard accidentally that Mr. Withersby, the artist who was to come from York, had not been able to come at the appointed time, but he had promised to give his opinion soon after Christmas. It was Christmas now. Christmas Day was over, gone by in a gloom and suspense that crept its shadow over the neighbourhood. But Bartholomew was not feeling impatient for Mr. Withersby's decision. He was trying not to think of the matter at all. It could only be pain, excessive pain, excessive humiliation, but something might be taken from his pain, or so nothing might be added to it, and it was in the nature of the man to die of the letter with a shuddering, unrelieved, and chilly, rowing dread.

Yet he suffered his dread in unbroken silence, in perfect seeming calmness. His devotion to his work accounted in part for his power to control all outward manifestation of inward discomposure. The 'A' stone was finished at last, and downcast though the man might be, he could not resist the thrill of satisfaction that came to him one morning when he drew the curtain back after remaining resolutely from doing so for some days. His satisfaction was of a curious and mingled kind. It was all but impersonal. That a thing of beauty had been created to his joy for ever was more to him than the fact that he had created it. The warm, sweet, uplifted face, sorrowful with a touching and lonely sorrow, suggestive with an infinite suggestiveness, would utter things too deep for words when the hand that had painted it was at rest for evermore. That the picture—though it was not finished—was yet a noble and impressive picture he could not fail to see. The perfect colouring, tender and delicate and pure, the fine modelling, the exquisite gradations of tone, the graceful importance of the composition were not things that a man might choose, consciously, ignorant of his achievement. Yet no touch of pride mingled his emotion, and the glow of gladness was but a sunny story that meant abjection of him and sadness came of him brooding like a mist about the face and figure of the golden-haired and beautiful bowed 'A' stone.

A day or two later he stood before his completed 'Julia'. This also was a full-length figure, standing not far from the place where his Master was even then kneeling in that last agony in the garden.

On the face of the Judas also there was an agony, though the face was not yet given there was a strong agony of doubt of the past and it was all but overwhelming. The piece—the thirty pieces of silver—was in his hand, but he had not yet uttered his price. He had yet to earn it, this he knew, and of this he knew, was born the agony on his face in anguish that a man might be constrained to pay though he might see judgment the pitiless road that came of this deliberation. The picture was powerful, fascinating, rather than beautiful. The pale, intellectual, inscrutable face was a face that haunted you in any hour of life when you might be open to suggestion, influences. Yet, though it haunted you to torture you would be conscious of yearning toward it yearning to save the man from himself from the sternness of his own traitorous deed. Having once seen Bartholomew's Julia you never forget that the man who betrayed his Master had immediately found his remorse to be greater than he could bear. Not every traitor has the grace to go out and hang himself.

There were a few inches to be put to the 'S' of the 'A'. This was only a head on a canvas some thirty inches square. So much of the 'marvel' armour as was visible, had been carefully copied from an antique coin. Let that adorn the studio. The bronze casque was thrown into relief by a background of greenish grey, the ground to be used around the 'A' stone. The uplifted face was of a clear soft brown, the light fell innocently to the vivid little effect of the picture. It was hardly more than a portrait, but it was, of course, not the least perfect. His blue eyes were a little less blue than Mr. Severus's eyes but the expression was his—his in his highest and gravest moments. The light brown nose, the thin, full, concealing mouth that was always pathetic when the face was in repose. The jawline had mild and infinitely pathetic, and the spirituality of the picture was in the quality of the young thing, to move a man against his cold and unshaken will.

Bartholomew was sitting before it, looking into it, trying, the points of his brush between his fingers, his hands.

"Shall you finish it to-day, father?" Genevieve asked.

"I don't know, dear . . . I don't feel like talking."

It was a little dry of the oil year, and it had been a long time since the last time and his daughter. Dr. Armstrong had pro-missed to come round by Netherbank on his return from his first visit to Ussellby, he had not come yet, and the suspense was growing as the moments went on. The doctor had thought it quite probable that he might have something decisive to say, but he had given no opinion as to the nature of that decision. He had tried to smile his manner as neutral as his words, but he had not succeeded in this. We always know more than we discern, and it seemed to Genevieve that she already heard him pronouncing that last fatal sentence that he would promise so cheerily, so straightforwardly and yet with such undertones of sympathy. These undertones had been there all through for her.

Once, meeting Dr. Armistice in the lane whilst her eyes were still wet with the frost-tears she had urged in will abandonment—

‘Make him well again, Dr. Armistice. Save him, for my sake, save him!’

And she would never forget the tones in which the answer came—

“I wish I could! I wish I could promise you. But believe that I will do my best.”

He always did his best, and he always knew when others did their best, and gave them credit for it generously.

If Mr. Arkwright were here, as I trust he will be, and one evening, “his recovery will be largely due to Mr. Stevens nursing, I may say to his devotion. I have not often seen anything like it. He seems able to do without sleep for a quite unlimited period.”

The morning wore on, and about noon the weather changed. The sky darkened suddenly, the wind rose, showers of bitum, sleet came driving up from the north-east. Work had not seemed possible before, and it was impossible now.

“I will go up to Ussellby,” Bartholomew said. “I must go. I cannot endure this any longer.”

“You will let me go with you?” Genevieve said, pleadingly.

“In this storm, my child, and with that thin white face?” It is out of the question. But in time I will not keep you in suspense one moment longer than is inevitable. Be quiet, little one, be good, as good and quiet as you have been all through.”

“I tell me honestly what you are thinking now, my father?”

“You will believe in my honesty?”

“To the last letter.”

“Then during the past hour I have been possessed by a hope vain as for which I cannot account. It seems like vision, like sight Scenes come before me as if I were, and George is in them always.”

The latch had fallen upon the window, while the doctor’s face was to him, a faint red glow that he felt here and there. He felt that the doctor’s face was to him, a faint red glow that he felt here and there. He felt that the doctor’s face was to him, a faint red glow that he felt here and there.

“I don’t know,” she said. “I have been here all the day in the room, and I have not yet. But I will be here as often as I can. I have been here all the day in the room, and I have not yet. But I will be here as often as I can. I have been here all the day in the room, and I have not yet. But I will be here as often as I can.”

The old woman spoke in kind tones and with dry eye, but the drawn lines about her mouth, the hollow in her furrowed cheeks had only come there lately. There is a difference that each of us, and unsuppressed—

There were tappings at the door, a little sheltered by the projecting chimney.

“I suppose I may not come in, since Dr. Armistice is in the room?” Bartholomew said. “I don’t think it is imminent. I cannot go back yet awhile.”

“There’s a greenhouse down at the bottom of the garden,” he said. “It’s no bigger than a little hut in its own full of new plants, but it’s warm. I can sit down there, pottering about about the new plants, and I’ll be there a bit.”

Bartholomew went up and down rather like a cat among the unarranged plants. It was a dismal little place at present, still, silent, oppressive. The dark clouds went on gathering, the night was coming down. Patience was not difficult, but it was ap-
“ing. The hopeful vision had deserted him. There were voices in the gusty wind that went whirling and whirling by. Great cold ran through him to fall upon the glass silently. Then, after two hours of dreary waiting, there was a loud sound of footsteps up the gravel path. . . . Was it welcome?”

It was Dr. Armistice who opened the door. “This is lively!” he said in cheerful tones as he came into the dim, silent little spot. Where are you? Oh there! No, don’t thank me. Bartholomew was shaking hands with him. "I thank God!" he was saying. "I thank you for all that you have done. The doctor has said no word of Karkoswald yet, but his tone has told me nearly all that might be told. Small thanks are due to me," he replied. "You will have to thank that young curate's much or his obedience to orders is anything. I am come away out of this. I have my cut here. I shall be glad of your company home."

"And the dinner is over?"

"The dinner is over. My patient is asleep, and the fever is subsiding rapidly. It will be a little while before he is a hunter by himself in the morning."

There was a white light, striding watching by the side when the doctor's dog came in to do its end the road that led down from the moor. But the storm still raged, hurrying voices on the wind. Geneva knew that it was herself that in Dr. Armitage who were coming down together, but she could not wait there for the news they might be bringing. "Is it life? Is it is it death?" she said half aloud, standing in the sunlight with clasped hands and bowed head. She was trembling violently when her father came in, her eyes were looking out toward him eagerly, wildly, almost incomprehendingly, her strength was gone. She put out her two hands, and fell into his arms with a cry.

"Tell me the worst my father."

Then he kissed her, and again he kissed her.

"There is no worst my daughter. There is no worst. God has been very good."

There is no thankfulness like the thankfulness of relief. There is no quiet like the quiet that comes when long and intense anxiety is at an end and the end is the end we have wished for.

Both Luth and his daughter had had more of this and less of hope than they quite knew. We never do know the full depth of a suspense until the end of suspense has declared itself and upon no man does the shock of the worst come so hardly as upon him who has believed himself prepared to face it.

A life passes on, the next deliverances are received more and more quietly more and more with hidden shaking gratitude. It is the unknown the unknown who are overjoyed, and we know that the terror that is past can have one life to it. Every spring prepares for winter, and though each calamity has its limit, you shall no discern how near the boundary of the next calamity lies to this.

Next day, New Year's Day it was, Noel Partholomew went up once more across the moor and through the tossing pinewoods. He was alone again, the day being too cold and threatening to admit of his having the satisfaction of his daughter's company. He had promised that he would go back again as quickly as possible.

"I have only come up to wish Mr. Karkoswald a happy New Year," he said to Jack. "And of course, my good wishes include Mr. Severn. . . . You will tell them both?"

"Ay, Ah'll tell 'em noo, and I feel more gratified than she was able to show. Ah'll tell 'em noo. Maybe he'll send ya a word or two back. He's as put as out."

"He, of course, was always her master, but her master was asleep just now, and the message that came was written on a slip of paper by the patient's father who was still at George Karkoswald's bedside."

"I thank you very much," Sir Galahad said, "and I know I may send Mr. Karkoswald's thanks as well as mine, and his best wishes for the New Year. I seem to feel sure that it will be a happy year for all of us. I never felt sure in this way before."

"Please tell Mrs. Partholomew, with my kind regards, that Mr. Karkoswald is doing as well as possible—Dr. Armitage says so. I am wondering if I shall get down to church for the Liphiny. I should so much like to offer the thanksgiving myself, and to offer it on that day."

So Ernest Severn wrote not dreaming that when the day of light came he would be at the Rectory himself, there in the stillness and darkness of his own room, stricken with fever, sorely stricken yet—so full—so fully conscious as he was wholly undismayed.

The stroke had seemed to fall suddenly. No one had noticed any change in him not even George Karkoswald whose deep gratitude was growing, with every hour of his increasing convalescence. More than gratitude was owing that in infinite charm of mingled loveliness and goodness, and simplicity and self-dedication which had won the young curate's friends everywhere, had won for him all the affectionate regard that was needful for the foundation of a strong and lasting friendship between himself and Karkoswald. It was a friendship that was its earliest stage as yet.

"I only know that there is something I want to keep alive, something, I tried to lose," George said two or three days after.

* Last—Last day

the critical moment of his own illness had gone by. And less than an hour after he had so suddenly perceived to his utter dismay that Mr Severn was lying back in the big arm chair that he used always pulled, fast, and only half-conscious. Just came quickly Fen saddled his master's horse and went hurrying down in the dim evening light for Dr Armistage. The doctor saw at a glance how it was. The fatness was over, and the slenderness that had followed was over, but either signs were written only too plainly.

He knew it all himself, he had seen too many fever cases of late not to know.

"I am not afraid," he said, "and the Canon is not afraid, so you will let me go home—to the Rectory. I mean, now while I may go. And though Dr Armistage objected, and George Kukosaid besought him to remain, he went on pleading. "Let me go home to my own room. I do not wish to seem obstinate, but please let me go home."

And so when the morning came he was taken to the Rectory, back to his own sombre room, that was all hung with dark blue and where all his own small treasures had been arranged to his satisfaction. The two narrow windows looked northward. The sun was shining on the paddock below when he went in, the shadows of the leafless trees stunted on the grass, birds were piping cheerily.

"This is good," he said, his parched lips parting into a smile. "This is good. I have always said the birds in the Rectory trees sang more sweetly than any other birds. I wanted to hear them. I wanted to see the field with the sunshine on it again. Now I have all I wanted. It is very good."

For a day or two Dr Armistage hoped that his first impression had been a mistaken one. The young man lay so calm, so still, and bore the pain and the strong thirst that was upon him so unconqueringly, that his nervous system was quicker for him. George Kukosaid had been, and this gave a better chance, and offered a straw for hopefulness to catch. But it was no more than a straw, to be utterly consumed in that dread fever flame that was burning in the youth's life so quickly—so quickly and yet so quietly, so silently.

Unfortunately, his mother, who was a widow, had gone abroad, and had taken her two daughters with her. They had been at Nice, at Montpellier, then Mrs Severn had written a hasty note saying that having met some friends they were going over the Pyrenees into Spain. She would write again, she had said, but no other letter had come yet.

So it was that just at that moment Mr Severn was hardly one of them exact whereabouts. Letters were written, telegrams sent, but no answer came.

There was no lack of nurses. Half a dozen women out of the little hospital hurried to come, and two were chosen. But the Canon seldom left the bed sick except when duty called him away. The old man sat there, or knelt there by day and by night. His prayer might and power still did not be waiting, but every plea was ended in the Master's hand. —

"Not my will but thine."

Delirium set in suddenly at last, conscious-ness came fleetingly then in one moment into the other in strange and unaccountable ways.

"Do you know me, I trust?" the Canon said to him in the evening of the day he had desired to keep as a day of thanksgiving for the recovery of another. A little while before he had not known the fact that was beat over him so invisibly, but now a change of mood had come, and the Canon was fain to speak a little while he might. "Do you know me, my son?" he asked with patient lips, and eyes dim with watching. And the young man smiled, putting out his hand.

"We shall always know each other," he said. "And I think I shall find and know your other son—we shall wait for you together."

"You will not have long to wait, the old man rejoined with the calmness of one who trusts death for all that life has denied.

"No," I think it will not be long. When I say 'good bye' to you I shall say it as she said it, only for this purpose. You will see her . . . You will tell her I did not forget?"

"Can we live?—Yes, I will tell her, the Canon said, still holding the hot hands in his own cool palm. "She was heart to die with her father—I would not let them come in, but I saw them for a moment and I had to turn the child away from the door with her eyes full of tears."

"Fears!" said Sir Githard with the old look of wonder coming into his round blue eyes. "Why should she cry? Why should it be sorrow? Oh! tell her—tell them that death is not sorrowful. . . Why have we made it so? Why do people think of it with dread, when it is so beautiful, so full of calm a thing? . . . Three nights ago I heard the wings of the Angel of Death clout my breast, rushing with the rhythm and sweep of

Wienle to be healed of it

It was some days before the Canon was able to go over to Netherbrink. The bright calm weather lingered on, a dry or two stilled the hedgerows, the rakes on the dunes turned to purple in the sun, the heads of last year's grasses were bowed gracefully, the red and leaves rustled and whispered together. Were they whispering sympathy? There was a smile on the face of the old man when he went into the garden down the orchard. And there was change in his face too. Who does not know that a silent changing intention that comes into voices that have been silenced by bereavement? The unspoken words vibrate through the spoken ones, other meanings flash across the common place thing that is uttered.

Dr. Armitage gave me permission to come, he thought that it would be better than your coming to me. The old man and I sat in the chair that Genevieve placed for him by the fire. There was all the old sweet life in him, with all its old customs, its old homeliness. Sorrows had come and gone, and changes and changes had happened, but the change had changed nothing. Genevieve's soft subdued smile, the pretty pink flush of pleasure that had come with the Canon's coming, and her great crown of shining golden hair seemed to take all the idea of mournfulness from her black dress. 'There are so many things I want to know, the Canon went on, 'so many things I want to say, that I could not keep away any longer than I was compelled. And first of all I want to know about Mr. Karl Oswald. The doctor's bulletin says he is dead.'

'You know that the worst is over?' Eutholomew said.

'Yes, I know so much as that, but I also gather that his recovery is slow and disappointing.'

'Do you wonder that it should be so?'

the artist asked. "Do you think it has been no shock to him, this terrible sequence to his own illness? I have not seen him, but I can well understand that his trouble is very great."

'You think it is that, then, that hinders his convalescence?'

"I fear so."

'Then I shall ask Dr. Armitage if I may not go to Ussaby to-morrow. I have messages that can hardly fail to be messages of peace,' said the Canon, with the gentle smile coming over his beautiful face.

But why do you say "terrible"? I have been no terror. There is none now.

Eutholomew pressed. 'I suppose I used the word thoughtlessly,' he said. 'The terrible that my undoubtedly be connected with the idea of death has never rooted itself as an impression in my mind. I will not say that I have not known dread, but I think it is certainly true that God permits the fear of death when it is intended that a man should live, and that it is only when it is intended that he shall live.'

'You speak as if it were mine, from yourself?'

'It has gone.'

Genevieve laid her hand on her father's arm, and looked into his eyes. There was only affection there, and patient endurance, and a quiet light gleaming through to new beauty.

'I will not say I know for death,' the artist went on. 'There are many reasons why I should not desire it yet. But since—since that morning the idea of it has been very present with me. And, like all ideas that remain persistently, it has grown and widened within me till it fills a large space.'

'Is it the idea of death that has so widened it?' the Canon asked, 'or is it the idea of what is beyond?'

'A number of what is beyond. The passing is a most filling subject. We the duly sleep is as mysterious as death. I do not say that death is not mysterious, the life after death is more full of mystery still, and no new ray of light is ever thrown there. But I think that since we human beings have done much by our dark and ignorant conceptions to invest the life to come with hum in alums and meanings, it is only fitting that we should now try to disentangle the spiritual ground of the old tangled overgrowth of childish terror, and low speculative ideas of the vengeance of a God whose wrath he has preached to us till we cannot, dare not, grasp the theme of His love. Putting aside for the moment the accepted views of the sure and certain hope of the Christian creed, I think that the merest glimpse into the vastness of the universal order of things assures to us a wider—and if I may say it—a more attractive and congenial future than most theologians venture to promise us. To the ordinary human mind the contemplation of such beatitude as that set before us in the Apocalypse is not—let me confess it—made without a certain shrinking, a certain awe, a certain sense of the overwhelmingness of that perpetual spiritual altitude to be maintained beyond the gates of pearl. There are men and women, and these not the worst, who are daunted rather than drawn, dismayed rather than encouraged, and it seems to me that so long as humanity is human that absolute transformation will be gained for only by the few."

"Only by the few," said Canon Gibriel with a sudden light and comprehension. "Many are called, but only the few enter into that inner court of the Kingdom of Heaven where they rest not day nor night from adoration."

"And you think there may be outer courts?"

"I am assured that there are many, many mansions, and I am assured that one star differs from another star in glory. . . . I fear there has been, as you say, a good deal of mistaken conception in regards the future life, doubtless it yet exists, and though all controversy on the subject must end pretty nearly where it began, something certainly might be done to put new life into ideas so overlaid by the old conventional phrases as to have lost all semblance of vigour and truth."

"I have suffered from those phrases all my life," said Ruthelma, "my soul's health has suffered, and I believe that millions of people, if they would confess the truth, would admit the same. It is even so with many texts of the Scripture itself. They have been repeated so often, and in such mindless, reckless ways, that they have come to have no meaning in them."

"Yes," said the Canon. "I have often wondered what exactly is the nature of the comfort derived by many people from the insignificant declaration—

"We know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him."

Which of us has the joy in that that he might have? Which of us remembers that to be—humanly speaking—as we believe Christ to be now, will be to have not only a spirit, a distinct individual spirit of one's own, but also an intellect, with all the known attributes of intellectual knowledge, and desire for knowledge; thought, and power to use thought, will, and power to exercise will, affection, and desire to expend and receive affection, and all these increased and heightened to a degree we do not dream of here. And could any one for a moment imagine it possible that a being so endowed with the powers of life would have no social and intellectual life to put such powers into requisition? Is it conceivable that no services save services of song would be demanded of him? Growth and advancement and achievement will surely be expected of us there, as here, and these things mean effort and action, and response to ever increasing depths and heights of Divine influence. . . . It hath not entered into the heart of man, that full conception of what will be, it can never enter here, but assuredly we might open our minds, and not be afraid to open them to such conceptions as even human reason may attain by the light of the Spirit, and reverent effort to arrive at the truer and fuller meaning of such revelation as has been made. It is within the grasp of the least vivid understanding to believe that—"There shall never be one lost good! What we, shall live as He lives

He can do all is sought is advance implying union
What we do, shall be good, with, for all so much good in us
On the earth the broken ones, on the heavens a part is rested."

"All we have made a big deal of of, it is all
Not an accident but still, so is it, for all is in us
What we have gone forth but each sure as for the million is done
In his eternity affirms the conception of an hour."

Genevieve was listening, thinking. ■ was becoming easier to recognise the fact that that other world, that other life, was only a continuance of this. He who had so recently gone had just slipped quietly and peacefully away, as some people like to do when they are going on a journey. "If he were to come back again, 'I should not feel it strange,'" she said to herself. She was rowing with a deep and silent sorrow, silence of the kind that she had lost that rare possibility but true, true and faithful and loyal friend. ■ that it may be it just when he stood

He had given all that a man may give—his life—and he had laid ■ down for his friend, for his two friends. "It was as much for my sake as for yours, George," she said, "for yours as much as for mine." It was in the silence and loneliness of the night that she spoke ■ herself. Life was very lonely now, very full of negations and negations. Only hope remained, vibrating through the days running in and out like a silken thread of blue all across the grey web that Fate was weaving. The next shuttle might be filled with strands of gold and silver, the pattern might be changed to a shining arabesque of flurts and flowers. It is good sometimes, to think what may be. It is never good to refuse to see aught but ill. The faithful are seldom brave, seldom patient. Hope is the very centre and munspring of long suffering. No beatitude was pronounced to the disarming.

CHAPTER XIII—"I HAVE DARED AND DONE SO NOW I WILL TRY TO SLIP."

George's hope was not deflated to the point of heart sickness. As the clear, cold January days went on, the messages from Ussibby became more and more buoyant and gladdening. George was able to sit up all day, to read for hours at a time, to write letters. With the first mild January morning came the news that Dr. Armitage had said that his patient would be out on the goons before the end of another week. Veiterbank was not far from the moors.

Let but a few more weeks pass, and the cherry would be in bloom, and the cypripedium trees, and Durkigg Gill would be ankle-deep with wild flowers again, and musical birds as wild as the flowers were. And a cuckoo would be there upon the hillsides, calling, calling, never weary of calling in spring.

"It really only a year, nay, much less than a year, since that day when George had put his hands in hers with a warm, strong, intimate grasp, and had looked into her eyes—achingly, and had asked her for her life—the whole life's love; and she had said, "I am yours, I am yours always." Then it was possible that he was less than a year old?

"Do you have compensation at hand?"

Would she now know the heights as she had known the depths—the heights of love's hope, love's gain, love's ecstasy? It could hardly be that her anticipations were unreasonable. It was in the nature of things that the one extreme should assure the other. Every night had its day, every winter its spring, every ebbing tide its free full flowing. No, her hope could not be unreasonable. She might cherish it in patience, in the calm and ample region of trust, in the divine strength of faith. The springtide was coming upon the land, it had already come in the heart of Genevieve Bartholomew.

So every budding snowdrop was welcome; and every spear of the daffodil left a new joy. The prophetic littlecelandine, spreading its golden stars to the pale sun, was a thing to be mused over with future

And the rapture was doubly rapturous ■ that it had not to be enjoyed alone. No! Bartholomew's quiet artistic receptivity of the promise that was in the very air was something almost so keen in the silent depths of it. His work was done. He was only waiting now for the decision that was to come through Mr. Montacute, and though he still kept silence Genevieve was beginning to perceive that the waiting was unfortunate. More and more he shrank from any mention of the matter, even to her, yet she perceived that he was brooding over it. The change on his face, the sudden greyness, the sudden strangeness in his eyes, the tightening of the muscles about his mouth ■ any one spoke of it, betrayed the fact that there was yet some hidden dread some fear of further slings and arrows still in the hands of outrageous fortune. As much as possible she remained with him, drawing his attention ■ other and brighter things. And she had the satisfaction of feeling that she was not wholly unsuccessful

One day, it was the last day of January, he had gone down to the studio quite early in the morning, going silently, and with a certain suddenness and when Genevieve went down later she found that he had begun a sketch in oil of a picture he meant to paint on a large scale. The sketch was full of life, and vigour, and pathos. Genevieve saw at a glance that it was the outcome of inspiration, of that fuller and higher light of which her father had spoken so solemnly, and yet so sadly. There was nothing ■ awakened sadness in this sketch of the Good Samaritan. The rough, dark, stony background was indicated. In the foreground there was the Samaritan himself, an elderly rugged figure with no beauty save the beauty of a divine said. They were going homeward in the still starlight.

'Yes,' Bartholomew acknowledged—"I am tired, I am very tired."

"It is partly because of your sleeplessness. If I lie awake for two or three hours I am worried. And you lose whole nights one after another. I wish you did not sleep so badly, father!"

"Then remember your wish dear when you know that I am sleeping better."

The next morning, Sunday morning though it was but January, yet had all the attributes that George Herbert stung so keenly together. It was sweet and cool and calm, and bright—calm—only Sunday morning in the country can be. Assuredly if there be on earth any paradise of heaven it is then and there.

With a new got up early, he had had another night of absolute sleeplessness and the daylight had been welcome, the sweet clear sunshine spreading itself over the hills of the morning was more welcome still. The doves came whirling and wheeling down, there was a sudden flutter of wings against the window-pane, a soft murmur came from the thicket. The sparrows were diving vigorously higher and higher, the snowdrops hung straight and white and still. Down in the village the blue-white smoke was beginning to curl against the red sky.

The mist stunted along the field, it was to be follow this year, Mrs. Craven had decreed, and the weeds among the dead stubble were promising nicely. A daisy or two studied the grassy edges of the furrows, the swallow-wort was still sleeping on the shaly side of the hedgerow near the stile, rich, green, changeable moss were spreading everywhere.

The perfect stillness was broken presently. There was a footstep in the lane, a figure coming up ward from the village. "It is not any one I know," Bartholomew said to himself as a tall dark young man came swiftly nearer. Then the artist turned, sunning, back along the hill until he heard the step upon the path behind him. The young man had a letter in his hand.

"It is from Mr. Montacute," he said politely, giving it to Bartholomew. "I ought to have brought it over last night when I left the office, but when I got home I found my mother ill, and I was not able to leave her. I hope the few hours' delay will make no difference?"

'None at all,' said Mr. Bartholomew, who had hardly heard the explanation. He spoke in a curiously absent way. "It can make no difference. Thank you for bringing it over this morning."

"There is not, of course much time lost," said the young man turning away. Mr. Witherby did not come to the office till yesterday afternoon. Good morning."

For some minutes Bartholomew stood there between Miss Craven's well-known axes holding the unopened note in his hand, looking out across the great stretch of upland sea that was beyond the green cliff tops. Far off in the distance he could see the red tiled roofs of Swarthcliffe beginning to glitter in the morning sun. "Bright blue but lit green brightened," he said to himself. "I wonder that with my truth one would certainly fall into credulity while the word is simply stroke is applied to the scene itself."

Who does not know the way in which thought seems positively to weave itself from some bold momentary thing, and turn to my uncle what it is that my officer itself? There is no great hour of our life that has not its small variations. If you sit by a diving bell you shall see the pattern on the creek and while you wait for the word that is to decide your whole life's fate you shall see gentle blue flowers in the face so distinctly that they become given on your mind's eye for evermore.

A great flood of song from the grey more face by the opposite side seemed to nouse Bartholomew for a moment to remind him that the unopened letter was still in his hand. He looked at it. "Mr. Montacute's handwriting is very excellent, he said turning back again, and sometimes toward the stile."

It was with a hush that he saw in its green picture in the hedge grey more. It hardly stirred its song while Bartholomew passed underneath, going upward between the great dark blue bushes, and the straggling birch sprays where the last year's leaves still lingered in tones of dusky gold and crimson and green. Carewre, looking out from her little window under the thatch was glad to see him going up to the moor—the still Sunday sunshin. "He will come back with some upstate for his bread last this morning," she said as she stood cooling the lengths of her mending golden hair. Presently she pushed the window again, watching in, her father as it drew to watch him by some new and sudden springing of new affection. So she stood till the dark figure went up over the ridge and disappeared in the yellow sunlight that was upon the moulded hills above the sapphire sea.

"The people who watched when Moses went up to the Mount of God must have seen him disappear so the girl said reverently. She was still standing by the window in the thick

If the silence had been just on the hill-side it was sublime upon the heights of Ingharough Moor. The leagues of brown heather stretched darkly away on every side, the stalks of the tall dead weeds stood still and beautiful, thick white brakes broke the monotony of sky and line, the great grey boulders were there, looking white in the sunshine. There was a slight haze upon the far landward distances giving that sense of mystery, of something more than is seen which is necessary to man's fullest enjoyment everywhere.

Burtholomew went slowly onward his foot falling softly upon the tufts of bent grass that were by the side of the stony road. He was walking carefully, as if not wishing to break that solemn stillness. There was not even a bird's song to break it, nor one thread of curling smoke for a sign of human life.

"Certainly this is perfect, Noel Burtholomew said, stopping for a moment on the top of a heathery ridge, beyond which a narrow stony valley sloped to the south-west. The road led across the end of the valley, but the artist turned a little to the left and sat down upon one of the grey squared stones with his feet upon the moss and the small beautiful bent grass that grew between the heather.

The unopened letter was still in his hand. "I wish I could write as well as Monticute does!" he said musingly. "It is a special distinction in a man's life to have a hand writing like that. It is like having a good name, or a reputation for some special skill or art."

Still he did not open the letter. It was sealed, and the seal bore Mr Monticute's crest, a defiant-looking eagle with a scroll in its beak. So far Burtholomew had made no attempt to break the seal. Whatever it might be that deterred him, it was some infinitely strong and prevailing thing.

He was still sitting upon the low grey stone, leaning back against a projecting bunk of heather and grass, among the russet red of the withered heath bells of the year that had been and the pink tipped petals of the one driving now him of the year that now was. He watched the daisy lone, watching it as Dante Rossetti must have watched his "wood-pigeon with the cup of three, red, missing its apparent simplicity, its real complexy, its infinite mystery of being. The little flower with its fringe of petals and its yellow centre was to the full as incomprehensible as the fate that had driven him on. He dreaded the opening of a letter that was certain at least to be written in courteous terms. So thinking he gathered the pink tipped daisy.

Then, at last he essayed to open the letter. Through all other thoughts and enjoyments, and quick vivid impressions, he had been steadily recognising the fact that the moment must come. His face grew rigid to his own consciousness, his grey lips closed firmly, his hand was upon the envelope. . . . What was it that arrested him stayed him? . . . Was it a sudden cry close at hand? It was only a plover's cry, a long sharply wailing note, "Wee yee weee! Wee yee weee!"

After a little while the beautiful thing with its curling crest and its white and green, and blue black feathers, came tumbling by in its swift flight, like a bird with broken wings and uncertain instincts about its destination. Presently there came another and another, and the wailing melancholy cry seemed to come from every part of the lone wide moor, "Wee yee weee! Wee yee weee!"

No other sound could have broken the stillness so gently, and yet have harmonized with it so completely. Burtholomew sat with his thin nervous hand upon the letter, close to him a tall red spiral dock was quivering slightly in the hardly perceptible air that stirred upon the wind. Was there any refreshment in the air for the repaid man who was lying with his head among the withered heather bells? Did he still feel the charm of that wild plaintive cry that was upon the moorland hills about him everywhere?

All through the day the plovers went on crying in the soft sunshine, "Wee yee weee! wee yee weee! wee yee weee!"

CHAPTER XXII — "TILL THE SWIFT OF THE BLUE MOUNTAIN"

The sound of the church bells came pealing across the Marshes as the clock struck ten, bursting upon the still sunny air like a psalm of joy and gladness. Genevieve was out among the snowdrops and the rich, green, bursting leaves of the lilacs. She had thrown a little shawl of cream white wool over her black silk dress, her straw garden hat was in her hand.

"What can he've got the matter?" said Auntie, coming to the door with her surprised eyes more surprised than ever. "Dya think he's gone to the by the hill?"

"That precisely, ■ what I am thinking," Geneva replied, with a sweet, piteous, satisfied smile. "And I am also thinking, that I will come in and have some breakfast, since it ■ too late now to go to church."

The bull fight was soon over, then Genevieve sat down and read the services for the day. ■ was the second morning of the month, and the parties began with a burst of thanksgiving that seemed like an echo of the gladness that had come upon the land with the sound of the pealing bells. The bells had ceased now, silence reigned once more, silence broken only by the rush of wings, and the swelling of sweet, grateful, murmuring hymns.

Then again comes it went out, and wandered up and down from the tiny garden to the stile at the end of the weedy stubble field. No fir touched her, no imputation. The longer her father stayed the more certain was it that he stayed at all by what so came to understand is George's almost childish need to have him, and eagerness to keep him? What so good and pleasant to the imagination as the meeting of those two, her father and—her girl?

That is what he will be doing," she said to herself, sitting down on the top step of the stile. The culm hole was wide open to the sun now. In the evening of the cock in the farmyard at Hains with came the only through the air the jacks were pecking about in the stubble. Far away in the blue distance a few white-sailed ships were seen

"That is what he will always be," she went on saying, "a friend who will help me, and teach me, and make my life fuller and sweeter, and more complete, than a lonely life can ever be." It amazed her now to think how contented she had been with her loneliness—once, how little she had cared for that finer and more perfect sympathy and co-bliss for which she yearned now. She had hardly yet tasted of this greater good, but once had there been an hour of unconscious communion of thought and feeling, of that subtle interchange of the best elements of two natures, that "running of two souls into one, which is the essence of all worthy and valuable human intercourse everywhere. This was yet to be

Genevieve had no doubts now. Up to the measure of her capacity she could judge his. She knew that there was more in him, more of character, of power, of goodness, than he had ever made evident by word or deed. And she was not overestimating him. She had not always counted him perfect. But for this illness of her which had driven her entirely to madness, for forgiveness, it is possible that the marriage she had had might have crystallized and taken form.

She knew that she had blamed him in her own mind for his want of trust and confidence in her, and, now, she had blamed him openly, and had told him openly that he had suffered—suffered in might, she felt to give her credit for that but a glimpse of things which is not always denied to a woman.

And for a long time she had been unable to shake off the effects of that shock she had received in the drawing room at Westcott Lane and thought—the softest thought that had come when George Kirkwood was lying on the border lands of his existence—had all but erased the dark vestige of that day but Constance was making up her mind steadily to a fuller and more complete erasure of all the marks and it seems that that experiment had left

"It will be better to speak of it," she said as she sat there looking up at the little white sunny clouds that were drifting slowly away. "It will be better to tell him that now. I understand, now I see how he would be drawn for awhile to one like that, and then find out that he had been drawn by an illusion that his soul is unconscious, his spirit unflinched, his tower and higher self left untouched than ever. All that I will tell him, and I will ask him to forgive—forgive me, to forgive her. I can forgive her myself now, since God has been so very good."

Yet, even as she sat there, she knew that he had come to her power of forgiveness by his deed—stroke of thought and prayer and meditation. The thing that Diana Richmond had done on that day had seemed so utterly dark when it came to be visible all round, that for a long time no comprehension of it had been possible. Of course General Venable now, she could not help perceiving that Miss Richmond in her attempt to create the impression that an engagement between herself and General still existed, must have been an act of pure undevoience, with no idea behind it that the deed would avail for naught but the production of discord and trouble and the wreck of happiness. And it had been so cleverly done, with such craft and fitness, with so few touches, and these so slight and dexterous, that it could not yet be controverted without shame. Not a word too much had been said, but no word had been omitted that was needful to the full effect Diana Richmond had aimed at. And then the little master stroke of apparent regret fulness, of hesitation of something that was almost sympathy with the grief she was so unwillingly causing—it was impossible to withhold the admiration due to that. The sensation of admiring a strolc directed against one's self is a curious one, and produces permanent embitterment.

As for that other cause of unforgiveness—the return of the two pictures, and all that that deed had entailed—surely the time of grace and condonation had come. Though the end had not been quite touched, and though her father yet had his times of apprehension, it was doubtless a nervous apprehension, a long-born of the just suffering, the just keen humiliation with its painful sequence of shattered nerves and broken health. It could not be that there was any real ill ■ he decided now. Mr Wetherby would come, he would take a few pounds from the purse of each picture for conciliation's sake, and then all the pain and annoyance would be over. There would be nothing that could make any new difficulties in the way of forgiving and forgetting.

So Genevieve Lutholme was thinking as she sat there in the calm Sunday sunshine. It was evident now that her father was going to stay at Uxley for dinner. She knew that there was no one who could have come over with a note or message except old Ben Chulock and it was quite within the possibility of things that Ben would raise some objection if he were asked to go so far for so slight a reason on a Sunday morning. "I consider, my father will be sure that I shall push all it out of it," she said to herself, opening a copy of the "Spiritual Voices," that was lying in her lap, and turning to its pages for that alumn which the soul needs daily as certainly as the body needs the bread by which it lives.

And still upon Langbrough Moor the sun was shining softly, and the weeds and the white daisies were glittering and quivering in the light air. Now and then a bird started in the whin brake, a wood pecker swept by to the far corner, always the plovers went on crying "crying softly, calling wildly, dreading further and further on uneasy, erratic wing. No other sound broke the wondrous stillness as the hours ■ noon went by. The peace that was on the upland was as the peace that ■ in the space between two worlds.

When the shadows were beginning to lengthen a tall dark figure came slowly up between the stunted oak trees that made a landmark on the north-west of the moor—a graceful, noticeable figure, richly dressed, and moving slowly, languidly, as became the languid afternoon.

It was Diana Richmond. What made the Sunday a better day than other days at Uxley (not? What hint of curly training, of hereditary instinct, of striving spirit, prevailed to the point of producing weariness, discomfort, dissatisfaction with all things that were or had been?

Nothing could have been more out of keeping with the dreary barren moorland than the appearance of Miss Richmond as she swept between the sombre whin brakes and the great scoured boulders that seemed to speak so plainly of some ancient cataclysm, some clashing of Nature's strongest forces. They did not speak ■ her, nothing spoke to her up there. The monotony of Langbrough Moor was as the monotony of her own drawing room, and the moor had the disadvantage of being less becoming as a background to a figure dressed with all the finish and elegance that the toilette of a fashionably dressed woman demands. Still there was room to move, and to a woman who can move gracefully movement is a pleasure though there be no witness of her gracefulness. Diana Richmond liked to know that if any one had been there her rich bronze silk dress, with its trimmings of velvet of the same careful colour, was a thing in perfect taste. She liked to watch it changing from green to gold in the sunlight, and descending to a bronzed brown where it fell into shadow, and she was aware that her huge Rembrandt hat, which was made of the same velvet, and trimmed with curling feathers of the same varying tints, was almost a picture of itself. These were new attractions, and they added ■ the old—the old pride, the old pleasure in her own great beauty. Surely to be very beautiful must be to have little left to desire in this world.

It was not always Miss Richmond's opinion, it was not her opinion in this afternoon as she walked alone on the edge of the moorland. Her brother had gone to stay for a few days at Lantland Brooks, where Sir John had lived, who was a widower, and who was—so the world was saying—a warm and much of Miss Richmond. But nothing within her had responded to his admiration so far. "It is strange," she said, half to herself, "it is strange even to myself that I should never have cared truly but for one man, and that that one man should be an insignificant-looking, artful of no particular birth, and no particular attractiveness. It ■ stranger still that I can move him ■ neither love nor hate, to neither liking nor scorn. I have moved other men to all these, but him I cannot touch. If fate should give me the power to crush him to his death, I should not move him from his cold indifference."

"She came nearer, near enough to see the placid, careful look."

She was still sweeping languidly onward over the moor, treading on the little edges of turf, listening to the rustling sound of her silk dress upon the dead yellow bracken. Why should she go onward? Why should she go back? When she stopped a moment on the overhanging brow of the moor, she perceived that she had already gone as far as it would be wise to go with the sun so low upon the purple hills in the distance. She was never now to Uxley Hill than she was to Virell Croft. What if she were to meet George Kulkowild? She had heard that he might go out for a while every day now, if he chose. She had no particular wish to meet him; neither had she any dread of meeting him. A woman who is mistress of the elements can hold her own under any circumstances.

She gave a little sigh as she gathered up some folds of her dress and turned to go. Even an encounter with Kulkowild might have been better than this dreary solitude.

Going back is always dreary when you are alone. Miss Richmond lingered a moment. The little, rough heathway, with the grey boulders all down its sides, seeming as if they must topple over, was close at her left. The low sun caught the upper edge of it, making a margin of gold. Something there, just between the gold and the purple brown, arrested her, something that was lying half into one of the whitest and smoothest of the rough scathed stones.

■ was a figure—certainly it was a dark figure that was lying so starkly there.

It was not far away, and Miss Richmond's sight was good, exceptionally good, though she never confessed it, holding him behind that shortsightedness and blue blood were inseparable concomitants. There was nothing so vulgar, so certainly picturesque, as the ability to recognise a friend across the street.

Nevertheless Diana Richmond smiled as she stood there, though the width of two streets was between her and the friend who had arrested her attention.

She saw plainly that it was none other than Noel Bartholomew, who had fallen asleep in the still sunshine of the Sunday afternoon. So it was that she smiled, wondering in what seemly and graceful and delicate way she might awaken him.

Already she was moving toward him with a sweet, soft smile on her curved lips, a faint blush on her cheek, and a glad subdued light in her beautiful eyes. Perhaps the mere risk of her stolen glimpse upon the withered heather would suffice to awaken him from his sleep.

She came nearer, nearer enough to see the placid, casual look that was most unusual upon the face of the sleeping man. The yellow sunlight lay there upon it, so that no unusual palor was there. Was it the sunlight that made him look so noble, so beautiful so grand? Was it the sunlight that had taken away all trace of care, all record of contact with human lowness, and narrowness, and hardness? Was it the light of this every day sun that had so lifted him, even in waking, so it shone himself, above her recognition of him, above her power of comprehension and appreciation?

Perhaps he might be dreaming. Who could say through what veil is a soul like his might not wander when sleep fixed it for awhile from the bounds of physical existence? Who could say what converse this man's spirit might be holding even as his body lay there upon the barren moor?

Such was the presence of him as he lay that even Diana Richmond was moved to thoughts like these. The complacent smile faded from her lips imperceptibly. She sat down on a stone near him, gently, quietly, as if fearing to awaken him.

Some time she sat watching there. She did not dream once of what he might think if he were to awaken, and find her there by his side. She did not try for one moment to imagine what she should say or do, or how she should look when he awakened.

Long afterwards she knew that from the first moment when she had seen his face, she had had no thought of his awakening. Yet she could never tell when or how her interest into his heart. Was it so? It was so soft a thing, so beautiful and it came so gently. This could not be seen.

Still she sat watching there. The sunlight had left the face, left it in paleness and wininess, but still in great and reverent nobleness. His head was lying back upon the dead heather, the grey hair stirred in the light wind that came like a sigh across the moor. In his hand there was a letter—an unopened letter, and upon it a daisy—one little closed, drooping, pink-tipped daisy.

Presently Miss Richmond, still moving with ■'s gentleness and quietness knelt down by his side. Then she called him softly by his name.

"Will you not speak to me?" she said in a soft whisper, and with lips almost as pillared as the lips before her. 'Will you not speak one word? Will you not let me tell you all the truth? If you will let me tell you all then I will go away. I will never see you any more. I will never vex you any more.'

Then she waited, listened, but the only answer was the cry of a solitary plover far off across the moor.

As she waited she read the superscription on the letter, and she recognised Mr Montacute's handwriting. She herself had received a letter exactly similar in appearance only the evening before. And Diana Richmond recognised more than the lawyer's handwriting. . . . She knelt there as a man might kneel by the friend he had slain by an ill-calculated blow in a moment of sudden anger. She had not the excuse of anger, but the excuse of love. She uttered no cry. She was struck far beyond the display of passionate emotion.

And still the sun went on sinking. It was behind the hill-top now, and darkness was coming up from the dark lone sea. She must do something. What could she do? she asked herself, feeling yet no stir of terror though she was alone there, on Langbarough Moor with one who might not stir nor speak.

At last she touched the hand—the hand near to her that held the devil daisy, and it was a very terrible thing to touch.

When she rose to her feet she reeled as with a sudden fit of seasickness, but the light breeze came with the effect of an ice-cold wind, and she shuddered, and the faintness passed.

She must leave him—leave him lying there, and she must go to Usselly. She was never to George Karkoswald's home than to her own, and some other unrecognised reasonings or rather instincts influenced her to this decision. She would go there, and then—what would happen then? Mrs. Richmond could see no farther at that moment.

She stood awhile with her face buried in her hands, and presently with a great effort she stooped and kissed the broad forehead from which the wind was blowing, the grey hair. Then she took the little withered daisy with its hump stalk, hiding it in her dress as she turned and fled. And as she went the plover cried again upon the moor-land, and the wailing plaintive note followed her like the cry of some dark, accusing spirit whose voice would be in her ears for ever more. All the way by whim brake and brambrie, and down by the pine-woods of Usselly, that cry still came. To her life's end it would come, and it would be full of pain and dark terror, and mingled accusations and threatenings. To her life's end the plover's note would be to her what the scent of the Pearly plant must have been always to those brothers of Florence—a thing that no self-brushment nor other self-inflicted suffering might deprive of its remorseless power.

And while Diana Richmond was hurrying downwards from the moor with white stricken face and tremulous form, Genevieve Bartholomew was leisurely drawing the curtains, and lighting the lamps, and placing her own little table by her father's chair. 'Surely he will come back to me for his cup of afternoon tea she was saying. 'It can never think that Julia's tea is as good as mine. I shall scold him a little when he comes back.'

CHAPTER XIV.—'THITHER OUR PATH LIES WIND WE VI THE HEIGHTS.'

THERE is often something that is both delightful and memorable about the state of convalescence. Men unused to illness and recovery from illness to be bewilderingly pleasant, and are sometimes tempted to make the most of it. For this, however, certain conditions are indispensable. A quiet sunny house between the moor and the sea is good, a comfortable reading chair, and in abundance of books, new and old are good to have perfect peace of mind about your worldly affairs is good, and to know that there is some one whose greater earthly share is your recovery is also good. But even these are not all sufficient. Solitude is yet to fill at such times, and to have no mother or sister, no wife or daughter for your ministering angel, does not tempt you to linger in a state of which the chief delight is the delight of being ministered to. Still even under these conditions, convalescence is not without its satisfactions.

At last, calm Sunday had certainly seemed to George Karkoswald to be—

On a fine day in the month of June.

Though he had not been out of doors he had sat by windows open to the pine woods, and the Murshes and the dark lone, blue sea, where the white swans were sitting. Sea-gulls had come up, flapping by on heavy wing resting in great flocks upon the newly ploughed lands, busy sparrows were darting about the gardens with swift unanimous whirr, the white-edged holly trees shone out against the ancient yew, the first soft, sweet thrush note came up from the boughs of the mulberry tree, and at times a tiny wren piped as he flew from shrub to shrub on the green terraces.

To be able to be quite still, listening, thinking, dreaming, yielding to the influence of the day and the hour, is to attain one of the highest peaks of earthly felicity. Wordsworth attained it, and, what is more, he kept it, lived in it. That is the secret of his charm for us who are hurrying through the burden and heat of the day, and to whom the pumrose by the river's brim is not even a yellow pumrose, but the incho of a great political party.

All the forenoon George had tried to read, in the afternoon he had permitted himself to write a letter—the first letter he had written to Genevieve Bartholomew.

For days past the yearning to write, to pour out all that he had to say, had been growing within him. He told himself that it would be both better and easier to write than to wait and speak face to face. He could express himself, his love, his sorrow, his hope, more fully if he might put them all on paper, and he was just in the mood to do it now. His illness had been like a sharp dividing line in his life. On the one side there were all the old mistakes, the old sufferings, the old temptations. The one good thing on that side was the day in Birking Gull, and the influence of that day was above and outside the line that severed all else. Nothing that had happened had really lessened or impaired it. He knew that now—he had known it through his illness. Even in his saddest and most desponding moments Genevieve's face had come before him just as he had seen it last on that evening when he had spoken of going abroad. The sudden pallor, the sudden silence, the sudden intense yet subdued emotion had had more meaning for him later than at the time. And he could never forget the look that had been on her face and in her eyes when he had said, with a twofold meaning in his words—

"Shall I come down again, Miss Bartholomew?"

And she had replied—

"Yes, come again before you go away."

Even as she spoke he had known that her generous, truthful words had prevented his going at all, and he had known also that this was not the most they had done. Her simple desire, so simply expressed, had meant a thousand things to him since then, and each one of them was as precious as it was nameless and undefined. All this, and more, was behind the mood that he was in as he sat there writing, pouring out his highest and best and most passionate aspirations with the full certainty that they would be understood and responded to "The worst of days, yet told you nothing"

he said, thinking he was near the end of his letter. But that was a long way from the end. Not till the light began to fade, and Jael came in with a cup of tea and a put of candles, was the envelope sealed and put ready for Noel Bartholomew to take down to Netherbrink the next day.

This was hardly done when the heavy knocker sounded upon the hall door, clanging with a wild impetuosity that was strangely startling on such a day, and at such an hour. George rose to his feet as by an impulse of alarm, and Jael and old Ben went to the door together. The dim passages seemed to be filled with a great and sudden dread.

From the door of his own room George Kirkoswald saw that it was Miss Richmond who stood there in the dark blue twilight.

"What is it?" he said gently, going up to her, taking her hand, and drawing her into the house. "What has happened? Some one is ill. Come in here—into my study. You are ill yourself. Pray come in!"

For a moment Diana only looked into his face with eyes set in terror, and pallid lips that tried to speak, and could not. Her features were distorted, her hair was dropping down over her dress, her hands were clasped tightly together. Words came at last, broken, imploring, half coherent words.

"Send them," she said. "Send your people to the moor. . . . You will let them bring him here? . . . You will let them bring him to your house?"

"It is your brother?" George said, placing her in a chair, and standing by her, ready to soothe and support her if he might. "It is Cecil? Is he ill? Whereabouts on the moor is he? But I will go myself, and you shall stay here. Tell me, if you can, exactly where he is?"

"It is not Cecil," Miss Richmond said, with increase of consciousness, increase of agony in her expression. "It is not Cecil. . . . I could wish that it were. . . . It is—it is Noel Bartholomew. It is he. And he is dead. He is lying there alone. And he is dead!"

No response was made. A minute or two later George Kirkoswald and Charlock went hurrying up to the top of Langbaugh Moor in the still evening together. The young crescent moon was hanging in the clear sky:

her growing loneliness. The one great deal that seemed to be taking root was the deal that some change, some eclipse, had come upon George Kirkowald. This was but natural, and it was consistent. If there was any darker deal it would surely be kept behind.

Still the time went on. The young moon sank over the edge of Lambhough Moor, the gusts swept up the leafy Blushes, the night clock ticked loudly, monotonously. Would anything break that strange stillness, that hush of silence?

At ten at last, there was a footstep on the still held. Someone drew the curtain back so as to throw a light outside.

then she ran to the door and stood peering into the darkness made visible.

It is you my father? It is you? she cried, with the gleam of a little child, and holding out her two white hands to the dark figure that was coming nearer. It had come, and was coming, a little child with a strong knickerbocker and was holding her into the house understanding, putting all her sudden silence, but with a wonder and a joy.

"You did not expect to see me my child?" Canon Graham said, speaking with a new and grave gentleness. "But come in, dear, come in. The evening is very chill, come in doors."

THE STORY OF JOHN WYCLIF

By PHILIP A. J. MICHIELL D.D. St. Anne's

I.—HIS LIFE AND DEATH.

IN the extreme north of the great county of York, on the bank of the winding Eas, just below its junction with the Great Ouse, there rises a rocky wood-crowned height with a small stone manor-house on its southern slope. The soil to have within its wooden shell remains to this day in an almost unimpaired state. It bears the name of Wyke or Water Cell, and it is said to be the neighbourhood of a little fish, who took to the church with that roof in its covered walls is situated on the green sward by the river side. According to tradition it was in the parish church in its old manor house or in the now extinct and old Wyke well that John De Wyclif, one of England's greatest sons, first put his mind to the Christian teaching—first saw the light, in this modern factory is now to be found one of the most authentic portraits of him, and in the church the old features, "pure, calm, firm, and strong, and manly smile, which we find in all acquainted with his story. His old biographers have named 1324 as the year of his birth, but more recent and careful investigators have come to the conclusion that this date must have taken place some years sooner, certainly not later than 1320. Of his early training nothing definite is known, but, in all probability, he received the rudiments of his education from the parish priest or family chaplain. In the fourteenth century youths seem to have gone up to the English Universities at an earlier age than is now customary and to have been left to acquire there some of the branches which now they would be expected to master before leaving school. The biographers suppose that he was in his fifteenth or sixteenth year when Wyclif left the home of his childhood and some of them will have it that it never to revisit it. But we cannot think that its scenery and language, and the Saxon speech, would have been so deeply engrained on his memory as his writings show them to have been, if he had finally left it at so early a date, nor that anything but then it for a good while after occurred which could lead him back to it with such a confidence from one of such talent and promise.

The College at Oxford where the young Wyclif began his studies and the foundation of his future eminence was probably that of Balliol. It had been founded for northern students by a family living in the same district as his own, and numbered among its alumni in the first half of the century more than one of the name of Wyclif. And although continued in it till he took his degree in 1345, some will have it till he took his degree in 1345. But the facts brought to light by Lechler seem to show that at the time Balliol Hall was but a poor and small school that its alumni, however they might have distinguished themselves were expected after taking their degree to leave and find their own way.

At Balliol College it was that one of the best known in the University and had long been favoured with a race of gifted teachers and alumni. Eusebius, John Scotus, Oecum, Basil, the Preceptor of Edward III, the astronomer, and Bradwardine the physicist found neither in and theologian, had given to it a renown in all the more important studies of their age though it was distinctively a southern college we can hardly think that it a northerner—and to none of our scholastic studies incomparable, would have been refused admittance to it then, any more than Duns Scotus in the previous century. We think that Lichfield is right in identifying the John Wyclif, who was sent to Merton in 1366 with our Reformers and not with Wycliffe of Wyke. And if he did not enter to enjoy as Bradwardine supposed the predictions of Bradwardine, he was there while that great teacher lived in the memories of his pupils, and was so indoctrinated in his principles that to the last there was no one to whom in theology of man he came nearer than the profound author of the De civitate Dei contra Iulianum. In this congenial society he extended his knowledge of mathematics and astronomy, which the universities of civil even and English law and prosecuted with all the ardour of his soul the study of scholastic philosophy and theology. Then too it was not until after his death he was brought practically under the influence of the truth as it is in Jesus. Even though we may not ascribe to him the tract on 'The Last Age of the Church' we cannot doubt that the mysterious visitation which swept away nearly half the population of England roused him, as it did many, to more serious thought. He may have passed through no such crisis as Augustine, Bradwardine or Luther but the strings of a life higher than that of intellect had begun and were more and more to show their reality and power.

The theologians with whose writings Wyclif then became acquainted were, besides Bradwardine, the four Doctors of the Latin Church and Grosseteste of Lincoln, who wrote a notable treatise against the errors of the Averroists and contended both in Oxford and his diocese of Lincoln against the corruption and decay of the friars. How far in after life he may have become acquainted with Lewis Howmans Vernon, or its author, who strove as hard by his poetry as Wyclif by his teaching and preaching, to formulate the Christian truth and righteousness we do not know. There is one however whose work as a preacher and a translator of Scripture was more similar to his own and who, as that work was carried on in the very district of Yorkshire to which he belonged, and even yet he had left it, can hardly have been unknown to him. This was Richard Rolle, termed the Hermit of Hampole, from his residence in that monastery in his later years, but who has lately been shown to have passed the earlier years of his life as a hermit and lay preacher in Richmondshire, traversing the district visiting the sick, consoling the sorrowing and bereaved, assisting in the services of the church, and preaching, as he had opportunity the unsearchable riches of Christ with winning tenderness and in it was so evangelical that the orthodox who looked upon him as a saint affirmed that evil men of Holy Trinity had corrupted his writings after his death.

II—HIS YEARS OF LITURGICAL WORK AT OXFORD

The period which followed the completion of his studies was probably the happiest, and certainly not the least useful in Wyclif's eventful life. In it he comes more clearly into view. In 1361 he is found in the honourable office of Warden of Balliol Hall and before the close of the year he was presented by the Fellows of the rectory of Wykeham, in the diocese of Lincoln. The appointment was not meant to draw him away from the University but to enable him to prosecute his work in it with greater comfort, and he generally continued to reside at Oxford, and to give himself with thorough devotedness to the work of teaching in the schools and preaching in the pulpit. Teichler to whom we owe by far the best biography of him, tells us that thirty-eight of his Latin sermons still preserved MSS., belong to this period of his life when he was mainly occupied with those philosophic studies the results of which he embodied in several large treatises still also preserved in manuscript. According to his account it was some time between 1363 and 1366 that he took the degree in theology which then constituted the only right to teach or profess that science in its full compass. From that time onward he occupied himself exclusively with the teaching of it in its scholastic as well as in its biblical form and possibly for the benefit of his students, he drew up the first outlines of the two great theological works the "Liber primus" and the "Liber secundus" which he was only able to elaborate and put into final shape towards the close of his laborious life. Hecker also inclined to hold that he began, in an earlier period of his academic life than is generally supposed to gather round him a band of devoted scholars, who went through the logical course of that day under his guidance, and were afterwards either returned to aid him in academic work, or were sent out into the surrounding dioceses, benevolently and clad in long russet robe, as travelling preachers to supply the deficiencies of the secular priests, and to preach simpler and more living Christianity than was then current among the wandering friars. In the first life of its existence, it is what he says that the members of the band were men who had passed through a University exam, and been admitted to priests' orders. They may have been coarse in manners and of humble attainments in that was the case with too many of the ordinary priesthood in that age, but they were in earnest about religion and communicated their views by their varied manner to those who were so. At a later period when the hostility of the bishops was avowed, it is likely that they were generally laymen and resembled more closely the lay preachers of the ancient Waldenses and modern Methodists and possibly, like the former they confined themselves in their addresses to the reading and explaining of Scripture and so gave occasion to their founder from time to time to prepare translations of detached parts of the New Testament and expository discourses on them.

For some years after resigning the Wardenship of Ely the Reformer had occupied himself in Queens College but in 1375 he removed to Canterbury Hall where, then selected as Warden by the founder, when he deemed it necessary to make some changes in the original constitution of the house. Some of the ruthless antagonists of the old traditions regarding him will have it that in this case his biographers have confounded him with his well-known namesake already mentioned. But all reliable information goes to prove that Wycliffe of Mayfield was not a person of any eminence, or one who had taken any academic degree, unless possibly that of Bachelor of Arts. The references in the Reformer's own writings, as well as the testimony of his contemporaries, Wodeford and the monk who compiled the "St Albans Chronicle," suffice to settle the matter of fact beyond all question. Still one may hesitate to accept the assertion of the latter that it was because of the rich and heretical opinions he ventilated that he was afterwards ejected from the office, no less than the insinuation of the former that it was because of his rejection that he soon after committed himself to opinions at variance with the teaching of the Church. The Reformer was not permitted long to enjoy this new office in peace. After the death of his patron, the displaced monks applied to the new Archbishop of Canterbury, and Wycliffe had to engage in a long and harassing contest, first in the Archbishop's Court and then in that of the Pope, in defence of his position. Events, of a more public nature, too, about the same time forced him from the academic seclusion in which hitherto he had been content to live and work.

III—HIS WORK AS A LAYMAN AND POLITICIAN

The year 1363, observed as a sort of jubilee in honour of the completion of the sixtieth year of the reigning sovereign, was a very notable one in the history of Edward III and his chivalrous sons. The Black Prince, were then in the height of his glory. Their victories in France had won for them nearly a third of that far famed island also had again been humbled and three suppliant kings were then at the English court. But to hold the conquests that had been gained overtaxed the resources of the kingdom and the concluding decade of Edward's reign was as disastrous as the preceding period had been glorious. Misfortune followed on misfortune till almost all was lost that could be lost. Its naval power, on which especially the country depended, it received a blow from which it did not recover for a long time to come. The crisis however, served in a singular degree to call forth the national feeling and to unite all ranks—sovereign and subject, Norman and Saxon, yeoman, burglar, and peasant—in defence of the national unity and independence against the insolent claims and exactions of the Papal Court at Avignon, and some of the state ecclesiastical at home who made common cause with it. Wyclif was forced to the forefront as the representative of this national uprising. He grasped ■ no other did its real meaning, set it resolutely on an unfeasible basis, and laboured with might and main to carry it to all its legitimate results.

Three stages may be noted in the struggle then begun. The first—in 1365 and 1366—was mainly directed against the claims of the French pope. Either enraged by the renewal of the statutes of provisors and premonition, or presuming on the waning fortunes of the king, he presented a demand for the tribute promised by King John, when he disgracefully consented to hold his kingdom as a fief of the Holy See. The Parliament, whose advice the king took care ■ solicit in this grave emergency, replied with unanimity that "neither King John nor any other king had power to place his realm and people under such thidom without consent of Parliament, which had neither been asked nor given," and they determined that if the Pope should attempt by formal process or in any other way to enforce his claim, he should be resisted by king and people with all their puissance. Lohier supposes that Wyclif was a member of this Parliament, either as representing his University or the clergy of his Archdeaconry, or as the Predicator clarissimus, summoned to give advice to the council or the Parliament in the emergency. However that may be, it admits of no question that he was challenged by name to defend the action of the king and Parliament by an anonymous monk who ventured to assail it. He courageously accepted the challenge, and it is admitted by one who is no indiscriminate admirer of his action, that he displayed in his answer "intability of a sound logician, the learning of an educated lawyer, with the theologian's reverence for the 'Church' of which he professed himself an obedient son. He adroitly shifted from his own shoulders the main burden of argument and laid it on those of the temporal Lords, whose reasonings in the recent Parliament he professed simply to report. The reasonings, whether real or imaginary, were vigorous, and in all respects worthy of the descendants of the bold barons who had stood for their liberties even against their sovereign, and were not likely to yield to a priest what they had refused to him.

The second stage in the struggle came in 1371, when the Parliament argued the conduct of the Lords spiritual themselves, and complained that not content with their ecclesiastical offices and benefices, they engrossed ■ themselves all the more important offices of state to the injury of the laity, and the alienation of their own minds from the proper duties of their sacred calling. They were not really ministers of Christ, watching over the souls entrusted to their care, but "Lawyers, statesmen, and architects in this disguise, with a large share of the votes of the laymen and nobles with whom they mingled," yet left in great measure free from the burdens of military service and taxation which at that time pressed so heavily on these. And so while they deprived the laity of offices which more fairly belonged to them, other prelates, with nominal dioceses in partibus infidelium, had to be sent out by the Pope who, instead of going ■ preach the gospel and act as pastors there, to live and if need be, to die for Christ, "hopped about ■ England to hallow men's altars and creep among curators and confess people against the law," and to supply the lack of services on the part of their immediate chief pastors.

According to the author of "Piers Plowman's Vision," who was a vigorous labourer in the same cause as the Reformer—

I was bi soþ that I se the way bi that he scholden be a churche prelate to sepe to how him self bi the lord's liche, that in Trinity he sholden And the lord's liche bi the good lord's liche, where at he scholden

There were noble exceptions ■ the prevalent degeneracy in a British udine and a Fitz Ralph, and some in humbler places. But, as Langland hints, there were too many priests and prelates "emblaunched with fair words, and with fair clothes, and as lambs they looked, and as wolves they lyven." Wyclif attacks them still more scathingly. In one treatise he adverts to the incompatibility of such offices with the teaching of the fathers, the apostles, and our Lord himself, and in another he testifies that such occupations interfered with habits of devotion, thoughtful ness and study, so that preaching of the gospel, visitation of the afflicted, and relieving of the poor, were neglected, and they themselves became so steeped in worldliness as ■ be utterly disqualified for relinquishing it in others. The practice had grown up in time of ignorance, and had been allowed to increase while the barons were with the king and the Prince in France exposing themselves to peril and danger in the service of their country, and it was surely reasonable that on their return they should look for that share of the honours and emoluments of the state which naturally belonged to them. The movement, it has been said, was premature, but ■ was a righteous one, and sure in the end to be adopted, and it would have been for the interest of the Church itself that its rulers should not obstruct or delay it, as for a long time they did.

The third stage of the struggle was reached in 1376-77. The Duke of Lancaster having failed in his conduct of the war, and the country being exhausted by its long continuance, a truce was agreed on between France and England, and commissioners from both countries met at Bruges ■ treat of the conditions of a permanent peace. Commissioners were also sent ■ negotiate with the representative of the Pope for an official remedy to the grievances of which the nation had so often complained in vain. The issue of our Reformer at this second on the list of these commissioners. This was the only opportunity he had of coming into closer acquaintance with ecclesiastics who were high in the confidence of the Pope, and his biographers will have it that his visit to this great council of Northern Europe was to him what his visit to Rome was to Luther. At all events he was but partially successful in his negotiations and soon returned home ■ affirm more confidently than ever that "the proud worldly priest of Rome was the most cursed of clippers and purse-knivers." At Bruges he formed or strengthened his acquaintance with the Duke of Lancaster and probably ■ owed to him the only further preferments he received—the prebend of Aust in the church of Westbury and the Rectory of Lutterworth, where his last days were spent.

In the Parliament of 1376 advantage was taken of the duke's absence and unpopularity to form a coalition against him. The clerical party so far yielded ■ the convictions of the Commons as ■ join in a remonstrance against the Papal exactions and provisions, in return for which they secured their end in removing from office some of the most obnoxious of the Duke's friends and joining some of themselves with him ■ the Council of Regency. But soon after his return he regained his influence, and though the Parliament continued to be termed the good Parliament, but little permanent good came of it, in restraining the appointment of aliens to benefices.

SHILLAND AND ITS PEOPLE.

By SIR RICHARD RAMSAY.

TWO o'clock in the morning but it is as bright as day. The sea is like a sheet of burnished glass. The sky is clear and unclouded. A rosy light increasing every moment gilds the top of the distant hills. Over earth, sea, and sky has fallen a silence deep as death, broken only by the monotonous splash ■ our steambot's paddles or the plaintive cry of a solitary gull flying low across the surface ■ the water. From the deck of the good ship St Magnus we watch the fast enlarging landscape. We have left the Lurels, with its traditions of the wreck of the Spanish Armada, far behind. We have come safely through the seething waters of Sunburg Shoal. We have passed the island ■ Mouse, with its Pictish Broch like a gigantic dice box. Before us is the fishman's light, now red now white, of Kirkabister lighthouse. On the other side of the bay, and a little to the left, the knob ■ conical mass of weathered rock and sun-browned verdure, guards the entrance to Lerwick harbour, and right athwart our bows, the dun light in their windows twinkling as if only half awake, are the grey gables and towering chimneys of the houses of the new town of Lerwick. A few minutes later and the house-tow of the steam wharf and the noise of the falling water indicate our arrival in Lerwick Sound.

We are lying in an apparently land-locked bay, formed by the island of Lerwick and the mainland, within whose spacious harbour—it is nearly three miles long and from a mile to a mile and a half in width—the most formidable naval armament that the world ever saw might find ample room and verge enough.

Fleets of all nations have ere now covered its waters. Here lay King ■ Olaf Hakonson with the navy of Norway, on the unfortunate expedition which terminated in his defeat ■ Largs in 1263. Twice in the seventeenth century, in 1653 and again in 1655, two English fleets, the one of ninety-four and the other of ninety-two sail, have rusted within ■. In 1861 ■ was visited by the Channel Fleet, in 1883 by the Reserve Squadron and summer after summer for centuries, in gradually decreasing numbers it must be confessed, the Dutch fishing fleet has enlivened its waters with brown-sailed busses and gaudily painted "booms" and sturdy luggers, from

and drying in the sunshine. Once a great battle was fought here. In the summer of 1640 a convoy of four Dutch men-of-war was lying in the Sound, awaiting the return of their spice fleet from the East Indies, when it was suddenly pounced upon by a formidable flotilla of ten Spanish vessels. A terrible fight ensued. Two of the Dutchmen were sunk, another was run ashore and blown up by her crew, the fourth fell into the hands of the enemy. On two other occasions the Dutch fishing fleet was burned by the French within its waters, and once—it was in 1778—it was said a suspicious looking craft was seen making for its entrance, whose rakish appearance and saucy bearing excited the strongest apprehensions in the Lerwickers' minds. Nor were their fears lessened when they discovered that it was the celebrated privateer Paul Jones himself, at that time the scourge and terror of all the British coast. As the news spread the whole inhabitants of the little town—they numbered barely a thousand—turned out to see the stranger. The lumbering old cannon of the fort, not yet known by the name of Fort Charlotte, which had been placed there by Oliver Cromwell, and the rusty guns of the battery were got into readiness ■ give him a warm reception, and all the women in the town, in scarlet petticoats of Shetland "wadmal," flocked to the knab to gratify their curiosity—perhaps, also, to be out of danger's way. But as they gazed and better gazed the brig was seen to slacken sail, then all of a sudden she tacked about, and before the astonished islanders could make out what she was after she was off with a fair breeze to the south. To this day it is believed that it was the women's scarlet petticoats that did it. Paul Jones had mistaken them for brave soldiers of King George, and had thought twice before attacking so strongly garrisoned a port.

In 1831 the first steam vessel appeared off the Shetland coast, causing great alarm to the islanders, who not unnaturally took it for a ship on fire. It was not, however, till fifteen years later that the secluded inhabitants of the more northern islands were first introduced to vessels propelled by steam. "In the summer of 1847," says Dr. Cowie, in his excellent "Guide ■ Shetland," "the late Mr Arthur Anderson, then candidate for the representation of the county, entered a certain vote in Yell in his steam-yacht. Some noise was occasioned by blowing off steam. Two unsophisticated islanders, who were engaged picking herring on the sea-shore, surveyed the fire ship in blank astonishment. At length the more strong-minded of the two handed his snuff horn ■ his terrified companion, with the exhortation, 'Oit Jamie, Junie, tik doo a snuff, for doo'll snuff nae mair wi' me till we snuff together in glory.' He had concluded the next day of wrath had come, and thit on board the steamer was the angel blowing the last trumpet."

But now, with steam communication with Scotland thrice a week in summer and twice in winter, and a little regular local steamer, even on the more round the islands, during into boys and voices and cracks, the ideas of the islanders have expanded. And with the spread of enlightenment and education has been developed a spirit of emulation, self-reliance, and emulation, which is not the least remarkable of the characteristics of the new Shetland, which is fast obliterating all the landmarks of the past.

Nowhere, perhaps, is this progress more visible than in the town of Lerwick itself. Originally a trading port of the Dutch fishing-fleet, its first house was built only two hundred years ago. In 1800 its population was

1,300, in 1881 it counted 3,854 inhabitants. With its main streets paved with Bressay flags, its steep lanes, crowded with houses, leading to the newer town on the Hill Head, its shops hung with Fair Isle hosiery, and with never a carriage or any wheeled vehicle larger than a country mail gig, rumbling over its stony streets, the appearance of Lerwick may fairly be classed as ■ unique. It more closely resembles a foreign town, Reykjavik in Iceland, or some out of the-way bourg in the Netherlands. As for its street scenes they are without a parallel in any other part of her Majesty's dominions. Shaggy ponies, bearing straw panniers, called "musics," laden with potatoes and poultry, eggs, and other country produce, wobble on ■ double under huge baskets of peats, their heads covered with dirty shawls, and their iron feet encased in sandals of untanned hide called "mylins," knitting, like their waters of Jerico, industriously as they go, others, with smudged "kayaks," from out of one of which peeps the fur-haired head of a child, whilst from another emerge the lower legs of a new born calf, seen with circular nets over their shoulders, on their way to the Docks to fish for sillocks, here a group of fishermen in tarpaulin suits and sou'wester hats calmly smoking their pipes while their women unload the boat, and attach it to the wharf, there a crowd ■ bare-legged children, boys and girls, playing cricket with three stones for wickets, in the middle of the highway. Anon, a herd of native sheep, black, white, grey, and ■ moor, coming into town to be shipped on board the St. Magnus, or a flock of geese, stalking gravely across the path of the passer-by, or a band of scavenger ducks jacking up the garbage from the gutters of the side walks. Then the soft patens of the natives, the use of du and deu for thou and thee, and yet and nay for yes and no in ordinary conversation, the Norse names above the shop doors, the keen, clear cut features of the men, and the refined beauty of many of the children, all these things give a Scandinavian colouring to the scene, which like the odour of peat-smoke which pervades the whole, is not displeasing to the southern tourist. The truth is, that despite the four hundred years that have attached them to the crown of Scotland, the Shetlanders are still Norse to the core. Old Norse customs still prevail, old Norse words form the basis of their speech. The names of their lochs and farms and hills and valleys are Norse. There are as many sæters in the Shetland place-names as in Norway itself. Gards, dales, names and wicks are as common in the one country as in the other. Even the name of the principal town, Lerwick, the Clay-bay, the name is that of an existing Norwegian village.

The inherent Scandinavism of the Shetlander which leads him to revere the appellation of Scotchman, and to cherish in secret the old customs and superstitions of his ancestors, asserts itself yearly in the high jinks with which he continues to honour the old Holy days of Yule. Until within the last two or three years he pertinaciously adhered to the old style in his observance of these festivities. On Christmas Eve, New Year's Eve and Upshy - the twenty-fourth day after Yule and that on which the H. h. or holly is supposed to be 'up' - the youths of Lerwick uttered in fantastic dresses go guising about the town in ban is visiting their friends and acquaintances and re-producing in miniature the carnival of more southern climes. On one or other of these occasions a torchlight procession forms part of the revelry. Formerly the torches were directed about the town and afterwards, with the first break of morning, were carried into the sea. But this ancient and dangerous custom is very properly been discontinued. The dresses of the dancers are often of the most expensive and magnificent description. Highlanders, Spanish cavaliers, negro minstrels, soldiers in the peaked caps, heavy more breeches and velvet coats turned up with buff of the reign of George II. Robin Hood and Maid Marian, we find in the motley throng. Some with boldness worthy of Aristotle places himself en route the dress the walk or some other eccentricity of leading person ages in the town others - for the spirit of "the Happy Land" has reached these hyperborean regions - make pleasant game of well known political characters. Each band of guisers has its leader, who walks before it playing "scallow is I see" or "the Foul Head" or "the Nip in Grund" or some other archaic tune. Thus conducted and blowing a horn to give notice of their approach, the makers enter the doors of all houses which they find open dance a measure with the inmates, partake of and offer refreshment, and then depart to repeat the same courtesies elsewhere. At daylight the horn of the Most Worthy Grand Guiser, a mysterious personage whose personality and functions are enveloped in the deepest concealment, is heard summoning all the bands to end their revels, and when, in the cold gray dawn of the winter morning, the worthy citizens of Lerwick awake to pursue their wonted vocations, not a trace remains of the saturnalia of the night before.

How it happens that in a busy, bustling, go-ahead place like Lerwick, these vestiges of long bygone years can still exist and flourish, is only to be accounted for by the immense hold which they retain upon the affections of every true and well-hearted Shetlander. In the rural districts, of course, where the wear and tear of life is so small that centenarianism is a matter of every day occurrence, old customs, old superstitions and old prejudices are as natural as the lichens which cover the weathered rocks, and the mosses that grow on the roof of the crofter's cottage. Every district in Shetland has its own peculiarities as well as its own nickname. The Westside people are called by Low in his Low to be the most superstitious in the Islands. The fishermen of the old villages are to be found amongst the 'pevie' (small) birds of Haddister. The Currimshutth folk are 'by all accounts the wildest in Shetland,' and their inhospitability was in 1771 - the stigma has long since been removed proverbially. "It's mink in the chimney, but light on the heath," was the formula by which they were wont to inform a guest that he had overstayed his welcome. In Puffinbour, till within the last thirty or forty years, the swan dance, described by Sir Walter Scott in his 'Puffin', was regularly performed during the winter evenings. In Unst - the garden of Shetland - a sort of circular dance in which a dozen persons held each other by the hand while "one of the company sang a Norn Visick," was a common diversion of the 'dist dills' of Christmas. As for the inhabitants of Foula - the Isle of Lacuna - the most secluded of all the hundred islands which compose the Shetland Archipelago, towards the end of the last century their language was still Norse. Even at the present day many of old Scandinavian songs and rhymes which have long ago been forgotten by all but the successors of Norna of the Fiftal Heul, are yet to be found amongst them. "Most or all of these tales are relative to the history of Norway, they seem to know little of the rest of Europe but by name, Norwegian transactions they have at their finger-ends." Not more than a generation ago, the favourite amusement of these islanders on the Sunday afternoon was "putting the stone"

* C. 1845. Low's Low through Orkney and Shetland in 1845.

While the young men made trial of their strength in the arena sat by as spectators encouraging the competitors like the riotous types in the States by "reciting the want matches and in true heroic style lamenting the degeneracy of their sons." If these poor Ioula men were Norsemen and Pagans at heart the fault, certainly, did not lie with them. They never saw a clergyman oftener than once or twice in the year. They are better off now, having a resident catechist of their own. They hardly ever saw a stranger, when they did they scarcely knew how much to make of him. In yesteryear and his company in with fish, fish, mill, butter and eggs, and when he offered to pay for what they had received they were much distressed and I told me no such thing ever happened in the island as to pry for eatable. The sole industry, up to a recent period was collecting the feathers and eggs of the myriads of wild fowl from which the island derived its name. With a rope fastened to his waist the fowler was lowered by his companions some thirty or fifty fathoms down the face of the cliff. It was as dangerous a trade as that of the rampart gatherer of Dover. But the Ioula man was bred up from his infancy to look upon death as falling over the cliffs as his natural lot. "My father gave it in for me, my butcher (grandfather) gave it before him and I must expect to go over the Sinking too," he would say. And over the Sinking, a fact which he would almost as a matter of course one day finally do up for.

All fishing communities are superstitious but the Shetlander has in addition added to his in his Norse descent. Old myths still linger in out of the way localities, influencing the motions and moulding the conduct of many a fisher family. I say such as the Iliad, the Kalevala, of Odin and the Arthur Knight song or Nightingale Incantation of which Dr John Leyden in his Compliments of Scotland, had only "heard two lines that were made the subject them of speculation by mythologists," we yet handed down by oral tradition from mother to son.

As for the domestic superstitions of the Shetlanders, they are of precisely the same type as those found in other isolated and uneducated communities. A belief in trows, elves, mermen, and mermaidens is universal. Writings and portents receive implicit credence. Many of the survivors of the great storm of 20th July, 1851, assert that they saw their safety in the wrappings they had received. A woman washing her husband's clothes in a burn sees his trousers fill with water, and infers from that an intimation of his approaching death.

The last executions for witchcraft in Shetland were in the beginning of the last century, when Lubara Tulloch and her daughter Ellen King were burned alive on the Gallows of Scalloway. A famous "vizard" of former days who shared the same fate, was known by the name of Luggie, and dwelt on a little hill called the Knop of Kibister, a few miles north of Lerwick. "Like his countrymen in modern days," says Dr Cowie, "he drew his harvest from the sea, but, unlike them, the calling exposed him to none of the dangers of the deep." For whenever he wanted fish he dropped his line through a hole in the knoe, and drew up his fish really cooked at some subterranean fire.

This, says Druid, the worthy missionary of 1700 "was certainly done by the agency of evil spirits, with whom he was in contact and covenant, but the economy of the Kingdom of Darkness is very wonderful, and little known to us." Spey wives and dealers in charms and incantations still ply a roving trade. There are drunken old hags in Lerwick itself who earn their livelihood by imposing upon the credulity of ignorant sailors and silly servant girls.

The influence of the evil eye is as well known in Shetland as in other parts of the world. But to run an evil tongue in the same category of magic potency is a refinement in superstition unknown to the folk lore of the majority of people. "Nobody must praise a child or anything they get a value on for if anything evil afterwards befalls it, this will be attributed to the tongue that spoke of it. This was called 'fore speaking' and persons so foretold could only be loosed from their enchantment by being washed in a water of which the collection is kept a profound secret. A relic of Paganry seems to linger in the superstition which formerly restrained some of the lower classes from eating or drinking on Sunday after divine service. But it is difficult to find either rhyme or reason for the belief that, if two infants that have got no teeth meet in the same room, one of them will die immediately after. To have one's way crossed, particularly by the minister when you go a fishing is reckoned unlucky. At funerals in the country districts it was usual to lift three cloths and fling them one by one after the corpse. Many of the old people

Old Zeilund must be admitted as infinitely more picturesque than modern Shetland. It is difficult for even the most imaginative of minds to invest with an air of romance such prosaic bodies and personages as parochial boards, commissioners of police, inspectors of poor and the modern school board dominate. Even the parish minister of modern times lacks that racy flavour, the talent of the soil, which made his predecessor of seventy or eighty years ago the prophet, priest and king of his district. As for the predecessor of the period, he is a colourless creature compared to his forerunner of the last generation. A quaint story is told of one of these worthies in an outlying district of the Mainland. There had been a wreck, and as the cargo was a valuable one, a diver had been sent for from the south. He and his diving bell, an invention which had never before been seen, were objects of the greatest curiosity to all the country side. The diver himself was a good looking young fellow and he speedily captivated the heart of the local heiress, who insisted, much to the chagrin of her family, on marrying him. Accordingly, one Sunday when the congregation were assembled in the kirk of Lunnasting, the preacher rose to publish the banns. 'Silence,' he cried, 'in the kirk of Lunnasting! There is a purpose of marriage atwixt us' (our) 'Juddy of I —' and —' (naming the diver), 'dooker and diver and he of contriver o' that wonderfu' thing the in jine.

If those halcyon conditions of life which Sir Walter Scott has idealised and exaggerated in the "Ivanhoe," ever indeed existed, no trace of them can be found in our more refined and certainly more practical days.

* He is seen at the bottom right and the walls of the larger proportions were always dignified by the courtesy of the lady.

that they made sufficient work and did not impose upon any in their prices. Lastly, they were admonished that as they were entrusted with a power of inspecting the lives and manners of others, so their own lives and conversation should be exemplars for good, and "take care" added the Act, with a simple and solemn earnestness that his "flavour of the antique world," "that you are not found guilty of these faults yourselves that you be called to reprove in others, if you should, your punishment shall be double to theirs."

Records such as these almost better than any laboured description what manner of men the tithers and grandfathers of the present race of Shetlanders were. They do more. They throw light upon some of the most marked characteristics of the present generation. They reflect the simplicity, the truthfulness, the hospitality, the kindness of their disposition, their law-abiding nature, their respect for all in authority, their affection for their "Old Rock," its habits, its customs and its traditions. They reflect also their vices, their indolence, thriftlessness and untruthfulness—vices, which perhaps the stranger who commences his visit to Shetland to Lerwick and its neighbourhood alone, may not readily perceive, but which are not unknown in the less explored districts of the country. Yet such vices are to be laid to the charge of the Shetland crofter, we must make ample allowance for the centuries of oppression of which it has been the victim crushed by monopolists, the thrall of the demoniacal rack system, overburdened and burdened with debt to landlord and to merchant, it is to his honour that it can still be alleged that now, as in the past, crime is almost unknown in the Shetland Islands.

THE PARSON'S COMFORTER.

A Photograph from Life.

THE parson goes about his duty with
With all the parish world in his hand
And he has faith out and in and in Beside the sufferer's chair, the dying bed

"Whether the secret sickness may be Doubt, drink, or debt—that keeps within his lay,
When parson comes the owner turns the key
And lets him out to "squeak and gibber there."

■ seems a possibility unguessed—
Or little borne in mind, if hardly known—
That he who cheers in trouble all the rest
May now and then have troubles of his own.

Alas! God knows, he has his lot to fight,
His closet atom, severe and grim,
All others claim his comfort as of right,
But, hapless parson! who shall comfort him?

A friend he has to whom he may repair
(Besides that One who carries all our grief)
And when his load is more than he can bear
He seeks his comforter, and finds relief.

He finds a cottage, very poor and small,
The meanest tenement where all we mean,
Yet decency and order mark it all—
The panes are bright, the step severely clean.

He left the lurch—his comforter is there
To sit in the bed, where now for weeks he sits
Or haphazard lying in her chair,
If this be one of those rare "better days."

A tiny woman, stunted, bent and thin,
Her features sharp with pain that always wakes
The nimble hand she holds the needles in
I wiped and wrenched by rheumatic aches.

Sometimes she gets a grateful change of pain,
Sometimes for half a day she quits her bed,
And—lying sitting, cradled to be I grieve—
Alas! she knits her needle up her back.

Too well she knows what 'tis a meal to miss,
Often the gate has not a coal of fire,
So his no hope of better things than this
The future darkens, suffering grows more drear.

Where will they take her, if betide ■ should
Her stiffened hand the needles cannot ply?
Not to the workhouse—God is very good,
He knows her weakness—He will let her die.

Sometimes, but seldom, neighbours hear her moan,

Wrung by some sudden stress of fiercer
pain,

Often they hear her pray, but none has known,

No single soul has heard her lips complain

The parson enters, and a gracious smile
Over the poor pinched features brightly grows,

She lets the needles rest a little while Your kindly welcome, sir! —ah! that he knows

He takes the book, and opens at the place—
No need to ask her which her favourite psalm

And as he reads, upon her tortured face
There comes a holy rapture, deep and calm

She murmurs softly with him as he reads
(She can repeat the Psalter through it all)
' His face is in green pastures, and He lies,
He leads me forth beside the waters still

Yet, through death's shadowy valley though
I tread,

I will not fear for Thou dost show the way
Thy holy oil is poured upon my head,
Thy living kindness follows me for aye'

The readings done, and now the prayer is said

He bids farewell, and leaves her to her psalm,

But grace and blessing on his soul are shed—
He goes forth comforted and strong again

He takes his way on divers errands bound,
Able to plead, and wain, and comfort wounds,

That is the darkest house on all his round,
And yet he sure, the happyest house he knows

Will it not ease, poor soul, thy restless bed,
And make thee more content if that can be
To know that from thy suffering, him is shed
That comforts him who comes to comfort thee?

SUNDAY READINGS

NOVEMBER 2ND

■ 11a. m. s. v. 11 1 11 — 11

THE works of God are usually accomplished by slow processes. Few, if any, great results either in the natural or spiritual world, are ever rapidly attained.
Doubtless God, by a mere stroke of omni-potence, could at once have created this globe completely prepared to the use of human history. Yet by no such instantaneous act of the Almighty Will was this accomplished, but by gradual changes, stretching throughout vast cycles. Nay those things in nature which seem to be sudden are but the resulting effects of causes long at work. The lightning flash reveals the store of electricity which has been long accumulating in the atmosphere.

We find the same slow method of working in the history of redemption. After the full of man the progress was gradual up to the incarnation of Christ. And by no single stroke of omnipotence, but by the same long and complicated action of a multitude of forces, is the final fruition of God's glorious kingdom on earth being now attained.

Now, what holds true of the material world and of the history of the Church applies equally to the growth of individual character.

For the grand result of spiritual perfection is inconceivably higher and more one which necessarily implies more of slow culture than the forming of a star or the development of any physical organism. Undoubtedly it may be said that God's omnipotence could make a sinner become a full grown saint at once, and, by an arbitrary stroke of power, render slow growth unnecessary. But it never has been so. No one by a single bound leaps into a fully developed condition either of sin or holiness. The beginning of the true life may be sudden, but never its increase. We are first 'babes in Christ' but of the most advanced saint the world has ever seen it can be said,— 'It doth not yet appear what he shall be.'

St. John puts the beginning and the end together, both before us. 'Now are we the sons of God,' and the end is, 'We shall be like Jesus Christ.' Between that beginning and end there is a wide gulf, but the true measure of the Christian heritage is to be found in its fruition. Just as the mature tree represents best the real value of the seedling, so it is only when we look to the ideal of son

God must mean something more spiritual intimate, and personal than could be bestowed by any external possession, such is the heritage of all this wondrous universe of order and beauty. To possess God must also imply more than authority over nature for any atheist or deist might claim such mastery over physical law as to be able to wield its forces for his own purposes. Still further while it may be true that none except the pure in heart can possess the richness of earth and sky, the taste that joy in the beauty of common things which is denied to the hindered and deprived, yet it would be too narrow an interpretation of St Paul's wish to apply them even to this enjoyment of external glory. All such heritages may or may not belong to the child of God, but it is evident that the bestowal of countless wealth would not express what he meant. That which St Paul emphatically connects with our being "sons of God" is not the possession of what is external, but of God Himself, and he explains his statement by pointing to Christ and saying, "we are joint-heirs with Him." He thereby teaches us that even in Christ Jesus God so loved us that He gave us a share in His own possession of all things, and in His own glory.

[illegible]

And if when we make St Paul's statement more clearly we insist how is it possible to go to God? How can the creature possess the Creator or the finite possess the Infinite?

Now there are two senses in which we can call another person 'ours'. There is the sense in which the master holds his slave, or the parent can control the child. It was in this external sense that Pil is possessed 'Christ when he asked, 'Knowest thou not that I have power to cleanse thee, and have power to release thee?' So too did Nero to see St Paul when the apostle lay chained in Rome. They each held their victim in their hands. Yet in neither case was there any true possession of Christ or of St Paul. Nero might have kept Christ in chains for years, but as long as there was mutual integrity, no external circumstance could give him possession of the Divine.

It is other sense in which we can possess a person is through love, whereby we have sympathetic apprehension of what they are. It was in this sense St Paul possessed Christ when he said, "To me to live is Christ," "The love of Christ has compassed me" when "I was crucified and wounded in love, he was able 'to come in and dwell with all saints what is the breadth and length and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge" and so was "filled with all the fulness of God." For love is the solvent which unites soul with soul. From his loving sympathy nature interpenetrates nature and the light leaps out to the night, and one person can possess another. It is in this way that we can understand the closeness of the connection, it children, then he says "Through childlike love St John has seen God and found in that possession his eternal life. It is through such love, ever seeking more and more of the Divine love, that the saints possess God for ever. They are continually being led into fuller realization of His unsearchable riches and into a deeper apprehension of His glory."

It is in the light of such thoughts that we can also understand the negative statement of St Paul, "If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of His." There is no eternal good for man, and that is to know God and to be in fellowship with the ever living righteousness, truth, and love. And there is only one way of reaching that good and that is by our becoming little children, possessing the life of Sonship as it is in Christ Jesus. That his Jesus came to the world to be a son and there is but one condition for its reception - to all who receive Him, to them gives He power to become sons of God."

NOVI MI LI 2360

I did not call to see you.

It is said of the living creature in the Book of Revelation, which seem to represent creation, that ' they rest not day fathers with it hesitation. Among the many reasons for this humane instinct which prevails we believe that one of the chief causes is to be found in the change that has passed over the theology of the country. At one time it was the sovereignty of God—His power and His pleasure—which was chiefly considered. Now there is the higher conception of the Divine character as determining the exercise of His sovereignty. It is not His arbitrary power but the righteous law that wields the power which we are called to love. Sometimes, however, we feel that even more trouble on this dark question of the future which leaves us at a lack of thoughtfulness. The difficulties that surround it cannot unfortunately be swept away at the bidding of mere cautious sentiment.

Our own very wishes are very decidedly on the side of the larger hope. As we fall back on Him whose name is love we believe that all that is possible will be done in eternity as well as in time for the well-being of every creature and that instead of the greatest pain it will be the least which is consistent with the order of the universe that will be inflicted. In this light we recognise with thankfulness the hints which occur in Scripture of a time when "God shall be all in all," and when every enemy shall have been destroyed, and when "all things," both which are in heaven and on earth, shall have been "gathered together in Christ." We also recognise with gratitude the clearer conceptions we have gained in modern times of the term "eternity" as implied by the Evangelists.

Nevertheless it is well to recognise the true difficulties of the question independent of those connected with the interpretation of texts.

(1) We have no difficulty in rejecting that popular conception of future punishment which rejects infinite and eternal torment as being the penalty fixed by God for some definite act or acts of sin done in this life. It would be easy to illustrate the dreadful applications which may be made of such views. Quotations might be adduced of things said and written by good men regarding the persons who were thus to suffer—ignorant children and even non-talking infants—which could not fail to shock us. But no one surely who thinks seriously on such a subject can believe that the principle on which God acts is to calculate the verdict of an unending existence in ceaseless and unspeakable torment on every one found guilty of certain transgressions or omissions in this brief life below. All that is best in us, and therefore all that is in us most like God Himself, rises in rebellion against so hideous a creed. Were this so, we would have little difficulty in denying the possibility of such principles determining the destiny of any man, woman, or child.

(2) But the real difficulty lies elsewhere, and lies not in the eternity of punishment but in the continuance of sin. When we contemplate him of whose name we must accept the risk of his choosing, evil instead of good. He does so in this life. We see him growing worse in this world, in spite of every deterring influence. Is it not at least conceivable that such a career may continue? Putting a free agent, man cannot be treated as a mere thing or be moulded as a piece of clay is shaped. And if man does reject evil instead of good and if he resists every influence which would lead to repentance, then, as long as that condition lasts he must carry with him his own hell. It is conceivable that there should be "a place of repentance" found even for such a man in some time in the infinite future, no less is it at least conceivable that having successfully resisted God for so long he may do so for ever. In view of such considerations, we ought humbly and reverently to express our hopes, without indulging in will as criterion as to what we think "must be," because we have formed a picture to ourselves of what we deem the universe ought to be. Living in God's world here we are met by too many terrible facts of sin and consequent misery, and of men huddling themselves against His will to warrant our constructing on merely antecedent reasoning the vision of an absolutely happy universe eternally, with a genuine dogmatism that there is no room for any hesitation in acknowledging the necessity for universal redemption.

(3) Nevertheless, while recognising these difficulties, I think we are permitted to fall back with reverent hearts on the "larger hope" of "a resurrection of all things." We know that the Lord reigns, and all His acts are done in righteousness and truth. We also know that His name is love and that we cannot meet the possibilities which that name implies. We see, even in the material history of the universe from lower to higher types, that a few of progress towards perfection everywhere prevail. So that, if clouds and darkness do curtain the sky, we may yet look hopefully to the far horizon, and catch with gladness the gleams where God may be making for Himself "an awful rose of dawn." Buffed as we may be by difficulties, yet it is surely allowable to yield to the instinct of that Christian love which He Himself has kindled, and if we can do no more, we can at least cast our burden upon Him—

If I lay with one we get a lot of care
Lay all the day down like a star,
If I sleep the darkness up to God!

LIFE AND LETTERS BY THE SEA-SIDE.

IN SPRING

IV.—WITH THE SEASWIMMERS

A SAD tragedy took place last night we hear,—the mother Mackerel was shot! We had seen her often upon the beach with her tiny brood behind her, coming swiftly and stealthily from side to side. No one had told us with her on the beach, but yesterday she had made up her mind to take her little ones down the stream to the sea and she had been discovered by some rustic sportsman who had violently taken and there brought her maternal solitudes to a close. Would the little warts be able to shift for themselves? How did they feel in the great, but unknown world, as they landed in among the rushes without guide or guidance? Would they all die of hunger and frost, while waiting in vain for the mother who does not return? Possibly these and similar reflections did not occur to the mind of the enterprising sportsman—more to the pity.

And yet, to do him justice, the man was not much worse than his neighbours, I dare say. It is hard to justify sport, but Mr. Ruskin is quite wrong, in his passionate invective against sportsmen. We know that fishing and shooting do not hinder the heart or scar the conscience, and that in point of fact the most violent sportsmen are to be found among the most tender-hearted men. To be logical and consistent, no doubt they ought to be cruel and blood-thirsty, but fortunately, as Mr. Ruskin knows human nature is susceptible of refinement and splendidly inconsistent. It is not merely that they do not let their wives or swear at their mothers-in-law, then kindness is possible, not merely that Wilton and Charles St. John in modern times have the most direct and cable sympathy with the innocent creatures of wood and field, and river. Yet what their blood is up—may even in cold blood—they think no more of flushing a trout or stalking a stag than does the merest Red Indian. I never knew a more gentle, or sweeter nature than St. John's, and I venture to say that the books of that delightful writer are the soundest and healthiest reading we can give our boys. If they imbibe his spirit they will learn how to reconcile what appear at first sight to be inconsistent qualities—how it is possible even in sport, to be high-minded and charitable. For sport is on things and things rather, and instead of shooting the poor maternal Mackerel, St. John would have watched her precious journey down the stream with infinite sympathy and delight, and given her a helping hand if he could. And how the debt was and the pleasant costly wiles of the little goans were would have sparkled in his eyes!

There is not a breath of rain in the sky, not a single musc-tail even, not a hawk or a cock to fly, could a trout be tempted to rise, so we put our rods aside and wander down to the beach. It is a pleasant shore—the yellowest of yellow sand, brown granite and then the cool fresh, intense blue of the sea. The oyster-catcher sits with shrill whistle round the point the warbler whistles further out. One, two, three, four herons are visible at intervals like sentinels along the beach, each at his favourite post. With hoarse croak the chorine Diver now develops a note of some purer and mellower in slow slipping pinions, the unruly gulls are as we approach. I do not love the heron, it seems to me that there is something cynical and sad in his expression—a natural none the less which expression has only served to confirm. But the sand-piper, and the oyster-catcher, and even the curlew, with their ridiculously long bills (which, one would fancy, must be immensely in the way of anything like familiar intercourse or close friendship) seem in all rather agreeable and delightful society.

Push the boat out and we shall make our way to the Delectable Island in the middle of the Sound. It is a long pull, but the skiff is light as an egg-shell, and the tide runs strongly with us. As we cross the bay a wharf is struttled from the shore and comes just within range. A soap shot brings him down—quite an event for the wharf is the shyest and warriest of birds. Our Delectable Islands are merely a few jagged reefs of grey, weather-beaten rock, with patches of coarse grass, upon which a populous colony of the black-headed tern have established their nurseries. The nests (if nests they can be called) are now empty, and only one or two downy little mouse's are to be found, lurking among the long grass. The whole colony, young and old, are on the wing, and wheel continuously round our heads. Between the islands the tide runs like a river—a famous fishing-ground for siltie and lither. But the only fish at present is a round fish, inquisitive and who persistently follows the boat until we are a cuttle over his head. Then he darts away, and we see him no more. There are a lovely party of half a dozen oyster-catchers on the outermost reef and is the luckiest of our party needs specimen for stuffing, a shot is fired. And a curious thing happens (for the terns almost patch themselves into our faces), one falls upon the water. But he is only wounded, and when we approach to pick him up dives is a duck or a quillmot would drive a quill into the surface after a few intervals of a hundred yards off. I had never heard of the oyster-catcher (who is not one of the web-footed race) diving in this manner, and it was a surprise to us all. Is it possible that extremity of fear suddenly develops a dormant talent? We fired at him again but he eluded with the boat and a third cuttle was needed before we cornered him. The oyster-catcher is a little bit like a duck—has a white, and black bell, effectively against the blue of sea or sky.

By this time the day was beginning to wane. We had plunged into the clear darkling water, in all directions, and then we hoisted our misty umbrellas (for a fresh breeze had risen at the twilight fell) and drifted back leisurely to the mainland. It was a perfect night, dry and fragrant upon the summit of Ben More, but the shadows had gathered round about us. There was not a sound, save the occasional wail of a cuckoo passing high overhead, or the twitter of a belated sand-piper.

Yet even on such a night there is not I think a shadow cast upon the sea. For the ocean is never at rest and the beating of its mighty heart is visible in the deepest calm. Deep calls unto deep. There is surely something strangely impressive in an ever-living ebb and flow which, like the swing of the pendulum, is adjusted with delicate nicety and absolute precision. But this chronometer that beats through the ages—was it set agoing once for all at the beginning, or is it periodically wound up? The will of mortal men did it, or it will, shall, or it may lay it to sleep. There is the fact—make of it what we like. For my own part I do not think this Greek or Latin sage, I reach Renan or English Matthew Arnold has said anything much better about the mystery than was said by the Shakspearean obscure Irish tribe thousands of years ago. Our New Testament is very beautiful but there are glimpses of insight, flashes of inspiration, in the Old, which, considering the time and the people, are even more surprising—especially from a purely literary point of view. The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath thee thou shalt find arms. How did Moses rise to this height? All round about there was darkness—thick darkness—darkness that might be felt. Yet on one favoured spot the light was absolute and unconditioned. May we not say that it is this intense imaginative vision that is the unique element in the only history of the chosen people?

The newspapers have varied during our voyage and what between Egypt itself and the more than Egyptian darkness of the press, the prospect of the Monarchy we thought to be the extreme. The British Constitution is on its last legs. Is it so? Whether indeed we have lost the faculty for government ourselves and what which our fathers possessed remains to be seen. But the end must come some time. We cannot hope to see up the party which has ruled, one after the other, the ruling races of the world. Meantime, however, there are big cuts in Moris, and the Atlantic ebbs and flows through the sand and is it did before the British Constitution was set up, and as it will continue to do after it is taken down and put away in the museum where we keep our antiquities. What shadows we are and what shall we be? So the great Mr Burke remarked, but Mr Burke lived before the British Police Bill was passed, and with the British Police Bill positive history begins. Shadows indeed! when we have a telegraph wire round the globe, and a telephone next door, and the whole little globe is the universe ready for us every morning with our muffins. There are grand lakes everywhere and in every age, but even the Mummy who had helped to raise the Pyramid was forced to confess with a blush that his countrymen had no knowledge of Ponnener's lozenges or the under-the-pill.

It is no wonder will reflect the eye sees a world of things, and the ear hears a world of things, and the mind thinks a world of things, and the heart feels a world of things, and the soul is a world of things.

THE STUDY WINDOW.

A Summer Song

WELCOME, welcome, green leaves, so discreetly hiding
Neighbours' prying glances, curious gossip sidling,
Once more come to screen' me with your sunny arms,
Shut out all prying, peeps that fret and harass!

Welcome, welcome, green leaves, Nature's airy curtain!
Now indeed I feel alone, privacy is certain,
Veiled my study window, from keen looks pursued,
None but little birds to peep and see what I am doing!

All day long they flutter round this upper story,
While my neighbours' chestnuts make a July glory
I let them peep and welcome, humkiss their spying,
Little wiser are they, certes, for their prying

Welcome, welcome, green leaves, best gut of the summer!
Hid from quizzing neighbours, now I'm in good-humour,
Now the pen moves freely till October scatters
All these green defences, rends my curtain into tatters!

A Lullaby Song

S NOW FLAKES, soft &
Window and pane,
Come now and screen me
From eyes watching keenly Shut out the neighbours
Lying my labours,
Let none get an inkling
Of what I'm thinking
My pen move in languor,
Dash off in anger,
Poetic minds fire me,
Great crises inspire me,
And the sparrows only
Watch the student lonely,
Twitter and chatter,
And say, "What's the matter?"

AMONG THE TRAPPISTS.

3. Gilmore ■ Life at Le Port de Salut

BA SICHON GENERAL II I COMFY*

THE monastic order of Trappists—a branch of the Cistercians—possesses monasteries in many parts of Europe, one, composed of German brethren being in Turkey. Some of these establishments are for cultural or industrial associations, others are reformatories for juvenile delinquents, while some have been instituted for effecting works that might be dangerous to health and life, such as draining marshy lands where the fatal malarial broods.

The Monastery of La Trappe du Port de Salut the subject of the present description is situated near the village of L'Armeny, at L'Armeny, on the river Mayenne, on the borders of Maine Anjou, and Brittany. Its site has been most picturesquely chosen in a charming nook, where the stream having rapidly passed through some rocky cliffs suddenly expands, and flows slowly through rich pasture lands. With its church, farms, water mill, cattle sheds, gardens, and orchards, the whole settlement looks like a blanketed surround with an enclosure (d'ence) marking the limits of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. A narrow passage between two high walls leads to the entrance gate, bearing the inscription "Hic est Portus Salutis — Hic est the haven of safety." A long chain with iron rings for a handle being pulled and a bell rung, a porter opens a wicket, bows his head down to his knees—the obligatory salutation of the Trappist—and in silence awaits the visitor's interrogation. The latter may have come simply from curiosity, or he may be a traveller seeking, for shelter and hospitality, a better taking than, or even a wrong, does in search of an asylum. He may be rich or poor, Christian, Jew or Mohammedan—no matter! the porter at once grants admittance, conducts him to the guests' reception room, and summons the hostler.

A monk in white robes appears, his head shaven with the exception of a ring of hair. He bows to the porter. If the visitor only contemplates a stay of a few hours no formality is gone through, a meal and refreshments are offered, and he is conducted over the monastery. But if he proposes to sleep there the monk whose rules are considered that every guest has been guided to the place by our Lord Himself, says, "I must worship in your person Jesus Christ, suffering and asking hospitality, pray do not heed what I am about to do." He then falls prostrate on the ground, and so remains for a short time in silent devotion. After this he leads the way to the adjoining room, and it must be the visitor to write his name in a book open here, as elsewhere in France for the inspection of the police. The entry made the father hostler (as he is called) tells from "The Institution of Jesus Christ the first passage that attracts his eye. In the case of our informant was 'I come to you, my son because you have called me.' But whatever the text may be he tells 'I' of these words form the subject of your meditations during your stay at La Trappe.

The Communauté is the name of the monks' private building, where no strangers are permitted to penetrate, except by special permission and accompanied by a father. Absolute silence is prescribed save during the times of religious service, and the visitor is warned that in his tour round the community he is to keep quiet, and make the sign of the cross when in a place where he sees his companion do so. This proceeding would at first sight seem to exclude from the monastery all non-Roman Catholics. The member of any religious communion, however, is welcome, provided he pays a certain deference to the rules, and as the Trappist guide walks in silence and never turns round to observe how his guest engaged, all derelictions in minor matters are purposely allowed to escape his notice. Were it otherwise he would at once rebuke his step, lead the way to the entrance door, show the visitor out, and without uttering a single word, bow and leave him there.

The church is a part of the Communauté, and is plain in architecture and simple in ornamentation. Here it is that each Trappist is brought to die. Whenever any monk is in the throes of death an assistant of the hospital runs about the monastery striking with a stick on a board. At that well known summons the brethren flock to the church, where their dying brother has been already laid on ashes strewn on the stones in the shape of a cross, and covered with a bundle of straw. A solemn joy lights up every face, and the Trappist passes away amid the thanks giving of his companions who envy his happiness. It is the finis coronat opus of his life work.

The Trappist must always be ready for the grave, and as he is to be buried in his religious vestments, so he is bound to sleep in those same vestments, even to the extent of keeping his shoes on. The dormitory is common to all the abbot included. The beds are made of quilted straw, as hard as a board, and are supported by a wooden partition, without doors, reaching more than half way to the ceiling. There is not the least distinction of accommodation. The Superior rests not more luxuriously than the brethren. Because equality rules here is elsewhere in the monastery. For La Trappe is a republic governed by a Chapter, the abbot being only the executive for all temporal affairs, not wielding absolute power in spiritual matters alone. But although he holds authority from the see of Rome yet he is elected by the brethren who may if they choose elect the humblest official of the monastery. There are no mental occupations in the world esteems them outside the abbey, as though of the order. The commonest duties may be performed by monks of the highest social rank.

The Chapter House answers the double purpose of a hall for meetings and of a reading room. The Chapter assembles daily at 8 A.M.—the fathers in their white gowns, the brethren in their brown ones—in order to discuss any matter, temporal or spiritual, interesting to the general community. When the secular business of the day has been gone through the abbot says, 'Let us speak concerning our rules, implying that any delinquencies which may have occurred during the past twenty-four hours are to be considered.' Then all the monks in succession, as they may have occasion, accuse themselves of any neglect even the most trivial. One may say, 'Reverend Father, addressing the abbot, 'I accidentally dropped my tool when working,' another, 'I did not bow low enough when Brother Joseph passed me,' a third, 'I saw that Brother Antony carried a load that was too heavy, and I did not assist him.' These and suchlike self-accusations may seem puerile but they lead up to the preservation of some of the essential precepts of the order, unmitigated attention while at labour, deferential demeanour and Christian courtesy towards brethren.

But if any brother may have omitted to mention delinquencies of which he himself was not aware it then devolves upon his companions, with the view of maintaining rules, on the observance of which the happiness of all is concerned, to state to the abbot what those faults may have been. For instance, one will say, 'When Brother Simon comes to the Chapter he sometimes forgets to make the sign for the brethren who stood up on his arrival to sit down again and yesterday Brother Peter remained standing for one hour, until another brother came in and made the sign to be seated.' Thus warned Brother Simon rises and kisses the inferior, thinking him in this way for kindly reproving him. These accusations are considered by the brethren as showing their zeal for reciprocal improvement.

The Trappist is bound to make the abbot acquainted at once with everything that occurs within the precinct of the monastery, and minutes of the most trifling and sometimes even ludicrous nature must be repeated without delay. To the same end, and in private must also be communicated those confessions in which personal feelings—even against himself—are concerned. To quote a single instance. It once so happened that a brother of Le Port du Salut took a dislike to Dom H.M., the abbot, and came to tell him of it.

Reverend Father I am very unhappy."

"Why so, brother?"

"Reverend Father, I cannot bear the sight of you."

"Why so?"

"I do not know, but when I see you I feel hatred towards you, and it destroys my peace of mind."

"It is a temptation on its face, but not wise, then any other, replied the abbot, 'be it what it may, do not heed it and whenever you feel as you say, come at once and tell me and especially warn me if I say or do anything that displeases you.'

The common belief that Trappists never speak is altogether erroneous. They do speak at stated times and under certain conditions, and they make use besides of most expressive signs each of which is symbolic. Thus joining the fingers of both hands at a right angle, imitating as it does the roof of a house, means house touching the forehead signifies the affliction the chin is stigma, the heart, a brother the eyes to sleep, and so on with some hundreds of like signs invented by Abbe de Rance, the founder of the order. Trappists converse in this manner with amazing rapidity, and may be heard laughing heartily at the comicality of a story told entirely by signs. Strange to say, there is no austere gloom about the Trappist. His face invariably bears the stamp of serenity, often that of half-subdued gaiety. The life he leads is nevertheless a very hard one. No fire is allowed in the winter except in the chauffon or stove room, and thence the monks are permitted during excessive cold weather to come in for fifteen minutes only, the man nearest the stove yielding his place to the new-comer. The chauffon and the hospital are the only artificially heated apartments in the building.

The Trappist takes but one meal and a slight refreshment per day. He is the strictest of all vegetarians, for he is not allowed to partake of any other food except milk and cheese. From the 14th of September to the Saturday in Passion week, he must not even touch milk. Vegetables cooked in water with a little salt, together with some cider apples, pears and almonds, being all that is permitted him, and during that long period he takes food but once daily. The diet is not precisely the same in all monasteries, certain modifications being authorised, according to the produce of the monastic lands. Thus at Le Port du Salut they brew and drink beer, and at other places where wine is made, they use that in very limited quantities, largely diluted with water.

Trappists wait in turn at table upon their brethren. No one, not even the abbot, is to ask for anything for himself, but each monk is bound to see that those seated on either side of him get everything they are entitled to, and to give notice of any omission by giving a slight tap upon the table and pointing with the finger to the neglected brother.

Any monk arriving in the refectory after grace prostrates himself in the middle of the room and remains there until the abbot knocks with a small hammer and thus liberates him. A graver punishment is inflicted now and again at the conclusion of dinner. The culprit, so called, lies flat on the stones across the doorway, and each brother and guest is compelled to step over him as he makes his exit. I say guest advisedly, for it is the privilege of all who receive hospitality at La Trappe to dine once—not oftener—in the monks' refectory. During meals one of the brotherhood reads aloud, in accordance with Cistercian practice.

The dinner at Le Port du Salut consists generally of vegetable soup, salad without oil, whole meal bread, cheese, and a modicum of light beer. Though the cooking is of the plainest description the quality of the vegetables is excellent, and the cheese has become quite famous. The meal never lasts longer than twenty minutes, and when over, all remaining scraps are distributed to the poor assembled at the gate. Six hundred pounds weight of bread and several casks of soup are also distributed weekly, besides what the abbot may send to any sick person in the vicinity.

The ailing Trappist is allowed to indulge in what is called Je Soulagement, viz two eggs taken early in the morning. Cases of very severe illness, and when under medical treatment in the hospital, animal food may be used, but the attachment to rules is so great that the authority of the Superiors has frequently to be exercised in order to enforce the doctor's prescription. In the words of Father Martin, the attendant of the hospital, "When a Trappist consents to eat meat he is at death's very door."

The cemetery is surrounded on all sides by the buildings of the Communauté, so that from every window the monks may see their last resting place. The graves are indicated by a slight rising of the grass and by a cross bearing the saint's name assumed by the brother on his profession. Nothing else is recorded save his age and the date of his death. Three-score years and ten seem to be the minimum of life at La Trappe, and astonishing as this longevity may appear prima facie, it is more so when one considers that the vocation of most postulants has been determined by a desire to separate themselves from a world, in which they had previously lost their peace of soul and their bodily health.

Under the regularity of monastic life, its labour, its tranquillity, and either despite the severity of the diet or in virtue of it, it is wonderful how soon the debilitated and feeble become restored to health. Out of fifteen novices, statistics show that only one remains to be what is called a profès, the other fourteen leaving the monastery before the expiration of two years. A touching custom may be here mentioned. Trappists are told in their Chapter meeting, "Brethren, one of us has lost a father (or any other relation), let us pray for the departed soul." But none know the name of the bereft brother.

After having taken vows as a profès the Trappist holds a co-proprietorship in the buildings and lands of the association and must live and die in the monastery. Death is his goal and best hope. In order to remind him of it, a grave is always ready in the cemetery; but the belief is altogether erroneous that each Trappist digs his own grave. When the earth yawning for the dead has been filled another pit is opened by any one ordered for the task. Each Trappist then comes and prays by the side of this grave which may be his own. Neither do Trappists when they meet each other say, "Brother, we must die," as is also generally accredited to them. This is, we think, the salute of the disciples of Bruno at La Grande Chartreuse.

The farm buildings of Le Port du Salut are many and various, including sheds for cattle, a corn mill, and looms for the manufacture of the woollen and cotton clothing the monks wear. There is much land, outside as well as inside the walls of the precinct, which the monks cultivate, and they may be often seen in their full robes, despite the heat of the summer, working steadily in the fields, and the abbot hapier than any of them.

During the twenty-four hours of an ordinary working day the Trappist is thus employed. He rises generally at two A.M., but on feast days at midnight or one o'clock in the morning according to the importance of the festival. He immediately goes to church, which is shrouded in darkness, except the light that glimmers from the small lamps perpetually burning before the altar in all Roman Catholic churches. The first service continues until three o'clock, at that hour and with the last words of the hymn all the monks prostrate themselves on the stones and remain in silent meditation during thirty minutes. The nave is then lighted and the chants are resumed until five A.M., when masses commence. The number of hours given to liturgic offices is, on an average, seven per day. Singing, but in a peculiar way, forms a part of the worship. All the musical notes are long and of equal duration, and this because the Trappist must sing hymns "for the love of God, and not for his own delectation." Moreover, he must exert his voice to its utmost, and this being prolonged at intervals during seven hours per diem proves a greater fatigue than even manual labour.

The distribution of the labour takes place every day under the superintendence of the abbot, the prior, and the cellérier, the last-named official having the care of all the temporalities of the place, and being permitted, like the Superior, to hold intercourse with the outer world. The cellérier stands isolated in the same relation to the monastery as does a supercargo to a ship.

Labour is regular or occasional. To the first the brethren are absolutely appointed, and their work is every day the same, the latter, which is mainly agricultural, is allotted by the Superior according to age, physical condition, and aptitude, but it is imperative that every monk must participate in manual labour. Even a guest may, if he pleases, claim what is considered as a privilege, three hours of work a day.

After dinner the Trappist gives one hour to rest, but the maximum never exceeds seven hours, and on feast days is materially reduced by earlier rising. The mid-day siesta over, labour continues until a quarter to six o'clock, which is the hour of refectory. Then comes the last religious office of the day, the "Salve Regina," at which guests as well as brethren are expected to assist. The last word of the hymn at this service is the last word of the day. It is called "The Time of the Great Silence." Monks and guests then leave the church, smothering the sound of their footsteps as much as possible, and nonekely return to their respective resting-places, but are put out, except in case of special permission of the abbot, and a death-like quiet and gloom reigns everywhere throughout the habitation.

The life of guests at Le Port du Salut differs from that of a Trappist. There is a parlour, common to all, with a fire burning in it during winter, but each one sleeps in a separate cell, and has three meals a day; he may eat eggs from Easter until September, and have his vegetables cooked with butter. Last, though not least, his wants are attended to, and his cell swept and cleaned by the father and the brother of the household, who are also at liberty to hold conversation with him.

A guest may stay in the monastery for three days without giving any particulars of himself, for fourteen days if he chooses to disclose who and what he is, and for as much as three months if his circumstances seem to need it. After that time, if he be poor, he may be sent away to another monastery at the cost of the senders; but the abbot is free to extend a guest's visit to any duration.

Trappists are most useful citizens. They perform, per head, more labour than any farmer; they expend upon their own maintenance the very minimum necessary to support existence; they undertake, at the cost of then lives, works of great public utility, such as the draining of the extensive marshes of Les Dombes, in the south of France, and of La Medouja, at Staoueli, near Algiers, which they are converting into fruitful fields. As horticulturists, agriculturists, dairy-men, millers, and breeders of cattle they are unrivalled, for men whose faith is that to work is to pray, cannot fail to excel those with whom work is, if even necessary, a tiresome obligation. Lastly, in ■ new establishments, the Trappist only considers his monastery founded when a dead brother has taken possession of the land and lies buried in the first open grave.

Such is the real life of the Trappists. It is apparently a happy one; and ■ is with feelings of deep regret and of friendly remembrance that the departing guest, as ■ reaches a turning of the road and sees the steeple of the monastery of Le Port du Salut disappear, stands for a moment to cast ■ last look upon that peaceful abode ere ■ wends his way again into the wide, wide world.

MOLES AND MOLE CATCHING.

By JAMES PERVIS.

GEORGE SAND, in "Maupiti," incidentally describes a mole catcher in her native place, Berry, and, short though the description is, we at once see it has been done on the spot. In her sympathetic style she depicts the man whose business it was to purge the houses and fields of rats, weasels, and polecats, who travelled alone and on foot through every part of the country where the farmers had the good sense to appreciate his talents. He was everywhere well received, in the chateau as ■ the hut, and his trade had been practised with honesty and success by his ancestors for generations. He received ready lodgings, wherever he went and had work secured for every day in the year. He reappeared at fixed intervals at all places which he had visited the preceding year, and was accompanied by the same dog and the same long sword, and he was cautious not to repeat in one house what news or gossip he had heard in another.

In the south of Scotland or north of England some thirty or forty years ago, the mole catcher led a similar life. He lived ■ the farm-house till his work was done, and generally slept in the stable loft above the farm horses, where the night's rest was disturbed only by the squeaking of mice and rats, and the horses crunching their food and rattling their halter chains in the tressers. His visit was looked for twice a year, ■ spring and midsummer, and he travelled sixty or eighty miles south, working his way by short stages and staying ■ week at a time ■ some farms until he had killed what moles he could in the infected fields. In his homeward journey, later on he would again make a brief stay. In this manner he would take the north news south and the south news north, and bring information to the farmers about the latest improvements in agriculture, or what their wives loved better, a good gossip about the farmers they only knew by name. In this not unpleasant way nine months of the year would be spent until winter set in, when he mended his old and made new traps, and followed the other occupations that a clever-handed man like a mole catcher generally has. He can kill rats, ferret rabbits, train a dog, rear pheasants, and clip horses, and so a mole catcher, like the mole, seldom or never starves. Thus we now greatly changed. My authority, old Jim Black, states that the "blasted rule" is done away with those journeys in which he made the bulk of his money, as he has done away with a lot of cunning hooks of roadside inns which used to live and thrive on the stage-coach and road traffic. In a confidential mood he lets slip what may be a stronger and more convincing reason. He has never made six months' journey since, for as he phrases it he got married, and so had to give it up. A mole catcher's opinions of marriage are not without interest in a practical, human way — a result of ordinary village experience — he tells us. Wives are feared and men get in other sweethearts in months time than in a June. He says that they are jealous-minded, but if a dinner like that man to be long, may I say so, my wives are enormous creatures.

A mole catcher is a picturesque person, more interesting in his life and surroundings than many better known or practical types of life. He can hold his own with many game keepers and the country sportsmen which abound where the trees are green and fields are ploughed and waters clear, though he has nothing more creditable to him in the earth than a wooden trap, and all the skill he possesses is his own experience of cunning. He follows his work as silent as the mole themselves, and his humble earnestness would stand many a preacher in good stead. We might with a little with the fun of his old clinics, his leather gaiters, his soiled knickerbockers, his battered hat, and rough hands, and come near him to a scold, but the moment we talk to him we find what a store of strange observations have been gathered up by those cute eyes, observations which his wit at night by the fireside alone shares, and we begin to consider what an immense debt we dwellers in cities owe this rustic for keeping down the moles and preserving the crops. As you travel on the highway you see the rude mole catcher down on his knees at work, with his hands in the soil blessing the ground by playing havoc with the black vermin, and whatever the marks of his knees have been the land prospers and grows green in spring. His hands are so stiff with rheumatism that they can hardly close, and his eyes are always among his feet, "as if," he says with a wry smile, "he was in search of half a crown he had lost in his young days." Yet in fact his occupation is an artificial one, and has been brought about by high farming and game preservation. "Weasels," he remarks, "destroy moles like smoke. God has aye one vermin to keep down another!" The gamekeepers having destroyed many weasels, wisdom means have to be taken to destroy moles. Looking from the window of a railway carriage at the solitary figure on the fields, you would think he has about the most lonely and gruesome work on the face of the earth, but old Jim says, "Min, I never weay, I'm ye seeing something new. I wish the moles if no allow one to be idle or weay. So I whiles think my wuld wuch his t'ren fight in his p'rl an hour or two the time flies by o' quick. You set a min to kill moles, in, I wish, he'll never weay." "It's fine," continued he, and the remark was that of a healthy man, "it's fine to be tired at nights after a long and a hard day's work, and to fall asleep as your cheek kisses the pillow. A hard day's work has a good night's rest. Any open air work like mole catching makes one sane-minded and moderate in thought, and gives one a natural life."

The mole catcher's work takes him into every farm among the fields all day long. He preserves his field to field and from farm to farm by way of "strips" or "stiles," without ever using the high roads or by-roads. He has practical knowledge of the habits in consequence more than any other rustic. He may work for days on end without enjoying a chat at his work, the only characters he may come across being the ploughmen with one foot in the furrow and taken up with his plough-shares and his steaming horse, or gangs of women field-workers stretched across the field in a row, gathering with hand hoes the dry weeds brought to the surface by the horse hoes. These may salute him with dull turning eyes and a pause in work, and probably a "Good day," and a few words of praise go by. But catching moles is really exciting, and will keep any man alive with interest, especially if he is proud to do it. It is at first a little difficult ■ understand why mole catching should not be come sport for gentlemen, moles being ranged under the same category with rabbits &c vermin. Certainly mole catching would breed patience and cuteness ■ our hooked esquire for it is as good as a game it chess to track the movements of a quick witted mole.

■ the mole the farmer's friend or the farmer's enemy? This is a debatable point on which there is considerable difference of opinion. The mole devours very vast numbers of worms and grubs, which, if they were not so destroyed might prove as destructive as the mole. the mole catchers opinion is that it does terrible destruction in a noble field. that when the seed is taken root and quickening in the earth the mole by its runs and its holes covers and destroys in an immense amount and that the subterranean galleries giving too much air and too little of the sap of the earth leave the seed dry and mouldy. In this way much seed which represents human toil, is destroyed and mole catchers deserve the thanks of the farmers and the State and have earned that approval which those have who make two or three blades of corn to grow where none would have grown but for their skill. The defenders of moles urge in their favour that they are the cheapest subsoil drainers a farmer can have, as they work without wages, that they keep the prolific worms within reasonable bounds, and that they, in some mysterious way, prevent foot rot in sheep. On arable farms moles are a pest.

■ was early in 'proud mid April when I spent the better part of a day in the company of a mole catcher at work. The spirit and warmth of returning spring were felt by the earth and the trees. The trees were juicy with the returning sap and the rustle of the branches blown with the breeze had the fresh quickening sound of spring and the lark seemed to rejoice in the sun and the warm west wind. The moss at the tree roots was springy and yielded to the touch, as if spring had got hold of the tendrils and sent them rejoicing ■ the foot of man ■ was a warm dry after the cold and the run—a day to sit on a rustic stile with the grassy footpath dotted with rich glow my primroses and homely daisies, red and white, for a prospect, and to open one's heart in careless talk. One felt with the force of personal experience that spring, with leaps and bounds was making the earth young again. The fields and pasture lands were rejoicing more than my heart was. The water in the ditches seemed to have a fresh sound, the hedges were budding, the winter wheat in the red loam was growing green, and the gorse alongside the ditch was in full bloom. The only figures in view were bending women heaping weeds together with their hoes on the field slopes, and the west wind that blew mild kept their grey clothes tight about them, and rounded their flexural figures into academic forms. Gorse in fresh full bloom is our finest spring colour; its spring flourish makes up for its dulness and prickly touch the rest of the year. It has about the most delicate yellow tinge of all wild flowers, and its rough, unaffected honesty makes it peculiarly appropriate to its surroundings—the hills or the downs, or babbling water-courses or stony soil.

The mole catcher was working in zigzag fashion across the field, and watching him for a few minutes I noticed he did not raise his eyes from the ground, straighten his back, or rest himself on his spade, like other labourers. It was a sandy field, about half a mile distant from the sea, and the roar of the breakers and the voices of sea-gulls and curlews and the whistling trill of the sand-pipers were in the air. In the soil of the field

rots were sown in it, and on stooping down and scraping with one's fore-finger in the soil the seed was visible, throwing off numerous tiny branch roots. Thence our eyes turned to the worms, to their life-long enemy, the mole, and to the worker's occupation, mole catching. Realism with the mole catcher is fiction to us. Moles are among the most interesting vermin, and you would find half a day spent with the mole catcher at his work on the fields among the most romantic hours ever spent in the country. This I venture to say, although a wise old country woman declared,

"I canna see what you could see in following a mole catcher ■ day long;" but she could not see with my eyes.

The mole can easily draw double its own weight in below the ground, and seven times its own weight on the level surface—like one o'clock, as Jim says. ■ requires more water than food, and runs long distances underground to drains and ditches, and will, if need be, puddle a hole or sink a well for water to lodge in. ■ travels a considerable distance in a day, and runs as quickly backwards as forwards. ■ is very active and 'cute, and burrows out of sight in a moment. A voracious eater, when it gets its belly filled and a good drink of water, ■ goes to bed, Jim says, like a little pig. Its nose is delicate and soft and sharp, and few animals have a keener smell, it is said to smell a worm three feet distant in the solid earth, work its way towards the surface, snatch the worm, and pop backwards to the burrow. In a run you can observe small openings where the mole has deviated in search of worms, and popped backwards to the run. The worms have an intuitive terror of moles, by their sensitive sense of the earth's motions they feel the moles burrowing, and crawl as fast as they can in terror from the mole's pursuit. Like a rabbit the mole smells the hand of man at the traps or the earth, so the mole catcher carries a piece of wood like a carpenter's foot-rule, whereby he paces the earth level in the runs, and sometimes, though rarely, he carries a wisp of barley straw, so that the smell of the human hand is not communicated. Popular belief will have the mole blind, and there is a number of old country rhymes of false wisdom, e.g. —

*If the m. be could see as well as it could hear,
It would turn the world a. in a hour.*

The old phrase speaks of being as blind as a mole, but a mole is not blind, its eyes are like two small black spots, set well back between its head and its shoulders, and it can project them and as quickly draw them back.

The mole's natural life is spent below the earth, and it only comes to the surface in search of food or water, or to cross a road. It runs zigzag whenever it can get the smallest insect or grub, and seldom goes a yard in a straight direction, except in the main run, and it can turn itself in the run like a worm. It runs every six hours, and strange to say, runs more actively about the witching hour of midnight than during the whole day, and then it makes the greatest destruction of the slumbering worms. It is a striking fact that if this voracious animal be imprisoned without food for twelve hours it will die of sheer starvation. When the ground is covered with snow it burrows most, and is most active, and in rainy weather, when the worms rejoice in the earth, "any amount" of moles, old Jim says, can be caught.

The mole is a splendid architect and sure builder. It constructs perfect subterranean galleries. The nest is a wonderful building, bearing immediately above it as much earth thrown up as would fill a moderately sized wheel-barrow. The soil roof of the nest is so strong that an ox may with safety stand on it, in spite of its being surrounded and intersected by runs, by which the family can separately escape in case of sudden danger. In one I saw there were at least, within a foot from the nest, four main runs, and these main runs again had three immediate branch runs towards the nest from the wheat field, making twelve within two feet of the nest, while there were many escape runs towards the surface for hiding. A favourite place for nests is about old broad hedge roots, where the moles have plenty of room, and where their nests are concealed by the undergrowth, which again protects their surface runs from being trampled by the hoofs of horses or cattle. And the moles nesting on either side of the hedge stick religiously to their own side of the field. Between the nest and the water there is a main run, and to an inexperienced eye its only distinguishing feature is that it is some what more direct than the other runs. But the mole catcher observes it in an instant, and he catches most moles there at the time when the moles are returning home from their food or water. It is wonderful how the moles find their long ways home, and it is remarkable the distance they travel every twenty four hours, in the ins and outs and confusing number of intersected runs. Moles multiply very fast, they pair for the season, and breed four or five times every year, and they are among the few animals which have preponderance of males. Their young run about shortly after they are born, and are taught to run in the main run first, the parents leading the way. The mole is said to be affectionate, and to brave death for its offspring or its mate, and to be found sometimes starved to death beside a trapped mate. It prefers dry loam to sandy soil, and does not much frequent stiff clay soil, which is both wet and cold, and difficult to burrow in. For every one that is to be found in clay soil ten will be found in dry loam. And it is a noteworthy fact, if true, as it is said to be, that there are no moles in Ireland.

A mole catcher requires considerable skill and cunning. To set the trap is the smallest part, you could do that in ten minutes, though you only saw it once done. The point is, where to set it, and with what bait, if any, and how to arrange the earth about the hole. My friend the mole catcher tells me "you have to be as 'cute as you can,' and on pressing him further he unconsciously repeats himself, 'you have to be as 'cute as you can, and use your wits.' Experience is his great teacher, until he has an unflinching instinct, or, as he says in old English, "practise makes profiteness." A mole will throw the trap out of the earth in anger, or it may scent the trap and fill it up with earth to prevent the trigger going off, and then run backwards, giving warning to others. Jim let me see such a trap just taken from the ground, and he pointed out what I would have taken years to notice—the glossiness of the mole's skin on the wood pin or trigger, where the mole had burrowed underneath and thrown up the earth, and the marks of its feet where it had so scratched on the ground to get underneath the trap. "He's an old dog, a great scoundrel, I warrant you, sir," old Jim said, on his knees, "a very 'cute gentleman." In another empty trap just lifted he showed me a worm, half eaten, lying below it, and said the mole, when ■ was feasting itself, had just discovered the trap, and then let the worm drop, and bolted along the run as fast as its legs could carry it. In this case Jim clogged the holes of the run firmly up with earth, and taking the half-eaten worm tied it on to the trap, so that, he said, the mole coming cautiously to the earth, and smelling the worm, will come slap through the earth into the trap, and ■ fairly caught at last. A mole that leaves a worm half eaten and takes to flight is certainly terrified. Old Jim never holds the moles too cheap; he gives them credit for as much cunning as he possesses himself. He uses at the proper seasons a little dry grass, such as the mole carries for its nest, so that smelling the grass "it will be thinking," as he says, "to enjoy itself, and get a bit o' fine bedding and nesting this time," play slap against the grass hanging from the trigger, set it off, and be trapped. "Experience teaches a man heaps o' things. One has to be 'cute how to lead these 'cute scoundrels on ■ destruction. They are sly gentlemen." Sometimes they are caught by the snout. They present a pitiable appearance with their small legs outstretched, and their noses pinky red against their black bodies. They are easily killed, a very slight touch on the head with a hard substance puts them out of pain. The slack earth plugged up against the run at each end of the trap often deceives them, or, as he vigorously says, "they play pop at the earth, and they are no more in a jiffy, as the saying is." But the trap gives them little pain, and strangles them in a moment.

"A mole is all life, 'cute, a quick little devil," said old Jim. And then, after a deliberate pause, ■ looked me in the face and said, "It knows what it's about, I can tell you. ■ works most when we're all asleep, when we don't know whether our heads or our heels are uppermost it's working death among the worms. Gosh! he's never idle, ■ never tires." A great dodge is that no light must be let into the run where the trap is set, the holes in the trap top must be carefully covered up. The slightest gleam of daylight arouses the mole's suspicions, and ■ observes ■ in an instant. Another dodge is not to let the wood trigger, —which, being pressed against by the mole, causes the trap to spring and so strangle the mole with the twine,—remain uncovered. The mole-catcher spat on it, so that the light, sandy soil should adhere, and looking up in my face remarked, with a confidential nod and wink, "As the byword says, an old dog for the hard road." On observing the ground being newly thrown up by a mole on forming a new run, a mole catcher slips gently on tip-toe to the leeward of the mole, and suddenly pounces on it. One has to tread softly, not because the mole actually hears the sound of the falling foot, but that it is very sensitive ■ the vibrations of the earth produced by walking. It can smell a man from the windward. Quick as lightning on reaching the spot the mole catcher puts one foot in the run between him and the mole, so as to prevent it running backwards into the run and escaping; and with his long, narrow spade he pierces the ground where its movements were last observed, and unerringly shovels the mole and earth on to the surface. This is the most exciting part in his work, and he does it with great glee, and sometimes he will catch three moles in this way. I saw him catch one, and he cried exultingly through high spirits, as he tipped up the earth and the mole with his sword-like spade, "Come on like the flowers o' May!"

The cleverest thing he did was ■ skin a dead mole. He had the head and feet discovered, and the skin stripped off the animal in, as he said, "two jiffies." He gave the big blade of his pocket knife two or three scrapes alongside his boot by way of sharpening it, then he held the body in his hand and looking at it earnestly with his head aside, with four quick, sharp, snicking sounds the legs were off and fell to the ground, he then pressed his left hand firmly round its body, and with two sharp cuts its head and neck were to the ground, and in a twinkling the skin was stripped from the body. It was very cleverly done. Taking the skin in one hand he ran it quickly two or three times between his other hand, clasped, so as to strip the skin of fleas. This done, he took his well-seasoned meerschaum pipe from his wamcoat pocket, which his daughter, a dairy maid to a baronet in the parish, had given him, and after lighting the tobacco he placed a tin cover over the pipe-head to protect the burning tobacco against the wind, though certainly a tin cover on a meerschaum pipe looked odd. And as he smoked and coughed and spat about his feet he said the most wonderful thing of all is that he could go back blindfold or in the dark and visit in regular rotation each of the twenty traps we had passed. But that I did not quite believe.

My experience is that a mole catcher is, of all rustic workmen, the most communicative. The reason may probably be it is so very seldom any one condescends to notice him or talk to him about what he knows best—his occupation, and some way or other he is generally an odd, wayward man whom the villagers think an idler. ■■■ said by parish and village cynics—and they form a large proportion of the population—that mole catching is another name for poaching, and that if the mole catcher's spring vans were searched, there would be found, below the straw, more hares and pheasants than dead moles. I cannot say whether this be true or not, never having had occasion to search their vans, but to me their talk is interesting and true, as all talk is which is based on experience, though the villagers tell me in a side way they would "stuff one's head with a parcel o' lies." ■■■ stuffing that agrees with me, and I wish I could get more of it.

His talk held me captive. Whether he told the truth or not I liked to hear him talk about the "cute little devils o' moles." His voice rings in my ears yet; his eager eyes, his sucking lips as he drew away at his tobacco-pipe, and his vigorous voice were at least pleasant facts. When I got him fairly started on the subject ■■■ talked, as the villagers say, "like a book," and when ■■■ talked I was as silent as a book.

To succeed as a mole catcher depends on "one's naturalness," ■■■ says, "there's no rule o' thumb w' t' there's no highflying cuts w' t' but 'cuteness'—'cuteness,' and that 'it stands to the face o' things ■■■ canno' be taught." His son, Young Jim, who also follows the calling, boasts that Old Jim can kill moles "w' the face o' day, w' any mortal man on the face o' God's earth, w' any white man, an' my certes! that's a big word." In the old man's emphatic way he says, "there's no use o' speaking," and then he talks volubly of the moles, worms, and traps, and the copped hulk, and the long experience of his own eyes, that are to him of enduring interest.

MEN AND MOUNTAINS.

Short Chapters of Swiss History

NO ■■■

NOT far from Sempach, on the other side of the lake, that side along which the Berne and Lucerne Railway runs, is the Guglers mound, or Englishmen's barrow. Rich country that enough, with its fine beech woods, its good crops and wonderfully substantial wooden houses. So the "Free Companions" thought, when, during the truce after Pontenr, Charles the Wise bribed them to give a little respite ■■■ his miserable kingdom. One hand threatened Basel, but retreated at the sight of 2,000 Berners, all in white shirts with "the bear" on their breasts. Another hand swept through the Aargau. They were under Ingram de Coucy, son-in-law of Edward III. His mother, daughter of the Leopold who was beaten at Morgarten, had Alsace and the Aargau for her dowry. These De Coucy claimed as her heir, but the Aargau would none of him, so he invaded it, many English knights, besides plenty of foreigners of the Sir Walter Manny sort, joining him. From their pointed helmets the Swiss called them Giglers, and in Balmer's picture a most disreputable lot they look—fat of course ("John Bull" always is so printed abroad) and hung round with strings of ducks, fowls, and savages, as if they had been dressing up for Father Christmas, driving withal lots of fat pigs and lean goats before them. In her distress Austria turned ■■■ the Federation for help, and Zurich, Berne, and Lucerne sent their troops at once, the Forest cantons (I am sorry to say) selfishly holding back, saying "the Guglers can never get near us." The English were beaten (though the Bishop of Basel, angry with Berne for seizing one ■■■ his towns, had joined them with 500 men). After two defeats, De Coucy fell back into Alsace, leaving all his pigs, ducks, &c., behind, and the Englishmen's barrow, near Buttisholz, contains, they say, the bones of the Guglers who were slain in one of these battles (1375).

But this was only a little by play. The desperate struggle took place at that Sempach of which I have just spoken (1386). Under Archduke Leopold II., Austria determined to make one more effort to regain its old power. This time Berne held aloof (these divisions seldom seem to have hurt the Swiss); she had an excuse, for she was cut off from the rest by the Entlebuch valley, owned by the lord of Thorberg, and by the Willisan, whose Count was her enemy, while close in her rear lay Freiburg, the fast friend of Austria. So the rest of the Federation went on alone, hurrying to defend Zurich, against which Leopold made a feint, his real intention being to march up the Sempach valley, right on Lucerne. It was a glorious sight, says the Chronicler, to see the Austrian host come on, the horse in front, as at Morgarten, banners flying, armour flashing, the Duke himself the handsomest man in his army. Out of very scorn they had mown off the ripening corn and had fed and littered their horses with it; and some of them rode up to the gate of Sempach and asked for "breakfast for the mowers." "Take care," cried a townsman, "or the Confederates will give you such a breakfast as you've no stomach for. Don't drop your spoons out of your hands while eating it." When Count Hasenbourg, who had already fought the Forest men, suggested that their work would not be all play, the rest cried him down saying: "What can you expect from Hare's castle (Hasenbourg) but a hare's heart?"

Leopold, however, was not quite so foolish as his knights. It was clear that horses could not get at the Confederates, so he made his men dismount and, taking their long sixteen-foot lances, form in close column. On the column went, forcing the Forest men before it by its very weight, and if light-armed infantry had been at hand to take them in flank, the Confederates must have been cut to pieces. As it was, the Swiss couldn't get at their foes. "Break the wooden handles," shouted an Uri man, but it was no good; as fast as a lance was broken, another from behind supplied its place, and sixty Swiss—a great number out of their little army—had fallen, when Arnold of Winkelried, crying, "Take care of my wife and children, and I'll make a passage for you," rushed on, seized in both arms a sheaf of lances, forced himself upon them, and falling, bore them down to the ground. His friends swarmed in over his body, and the day was won. The long lances were only an encumbrance in hand-to-hand fight, while the short swords and clubs and bills of the Swiss dealt destruction in the ever-widening breach. Another body of volunteers, coming up at the same moment, increased the dismay of the Austrians. Leopold thrice led his knights to the charge; and then, when they fled on all sides, rushed into the midst of the foes and fell. He had brave men on his side; the banneret of Zofingen, for instance, wounded to death, tore up his flag and held the broken staff in his teeth, fighting with both hands as long as life lasted. But individual valour was of no avail; the knights fled, and when they came to where their horses ought to have been, the cowardly grooms had ridden off with them. The infantry, as usual, did nothing; we don't this time even hear of their having been cut to pieces. Several hundred counts were among the slain; fifteen banners and the Archduke's coat of mail were taken, and so was the iron collar with spikes inside, which the Austrians had intended for the Schultheiss of Lucerne, who himself was killed just as the victory was won.

If you go from Lucerne home by the Brüning pass (and it is better than the railway) you should stop at Stanz and see Winkelried's statue and what is left of his house; and get some one to read to you Herwegh's poem, "Der Freiheit eine Gasse." Naturally, the Austrians were very angry; and Archduke Albert sought, two years after, to avenge on the Glarus men their share in Sempach. Glarus is all one big valley, into which 6,000 Austrians forced their way before there had been time to send news to the Federation. Matthew Anibüel, the headman, gathered a few hundred men and tried to stand his ground, adopting the Morgarten tactics; but perhaps the country was more suited for cavalry. Ten times the handful of Glarus men was broken and dispersed, each time retreating mountain-wards. As they were making their eleventh stand, they heard the Swiss war-cry re-echoed from the rocks, until it seemed to come from thousands of throats. It was only fifty Schwytzers who had heard what was doing and hastened to give help; fortunately, the Austrians did not see them, but, deceived by the sound, broke and fled; the bridge over the Linth gave way under them, and the men-at-arms, in their usual helplessness, were mercilessly cut to pieces—2,500 were left on the field. At the village of Näfels, half-way on from the gloomy Wallenstadt lake to Glarus, they keep the first Thursday in April the anniversary of perhaps the most desperate, though not the most world-famed of Swiss battles for freedom.

I said their divisions seldom hurt the Swiss—that was perhaps true on Swiss ground, certainly not on Italian. Their first effort to get hold of Bellinzona, the key to the country of which the St. Gothard is the keyhole, resulted in an ignominious defeat at Arbedo. They had bought the place and its valley, the Livinental, of the German Emperor for 2,400 florins; but the Dukes of Milan, its real owners, would not agree to the bargain, and, while Schuyt was quarrelling with Uri, fell on and defeated them both. But this check (1422) was more than compensated by the coming in of the Graubunden (Grisons—so called because when the league was signed (1444) the snow lay deep on the mountains); and this defection of what was really a part of the Tyrol (Upper Rhetia) incensed the Austrians more than anything, so much so that they even deigned to seek French help against the Confederates. Times in France then (1444) were much as they had been after Poitiers. At last there was peace with England, and nothing pleased the French so much as the idea of getting rid of the loose troops whose plundering was worse than actual war. So the Dauphin Louis was sent, some say with 12,000, others with 20,000 "Armagnacs" to help the Austrians. The Dauphin was threatening Basel (which had become a Confederate town) when the Confederates (some 1,600 strong) hurried along the Munsterthal—you know it, if you've gone by rail from Basel to Bienne along the banks of the little Birs with its green meadows and stern castle-crowned rocks, and the villages where they still call the red wine Swissers' blood. They drove before them 4,000 Flench, and, wild with victory, swam the Illis, rained upon by French shot, and forced their way to St. Jacob's chapel, where they fortified themselves. That passage had cost them a third of their number. Louis, admiring their bravery, wished to offer them terms, but the Austrian Knight of Mörsberg managed to persuade him to "let the peasant dogs die," as he expressed it. After three unsuccessful charges the French set the chapel on fire, and at last the Confederates all fell, save ten who ran away, only to meet sentence of death at home for deserting their fellows. The Knight of Landskron, near Basel, who had been guide to the Armagnacs, rode over the field that evening making sport of the slain heroes. "Now," cried he, as his horse plunged amid the blood, "we're bathing in roses." "Take one of the roses then, and see how you like it," said a voice from among the corpses, and straightway a big stone hit Landskron so shrewdly on the head that he died three days after. It was Arnold Schick, of Lin-tally wounded, gathered up all his strength when he heard the taunt, and sent that forcible answer to it. Louis had had enough; he made peace with the Federation, and took himself off. This Swiss Thermopylae (they had many Rannockburns) was as good as a victory to the Confederates; they seized the Thurgau, (as they had done the Aargau before) and made it one of those dependencies which (as I said) I am afraid they treated quite as harshly as ever nobles or abbots did. Of the Burgundian war I need not say much; we have often read how Charles the Bold lost battle after battle, and finally his life. The story is less pleasing than that of the former victories. The Swiss were tools in the hands of Louis XI., who as Dauphin had had a taste of their bravery at the Birs, and who wanted to ruin Charles. The Austrians, too, had their reasons for wishing Burgundy to fall to pieces. So the Swiss, on the pretext that Charles was making his army dangerously strong, invaded Burgundy; and Charles, as soon as he had finished conquering Lorraine (his idea was to have a "middle kingdom" from Holland to the Alps, dividing France and Germany) gathered his host at Besançon, and marched to Granson on the Neuchâtel Lake. Here a garrison of 500 Swiss was betrayed to him; he hanged or drowned every man of them, including the monks who came as chaplains. Justly enraged, the Federation gathered its whole strength, and with 24,000 men fell upon Charles unawares and defeated him utterly. The booty was something fabulous; Burgundy, taking taxes from all the rich Netherland towns, was then the richest power in Europe. The spoil was valued at a quarter of a million. You may calculate what that would be worth now. The big diamonds—one is now the Pope's tiara, another was long the glory of the French regalia—were among the valuables. The Duke's throne was valued at 21,000 gulden; all his plate, his silver bedstead, his wonderfully illuminated prayer-book, were taken, besides 1,000,000 gulden in his treasure chest, 20,000 horses, and a proportionate quantity of all kinds of stores. No wonder the Swiss never recovered Granson; there were long and bitter quarrels about the division of the booty, and the coming in of so much wealth amongst a simple people demoralised them sadly, and led the way to their becoming the chief mercenaries of Europe.

Less than four months after Granson came Morat, preluded by a little act of heroism, of which the Swiss make as much as the old Romans did of Horatius keeping the bridge.

More than half a century before, Neuchâtel (Neuenburg) and her count had found it advisable to put themselves under the protection of Berne, and so had got linked on to the Federation. The Neuenburgers therefore were now afield, among them one Jacques Bailloz. One day this man saw a horde of plundering Burgundians making for the bridge across the little river Zihl which joins the Neuchâtel and Bienné lakes. Springing forward, he drew his double handed sword, and not only held the way but slew so many of the foe that a panic seized them, and they ran off. A medal was struck with the motto, "Ein Mann ein Heer" (one man is worth an army), and was given ■ Bailloz, a strange motto (by the way) for a French-speaking Neuchâteller.

At Morat, as at Granson, Charles was taken by surprise. All day he had kept his troops in order expecting a battle, but just when he drew off, the Swiss fell on his flank, threw his men into confusion, and, though he fought desperately, even when none stood their ground except his body guard, he was at last swept away in the course qui perd. It was not many who could save themselves. Fifteen thousand fell, many drowned in the little lake or smothered in its muddy banks. The Confederates gave no quarter. "Revenge for those hanged before Granson," was the cry, and the killing went on as the rout swept past quaint little Morat town, with its arched streets, miles away to the south west. "Grausam wie zu Murten" (grim as at Morat) became a Swiss proverb. You know all about the pyramid of bones, destroyed by the French revolutionary soldiers, of which Byron managed to get enough to make what he calls "the quarter of a hero." Napoleon I went over Morat field, and remarked to some Swiss officers. "If we ever have to fight you here again, you may be sure we shan't put the lake in our line of retreat." The marble obelisk, set up fifty years ago by Freiburg, attributes the victory to "amara patria." Certainly Freiburg was then, for a wonder, at one with Berne, and they signalled their amity immediately after the fight by jointly falling on and "annexing" the Pays de Vaud. But, as I said, one does not think of Morat as one does of Morgarten. The Swiss had a big army, and they were not on their own ground. The war was of their seeking, and that makes all the difference. Those whom one pities are the poor Burgundian rank and file, whose bones and armour the fishermen still bring up now and then from the depths of the lake.

Six months after came Nancy, where Charles, having lost his treasure at Granson, and his honour ■ Morat, lost ■ life—drowned in a half-frozen ditch which he had set his horse to leap across. The part of the Swiss at Nancy was but small, Charles was fighting against Duke Renatus of Lorraine, the Confederates would not come as allies, but they let Renatus hire 6,000 mercenaries. Charles was easily beaten. Campobasso, his Italian general, had just betrayed him. His presentiment of defeat was so strong that, as he was mounting his charger, he gave his last will to a trusty servant. In the rout his horse leapt short of the bank, and as he was getting out of the ditch the Castellan of St. Dié came by and wounded him. "Save the Duke of Burgundy," cried he, but St. Dié was deaf, and thinking he said "Long live the Duke," beat him back into the freezing water. Next morning ■ was found naked, and half-eaten by dogs and wolves.

The Swiss League was now respected abroad, they were rich, Louis XI paid them 100,000 guilden as their share when he took poor Burgundy as his prey. But primitive simplicity was gone, the heroes of the Forest cantons would not have owned their fifteenth century representatives—lawless, greedy, dissolute, corrupted by foreign service, unable to take to peaceful work at home. Robbery became so frequent that the Federation passed a law that a man should be hung for stealing the value of the halberd. But the change did not come on without protest. What one man can do, not only in heading a popular rising, but in the far harder work of stemming a people's degradation, is shown by the work of Niklaus Leuenbrugger von der Flue. Brother Klaus, he is called—never St. Klaus, though he has been canonized, and his bones are to be seen at Sachveln by the little lake of Sarnen, between Lucerne and the Brunig, in a glass case over the high altar. There, instead of his heart, is a jewelled cross, and on the breast bone hang military orders, and other decorations of which pilgrims have stripped themselves. But better than jewels is the memory of him in his countrymen's hearts. Scarcely a cottage thereabouts in which you won't see his portrait, just as you find Luther's in the Saxon miners' huts, and O'Connell's or Father Mathew's in Munster cabins.

Klaus was for fifty years simply a good ordinary man, serving his time as a soldier and then doing his duty at home. He then "left the world," fixing his hermitage at a wild spot in the Melchthal (the name, valley, and home of one of "the three men of Gröth"). His fame soon spread, people came from all sides to take counsel of him in difficulties. There began to be talk of miracles, some said that he lived for months on nothing but the Holy Communion. But the real miracle was when, in 1481, he walked into the Rathhaus, at Stans, and said "Men, you were strong because you were united. Are you going now to throw everything away for the sake of paltry booty? Will you listen to foreign advice which is given to ruin you? Will you keep out of your League towns whose citizens have fought and died beside you for fear they should claim a share of the spoil? Far be all this from you, for it means the ruin of the League." Simple words, but they told, coming from such a man who had nothing to gain by what he said. The Confederates had been at daggers drawn about the division of the Granson booty; they had put it off for four years, hoping that, as time cooled them, ■ might be settled without bloodshed. That they did not fight about ■ and by so doing break up the whole Federation, was owing to Brother Klaus. Do stay at Sachseln, if you can, and see his relics, and don't smile at the quaint wooden figure, dressed up in his veritable robes, which is kept for the edification of pilgrims. It does tend to education, if coming to his shrine makes them try to be like him.

And thus you have two acts in the drama of Swiss history, her stand against Austria and her conquest of the Burgundians, both proving my theory that it is not the high Alp folk, stunted for the most part like the plants that grow on the moraines, but the stout well fed men of the lower Alps and middle valleys who were the fathers of Swiss independence.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

By SARAH TYTLER, AUTHOR OF "CLOVERNE JACQUELINE," "LADY BELL," ETC

CHAPTER XXXVI.—A RAINY DAY.

THE next morning rose with such a raw, white Scotch mist or drizzling rain as to catch everybody in the throat worse than her cold had caught Lady Fernor, and to forbid preliminary strolls and seats on the border moors. The two young men tried them on several occasions, only to return thoroughly soaked, to be sent ■ the lower regions, where, as Marianne Dugdale declared, the pedestrians were turned before a slow fire. Even in fine weather these moors are bleak in August, for the bloom of the broom ■ past, and the first purple of the heather is growing brown, before the burst of September red lings which lends the final glow to the wilderness. It was hard to be assailed by the Scotch weather-fiend before the party had done more than set foot in Scotland.

Marianne Dugdale was crusty when she came down to breakfast in the inn parlour, where Lady Fernor sent Soames to pour out tea and play propriety at the table with the young people. "Nobody shall say that I have not looked after you. After what I've seen and known, I trust nobody," the old lady told her nieces insultingly.

"Quite right, granny. We've all heard evil doers are evil dreadsers," retorted Marianne recklessly, while Mrs. Crumsoned and hurried out of hearing.

Marianne's temper was not improved by a somewhat agitated announcement from King Lud that he must leave them and start by the night train. He had not heard from the Admiralty, but there were letters from the Rectory, where he ought to have been weeks before. The mother had been ill, and even without that obligation his last days on shore were due to those at home. They were too kind to complain, but he should not have failed them.

No, of course not. Good little boys could not play truant for any length of time, Marianne told him scornfully, while she crumbled down the bit of oat cake with which she had provided herself, but could not eat. But how any one could leave his friends in the lurch she could not understand, she went on tartly. ■ would have been bad enough to have deserted them before they had reached their destination, but it was mean to go in such weather.

He brightened up a little, and said earnestly, "You must be aware I have no choice, Mrs. Dugdale." And then the big, sandy-haired, ■■ faced lieutenant, the diver among sharks and the defier of polar bears, positively blushed like a girl when he went on "But I may comfort myself—may I not?—with the selfish hope that I shall be missed—a little?"

"You are wrong, Jeanne, altogether wrong."

"Not unless by Iris or Lady Fermor or Sir William," Marianne assured him coolly. "I never flatter a man's vanity. We can really get on very well without you—can we not, Sir William?"

"If you like to put it so, Mrs Dugdale," said Sir William a little awkwardly, and so deliberately that Marianne could have shaken him, to have roused the man into greater alacrity.

Ludovic Acton had deferred his departure till he should have to encounter the chill and darkness of midnight in such weather, in order—infatuated fellow—that he might have ten or twelve hours more to sun and scorch himself in the flame that was consuming him. Marianne proposed to repay him by rendering these hours one prolonged period of bitterness, till it was just possible the cruel cauterisation of his wound might be complete and prove effectual, and the last boon be granted to him ■ departing limp and spiritless, but cured, if he were capable of cure, of a misplaced attachment to an unfeeling, ungrateful girl.

It was a blank, disconsolate day for belated travellers at a country inn; a day to order a smoky fire ■ be lit, draw the scanty curtains, and aim at the severe discharge of duty, and the acquisition of a rampant sense of self-righteousness, by writing off a dozen letters—long due; to collapse into calling for refreshments, to yawn and dawdle and tell idle stories, and finally to sour and ferment into quarrelling with might and main, and get a little heat and vigour into life in that way.

Marianne tried none of these plans, for she did not deign to quarrel with King Lear, it was not her cue to dispute with Sir William, except in spurts of uncontrollable exasperation, she had a notion that Iris would not wrangle with her, and Lady Fernor was not visible all the morning.

Marianne lugged Sir William into the passage to play battledore and shuttlecock by means of ancient implements for the game, which she had discovered in some corner; but found that he had to be taught, and though ■ insisted that he was good for rackets, he made no progress in catching and returning the mounted bunch of feathers. She sat down to backgammon with him, and found, to her disgust, that he could not only beat her to sticks, but did it without ceremony, with a wooden beaded adherence to the rules of the game, and a quiet grin of masculine superiority, which were beyond bearing. She rummaged out of her trunk silk and worsteds, and set him to wind them for her, as Lady Thwaste had once done before. But either Sir William was now a more adroit master of the situation, or Marianne was not such an adept in taking amusement out of her neighbour's blunders. Marianne asked her victim ■ read a guide-book aloud while she worked, but he read, according to his custom, in a stentorian voice, so that everybody in the room had the benefit of the performance. It ceased to be private, as she had intended, and the publicity did not suit her, since she had a little weakness for monopolising men's notice—a weakness which this day had become an urgent necessity to her. ■ the end, between worry and the noise her square made in obeying her last behest, her head began to ache violently. Then it became evident that Marianne was in a state of nervous weariness and crossness, which, to her extreme mortification, caused her to be viewed as an object of pity, rather than of reprehension.

There was more sorrow than anger in King Lear's kind eyes, and the sorrow smote Marianne Dugdale, so that she was barely able to persist in the line of behaviour she had adopted towards him and other people. She was extremely offended by Iris's offer of eau-de-cologne for her headache, the more so, perhaps, that Iris had been conversing for the last three-quarters of an hour, in the most natural, unaffected manner certainly, but still on confidential terms, with Ladovic Acton, on scraps of Rectory news and on his probable destination when he should get a ship. Iris had no right to such information as Marianne had not cared ■ seek. To sum up the sufferings of Marianne's dog-in-the-manger mood, she began to grow frightened at Sir William, whom she had only looked upon as a temporary servant to suit her purpose. She had raised up a spirit with which she could not cope, and that she did not understand. His looks and tones had changed to rueful, unbounded forbearance and repressed tenderness, as she had known them change on the morning at the Academy. Marianne could not comprehend it, and her ignorance abashed her for the moment in her perversity. Iris believed that his heart was melting and thrilling because he was thinking of his dead wife, poor, wild Honor, to whom, in the person of this capricious, captious, yet withal generous and warm hearted girl, he might be called on in some sort to atone for his errors.

And all the time Iris was as sure as she could be of the result of any human act, that if Sir William Thwaste were led on and suffered, by the contrivance of Lady Fernor and the folly of Marianne Dugdale, to accomplish the reparation which had more than once flashed across his mind, it would not only be a repetition of his former grievous blunder, it would be the consummation of the misfortunes of his chequered life.

Luncheon was welcome by way of variety, and still more dinner, with Lady Fernor declaring herself recruited in spite of the weather. Apparances brightened still more with coffee. Lady Fernor was at her best, chatty, with a rasping good-humour, inclined to encourage the young people in any form of diversion, though she still declared herself unfit for her usual game of cards. "But you boys and girls may set a going games for yourselves. What games we had long ago, when we were not too wise or grand or goody goody ■ play games! Old fashioned, homely riddles and forfeits, when I was a very small child, charades, tableaux, not to speak of private theatricals for our own benefit, without any shoddy pretence of helping charities or entertaining paupers. Why, Marianne, are you so down in the mouth with one day's rain that you cannot even get up a sham Penny Reading?"

There had been a reaction from Marianne's exhaustion before this speech, a return to the restless excitement of the morning, deepened, as in the case of all relapses. But it was Lady Fernor's goad which sent the girl beyond all bounds of discretion and delicacy.

"Thank you, granny, for the suggestion, which I'll take leave to improve upon," cried Marianne with flaming cheeks and flashing eyes. "Ladies and gentlemen, we shall act one of the runaway marriages, for which this place was once famous. It will be a play in a single scene, and the words are so few that nobody need pretend not to be equal to learning his or her part."

"Bravo!" exclaimed Lady Fermor, with the baleful fires in her sunken eyes leaping up for an instant, "if you are able to carry out the idea. But who will bell the cat? Who will assume the principal parts, and play bride and bridegroom?"

"I, said the sparrow," quoted Marianne, with an assumption of sparrow-like pertinence, "I will play the bride, and I choose Sir William for my bridegroom."

It was a bold speech, and seemed to take the person most concerned by storm. "How am I to thank you for your condescension, Miss Dugdale?" he said with an agitation and seriousness which were startling, and caused even Marianne to look put out and to pause for a moment in her recklessness.

"Oh, by acting as well as you can," she said hastily. "I ask nothing further. I can coach you, I can coach everybody. I heard all about it from the maid. Some body has to ask the bride and bridegroom if 'Barkis is willin',' and then we have only to say 'yes' or 'boo,' which seems to be letting us off by an easier method than speaking—even in a monosyllable. But what can 'boo' mean? I understand, and am able to say, 'bo' to a goose"—with a fleeting, impatient glance at King Lud, sitting back in a corner, with a sudden lividness of cheek and lip, yet with the self-control of a gentleman and an officer. "But I confess 'boo' beats me."

"It means 'nod,' Marianne. Couldn't you guess it by the corresponding word 'curtshey'?" said Iris, speaking with an effort, as if she were forcing herself to join in the conversation. "But if I were you I would not bow to such a bad jest. I think you might find a better game."

"Oh, we are too demure to go through with a marriage even in a play," said Lady Fermor with suppressed rage because her opinion was disregarded. "Or is it some grapes, because the chief roles are appropriated?"

"And the smallest and simplest of us can nod easily enough," maintained Marianne, so that Iris was silenced.

Sir William glanced at her with a quick, disturbed inquiry, but he could not read her face or her heart.

"Acton"—Lady Fermor turned ruthlessly to the lieutenant—"you are glum enough to play the owl or the parson, you'll do the grave—no, I did not mean that—you'll perform the ceremony."

"Thanks, Lady Fermor"—he choked down his feelings—"but I am not qualified to take my father's place."

"I'll teach you," insisted Marianne flippantly, "you have only to utter three simple sentences. You ask whether the man will take the woman and the woman the man for husband and wife, you bid them join hands, and then declare no power in heaven or on earth is ever to part them. Surely you can remember that."

"Don't spoil sport, Acton," enjoined Lady Fermor in her deep gutturals. "We have no substitute, unless we call in the inn-keeper—honest man! as they say in his country—and he may not be able to see a joke. You know you have to punch a hole in a Scotchman's head before you can get a joke into him. Never shrink what you've got to do, however much against the grain. I thought that was part of a sailor's creed."

"So it is," said the badgered man, raising his head and pulling himself together. "I'll do what you want. Don't fear that I shall spoil sport, Miss Dugdale—Lady Fermor."

"Are you all mad?" implored Iris, but she spoke in a low tone, and nobody, unless Sir William, heard her.

"Be off, Marianne," urged Lady Fermor, entering into the spirit of the unbecomingly frolic, as she had entered into many another of the same description. "It won't be hard for you to dress in character, since there are no white silks or satins, or veils or orange-blossoms, required here. Your travelling dress will do, and Thwaite need not change his coat. Your cousin Iris will not object to bring you in, and stay as a spectator, unless she holds that the bride's shoes are hers by prior right—as she so many months the senior or the junior of the two? I forget which—and ought not to be filled by other feet. I'll arrange where the men shall stand."

Marianne went out of the room, with Iris following her, sure enough, but Iris did not overtake her cousin as she ran up-stairs before she had passed Jeannie, the chamber-maid, smilingly making room for her. The young lady had a rough whisper for her bumble ally. "Jeannie, I'm coming down again to be married. The house has not lost its spell."

"Eh! Megaty me!" cried Jeannie, instinctively setting down the jug of hot water she was carrying for some gentleman's toddy, that she might not scald herself or any other person in the height of her excitement. But Miss Dugdale had already gone into her room, followed by the other young lady, looking "that taken up" that she did not notice Jeannie.

In reality Iris was moved to the depths of her soul. The moment she was alone with her cousin Iris went up to the little actress and poured forth, for her benefit, such a torrent of passionate upbraiding as the gentlest lips will utter when the heart is stirred with poignant sympathy, and the honourable spirit outraged by what is unfair and ungenerous. "How could you, Marianne Dugdale—how could you have the heart? You may not care for him a bit, but you see how he cares for you, and if you had any pity, any womanly feeling, you would spare him. ■ is only acting, of course, and there might be no great harm in that, but it is brutal—yes, brutal, to get up such a farce, knowing what he is suffering. I cannot tell whether you are making a fool of Sir William also, but you have no right to do that either," said Iris, holding up her head and flushing rosy red. "He is a man who, though he is not much older than ourselves, has had great troubles and sorrows. The knowledge of that alone should keep the most thoughtless girl from harming him—perhaps in a way she cannot guess. I could never have believed it of you, Marianne." Iris ended, exhausted by her vehement defence of her friends and protest against wrong.

Marianne stared with big brown eyes, tried to laugh, turned away her head, to hide her changing colour and drooping eyelids, and cried out ironically—

"Well, this is a trade from a quiet going young lady!" At last she sat down, crossed her arms, and faced her flushed, overcome accuser. "So I don't care a straw for King Lud, and I have a sneaking kindness for Sir William, or rather for his place and title, I dare say. I am going to sell myself for a little rank and wealth, as thousands of girls have done before me. That is the way of it—is it? Will you tell me just one thing, Iris? What business has Mr. Acton to ■ away in such detestable weather, as if ■ face the elements—in the rhetorical phrase, ■ their very dimmest—as a great deal better than a comfortable enough inn with our company? He has no summons from the Admiralty compelling him to start on the instant, he has to get up a story of his mother's being ill and wanting him, and it can't refuse its mamma's lightest whim, pretty dear!"

"Oh, Marianne! how can you be so horribly unreasonable and unkind?" Iris said again with fresh wonder and wrath. "It is not why should Ludovic go, but why should he have stayed so long, in consideration of the little he has got for all he has given? He ■ a good son and brother, however little you may be capable of valuing such a character, and Mrs. Acton is a good mother, who would not grudge her boy his happiness, or make an outcry about her health for the purpose of recalling him. You cannot imagine how much he is thought of, how he is waited and waited for at the Rectory. And he is going to sea and may never come back. Before he knew you he had a happy and honourable life before him, and he loves his people, which you seem ■ think rather ■ flaw in his character. To-day may be the last time we shall see him in this world—dear old King Lud! whom I have liked and respected, boy and man. How I should mourn for him! But how will you look, and what will you say, if you are told next winter or next summer that his ship has gone down to the bottom of the sea, like the Captain and the Ben ■ and the Alacante, and that he has gone down to the depths with it, or that he ■ died far from home in some foreign host?"

However she might look then, there could be no question as to how she looked now, she looked white as a sheet and trembled like an aspen, and what she said was the strange outbreak "Yet ■ he will give his mother the last word, the last look, which ought to be mine."

Then she put up her little hand to her face, and

"Like summer tempest came her ■"

The storm was as short lived as it was violent, and even while Iris looked on in dismay at the effect of her words, the big drops ceased to rattle down, the chest left off heaving with sobs, while Marianne began to accuse herself piteously, passionately, laughingly, for extremes are always ■ meeting. "I am a wretch of a girl, and he's the dearest, best of fellows, as gallant ■ a man as ever stepped, as true as steel, as tender as only the best men can be. And what did you take me for, that you could ■ I preferred Sir William Thwaite, who ■ risen in the world, and been wild, and ■ reformed, and as well enough in his way? But what drowned women did he save? What shipwrecked crew did he rescue? What torpedoes did he help to launch at the peril of his precious life—like—like—like Jove scattering thunder bolts?"

Iris looked up in sheer bewilderment at this extravagant laudation. She was tempted to put in the reservation "Where had he the opportunity, though he, too, fought and bled for his country? And are there not spiritual conflicts and conquests harder and nobler by far than any physical warfare and victory?" But she had not the chance, for it was Marianne's turn to speak, and she was making abundant use of the privilege.

"There is one good deed I have done him, I have saved him from the consequences of an unworthy choice," she said, her voice, which had sounded shrilly eager and exultant an instant before, suddenly sinking in despair.

"No, Marianne. He does not think so, he never will. I have known him since we were children. I know how hard it is to offend Ludovic Acton, how lenient he is to offenders, how sure to forgive," represented Iris earnestly.

"Yes, he will think he has made a fortunate escape, after to-day," persisted Marianne dolefully. "No man could bear what he has had to bear and forget it."

"But you mean to make it up with him before he goes? You won't go on now with this stupid, coarse play, surely, Marianne?" besought Iris.

Marianne shook her head in silent determination to suffer the worst penalty she had brought upon herself, and with a perverse doggedness which was characteristic of the girl. "I cannot, it is too late. It would make no difference now. Besides, we are not on terms to admit of an explanation, and I dare say I will be thankful in years to come that there never has been a ghost of an engagement, or even of a mutual understanding between us," she said sadly. "I would not let him speak, or grant him the least satisfaction. It was a game in the beginning, though it has ended in earnest. Oh dear! I liked it so much while it lasted—to feel my power, and know I could make every thing bright or dark to him by a word, a look. It was dreadfully inconsiderate and selfish to him, no doubt, and I shall be punished as I deserve."

Iris was altogether taken aback, though she had not been without her suspicions. She protested that Marianne would punish at least one other person as well as herself, the innocent with the guilty. And Iris pleaded, "Won't you say, or let me say, that you have thought better of it, and cannot carry out this absurd, unbecoming mimicry of a marriage? That will be some compensation to Ludovic before he goes, and he may understand—my suspect."

"No, no," cried Marianne, starting up in a flesh access of wilfulness and waywardness, "I am not going to crave mercy from any man, or seek to call him back. Besides, I am certain that granny would begin to jeer and taunt me till I became possessed, and then my last error would be worse than my first. Let us act the marriage and have done with the whole thing. I believe he has renounced me already in his heart, let him have the comfort—the sop to his pride, poor fellow, of doing it in so many words. After I have treated him as I have done, and gone so far, I owe him his revenge, and do you think I'll stint him in it?"

Marianne in perfect sincerity doubled in the argument, and twisted it round to make herself and everybody miserable in an ingenious fashion of her own, which is yet not altogether uncommon.

In any imminent danger in which Iris had ever seen a fellow creature, her immediate instinct had always been to save the threatened victim—to save at Iris's expense if need were—as when she controlled her natural recoil and held close the severed artery in her servant's wrist, as when she walked back to Whitehill with Lady Elwaine dressed in a groom's clothes and faced a man in whom she had reason to know she had deeply offended, and whom all her friends and neighbours were then denouncing as a drunken ruffian. The instinct did not fail to assert itself at this juncture. "Let me act the bride," she said with quiet determination. "It will be all the same who takes the part in a piece of child's play that neither Sir William nor I need mind, and it will save you and Ludovic Acton from a last misunderstanding, which, though it is only about a silly joke, may separate you for life."

Marianne hesitated, with changing colour and parted lips. Her susceptible pride and fiery temper had been up in arms a moment before. She had forbidden a compromise, yet she might snatch a reprieve. Her decision would be very much a matter of chance, as were many of the resolutions she formed in her honest but unregulated mind.

In the meantime Iris, awaiting Marianne's answer, frightened to look at her for fear of influencing her, looking on the floor instead, was calling King Lud her brother in her heart and remembering all that his family had done for her—Iris Compton. She was thinking of Marianne's affectionate championship soon after they had become acquainted, and what a different world it had been to a lonely girl, when she had found a bright, frank young companion, generous and lovable even in her transparent follies, constantly by her side. Iris was thinking of Sir Wilfrim and the debt he had already paid to Lady Fernor, and the other debt he had paid to Honor. Iris's mind was even recurring to old stories and old wrongs in which her ancestor had been the wrong-doer and Marianne Dugdale's the sufferer of the wrong.

"What an excellent idea!" cried Marianne suddenly. "You can play the bride, as you say, as well as I. They will not suppose that I have drawn back—only that we have agreed to change places. Indeed, as our hats and travelling dresses are alike, and the light is none of the best, if we had not been so different in height, they might not have known the one from the other," she ended with a little uncertain laugh, beginning to recover her courage and spirits. "I wonder if he will give a great start and gape, forget all I told him, and not be able to proceed with the ceremony? Won't ■■■ look dreadfully foolish? But I shall not have vexed him—the very last thing. Iris, it was taking a despicable advantage of me to work upon my feelings and pretend he would not come back safe and sound—a great, strong, fearless fellow like King Lud, twice as big as our boys at home, with a face like a full moon. Yet, indeed, it is true; but I hate small faces in men, I think they cannot be too big every way. He has so often gone away, and always returned like a bad half penny. I wonder how and when we shall meet next," melting into tenderness, but rushing off at a tangent the next moment. "He can never be so base as to forget 'the girl he left behind him'! Remember, I shall be fit to kill you if he should jilt me, after what you have made me tell you. In the meantime I'll play that tune in my own honour, every day that I can reach a piano till he come back. Must he stay away months? A whole year or more? The man should not have made me so accustomed to his tiresome ways. How will the time pass without them? Shall I grow sick with hope deferred? And do all the girls in my position complain of the cruelty of the Queen and the Lord High Admiral? Who would have said I should be a spoon? How our boys would laugh, and even Cathie and Chattie would giggle. But they shan't know a syllable till he is a captain and able to propose for me to granny or papa in due form. I suppose that will not be till he has made a pot of money, poor fellow, ■■■ keep me with, but if the ruling powers continue long obdurate, we'll know what to do, we'll run straight away to Scotland. Then we'll have to go into sea-side lodgings and be careful of our coals and never allow ourselves an extra pair of boots. Will you still acknowledge us, Iris? you ought to, for you have been at the bottom of the mischief—even though granny has nothing more to say to us. By the way, we must not keep her waiting any longer. She will not stand the further delay of this marriage."

Iris was hardly listening now as they proceeded to put on their travelling jackets and hats of brown tweed, with which they had provided themselves in preparation for what they had been pleased to consider the arctic climate of Scotland. "What a dress for a bride!" cried Marianne in lively disgust.

"But ■■■ is a runaway bride," said Iris.

"Yes, but depend upon it if she ran away of her own accord, she had some respect for her own feelings and those of her bridegroom, and put a bridal touch somewhere to her dress. Besides, my dear child, there must be something to mark the difference between us—in our parts. Here, take this bunch of wet bridal roses—I dare say they are the descendants of Jacobite roses—which Jeannie brought me from the kailyard. Roses are later in the north than in the south; we are not travelled girls, so we may speak of Scotland and England—all we know, as north and south. Fasten the flowers in your jacket."

Iris did as she was bidden to please Marianne, and get the sooner done with the foolish play. The couple hurried down-stairs arm-in-arm and entered the room ■■■ abruptly that it was not difficult to picture an angry father at their back.

Somebody had drawn a table before the corner where Ludovic sat, looking grum. Sir William was standing beside it with a curious mixture of affront—as if doing something preposterous—and wistful yearning and pain in his face.

Lady Fernor sat still in the chair which she had before occupied, but she must have rung for Soames in order to enable her maid to enjoy the little entertainment, for the long, lank functionary was ranged behind her mistress's chair.

The room was dark from the state of the weather, and the old-fashioned little windows, besides the company were not quick enough to take up at once the cue of the roses with which Marianne had obligingly supplied them. Iris had volunteered to act her part, and was doing what she needed to do with a growing reluctance which became so nearly insupportable, that she could not stop to think what she was about, but must hasten through it, behaving like a creature in a dream.

Marianne took the initiative, as she was always disposed to do. She walked straight up to Sir William. There she paused for a second. In truth she was not at all clear how the office of giving away a runaway bride was performed in the strange Scotch marriage. She was afraid Jeanne had forgotten something. Marianne had to use her own judgment, she wisely confined herself to dumb show. She simply dropped Iris's arm and retreated, leaving her cousin standing by Sir William.

King Lud leant forward confounded, yet eager as at an unlooked for release from a piece of sport which had galled him like a wanton insult, a real irreparable injury.

Lady Fermor put up her hand to her eyes, as if to clear her sight, and let it fall again sitting upright, with her eyes glittering, and nodding her head, as if she were the person called upon to bow her consent.

Sir William flushed scarlet, and looked, like a man driven wild, from one to the other. He could read nothing in Iris's little face, it was blank, like that of one forcing herself to stifle every warning inclination and go on with an ordeal.

"Proceed with the marriage, Mr Acton, there is the bride," muttered Marianne ex officio, with a little quiver, partly of laughter, partly of another feeling, in her voice.

Ludovic Acton started up to obey his mistress's behest, while life was once more opening out before him with hope and love and joy among its possibilities. Why had he been such a fool? His acting a marriage was nothing, the merest jest, when Marianne Dugdale was not to play the bride to another bridegroom than himself. It was no worse than fifty charades and tableaux vivants, in which he had taken part. If it had been so, Iris Compton, good little Iris, whom he knew so well and could depend on entirely, would not have been in it. He stood behind the table facing Sir William and Iris, and tried to respond to Marianne's appeal, and to do credit to what she had told him when he had utterly mistaken her intention. He looked imploringly at her for inspiration instead of at the pair before him. He sought to recall the sentences she had repeated to him. If he made a verbal mistake it would be forgiven in an actor who had only once heard his part.

"Will you take this woman for your wife?"

Marianne, who had drawn nearer the couple, turned prompter again—this time on behalf of Sir William, with the pantomime of an emphatic nod, but he took them all by surprise, speaking out distinctly and so loudly as to sound roughly, "I will."

"Will you take this man for your husband?"

"Boo, or 'curtshey,' Iris," whispered Marianne mischievously. Iris smiled slightly as at a dimly apprehended, far away bit of fun, and inclined her head.

The impromptu paison looked despairingly at Marianne, who in answering despair clasped her hands, shaking her head reproachfully at the same time.

"Join hands," cried Ludovic.

Sir William put out his hand and grasped Iris's in so tight a clasp that it half roused her. She made a little motion to draw her crushed fingers away. He was the better actor of the two certainly, but he overacted his part. Iris was so far recalled to herself that she became aware of a stir at the room door. Glancing in that direction she saw, to her vague distress, it had been left open and pushed slightly ajar, and that there was quite a group of people on the threshold, the most of them seeking to see without being seen. Jeanne, the chambermaid, formed one bashful spectatress, another guest was the landlord, a thick set, shock-headed man, who still wore mine host's conventional red waistcoat. But he was not skulking, whatever his companions might be, he held a candlestick with a lit candle in his hand, for the rainy gloaming was fast deepening into night. He looked excited, as if he wanted to come in and either interfere with the performance or join in it.

Apparently Lady Fermor had also detected the intruder, for she called out, "I here, that will do," and sure enough the group melted and vanished, pulling the door close behind them. But her ladyship, who was in high glee, might not so much intend to give a reprimand as to say the scene had been sufficiently represented, for she added immediately afterwards, addressing her own party, "We need not mind signing the register or the bride's 'I do.' Upon my word I have been a very pretty wedding. Let me congratulate you, I believe and Iris—that is my part of the performance, and a very pleasant part it is, I can tell you. You have given us a good notion of what a runaway marriage is like. I suppose, Iris, you thought, after all, you were the fittest match for the bridegroom."

The hands so lately joined had already dropped asunder. Sir William remained standing alone by the table, as if he were trying to reason with himself, to get rid of a momentary hallucination, to cast off a disordering, maddening impression. He did not go near Lady Fermor. He hardly suffered himself to throw a look after Iris as she rejoined Marianne.

"How stupid you were, Mr. Acton," Marianne accused King Lud. "It was I, not you, who married them. I must ask Jeannie if that is correct, and if a woman can marry a couple in this improper little Scotland."

Iris left the room with Marianne to put off their out-of-doors habiliments. As the girls did so, the roses fell unheeded from Iris's jacket on the floor, and would have lain there to be trampled under foot if Sir William had not stepped forward, stooped, and picked them up.

When the cousins came back the subject of the acted marriage was dropped as if by common consent. The talk had turned upon the lieutenant's departure, the hour for which was drawing near. He had engaged a trap from the innkeeper to take him through the rain and darkness to the nearest station, a few miles off. He was far brighter and more animated than he had been all the day, while Marianne Dugdale, on the contrary, became somewhat silent, only emitting an occasional little jet of contradiction and naivness. He announced confidently that he expected to see them all again before he sailed, and nobody deprived him of the hope or forbade him the privilege. If he wrung Marianne's hand in saying good-bye, nobody could see and censure the deed, since she did not wrench her fingers away—for that matter she had not flouted him for the last five minutes; but she cried herself to sleep and bemoaned her former perversity and cruelty, it was the silence and solitude of her room.

Iris thought it was charity to everybody to adopt Lady Fermor's early hours this night. A sudden sobriety which was almost oppressive, the natural result of contending emotions and of King Lud's going, had fallen upon the young people. As for herself she desired nothing better than to be able to recall undisturbed the whole events of the day, including the grotesque farce which she had been involved. When she had thought all over she would dismiss it from her mind at once and for ever.

The dismissal was not quite so easy as Iris had anticipated. She felt haunted by the foolish play; she tossed on her bed sleepless and feverish. When she did drop asleep, she dreamt she had married Sir William Thwaite in earnest without intending it, and what was worse, she had not asked his leave and he had not spoken one word, or given a single glance, a renewal of his passionate love-making and proposal to her in the hayfield at Whitehills four years before. Nay, he had seemed every crisis to turn—with whatever mixed motives—to Marianne Dugdale.

At last Iris slept soundly; but even then she was disturbed by the business of the inn, or by the figments of her own imagination. She thought she heard some one calling her name loudly and urgently, and when she started up in bed and listened and failed to distinguish a voice speaking to her, she seemed to hear the noise of wheels driving rapidly from the door.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—THE BEAST RISES UP A PRINCE.

Iris slept late after a troubled night, and when she awoke and looked at her watch she could take nothing into account save that she had been shockingly lazy; though the sun was shining brightly enough, after the rain, to tempt all exemplary travellers to be up and abroad on unfamiliar ground. Iris grudged losing the bright morning, and she grudged still more keeping Marianne Dugdale, Sir William Thwaite, and Soames hanging about till she should choose to appear for breakfast. She had no time to spare for more than the general confusion with which the incidents of the past day—especially if they have been of an unusual character and crowded together—are apt to present themselves to people on their first awakening from a few hours' welcome oblivion.

Iris for once took refuge in self-evasion, for she had a half-formed notion, after her dim, partly-remembered dreams, that she too had acted rashly and foolishly in what had passed, though it was no more than in being guilty of an appearance of evil in yielding to figure in an indiscreet, not too delicate parody of a solemn service. She might well feel provoked and mortified by discovering that she had put herself—unless her companions were considerate and forbearing—and when had Lady Fermor been either the one or the other?

—in an awkward, embarrassing position? ■ was not to be thought that nobody would ever allude to the rainy day, ■ the inn on the Borders, and the amusement to which the party had resorted in order to spur on the lagging hours. ■ such allusions were made, what was she—or when ■ came to that what was Sir William—to think?

When Iris ran down stairs, half-unwilling to face her companions, and yet eager to have the meeting over, she believed she was later than she had suspected. The maid Jeannie, standing ■ one of the doors on the landing, withdrew into the room, as if ashamed for Iris's credit ■ encounter her at such an hour, and unwilling to detain her, while another servant, Iris fancied, looked at her with titillating significance.

But what was Iris's surprise when she entered the inn parlour and found it empty, with breakfast only laid for one? She rang the bell in a little trepidation, for she was conscious that Marianne was capable of playing her a trick, though Iris considered it would be especially unkind and undeserved this morning.

As another instance of the unexpected happening, the landlord chose to wait in person, bringing in the dish of trout as his excuse for his presence. "Where are the others?" Iris inquired without waiting for the departure of the single rustic young waiter, who was also favouring her with his attentions and showing no hurry in disposing and arranging the tea and coffee service so as to satisfy a scrupulous taste. "Have they all breakfasted and gone out? I am afraid I am very late," and Iris tried to smile instead of feeling absurdly disconcerted.

The landlord did not hasten ■ answer her with civil fluency. He began staring at her in silence. "Do you not know, miss, they are gone?" he said ■ first cautiously.

"Gone!" exclaimed Iris, not able to believe her ears. "Ah! for a morning's excursion, I suppose," she took heart to exclaim. "But Lady Hermon never drives out before luncheon, and Mrs. Soames cannot have left her."

"The ledly and her mud and the other young ledly went first," said the landlord with precision. "The gentleman only left about an hour syne."

"An hour ago? Where have they gone? When are they coming back?" cried Iris in unrestrained bewilderment.

"That I cannot take it upon me to say, miss—you should know better than me. But I apprehend you're in error on one point.

XXV.—c

You seem ■ think all your party went the same gate, nigh hand together?"

Iris nodded, her tongue refused its office. The man looked a respectable man, and was respectful enough in his manner, but the warmth with which he conducted the conversation was remarkable, and there was in his tone the slightest shade of irony not unmingled with dry humour—if she could have recognised it—and a degree of perplexity. ■ was as if he suspected her of still playing a part, and had no objection ■ let her see he suspected her.

"Now, you're wrang there, begging your pardon. First there was the young gentle man who took the trap ■ catch the last train overnight, but I think you were with the four when he set out. Syne, not long past the wint' hours, between four and five o'clock, when the sun was still spittin', afore the inn was richt astir, the auld ledly sent for me and but to be off to meet the first train, though it was a fell like fatigued for a woman at her time of life. Her body woman was dressed and ready like her mistress, but the young ledly seemed laither to quit her pily. She did not come down till the chaise was at the door, and then she made such a colly-shantie calling out for somebody after she was in the carriage, and wanting to stop and go back, that she was like to waken the whole house. But the auld ledly mastered the lassie—that I should speak so unmercifully—and drove off in spite of her. Lastly," and mine host looked still more curiously at Iris from under his eyebrows, "there wis the tuled gentleman, who did not appear to have been disturbed any more than yourself, miss, for he just came quietly down at his usual hour. It was only after he found that so many of the party were gone that he wrote a letter or two in haste—sending off one by a messenger, asked for a time table, and left to meet the mid day train. He did not speak ■ me of coming back when he paid his share of the bill—what was left after the auld ledly cleared the score—though he may have mentioned it otherwise, as it is what one would expect," the speaker observed meditatively. "However, he kilt a bit parcel for you in my hands," the inn keeper went on briskly, as if the truth might lie in this nut shell, extracting a small packet from his waistcoat pocket and placing ■ ostentatiously before Iris, "and ■ need be no secret that it was he wrot one of the letters which were left for you that I jalouse you have not seen." He bustled to bring two letters from where they were stuck conspicuously in a card rack on the chimney-piece and, laying them on her plate, left her at last with evident reluctance and disappointment at her reticence. In any other circumstances Iris would have been amused by the worthy man's inquisitiveness, and by the mingled shrewdness and simplicity with which he betrayed that he had been speculating on her affairs, and putting two and two together in order to bring out the sum of them to his satisfaction. But she was far past such amusement. She sat for a moment, before opening the letters staring at them mechanically with a stunned sensation. The one was in her grandmother's big, blurred, shaken hand-writing, the other displayed the spruce, upright characters which Sir William Whitwell's pen was wont to produce.

Iris tore open her grandmother's letter first. It contained only a few lines—

"DEAR IRIS,—I am glad you have come to your senses at last, though I must own you took me—and I presume more than me—by surprise. However, when that person was perfectly agreeable, there is no more to be said. All's well that ends well. As I think you and Sir William had better be left to yourselves like other young fools, for your honeymoon I have taken myself and Mariann Dugdale off with the greatest expedition. You ought to give me credit for my youthful activity. I trust to see you when you go to Whitehall and I have returned to Lambford.

"I remain your affectionate grandmother,
"MARIANN FERNOR

"P.S.—As Scotch marriages properly tested, which yours can easily be, are quite legal if I were you and I write I should not put myself in the trouble and expense of a remarriage with the benefit of clergy favours, and cake, and a crowd of milk on lookers. Fact, these remarriages are often great mistakes, mere sources of confusion and misconception, so the less you have to do with them, in my opinion, the better, but please yourselves—M.F."

Here at least were honest betrayal and desertion, whether premeditated, or the instant relentless improvement of an unfortunate opportunity for guining an end and paying back the opposition to an impetuous will, Iris could not tell, then or ever. She thrust back the paper with trembling fingers into the envelope. As she turned it over she looked beyond the handwriting and read the address, it was to—

of Whitehall."

She flung down the letter as if it stung her. While she did so a vision of Honor who had last borne the title rose before her. Poor Honor, who had so scandalised the public, had she ever acted more imprudently, or felt so degraded and disgraced as Iris did upon this miserable morning?

Iris read the address of the other letter before she opened it, and it gave her a grain of comfort, for it bore the familiar direction to Miss Compton.

"Madam," Sir William must have written first in his massive letters, then succeeded in "Dear" at the edge, as if conscious, on reading over the note that he was warranted, nay bound, in exchange of confidence, to use the friendly prefix in cold blood. "I am confounded by Lady Fernor's unexpected departure. I feel that she has taken a gross advantage of you by representing in another light what I can never presume to regard as anything more than your having been induced to lend your countenance to a frolic of Miss Dugdale's. Perhaps Lady Fernor means this last act as some thing of the same kind, but a frolic which I am sorely afraid must inconvenience and distress you, for the time is too much of a good thing. I have come to the conclusion that the best I can do for your relief is not to stay here a moment longer. I will go away instantly and wait your pleasure elsewhere. Perhaps I had better stop at Dunsfries in place of following Lady Fernor to Moffat. It sounds too much that you should wish to write to me, but if it is necessary, I shall get the letter at the post office there. You have done so much for me and mine in the past, that I think you will do me the justice of believing that I would do no rather than vex you—for less intrude upon and insult you. "Your obedient servant,
"WILLIAM THWACK"

Here was no treachery, and if she were forsaken the deed was done out of manly, grateful, jealous care for her best interests—as a faithful brother would shield his sister. It was clear that the letter had been written in agitation and with anxious pains, no less than with earnestness of purpose. The strong characters had not faltered, but there were erasures, as if he had found difficulty in expressing himself. Iris was both comforted and troubled by the letter—comforted that her old friend, as she had come to consider him, was not destined to fall lamentably in her estimation by becoming her deadliest foe.

On the contrary he was as innocent as himself and he was judging wisely and acting truly in the painful dilemma into which they were both brought by Irish Icarus's wicked will and their own weakness. Still, however inconsistent, she could not help wasting a regret on the utter extinction of his early feelings for her. His love had not appeared wise or suitable, or even seemly to her—nobody had felt that more strongly than she herself had felt it in those days. Still the knowledge of the destruction, root and branch, of the old desperate regard cost her a pang.

But there was another communication from Sir William besides the letter which he had possibly intended to be left till something had occurred to him at the last moment that had caused him to turn out of the packet and intrust it to the mail-boy. When Iris unfolded the paper she started at the contents. It was a moment while her eyes went in and out in much uncertainty. He had enclosed a ten-pound note, probably the greater part of the money he had taken from her—in a cover, on which it had written in pencil, 'Will you do me the honour to accept this loan in case you should want it?'

'In case she would want it'—as she felt the sentence she uttered the truth fully for the first time. It had been left behind abandoned in what the people of the house might well view as compromising circumstances a young woman alone in a strange inn, on the borders of a remote country. And whether she should determine to follow her own mother, upbraid her with her brutality and insist on her undoing her part of the plot, or attempt the return journey by herself over more than half the length of Ireland to seek the protection of Miss March or throw herself on the old friendship of the Actons at the Rectory—her slender purse would have been unequal to the demands either of the shorter or the longer expedition, since Marianne Dugdale having spent her own quarters' salary had freely borrowed from Iris. She would have been without the means of paying her expenses in any direction had it not been for the humanity of Sir William Thwaite.

Iris felt humbled and distracted, unable to fix what she should do, yet aware that she must do something without loss of time. She tried to swallow her breakfast as the first necessary task to be performed. Then she too, studied the time-bill, but shrank unconquerably from the possibility of encountering

Sir William at the little way-side station. The landlord had spoken of the mid-day train, apparently not many trains stopped at this out of the way junction, and he might not be gone by the time she reached the place.

As she began to recover from the blow and her natural presence of mind and power of resource returned to her, it struck her that the obviously sensible course for her to pursue was to stay where she was, till she had contradicted to the people of the house the false impression they had received. Some then from whatever cause had been witnesses to the carrying out of the ill-tempered jest—in keeping with the old reputation of the house. The misconception of the inhabitants was deepened by their knowledge that irregular, but at the same time lawful, marriages could still be performed within the precincts of the little matter within the entire bounds of Scotland. Above all their curiosity was impinged upon by the closely connected conduct of Lady Fermor.

As Iris reflected, her courage and even her spirits though they had been greatly tried revived a little. In spite of the outrageous interpretation which Lady Fermor had chosen to put upon the story it was simply preposterous. Nobody could treat it seriously for a moment. Neither the patrician bride nor bridegroom was in earnest and as little was King Lud who spoke the words, or Marianne Dugdale who prompted them. She was at the bottom of the practical joke and yet she had strangely though not without protest acquiesced in the innkeeper's going over to the enemy. Of course no reasonable person could attach the slightest importance to the scandal.

Iris did not suffer her heart to fill before the disheartening recollection of the limited number of reasonable persons in the world, in like sorrowful comprehension that the bare breath of the most incredible scandal is blighting even where the sins of the fathers are not visited on the children.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—THE LAW OF IRELAND

Her landlord had appeared to try himself out for Iris's confidence but he had not uttered his suspicions in so many words. Iris had not inherited her grandmother's propensity of invariably choosing men for her advisers. It would be doubly disgraceful for Iris to try to make a man measure the extent of the blue piece of folly—so much folly. Yet she wanted a mouth-piece to tell it to all who would listen. Her security lay in the immediate publication of the truth, and her inclination pointed ■ the bright yet douce girl Jeannie, who had spoken only too graphically and amusingly of the Bowler marriages to the English young ladies.

Iris walking restlessly about the room saw from the end window Jeannie, in her morning calico wrapper, linen apron and bare arms, carrying a great basket full of wrung-out clothes to spread over a washing green. Iris took a swift resolve to go out and talk to the girl and tell her the truth, which she would surely convey to her master and mistress.

Iris found Jeannie busily employed on a haugh or strip of meadow by the side of one of those rapid, white and brown, brawling streamlets, "the bonnie burnies," with their endless songs, which are among the chief delights of the north country. Though the brook was swollen by the rains of yesterday, so that every slippery stepping stone was covered, and its clear water rendered turbid, yet it did its best to flush in the sunshine and "jouk" round each corner.

Jeannie glanced up from her occupation and made one of the "curtseys," which, unless in remote country places, and among very primitive people, form now the depth of respectful greeting reserved solely for royalty.

Iris had grown nervous, or the Jeannie was really shy, or she had been before, and the single look which she gave was not directed so much to the visitor's face as to her uncovered left hand. Was Jeannie looking in vain for that "bit gusie" of a wedding-ring, which, though ■ does not always play a part in the Scotch marriage ceremony, is always bestowed as the first token from the husband ■ the wife, and in this light is regarded as a proof of marriage and universally worn till death in Scotland as well as in England. "Oh! what a miserable day it was yesterday, Jeannie," began Iris, referring to the weather.

"Did you think sae, my leddy?" inquired Jeannie, as if there could be two opinions on the subject, while she completed laying out a row of towels on the grass.

"Did you not think so? Have you so much worse weather?" Then Iris added hastily, with regard to the changed form of address which Jeannie had used, that had struck the listener's roused ear. "But I'm not 'my lady,' only my grandmother, the old lady who left early this morning, is entitled to be 'poken to in that way'."

"As you like, mem," said Jeannie slowly and doubtfully. "You should ken best it is for you to tak' your choice how you're to be ca'd. For the weather, weel, whiles we've deep snaw in the winter, and sleet as late as April, and rain—no' drizzlin' but poorn' in buckets fu', with spates in the burn till ■ rns ower ■ the haugh, and the beasts are flooded in the byre and the stable, and we're keepit in the hoose for twa or three days at a time. But I was meaning that ■ is often the mind that makes the weather ■ folk, the sun will be shinin' for some when there's nocht but cluds for others—div you no think sae, mem? In that case yesterday nichtna hae been sae dowie a day to you."

Jeannie, in spite of her momentary bashfulness, was not unwilling ■ approach the subject Iris wished to discuss. In fact, the girl was dying to pick up some crumbs of information if the young lady would drop them. The whole house was on the alert in reference to the supposed marriage which had taken place, and in addition to Jeannie's craving for a share in an exceptional and half-forbidden experience, the friendly heart pitied "the bonnie young leddy, left her lee lane the day after her marriage, by her very man." This was the great and not to be admired eccentricity in the proceedings which had puzzled and exercised the minds of the inn household, and of such boarders and customers as were privileged to be privately informed of the occurrence. It was not unusual for the bride or the bridegroom expectant to make their entrance on the scene separately, as Jeannie had told Iris and Marianne, but it had been the good old custom that they should make their exit in company.

"Yesterday was dowie, if that means unhappy, to me, Jeannie," admitted Iris with tears in her eyes, "and I am bemoaning ■ at the present moment, though I trust it will not be for long."

"Gude forbid, mem," Jeannie said so solemnly that Iris felt she must beat about the bush no longer.

"What do you think we were so tired of ourselves and of everything else, and so silly as to do, yesterday, in the glooming?"

"I think I ken, mem," said Jeannie with a slightly reproachful accent. It appeared to her that Iris was not approaching the subject in a proper spirit. It seemed as if the young lady was trying, from what motive it would be hard to say, to throw dust in Jeannie's wide awake eyes, and pass off an incredible version of the story on a lass who had heard all about the grand old runaway marriages from her grandmother and her father and mother, who had herself seen humble, discreditable editions of the originals. More than that, Jeannie had been told something of what was going to take place by the other franker young lady. Then the servant-girl had rushed off and informed her master and mistress, as in duty bound. Afterwards she had gone back with them and others and stood at the door of the room, and had heard and seen the couple take each other for man and wife, and join hands before witnesses in due form, till the old lady, who did not look offended either, put an end to the spectacle.

Jeannie was "ill pleased" by what struck her as levity on the part of Iris, by her trifling with the truth, to which she, Jeannie, could swear, if need were. She commenced re-wringing the drops of water from the wet towel with all the strength she possessed. As she did so she said something plausibly, to show she would not be taken in, for why need the bride come to Jeannie and pretend to confide in her, if the young lady was to begin by speaking deceitfully?

"Theither miss telled me as she passed me on the stair that there was going to be a marriage—I thought she said she was going to be married herself, but I maun hie taken her up wrang. An' I telled the maister, as I behoved to do, and him and me and thether in the house stood at the door and saw the waddin'. I may hae ta'en a liberty, mem, but I did ye nae wrang, for there was nae body pursuing to track you, and the maister wither the better for you and yours. ■ is only when the couple is like to be caught in the act, or when there's mischief in the wind, that sic a business is done hidlin'."

"But, Jeannie, there was no marriage," insisted Iris. "We were all in jest, we were only making a little play out of your marriage."

"Dinna tell me that grown up men and women, educate leddies and gentlemen, would play sic a fule trick here," cried Jeannie incredulously, and with high disdainfully.

She took up a pillow-case, and, hoking it up high, shook it as if in protestation, till she brought down a shower of glistening drops upon her brown hair and ruddy face. Then she dropped her bare brown arms by her side and said severely—

"It's nae matter o' mine if any tilled kiddy likes ■ lee—I beg your pardon, mem, I micht hae fund a safter waird, but I'm no used to cringing ony maister than to doddle tongues. My folk's a' honest and steady, though they're only pair working men and women, no sae muckle as a runawa' marriage after a feen' market among the whole lot o' us, as the maister kens. I put it to you, mem—my leddy, I should say," Jeannie corrected herself with malicious punctiliousness, "though it may not be your will to tak' your title for a time, how can I or onybody in his or her senses credit that you were a' daffin' w' me anither at a wild game? It was hardly fit for bairns, though ■ could be said for them, for aye thing, they wouldna ken its danger. But, if you were just wihin' awa' the close o' a rainy day, what for did the lave o' the players melt awa' at ance like a snaw ba' and gang their wa's here and there, and leave you and anither to bear the wyte? Well-a-wat ■ would hae been but richt and kind if he had bidden still to bear his new-made wife company, however, there's an odds ■ the man nae o' gentle and simple, and he may hae gone on a richt gude errand, and be back again like a shot," continued Jeannie, recovering her good-humour as she built up her edifice to her satisfaction.

"You are wrong, Jeannie, altogether wrong," was all Iris could say.

"Maybe sae," answered Jeannie cautiously, not liking contradiction, but certainly doubtful where this ill sitting, loose tongue could come into the bawking. "There was them that telled me when he came down in the mornin' and fund the feck of his friends gane, and saw the letter for you—the one w' the proper address—he grew as red as fire, and there was a glint in his een like a man who has gotten his heut's desire—he it a cuon, or a lass, or a lad bairn. Next he grew as white as death, and there were drops o' waite on his brow, as he gripped the table after the fashion o' a man who is riven in twa in his contention w' his deadliest enemy. Syne he stichtened hussel and gie a scuch, and said he was gangin' immediately. He wrat a letter or twa, and sent aff a messenger express w' me and laid theither down, and cried for the time-table, paid the lawin' and walked out without looking ower his shoulder for his breakfast. But when he was as far as the yett what did he do afore he gae?" asked Jeannie, resuming her tone of superior knowledge and settled conviction. "He cam' back and put up siller—you'll no hinder the maister frae kennin' what he was taking care o'—and left it, like a canny young gudeman, for the use o' his young gudewife, though he did not ca' her sae, in case he should be detained longer than they foresaw, till he cam' back to fetch her. What mak' you o' that, mem? Is that part o' a fule play? My leddy, it is neither fair nor wise ■ seek to daiken the truth, the deil—that I should name him—only Lena wherefore, even to a stranger lass, your inferior in worldly station, who yet would never harm you, but would stir it up for you if she got the chance, and you needed her countenance."

"Woman!" said Iris in the vehemence of her reproof and the extremity of the moment, "I would not depart from the truth save my life, any more than you would, and if you are a happy girl in being able to boast of the virtue of your kindred, it should not make you hard to others less fortunate. You, a girl like myself, will not believe me, where can I hope to find trust?"

Overcome by the successive shocks of the morning Iris could only restrain by a gasp at effort the sob that rose to her throat in the tears to her eyes.

Jeannie's sharp eyes took in the signs in the really kind heart of the girl under her stolid independence and in her shrewd observation was for her.

"Na dinner yet, my laddy, or morn you please. I'll believe anything reasonable you like to tell me, and gif there has been ony fause or ba' trick played upon you, I'll do my best to see you right it, though I'm but a bairn int lass, and ye will the mistress and the mistress, which is near to the purpose. I'm free to own they weren't wise to me specin the int an' outs o' the story if you gild me the chance. But if a him, wouid is to do you ony guid, morn you mun speak out, and I'll be nothing back that has to do wi' the case."

Iris could recognize the common-sense of the recommendation, and in the circumstances she felt she had better meet Jeannie's advances. After all, however much Iris' shrinking delicacy and the prejudices of her education recoiled from bestowing the confidence, there might well be worse confidants and counsellors than a peasant bride Jeannie with her perfect common honest mud-coloured warm heart, in a ready wit.

"It was as I said, Jeannie. Miss Dugdale, my cousin, proposed me int one of your many marriages and went to dress as a marriage bride. But I did not like the play, and I liked it best of all for her, because she and one of the gentlemen—the taller and surer of the two—were sweethearts, though she had never let him know that she cared for him, indeed, she had been teasing and vexing him all the morning."

Jeannie was intensely interested and appreciative. "Biting and scurving are Scotch folks' woin'," she said. "The young laddy man has a drap o' guid Scotch blude in her veins. There's mony a Maggie has 'cuist her head and looked fu' skeich' to begin wi'. But you manna stand and wear yoursel' oot, when you may hae eneuch afore you." And Jeannie nimbly emptied out her basket, turned it over, and made Iris sit down upon it. ■ ■ ■ did not signify that Jeannie was in danger of losing the best of the morning for bleaching and "withering" her "claes." Such a cause—the last grand marriage that was ever likely to be enacted in the inn, about which there might be trouble in time to come—even the mistress must allow, justified the wasted sunshine.

"It was not the man she liked in that way she had arranged should be the mock bridegroom." Iris stung Jeannie to will the story.

"Na, I could guess that," commented Jeannie from her own experience and in a kindly instant.

Mr. Acton—her real lover, I mean—was much hurt, and as he had to go off last night to see his family and join his ship—he is a sailor—there would have been no time for a reconciliation and I fancied the thoughtless offence might have parted the two for ever."

"For a tun clumed in Jeannie decisively. "If th' child had ony spunk! Eh! but she mun hae been a willin' hettless lass."

"I said I would be the bride instead of Miss Dugdale."

"It was a guid ye you mean, very guid, but waeo' fule hands declared Jeannie with her characteristic plain speaking. "Then that deaved the wench's o'cht to hae run the risk and borne the blame."

We had not the slightest idea, and I cannot see it yet, that there was the least danger or that there could be a mistake when none of us, neither bride nor bridegroom, nor the gentleman who consented, ■ ■ ■ say the words which you use in your marriage ceremony, meant anything by it."

"Then what for did they 't' slip awa' like a knotless thread and leave you and the titled gentleman, who mun hae been the bridegroom,—deed I seed him in the character wi' my ain een, and a braw bonnie bridegroom he looked—to suffer the scathe and the scorn?" questioned Jeannie with natural unmasked impatience.

It was the old lady—Irby Fumor, who is grandmother both to me and Miss Dugdale, that did it, and this is the painful part of the story," confessed Iris with furious blushes. "She has a great friendship for—for Sir William I hwaite—you know his name already

She wished greatly that there should be a marriage between—between him and either of her grand daughters—first one and then the other, but she has not been able to bring ■ about I suppose, but I cannot tell, that she suddenly thought when the temptation met her, for I cannot believe she brought us all this distance to lead us into a snare,' cried Iris, wringing her hands, "she would make the jest look like earnest, deceive Sir William and frighten Miss Dugdale and me into imagining there was nothing left for us but to be married truly."

"Oh, the auld bizzum! forgive me, mem, since she is your granny, but ■ ■ a sair pity when the auld, who suld be thinking o' a better place, has neither conscience nor mercy, and are fit ■ sacrifice their bairns and their burns' bairns if it will but compass some waridly plan of their ain. But what for did the other young leddy forsake you when you had done her sic a service?"

"I cannot tell, Jeannie," said Iris sadly. "But I think Lady Fernor and her maid must have misled my cousin up to the last moment and then forced her away. If so, she will never rest till she finds me out, I can trust her for that."

"You'll no think me impudent, mem," said Jeannie gravely, "gin I say I cannot altogether comprehend, though I dinna misdoobt your word. But I mun hae a' the arts and parts o' the story to gie to them that may help you. There were letters left for you—one o' them directed to Liddy Thwaite, you opened brith, as gin you were free to do't—nor by token, the gentleman sent you money for your use."

It was unmistakable that Jeannie, though genuinely indignant on Iris's account because of what the young lady had told the girl, still clung with a certain faith to the marriage, partly because of the perplexing contradictions she had alluded to, partly from a natural reluctance ■ find that her first, and it might be her last, example of a real grand runaway marriage was likely to end in smoke.

Iris sat aghast at these fresh complications. Were the meshes of the net closing round her? But she would strive to the last ■ break through them.

"The letter addressed to Lady Thwaite was in my grandmother's handwriting. I knew the handwriting and looked no farther. I never doubted it was written to me."

"It was a thousand pities you tore open the envelope, for a written word gangs far in law. ■ make, nae odds what you did wi't, though you hae burnt ■ to ash, for ■ dizen folk could swai to the direction, and you daured na deny you opened and read the letter."

"But it was not Sir William who addressed it," argued Iris with a faint blush, "I could understand the name would be of moment then. Think, Jeannie, anybody might write a letter to you calling you by a name which the writer had no right to give you, and you might open the letter by mistake, but the unwarrantable name would signify nothing, could not implicate you."

"You forget, mem, the ither proofs," said Jeannie, who had the logical head and the good parish schooling of many of her nation.

"I have a letter from Sir William Thwaite, mentioning the marriage as a blot and addressed to me as Miss Compton. Will that letter not contravert the other?"

"Well, it suld do something," granted cautious Jeannie. "But what about the money for your use, mem?"

"He sent it to me as a loan lest Lady Fernor should have gone away and left me without curing to ascertain whether I had enough in my purse to pay my railway fare in following her, or in going back to my other friends in England. The precaution was justifiable," said Iris, flashing out in the middle of her patient humility and holding up her fine little head in the old style. "We had many expenses when we were in town. I had lent Miss Dugdale part of my last quarter's allowance and I had not got the money for the next quarter—I was nearly penniless."

"The heartless, hard-fisted auld sorry," cried Jeannie, unable to restrain herself or even to offer an apology for her freedom of speech. "Even a servant lass like me, gin she be wise, has naively a pund or twa in the savings' bank, or a couple o' croons in her hat to fe' back upon. But you pair young leddies, who mustna mint at working for your ain hands, as often as helpless as bairns, and mair hardly dealt wi' by evil parents. Well, mem, I hae you noo. I can follow your tale, though as sure's death it's gey daft like, still it's within the bounds o' possibility, and it's no aye the daftest last that gits into trouble. For my part I believe you ilka word, and sae micht juryinen and judge, if it were iver to get into a court, though the auld leddy and her maid were to take false oaths—as you may swear the 'I am wouidna stick at, and though the direction o' the letter and the money and a' were brocht in. But loosh! mem, it was playin' wi' fire to play at a Border marriage, on the very spot, as gin the spirit o' the place possessed you. The mere word o't micht stick to you and bleck you ■■■ your dooin' day. What modest lass—be she o' the laigest degree, would care to gang into a court and be speered and back speered by staggering running blackguards o' lawyers, about sic a job? The bare word o' the scandal would stick ■■■ her."

"But the story's far too absurd for a court—who would carry it there? not even Lady Fernor," pled Iris.

"You dinna ken," said Jeannie, who preferred to look ■■■ all sides of a question, and rather inclined to take the dark side, "one can never tell how boots will row or what ferries may come to pass. It might be a score ■■■ fifty years hence, when maist who could hae telled the truth were gane, gin you had married and had barns, and ony money were to be left to them, or to yourself, and there were ither elements for the miller who heard a sough lingering here o' what happened last night, hecht! it micht cost your lads and lasses their birthright and cast shame on their mither in her grave."

"Oh, Jeannie, don't be a prophet of evil," implored Iris, "and surely there is no need to look ■■■ fur forward."

"Duch, that is just what there is need o', and a fur outlook is a grand thing. Could you no walk it up among yourself's," suggested Jeannie, feeling her own responsibility and striving to give the most direct advice to the young English lady who had been so simple in her uprightness and was so gentle in her tribulation. "The wild gentleman seems to be a manfu' mindfu' chip and a kind lad, taking ■■■ into account that he was made a cat's paw o' as weel as you, by the auld ledly, for I fancy he was seekin' the price o' either o' you twa young ledlies. I say nuthing o' his being a grand match, though when a' else is right, wile and a landskip and a Sir before his name are God's gifts and no to be luckily disposed by any prudent young ledly. He's four fine ill faured and you're a rare bonnie, civil-spoken young ledly, gin you'll let me say sae. You would mak' a braw young couple—your granny was no far wrang there. Noo, you're baith in the scrape, could you no think ower't and gin there be nae ither lad or lass standin' between, which maks a fell odds, could you twa no draw thegither and mak' the best o' what has happened? Whiles a prudent marriage is so the want, and they say—

"Happy's the man
That's no lang o' do o'."

"Jeannie!" cried Iris, starting up as if the girl had been suborned by Lady Fernor to betray her grand daughter's confidence which she had forced herself to give. "How can you say such a thing, after I had proposed to be my cousin's substitute, as if I were offering myself to Sir William and throwing myself ■■■ the head of the man I rejected with scorn years ago?" persisted Iris, betrayed into casting down the last barrier of reserve she had jealously guarded.

"Keep me!" retorted Jeannie, "here's another cat louped out o' the poke, no that it mak's ony great differ that I can see, except to prove the heart's gudeness o' the fine lad Cammy! mem, you're under the obligation to mind what I say, and troth I dinna ken that I would do what I bade you, myself. But I maun mak' you aware o' something mair bearing on this work. I spoke to you about my auld granny who has a' her wits about her and minds fine yet ■■■ the grand runawa' marriages lang syne. She bides wi' a single woman, a niece, a' her ain barns being dead lang syne, in a hoosie by the roadside—the road that leads to the station. Granny's an ill sleeper, and in summer she often gets up by screech o' day, and puts on her duds—she's fit for that yet—and creeps to the door for a breath o' the caller mornin' air. She was at the door this morning when the chaise wi' your ledly granny passed, driving to the station, and my granny has sent for me in syne. She thinks she kenned the auld ledly. Granny had time to look at her, for the horse next the hoosie had gotten a stane in ane o' its fore feet, and the driver drew up and lited down to pick ■■■ oot, just forenent grunty. And the auld ledly stood up and kent oot and kenned him. Granny will hae it she kenned baith the face—though it was a bantle aulder, and the vice as weel as the rampaging way. Granny says it was a ledly who ran awa' frae her man, and came wi' a lord as ill as herel ■■■ ■■■ buckled thegither on the Borders. But the man who married the couples there rusted. He said it was clew against the law o' Scotland. Had the twa been bachelor and maid, or widower and widow, he could have joined them sae as nae man could fowse them, but ■■■ couldna an' he wouldn't, and it would be ■■■ muckle as his place was worth, for him ■■■ marry sicca a couple. For the auld marriage law o' Scotland was to aid the helpless and defend the wack, but never to paunder to sin."

CHAPTER LXVI.—IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN.

THEY went into the little room where the pine knots were blazing, the tea tray standing by the arm-chair cosily, the foot-stool drawn quite near.

"You shall sit there," Genevieve said to the Canon, moving the chair forward in nervous unconsciousness. "And tell me what has brought you to Netherbank on Sunday evening during service-time—tell me quickly, please?"

She spoke strangely, trying to speak quietly, trying to speak lightly. Her lips quivered, not knowing whether they should smile or no.

"It is a little out of the usual order of things, is it not?" said the Canon, taking her two hands in his. She had knelt down by his side, and was resting with one elbow on the broad arm of the chair. Kneeling so she could look into the old man's face, and try to read all that he might hesitate to speak. Assuredly he had that to say which might make him hesitate.

"It is a little out of the usual order of things," he said, keeping the girl's hands in his, and looking outwards, beyond the boundary of anything he saw. "My new curate, Mr. Summerhayes, is taking the evening service entirely, and that is not usual. I happened to have stayed at home, and that is not usual. Then there came a visitor to the Rectory, and the visitor was Mr. Kirkoswald. . . . It has all been unusual."

"Mr. Kirkoswald?" exclaimed Genevieve, for the moment surprised out of all fear. "He is able to go out?"

"He has been out this evening for the first time."

"Why should he have chosen to go out in the evening?" the girl asked, conscious again of hidden dread, and some bewilderment.

"He did not choose, dear. He went on an errand of mercy."

Then, for the first time, the Canon looked into Genevieve's eyes, while she looked into his, reading there nothing to put an end to fear.

There was a distinct and impressive pause. The flames of the fire went up with a rhythmical beating; the clock ticked audibly, the Canon's grasp tightened upon the girl's white hands.

"And that errand of mercy concerned me?" she said at last, turning her beautiful dark eyes, and her pale, finely-cut face toward the old man again.

"Yes, my child," he said, feeling and knowing that he need dread no scene, that the woman who knelt at his feet was one who might have gone to her death as Agnes and Perpetua went to theirs; and who therefore might meet the tidings of the death of him who was nearest and dearest to her with something of the same courage with which she would have met the sentence of her own death, with something of the same martyr heroism, something of the same Christian fortitude.

"Yes, my child," he said, "it concerns you, even as it concerns himself. His emotion was such that he could not come here to night. He asked me to come. . . . He has asked me more than that. . . . He has asked me if I would be to you a friend . . . a father."

So it was that knowledge came—the knowledge that she had no other father.

No cry went upward. No word broke the silence.

"I tell you, hope is grief's premonition,
That only men's misadventures of despair,
He did tonight in anguish through the midnight air
In a whisper tell a God a thing he had seen
On shrieking and rejoicing."

For a long time Genevieve lay with her head on Canon Kirkoswald's arm, stricken, but not unconscious, bereaved, yet knowing that she might then know of her bereavement. All that she might know then. No bereaved woman ever knows all in that first moment when death has but just closed the eyes that were ever open to watch and guard her, but just sealed the lips that were ever eloquent at her need.

It is Time—Time, the healer of other griefs, that tears open this wound afresh at every point of contact with a hard and blind, a self-seeking and ungenerous world.

The arrangement is merciful. ■ foresight were added to the anguish of loss, then were grief beyond consolation. The arrangement that denies consciousness of aught save that one form lying peacefully in the arms of Azazel is most merciful.

After a time Genevieve raised her head and looked with tearless eyes into the Canon's face again, and spoke with quivering lips—

"I have not misunderstood?" she said, speaking as people speak who awake from the effect of some anæsthetic that has confused the senses and changed the voice. "I have not misunderstood, my father is . . ."

"Your father has fallen asleep, my child."

And even as the old man spoke, the words that Noel Bartholomew had used only the night before came as if she heard them again—

"Remember your wish, dear, when you know that I am sleeping better."

Had he known? Had he felt that such great weariness as his, weariness of life, of work, of pain, of disappointment, had he felt that such weariness was significant of coming rest? Even as she asked herself the question she knew that he had felt it, that he had known it long. He had prepared himself for this quiet falling asleep.

She did not ask more questions, but Canon Gabriel wisely thought that it would be better to tell her than all that there was to be told, then while her stun was greater than her sorrow, then before consciousness to the sound of her father's name, to the mention of aught connected with him, had come upon her, as so surely it would come.

She listened very patiently while the Canon told his tale, heightening the halo of quiet spiritual beauty that was about it. She spoke of her own last sight of her father, of how she had watched him going up to the moor, gliding away out of the shadow into the full light of the morning sun. She had known nothing of the letter that had been in his hand. The Canon told her of it, and she felt its significance as a factor in the thing that had happened. None could know as she knew how her father had shrunk from the gentlest and kindest human intercourse, how he had suffered from even the unthinking, and how any signs of evil will had preyed upon him "like night fires on a hearth." None could know as she knew, yet both Canon Gabriel and George Kinkor would have partly perceived the meaning and weight of that one small incident. The letter was in Kinkor's hands now, and it was still unopened, the Canon told her.

"Then it shall remain unopened," she replied. "Since he never knew what it contained, I will never know. It shall not be opened and they shall know that it was never opened."

"You are speaking of Mr. Richmond?"

"I am speaking of all who have done this," the girl said, rising to her feet and uplifting her clasped hands passionately. "I am speaking of all who have done this—who have done my father to death. . . There is a word, I will not use it, but all my life I shall know that there is no other word. . . . My father! my father! my father! all my life that word will ring in my ears at the thought of you!"

Yet no tears came. Her eyes were beginning to ache and burn with the hot unshed tears that were behind them, and her hands were very chill. The Canon took them again in his, and drew her gently to his side.

"Sit down, dear," he said with that gentle loquacity in his persuasive voice that none could hear and resist. "Sit down beside me, and let us speak of him—of your father. Let us think together of what he would say to us if he might come back for an hour. If, as it is thought, he fell asleep quite early this morning, this day will have been to him better than ten thousand days of such existences as ours. Think if he could come back untroubled in heart and brain, illumined, enripi in the atmosphere of that world where life is love, untroubled far, far above all that bound, and warped, and narrowed his vision here, imagine him here by us, listening to us, replying to us. Can you think what reply he would make to that bitter cry you uttered just now?"

No answer came. Genevieve's white lips were closed in pain. Only her eyes betrayed that she had heard, that she understood.

"Would he not remind us," the Canon went on, "of that last word uttered on the Cross eighteen hundred years ago, yet echoing across the world till now for our example?"

"Father, forgive them for they know not what they do!"

So your father might jerk in large pity and comprehension of your weakness, of your excusable feeling. I cannot think that that feeling would be his. Had he not gone away, had he merely had an attack this morning similar to the one he had before, and then recovered, I cannot believe that he would for a moment have blamed any one. I think he knew himself he was less strong than others believed him to be. I think Dr. Armitage feared some such sudden seeming event as this for him. It is more than probable that he had had a sleepless night, he went out without having tasted food of any kind, and he climbed to the last height of Langbarough Moor. What so certain as exhaustion? What so likely as consequent sudden failure of vitality? . . . And what so painful to him now as to know that you are entertaining a wrong and unjust impression, to perceive, as he may indeed perceive, that the beauty, the stillness, the goodness that was about him on that sunny hill-top to the last moment, is all unnoted by you, that you are not thankful that he had no pain or fear, that he was, and, ■ a moment, was not, for God took him? How can we know what angels came and ministered to him there, closing his eyes in peace, and filling his spirit with peace, and bearing him away to be for ever in that peace that passeth ■ understanding? And is all this nothing ■ you, my child? Can you turn from it and see only a dark, embittering consequence of human error and mistake? At the worst it has been mistake. And have you no pity for those who have made it? ■ they should, unfortunately and unhappily, take the same view that you are taking, does not your heart burn within you even now to go and comfort them? Do you not yearn to make them see how all their error and perversity and want of charity has been changed in the crucible—the crucible—of God's loving kindness till it has turned to peace, and rest and perfect spiritual beauty? . . . Do not think that I underestimate the pain of parting. I, who have said so many farewells, am not likely to do that. But it is not all pain, do you see, and it is none of it bitter now, even to you this should not, it must not, be bitterness.

Genevieve listened, still with that look of something that was almost stupor on her face. It seemed to be deepening there. She kissed the old man's hand when he had spoken, then she looked into his eyes again.

"I will try to be good," she said simply. "I will try to be very good, and I will remember all that you have said. . . . But you will not leave me, Simon Gabriel? You will not leave me here? . . . You will take me ■ Usselby? . . . You will let me see him—you will let me sit beside him to night?"

"I will certainly not leave you here, my child," the Canon said. "And for the rest, I have arranged ■ all with Mr. Kirkoswald. I cannot take you to Usselby to night, that would not be possible, but you shall go there to-morrow. You are to go home with me now, if you will be so good, so kind to an old man as to let him have the privilege of taking care of you for awhile. . . . I have left instructions about your room with my housekeeper, Mrs. Knottingley, and the cab that brought me here will be back again directly. I told the man to come in an hour. Can you be ready? And your little maid, she will come with you, she will be useful and helpful to you, and she will not be a stranger. It was Miss. Knottingley who thought of that."

Fortunately Keturah came in whilst they were still speaking, and the Canon went to her and told her all that might be told, and gave her such instructions as were needful. Genevieve gave none. She did not move nor speak. When the Canon came back and sat down again she listened, sitting beside him, pale and placid and still. The little table was there with the tea tray on it, the kettle was on the hearth, the fire was dying down sadly, as if it knew that it would be relighted no more. All about the room the household treasures were lying, the pictures, the books, the flowers, the music. Were they all stricken with some strange change that they looked so? Surely such things vary in expression, and respond to our own mood! It was no hardship to leave these now. Keturah came in with swollen, tearful face, bringing Genevieve's cloak and hat, and she stayed to put them on, wondering at her mistress's unstrained face, and bright, fearless, expressionless eyes. "Did she see anything with those eyes?" the girl wondered. "Was she hearing anything, understanding anything?"

They went out all together into the blue starlit night, Genevieve leaning on Canon Gabriel's arm. He felt the shudder that shook her whole frame when Keturah locked the cottage door, turning the key with a loud click. That one shudder was the only sign.

As she went along the stubble-field her whole life there came back as in the flesh that comes to the drowning man—her life and another life. . . . And this was the end, this sudden going forth in the darkness of the night with comparative strangers to seek a home in a strange house, whilst he—he was there, far off among the pine woods—nay, beyond the pine woods, beyond the stars above them, gone beyond all touch and reach of hers for evermore.

What wonder that deep down in her heart there should be the cry—

"All thy waves and storms are gone over me. The waters compass me about, even to the soul the depth is closed upon me. The weeds are wrapped about my head."

CHAPTER LXVII.—"LADY, YOU UTTER MADNESS AND NOT SORROW."

THERE is in this north country of ours a proverb which says that "A bad tale gangs faster afoot than a good tale gangs a horse-back." The sorrowful news of Noel Bartholomew's death must have been conveyed by all swift means possible. By nine o'clock on Monday morning ■ was everywhere.

Now that he was gone where unkindness might pain him nevermore, nothing save kind words were said.

All that had been counted so inadequate in him was praised as the natural simplicity and humility of genius in all ages. His want of manner became genuine unaffectedness; his occasional brusqueness of speech was recognised as manful honesty; his unsociality was admitted to be the natural love of reclusive ways of living common to all workers or thinkers to whom work and thought are realities of life. One-half of that sacred wine of charity and sympathy which was poured out to the memory of the dead man would have made his life dear to him—so dear that he had desired to live on, to work on.

"Not go to heaven, but linger here,
Here in my earth, earth's very man my friend."

Did he hear now? Did he know?

There were people who would have given much to see him back again, had it been but for one half-hour. Those pathetic eyes were not without power now that they were closed not to be opened again till the shadows flee away in the light of the Resurrection Morning.

This February day was, as the day before had been, bright, and sunny, and unusually mild. Not a twig stirred as George Kirkoswald rode down from Usselby to inquire how Genevieve was. He did not stay long at the Rectory. The Canon had not seen Genevieve since the previous evening. He could only say that he feared that the night had gone harshly with her. She had not slept; and no tears had come to her relief.

"I promised to bring her to Usselby to-day," the old man went on to say. "I must keep my promise, and I think it may be well for her to see him. But I doubt—you will excuse my saying it—I doubt if she will be equal to seeing you."

"I should not dream of expecting it," George said. He was looking pale, and thin, and worn, and he was still very weak. The events of the previous day had shattered him, as they could not fail to have done.

Yet he was easy to see even now that his illness and his sorrow had not been all loss. There was surely gain in the clearer light that was in his dark, deep-set eyes; in the look of larger peacefulness that was upon his broad thought-lined forehead, in the finer sympathy that was written in the lines about his firm mouth. The Canon could not but wonder and be glad as he watched him riding away from the Rectory.

He rode back quietly, deciding as he went that when he reached the moor he would take the bridle path to the right and go to Yarrell to ask how Miss Richmond was. He had left her last night with Jael when he went out, but she had gone almost immediately. He had heard nothing of her since, and her face had haunted him persistently, coming through and between all the other haunting sights and sounds that had shadowed his experience in the few hours that had intervened.

He would never forget. To the end of his life he would see that still, placid figure lying on the moorland, with the noble face upturned to the luminous sky where the young moon was gleaming with almost dazzling brilliance, and the silver stars shining in the clear radiant ether. And for him, as for another, the plover's cry would henceforth have one meaning: a meaning that no words and no other sounds might express with the same piercingly-cadenced exactness.

Was he surprised, or was he not surprised, when he rode over the brow of Langbarough Moor to find that Diana Richmond was there, not twenty yards away from the road that led across the ridge? She turned and stood still, waiting there with her black dress dropped upon the heather, and her white face uplifted as the face of one who pleads with a judge for mercy. George dismounted, and held out his hand.

"I was coming to Yarrell," he said, speaking gently and kindly. "I have been anxious to know how you were, very anxious. I was not able to come over last night."

The only answer was a half-uncomprehending stare from eyes that were heavy with long weeping. George could see now that the white face before him had a strangely stricken look. It was not difficult to understand. For a woman who had so seldom seen death in any form the shock of yesterday must have been very terrible—all the more terrible because of her connection with the events of the past few weeks. He remembered; yet he felt only pity, and only pity was in his look.

"I was coming to you," she said, speaking as if her voice had been pitched in some other key since he heard her last; changed to something natural, yet, in a sense unnatural, because sincere and true and tuned to accord with the realities of pain. "I was coming to you," she said; "not to your house—not there; but near it. I wanted to see you. I could not have slept again if I had not seen you."

"I need hardly say that if there is anything I can do, you may command me," George replied. One of his firm and strongest in-instincts was the instinct that prompted him always to help any woman who might be in need of help. ■ was as natural to him as to breathe. The fact that between Diana Richmond and himself there had been relations not of the pleasantest did but make him more consciously anxious to be of use to her if he might. Therefore ■ was that he said so sincerely, "You may command me. . . . Cecil, I know, is not at home."

"No, and if he were it would not matter," Diana replied. "Cecil cannot help me. . . . No one can help me."

"If you are in trouble, and I fear you are," George replied, turning to look into her face again, and speaking with that authoritative kindness that sits upon some men so naturally, "perhaps it would comfort you, do you some good, even ■ speak of it. . . . Don't think I am curious or inquisitive."

"I think nothing of that kind," interposed Diana. "I must speak of it. I must speak of it all, or go mad. Thus ■ no exaggeration. My brain has reeled, my consciousness has been shaken, more than once since last night I have been to near the borderland of madness that I have taken a book and tried to read ■ see if I could still understand the speech and meaning of sane men. . . . I know something of these things—of monomania. It has been in the family for generations—the tendency to dwell upon one idea till no other was possible. . . . I do not say this to excuse myself, to win your sympathy. I say it ■ explain myself, my reason for coming here. I do not wish to go mad, therefore I would not brood alone over things that may make me mad. . . . I want you to listen, that is all I want. I want you to be patient whilst I . . . whilst I tell you how I came to murder the man I loved."

Miss Richmond paused. They had been walking onward slowly, now she stopped and turned, looking into George Kirkoswald's face with conscious, grief-filled, earnest eyes—eyes that had no madness in them, though he looked for some, hearing the thing she said. She understood "No," she went on, "I am quite sane. I think I must be saner than I have ever been, since I see my life so clearly. ■ has always seemed a confused life. I have drifted on in the dark from one rock to another. Now it is as if daylight had come, and shown me all I had passed over, or as if some one had watched me, and then had written my life that I might see what it had been. I see ■ as clearly as that, and the sight is—I cannot tell you what it is. When I think of words that face comes, it comes as I saw it yesterday, as I shall always see it—white, and cold, and grand, and dead. You will believe that then words have no meaning."

They were still standing there in the soft sunshine. George had his hand on his horse's bridle, and at moments Bevis was impatient.

"Would it not be better if I were to go back with you to Yarrell?" he asked. "You are looking tired. ■ would be wiser of you to go home. You shall tell me all there."

"Let me tell you here," Diana said wistfully, and turning as if to go toward the place where she had sat so long the day before. "Let me speak here where the end came—the end of my deed. It may be that ■ can hear it may be that he will forgive. All night I have been asking him to forgive. I dare ask no other forgiveness till I feel his."

They had come to the edge of the valley on the moor at last, the place where her attention had been arrested only a few hours before. She could see the stone lying in the sun. There was the little grassy knoll from whence ■ had plucked the pink-tipped daisy. Miss Richmond kept the withered daisy.

She sat down at some distance from the stone, but she could see it as she sat, and her eyes were drawn there half against her will, while George led his horse a few yards away and fastened the bridle to the stump of a dead thorn-tree. Then he came back and sat down on the heather opposite ■ where Diana Richmond was sitting.

She sat silently for awhile. It was difficult to begin again, and George was half-fearing, half-hoping, that she might change her mind. The thing she had to say, whatever it might be, would undo nothing that had been done. Confession is not reparation. Yet there were things that Miss Richmond might make plain if she could do no more.

There was no smile on her face when she began speaking again, the same stricken look was there, the same intense earnestness, and in her words the same grave directness.

"You are very good," she said, looking into George's face. "I have always known that, always felt it, sometimes I have hated you for it. Now I am glad of it, since it makes you patient, and sympathetic, and forgiving. Just now you are dreading ■ hear what I have to say, and yet you are sitting there as if there were nothing you desired so much as to hear me begin at the beginning of my life, and tell you every trivial and hateful detail of it all on to the end. . . . The end was yesterday."

"I will only go back to the beginning of that end, but that will take me back over one-and-twenty years, back to the time when I was a wilful, unthinking, yet intensely-loving woman of seventeen. I had never loved till then. I have never loved since. Plays and novels count it a virtue in a woman that she never loves but once, and is true to one love for her whole long lifetime. I may claim credit then for one virtue. But I was true against my will. I would have loved you if I could. But though Noel Bartholomew was married, and though I never saw him, I never forgot him, I never ceased to care for him, and to care passionately. And somehow I had always the feeling that my chance of winning him was not ended.

He had never loved me, never cared for me, and I have thought sometimes that it was his indifference that drew me to love him so wildly, so madly. . . (Now, it was before I knew that he was engaged to Clarice Brook, I told him here, on this very moor, that if I could not have his love I should die. I had no shame when I said it, and for that I have had no shame since. . . If I had been a weak woman instead of a strong one, I should assuredly have died.

"I need say no more of that time. I need not tell you that he was kind, and gentle, and honourable, and silent.

"When I heard of his wife's death I thanked heaven. Then it seemed to me that I might believe in a special Providence, a Providence that yet meant good towards me.

"And once again I thanked Heaven, it was when Noel Bartholomew came back to Murk-Marishes. I had been growing old, and my looks had begun to fade. In one week I grew young again, and, let me say it, more beautiful than I had ever been. A woman does not see when she is beautiful, she feels it. I felt myself growing beautiful again, and I felt myself capable of growing good.

"But the first time I met Noel Bartholomew—it was in his own house—my heart sank swiftly. He had loved, and his love was not dead. It would never die.

"And my love would never die.

"Instead of dying, it began to live as it had never lived before. It had always been a strong love; now it grew all at once to be a passionate love, or rather a passionate pain, a passionate suffering. . . You will wonder why I was so. You will ask yourself what there was about Noel Bartholomew to win the affection of such a one as I am? I asked me I could not answer you. I said it was his goodness, you would smile. If

I said it was his kindness, you would not understand. No man ever does understand, and yet it is the one thing that a woman can never resist—simple, thoughtful, unwearied, and unflinching kindness.

"His kindness to me was only a suggestion of what I might have been if he had loved me. That was where the pain was; the suggestion was so sweet, so haunting, so discontenting. . . And yet I would rather have had his unkindness than the kindness of any man I have ever known.

"And every time I saw him afresh the pain grew, and the trouble grew, and my love grew, it grew to richness. More than once I all but told him of my love. I did tell him, only just not so directly that he had to refuse it in so many words. And yet he did refuse it, and he stung me, maddened me by his coldness, his calmness, his gentle, imperturbable apathy. Oh! how it stung me, when I was so willing to give up all for him! If he had asked me I would have gone to live under that thatched roof, and never once have hesitated to do it. And yet he would not even stoop to take anything I had to offer. He could not, and I saw that he could not, and I grew more utterly reckless with every week that went by.

"There are certain days that stand out above the other days. There was the day when the storm was laid in Soulsgrit Bight. I went down all gentleness and love and new humility, and filled with new yearnings. When I saw him there among the crowd my heart almost stood still. For a moment I was afraid of him coming to me, afraid to hear his voice, afraid to touch his hand. But he did not come, he remained standing aloof, talking to farm-folks and to fisher-folks, and for a long time he was as if I had not been there. Then he passed me, raising his hat as he passed, and sending me a cold glance that went through me like a shiver, and before I was aware of it all my love and gentleness was turned to a wild desire to be revenged, to give pain, to have satisfaction of some kind. It was his coldness, his aloofness, that changed me. I had borne so much, I was bearing so much then.

"When I first heard that his daughter had won your love—it was long before that day when I met her and you in Buknigg Gill—I was glad—glad to the bottom of my heart. Now, I thought, he will be alone and lonely, now he will turn to me. But that hope died as soon as it was born, and the thought that others were happy all round me while I was left so miserably unhappy, was a constant goad, driving me on ■ do things I had never intended to do ■ was in that mood I wrote that letter to you and in that mood I answered you on that day in Southgriff Bight.

"I had another motive for doing some of the things I have done, it has influenced me all through ■ arose out ■ the idea that if Noel Bartholomew knew me better, he could not but learn to care for me more. I wanted ■ bring him to me, to hear him ask me for something, some explanation, some decision. If I could but bring him oftener to my side let the errand be what it might, I should know how to make the most of it. If he asked a favour I should know how to delay the granting of it, I should know how to yield at last. I should know how to make my yielding effective.

Caring so much as he did care for his daughter, I felt certain that for her sake he would come; that he would desire to know all the truth as to that long, past engagement. I did not deem that you would keep silence, or that the stupid world would keep silence. I did have noted that the world's silences are often as malignant in their results as it is with speech.

'All the summer I watched for his coming but he never came. I learnt afterwards that he had even taken admittance of the few days I was absent to come over and take such sketches as were needful for the pictures. Cecil had asked him to print.

'From the first I was glad about those pictures.

'I am telling you all—I am telling you the worst, I am telling you that I am a woman capable of deliberate evil will, I may even say that I believe there is in me an innate tendency to wrong, doing rather than to right, but am I all evil? . . . Say that I am not. I have known hours of inward strife, hours of relenting, hours when I have been afraid of myself, afraid at unexpected results. I tell me that I am not so evil all through as so utterly beyond hope as I seem to myself to be!'

Miss Richmond paled and she looked into George Karkoswell's face, but her sudden question found him unprepared. He was dismayed and perplexed, and yet his dismay was half pity, half compassion. He did not speak but Mrs. Richmond saw the look on his face and went on again.

"Yes, I was glad from the first moment about those commissions," she said. "A whole series of suggestions hung about the idea that he was doing something that must bring us into contact of some kind, the kind might be made to depend on my will—or so

I thought. But I never decided on any particular course. I let matters drift—only giving them a little turn this way or that when the chance came. But nothing happened as I expected ■ would happen.

"You know that I destroyed Mr Bartholomew's letters to Cecil? No? Well, I did. There were three of them. I had the same motive. It was not to keep Noel Bartholomew in suspense but to bring him to Yarell—to bring him there alone. He never came.

"The silence then was terrible. He was silent, and you were silent, and I did not know what was going on anywhere. I only believed that you were all together, all in sympathy in silence, and the thought made me feel as if the only end of my loneliness and misery would be fever and death.

That was how I came to send the pictures back. Cecil did not know till afterwards, and he was furious—but his fury availed nothing. Let me say it now, Cecil has been blind less all through, and he will suffer when he knows all. But his suffering will be nothing to mine—nothing. Mine can never end.

You know all the rest, you know that on that day when you came to Yarell to plead for your friend your plea was unsuccessful. You did not know the madness the nervousness, the disappointment that was consuming me. If I could come . . . But I cannot think of it. I dare not think of it.

He will come no more. That is all I know. He will come no more. I cannot resist it. I have to keep on saying it. I shall never see him any more.

On that same day when I was in that same mood, his daughter came. You know what happened then?

Yes, George said smiling calmly. 'Yes, I know. Do not let any thought of that distress you.'

'No, that will not distress me—not now,' Diana replied. 'I can never now have but one distress.'

I only mention it ■ tell you that then again my motive was the same—to bring him to Yarell to hear him speak, and question, and plead in his quiet way. Does it seem small, pitiful, inadequate? Then you do not know yet what love is, if aught seem small to you that can touch it in any way.

"It is pitiful it is inadequate—it is worse than these in the light of yesterday. But remember that yesterday had not then dawned, remember that. I could not dream of yesterday.

'Can you even faintly understand now how I was driven on from point to point, goaded into fighting a battle over two paintings that were precious to me because they were his work? Did you really think that I cared for the price? The price of the two of them was less than the price of the last new dress I had from Paris.

"I came at last to feel that if I might not have his love I would have his hate. Was I passing on ■ hatred myself? or is perverted love a worse thing than hatred? Indifference I could not know, nor forgetfulness.

"At any moment, from first to last, one word from him and I had fallen at his feet in regret, in remorse, in passionate desire to atone for all I had done.

"And now ■ possibility of atonement is gone.

"Have you any pity left for me? Can you think of yesterday, of the fate that drew me, half against my will, from my own drawing room to the top of Langbarough Moor, drew me there, face to face with the man I had loved so passionately, and who lay there with his death warrant in his hand so peacefully—can you think of it, and not pity me, knowing that I know that it was my own hand that signed the deed?

"And yet I do not want your pity, I did not come here to ask for that. I came to do burden myself of all this, ■ see if I might breathe more freely when I had spoken. . . . No, I do not want your pity. I want nothing you can give. . . . Yet you might forgive me—you might forgive me the harm I have done to you. To feel that you forgave me would ease my mind a little—it would ease me from this pain, and wretchedness, and racking misery a little."

Miss Richmond had spoken with calmness, and yet her voice had betrayed more ■ the reality of her suffering than her words had done. She sat there now, twining her hands together with a grasp and movement that was almost convulsive. No doubt of the depth of her misery entered George's brain for a moment. His thought was other wise engaged, as ■ could not fail to be, indeed, he was so greatly bewildered that he could hardly free himself ■ declare that forgiveness which was asked of him.

"Of course," he replied, "of course, if it is needful for me to say in so many words that I forgive you any pain you may have caused me, I will say it, and, I may add, that I can say it all the more readily and truly, because since you have spoken so plainly I cannot but understand. If you had not spoken, I confess that comprehension would have been difficult. All through I have been puzzled, pained, and now I am pained for you, but what can I say to comfort you?"

"What do prison chaplains say to men condemned to die?"

"I cannot even imagine," George replied. "But it is certain that they must speak differently to different men, and ■ must be easier far to speak ■ such as acknowledge their wrong doing, and are filled with sorrow for it. But the comparison was not mine, and I do not for a moment accept ■ There is no analogy whatever. If we were to be punished for the consequences of all our errors, then were we indeed a miserable race. And as for this sad, final consequence we speak of, I can tell you, for your comfort, that he who is lying there in my house has known for some time past that the end might come even as suddenly as it has come. Dr. Armitage has told me that. I did not know it, would that I had! I would that I had but known ■ myself!"

"Supposing that to be so—I do not doubt it—supposing his life to have been one of those that hung on a thread, yet see how the thread holds together in cases where there is peace, and freedom from anxiety and from all harassing things! . . . And Noel Bartholomew's first attack happened on that morning when the pictures were returned."

"I believe that was the first."

"And he has had none since—not till yesterday?"

"Not to my knowledge."

"Then to my dying hour I shall know that the snapping of the thread was my deed."

George Kirkcaldie was silent a moment. With all possible desire to speak "large, divine, and comfortable words," he knew that there could be no divinity in words that were not truthful. On the face of it there seemed only too much probability that this self-recusation of Miss Richmond ■ did not arise from an exaggerated view of the matter. And yet who could say?"

"It is impossible to say," he answered. "I know that even the uncertainty must be a most terrible thing to you, and I would that I might assure you that nothing that you have done could have had anything to do with the failure of his health, but you perceive I can not do that. I can only say that no man or woman may foresee the result of the smallest and most trivial seeming action. A spoken word, a sentence in a letter, may have consequences we cannot even dream of. Our own acts pass beyond our own control, and take on a separate existence, and how far our responsibility may extend we cannot tell. We may blame ourselves for things of which the very angels hold us innocent. Where we know we are not innocent, we need not, thank Heaven! sink in despair. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, and no spirit was ever yet broken by the weight of what was counted in but venial sin. A great fall, or what seems such in us, is very often the beginning of any real spiritual rising."

An almost imperceptible light moved like a flash across Miss Richmond's face, as George Kirkoswald said the last sentence.

"You think that?" she said. "You can say that though you are thinking of me?"

"Yes," George replied, looking up with the consciousness of the weight of the moment in his eyes. "Yes, I can say that. Will you let me say more—will you let me say that I think your whole nature has needed some such powerful and determining influence as this? Hitherto there has been no crisis in your life, nothing to awaken, to test your powers, nothing to bring you face to face with the stern realities of existence. . . . Your experience has been all of one kind, and therefore it is all the more likely that this sudden and trying calamity will, in the end, make for your peace."

Miss Richmond sat in silence for another minute or two, then she rose to her feet, and stood looking out with eyes that were slowly filling with tears toward the spot where the dark figure had lain but yesterday.

"Thank you," she said at last, holding out her hand as she spoke. "Thank you. . . . If all comes back again—if it is more than I can bear, will you let me write?"

"I shall be glad if you will write," George replied, remembering all the loneliness and desolateness of her life. "If you will let me, I shall be glad to be your friend so long as you may need my friendliness."

They parted then, Miss Richmond preferring to walk back over the moor alone. All the way the hot tears were dropping over her face, all the way the soothing words were ringing through her brain, the way that seed-germ of higher hope was falling more deeply into the ground prepared for it. As yet it was no more than that, a tiny germ that might grow, and unfold, and make for good.

CHAPTER LXVIII.—THE DAY SO PLACED IN ITS GOING.

They had done all that might be done to make the stately yet shabby room seemly for the august Presence which had entered there.

Joel, and the women who helped her, were of such as hand on the old traditions, and nothing was neglected. The crimson draperies of the room were replaced by white, white coverlets were folded in conventional ways, the toilet glass was shrouded in fine white linen. The flowers that George Kirkoswald had procured with such difficulty were disposed everywhere. He had arranged these himself, feeling a very agony of regret that this small service of love should be the last. . . . If he might only have known!

When he saw the carriage coming, bringing Canon Gibbald and Genevieve from the Rectory, George went out resolutely to the greenhouse to the bottom of the garden. No sight or sound of him should disturb her, and as he went he thanked God earnestly that she was not alone.

Canon Gibbald went into the room where Noel Bartholomew was lying, he went first, leaving Genevieve without the door for a moment or two, then he led her there to the side of the bed, and they knelt together for awhile. Genevieve was calm, but the strength to look on the dead face was not yet hers. She was alone when the strength came.

I thought the white curtains were drawn the room was yet filled with light, a soft, reverent, pure white light that helped to beautify every thing it fell upon.

The face of Noel Bartholomew needed no adventitious aid. It was as a sculptor's dream of all that might be grand or great in humanity.

It has been said that it is not till after death that the real character of a man is made visible in the countenance, not till that low strife which makes the mind little for the moment is over. All that has been best in a man is confirmed, attested, all that has been less than the best is done away.

When Death has laid "his sovereign, soothing hand" upon the features he leaves there a royal serenity of aspect. It is as if he said, "I thought you knew not, this man was noble, and had a noble power. All that life darkened, I, Death, make visible to your eyes."

Not yet had Genevieve Bartholomew shed any tear. In this first moment she shed none. It seemed no place for tears. Her first thought was, "Is this my father? Can he look so?"

For some time she stood there with clasped hands and bowed head, not thinking, not praying, only looking into that still, and calm, and noble face.

The scent of the white violets that were strewn about the pillow, of the great rich spires of white hyacinth that were every where came ■ her like part of that which filled the room, that grand, great presence that was yet beautiful, that was wholly peaceful Outside in the sunny air the birds were chirping and singing, that was the only sound and it was the sound that the sleeping man had loved above all others, the sound that more than any had made him to be "in love with useful Death." It was as if she could still hear him saying

"I have never wanted to be for anything but a good man."

Even so he had ceased to be not upon the dark midnight, but upon the still sunny Sunday morning at a time, and in a place where one lower than he might have been moved to desire to cease to be.

■ was not till the thought came to her that she might not remain there much longer that any child of grief was struck. She knelt again then kneeling so that she could see the face. Must I leave you my father? she said, speaking with white quivering lips. Must I leave you, not to see you any more?

And you have not spoken to me not once. I want to hear you speak again my father but once again. She spoke softly and as she spoke, her voice changed sobb broke it, the slow hot tears began to fall.

For a long time she knelt there and the passion of weeping had its way weeping which holds the heart's laments in such mysterious ways and with such effectiveness that the worst grief is never the same again as when it was dry and hard and useless.

Genevieve's sorrow had never been hid there was no hardness in her nature and this loss was not of a kind to bring hardness. Neither was there to be any kind nor any dark dread of the silent land wh her her father had gone.

He seemed very near to her as she knelt there. His hand ■ that you can ■ it out your hand and touch the face that is so close to you if you will is incompatible with the idea that he whom you may touch cannot hear you, or know of your existence.

Is there not always the idea that those who have but just gone cannot yet have gone very far?

Other thoughts came, other questions other desires such as may not be written, then at last the moment of parting came. It might have been terrible, but that yearning aching sadness had no terror in it. The sting of death had been taken away, the victorious grave was as the open gate of heaven.

The day when they laid him in his grave was a grey, quiet, sombre day. The sun did not shine upon it. Nature had no smile that morning, instead she dropped a few quiet tears, and her deep drawn sighs came shivering downward from the moor, stirring the leafless boughs to a mournful movement that was like a gesture of sympathetic sadness.

Noel Bartholomew's grave had been made by the side of the one that had been made only a few short weeks before. "He will be glad to have it so," Genevieve said when the Canon told her. "And I shall be glad." The affectionate friendship that had been between the two who slept there came back to her with a new significance. Death, dark death, throws new light upon many things.

When it was over, when the dropping mould had fallen upon the coffin lid, surely the most agonising sound this earth can have for human ears, then a sun sorrow would have her own wild will and way, and Canon Gabriel was too wise to try to stop the flowing of tears so natural so certain to end in a more potent peacefulness. For while his great did as she would. If she preferred to be alone he understood without a word if she cared to go to him in his study then she knew that he was glad to have her there. So two days went by in a quiet that was as precious as it was needful.

On the third day there came a sound to break the quiet. The big gates at the bottom of the manor were thrown open, a carriage with a pair of horses dashed in rather wildly, and in a very few minutes Canon Gabriel came to propose Genevieve for a visit.

"Can you see a friend, dear?" the old man asked. A friend, who has come a long way to see you. She only got my letter yesterday morning."

"It is Mrs. Winterton," Genevieve said, speaking with more of life and eagerness than she had shown about anything yet, and the next moment a little shy timid white haired lady was shown in her black silk dress rustling her black beads and fringes glittering and trembling as she rushed forward to be folded in Genevieve's kind embrace.

"My child!" she exclaimed, "my own child whom God has given me twice over!" That was all that could ■ said in that first moment. Tears silenced the words that might have been.

Presently the carriage, which had been hired at Market Stedley, was sent round to the Richmond Arms, and rooms were taken there for Mrs. Winterford and her maid for one night. The little lady meant to do things very quickly, wisely thinking that since they must be painful things, the sooner the pain was overgot the better. She was not long in perceiving that Genevieve had had no plans, and thought of none, so that her own did not meet with prepared opposition. She spoke from the beginning as if no opposition were possible or likely, and indeed what opposition could have been made? If Genevieve had thought of the matter at all she would have said to herself, "I have no home, I have no money and I have no talent that would bring me bread," and so thinking she might for her own convenience, or rather for her life's continuance, have been glad to accept such a home as that open to her at Havlands. Fortunately both for herself and Mrs. Winterford these thoughts had not come yet. Genevieve only knew that her godmother, who had been very dear to her real mother, was the one friend to whom she could have yielded herself in this complete and passive way. No thought of dependence crossed her mind because she knew that it could never cross the mind of Mrs. Winterford. True affection, true friendship knows nothing of benefits conferred or received. The mutual give and take, where hearts are true enough for giving and taking is not a thing to be counted up and entered in a note-book. You shall do a thousand kindnesses to your friend, and every one of them he shall forget, but he shall never forget the atmosphere of love for him that was about you and with you, making your material kindness so utterly a secondary thing. He saw that you could not help your lavish gifts, and therefore the gifts themselves were not impressive. The impressive thing was the love that was all the while behind. If that love be wanting your kindest deed shall turn to gall and wormwood in your own heart and in his, nay it shall be worse than the wormwood and the gall—these are bitter, but not deadly.

As soon as possible Mrs. Winterford made her arrangements with the Canon's aid and aid. He was to see Miss Crown, and ask her to take Keturah until another place could be found for her to pay out that might be owing, to engage some one to pack up all that had belonged to Noel Bartholomew and to his daughter, and see that the packages were forwarded to Havlands. The pictures and the furniture of the studio were to be sent to Meyer and Calamson's. The dead artist had mentioned to Canon Gabriel as well as to his daughter, his intention about the disposal of his works.

All this was arranged in that first evening, and then the Canon disclosed to Mrs. Winterford, as gently as he could all that he knew of George Kulkowald's love for Genevieve. That was how he spoke of it because that was the side of the matter that he knew most about.

You do not speak as if the engagement were a definite one? Mrs. Winterford said, trying to hide the sudden sinking of heart that the news crossed her. "And, indeed, if it had been, I think I should have heard of it."

"I am sure you would have heard of it," the Canon said. They were sitting together in his book-lined study. The little white-haired lady with her white cap and platinum-fingert ring by the fire looking into the Canon's worn, gentle finely furrowed face, listening to his pure musical voice with appreciation of its music. "I am sure you would have been told it once," he said.

And I think I should have been told too. But there has been pain and some mistake, some mystery. I only guess its nature and therefore I may not speak of it. I think it is in the end, but events have come too quickly one after another to permit of any real unbroken clearing up of things. Now, of course, it is impossible that there can be anything definite said for some time to come."

You think the affection is mutual? the little lady asked.

Oh that I am certain was the reply, and many thoughts were behind the old man's words as he said. "I am quite certain that it is mutual and I am quite certain that on both sides it is very great. Mr. Kulkowald has been ill but he is better now, and I am sure Genevieve has been here he has come down to him. Usually each morning and each evening, to make inquiries. He will come again to-morrow and I must see him for a moment."

It will be a painful moment if I must tell him that Genevieve is leaving us to-morrow.

I think she would not wish to see him just now, Mrs. Winterford said, speaking unadvisedly, as it next quite sure.

"Most certainly she would not," the Canon said decisively, "she probably could not. I have not mentioned his name to her at all."

And he is very good, patient with a deep, strong patience that touches me greatly."

* * * * *

The events of the past few days had told more considerably upon George Kirkoswald's newly-recovered strength than he was ready to admit, but admission was forced upon him at last. Dr Armitage, meeting him on his way down from Uxethy to the Rectory that same evening, insisted upon his going back again, and the next morning found him, to say the least of it, willing to rest. He would go down to Thurkeld Abbas when evening came again.

It was a very wild evening, wild and cold and strange. All day the sky had been swept by great gloomy masses of cloud, the temperature had gone down rapidly, the wind had come in fitful gusts. Then ■ had ceased, and a thick, damp, chilling snow fog had crept up from the north-east, covering all the land. ■ hung like a great yellow pill as George went down from Uxethy in the late afternoon. He could not see the church tower the tops of the houses disclosed themselves to him slowly, one by one, as he rode up the village street. He left his horse at the Richmond Arms this evening, which he had not done before. He hardly knew why he did it now. Was there any vague hope in him that Genevieve might see him for a minute or two? Surely she could trust him not to speak of aught that might not yet be spoken of! He had just destroyed that letter which he had written ten days ago, he had put it into the fire without breaking the seal, having the very general feeling that one's own letters are seldom pleasant reading. . . . What unpleasant things time can make of some of them!

So, with a little fluttering about his heart, he went up to the Rectory. If he might but just see her, but just hold her hand, and look into her eyes for one moment he would ask no more. There was something that was almost a smile about his mouth as he shook hands with Canon Crichel, but the Canon did not respond to that buoyant and rather hopeful glance. Instead he said at once:—

"I have some news that will surprise you, and not agreeably I am afraid. But sit down. . . . There is nothing very sad about ■ in one sense."

"It concerns Miss Bartholomew? Is she ill?"

"No, I am thankful ■ say. She seemed better than I had hoped this morning. Fragile as she looks, she is very strong. But it will be better to tell you all at once. Mrs. Winterford, her friend and godmother, came yesterday; and this morning she went away again, taking Genevieve with her. They have gone direct to Havilands."

For a considerable time George Kirkoswald made no reply. He sat looking into the fire, a quick dash of sleety snow came beating with a sudden spitefulness upon the window-pane. The study was growing dark.

"Havilands is near to Dorking, I think?" he remarked presently.

"Yes, somewhere between Dorking and Leatherhead. It is a very lovely place, I believe."

"And what ■ Mrs. Winterford like?"

"She is like a good, charming, motherly little lady, nearly sixty years of age, I should say," the Canon replied. "Her love for Genevieve is beautiful to see, ■ is so tender, so almost deferential, and yet so wise. To have seen her is to find a load gone from my heart . . . I wish much that you might have seen her too!"

"I shall see her before long," said George resolutely, rising to his feet as he spoke, and smoothing out the contractions that had gathered about his forehead. He could perceive already that this thing that was causing him such great and unexpected disappointment was the best thing possible for her he loved. Love is worth nothing that cannot acquiesce in the good of the one beloved, even though that good lie outside of him and all his effort, all his cognisance.

Yet it was a lonely going back for him. He felt that he had never been glad enough that Genevieve had been so near. He could not picture her in that new and unknown home, with that new and unknown friend whose love and opportunities for showing love seemed to defend him somewhat. He would have to live in the future while the slow days were passing now, but he could not look cheerfully into the days to be with that chill piercing gust coming round him in the darkness, dashing the snow into his face, and half-blinding him. That brief bright February spring which comes so often in this strange climate of ours was at an end. ■ had given place ■ that second winter which, as a rule, proves to be a worst winter than the first.

CHAPTER LXIV.—THE DRIFTING SNOW UPON LANGBAUGH MOOR.

ALL the year that cry that was for ever upon old Joseph Craven's lips had no meaning—none but that tragic meaning which was connected with ■ when ■ first broke from his lips. Now once more it came mournfully and appositely,—

"The snaw's allus driftin' over Lang-barugh Moor!"

For three days ■ had been drifting. The land lay white and still under a lowering, threatening snow-cloud of dark indigo blue. It is a sky that is indescribable in its effect, and that effect ■ heightened by the unbroken whiteness that lies everywhere underneath it. Has any artist ever given us its mystery, its strange gloom, its ominousness?

■ is, of course, only visible between the showers. When the snow is actually falling there ■ nothing but the thick whiteness, which is dusky yellow if you look upward, or towards nightfall dusky grey. There is hardly a more mournful time than the twilight that is darkened by thick, fast falling snow.

■ is mournful enough in town and villages, but if you would know it at its worst you must seek out some lone house on the edge of a Yorkshire moor, accessible only by bad roads, and some miles distant from the necessities of life. To add to your appreciation of the moment, you should be responsible for the well-being of the household, and your means should be of the narrowest, so as ■ preclude your having had stores of anything in readiness for such a catastrophe as lies within the meaning of the simple words "snowed up."

Poor Dorothy Craven was feeling as if every flake was falling upon her heart with anything but snow-like lightness. The winter altogether had been a dark time for her. The bad harvest had proved in the event to be very bad. The downward trend of things had become more marked than ever since the thrashing out of the scant spoiled corn, which had been pronounced to be unfit for human food. Dorothy knew that it was unfit—the black, heavy, moist loaf on her own table was proof enough of that. Even when she had bought a sack of good foreign flour to mix with her own, the product was hardly eatable. Yet Miss Craven ate of it daily, with many a sail and secret wonder as ■ the ways of an inscrutable Providence.

This was not the worst. Black bread was bad, but unpaid rent was worse, and now a whole year's rent was owing, ■ May day it would be a year and a-half. . . . It was very certain that the coming May would see the end of things at Hunsgarth Hagg.

If a last straw had been needed surely it had come in the shape of this late snow storm. The few sheep that were left were huddled together in the frozen stackyard, the cattle were housed, and were feeding on the black, worthless hay. It was no wonder that the little milk that the cows gave was blue and thin, and that ■ had no cream to speak of. It was only in keeping with all the rest. The very fowls were not laying. For weeks past there had been no farm produce of any kind to be taken to Thurkeld Abbas, to exchange for groceries or for animal food. For over a week now the daily dinner for Mrs. Craven, her father and mother, and the one farm lad, had consisted mainly of a pigeon or two shot by Hanson as they clustered together on the snow-covered remains of the last haystack.

Mr. Crudas was not unaware of this state of things, he was mindful ■ keep himself as much alive ■ it as was possible. Dorothy told him nothing that she could help telling, but, as he was in the habit of saying to himself, "If I is a bit deaf, I isn't blind yet," and, indeed, though love may blind the eyes, as it is said to do, assuredly ■ does but give double seeing power to the heart.

Ishmael Crudas saw a great deal more than he wished to see, and the sight made his heart ache more than Miss Craven imagined. And she had not permitted him to speak of his heart since, of late. Some time ago she had forbidden all protestation. He might come to the house if he chose, or he might choose not to come, but if he came he must be silent about the one wish and desire that was left to him.

He had not been obedient. The thing was always present with him, and it could not be but that it should declare its continued existence in one way or another. If he might not plead openly, he could take care that no chance of insinuating a hint was ever lost. He did not mind Dorothy's glances. Another man might have found them deterrent and forbidding, but Mr. Crudas knew her well enough and loved her well enough to dare to brave any number of them. To him they were but a proof that he was not indifferent to her.

He had not been up at Hunsgarth Hagg since the snow storm set in. The last time Miss Craven had seen him had been in the churchyard at Thurkeld Abbas on the day when Noel Bartholomew had been laid there to rest. Their eyes had met then through tears and sorrow, and it was but natural that each should see in the face of the other an expression of sympathetic kindness that was not too common there.

More than once during those days of dearth and darkness Miss Craven had remembered the look on Ishmael Crudas's face as he stood with his bared head in the churchyard listening ■ the solemn yet grandly beautiful words that were being said. . . . If she had never really forgiven him for the sin of his youth until that moment, assuredly she forgave him then.

When she went home there was a new peace in her heart—that deep peace which comes when a long struggle ■ at an end. No thought of what “the country side” would say troubled her now, nor did she set herself ■ think how she should make known to Ishmael Crudas that there was change in her. He would perceive it quickly enough when he came. ■ If he did not perceive it quickly, then let his perception awaken slowly, it would be all the same. For two or three days she was conscious only of this—the fight was over.

That was nearly a week ago, and he had not come. Miss Craven could hardly remember the time when a week had passed without a visit from Ishmael Crudas. She knew well enough that it was not the weather that prevented his coming. Was he ill—lying down there in that wide, lonely house by the sea cliffs, with no one to tend or care for him? Had he gone from home? Had any accident happened to him?

This was the first time for many years that she had needed ■ have any anxiety about him, and anxiety seldom does aught toward lessening a woman's affliction. Many a love has been first discovered to its possessor in a time of waiting and dread.

And still the dark, wild gusts swept over the moor, laden with the thick driving snow. The hedges and the low stone walls that were about the farm were not to be discerned. The stillness grew more and more intense, it was almost appalling. The very blackbird upon the cawls seemed afraid of his own short, plaintive note, and only piped at rare intervals. A half-frozen robin and two starlings went in doors boldly, and sat in panting silence whenever they were allowed ■ sit.

And all the while, day by day and hour by hour, old Joseph Craven, walking up and down over the sanded floor, uttered his melancholy burden, varying it, turning it, yet leaving it always the same —

“For ever, for ever, for ever, the white snow drifts upon Langbarugh Moor!”

Dorothy made no attempt to hinder the words that weaned her so. She sat by her mother's side knitting quickly, almost excitedly, as if the mere mechanical movement of her hands was a necessity of her existence. There was nothing else to be done. She could not see to do anything else. The snow had frozen thickly upon the window-pane, filling the house with gloom, the wind was muttering heavily round the farm, the snow came down the wide chimney, hissing upon the fire as it fell. ■ there had been no poverty, no lack of aught, no sadness, no dread, that snowstorm would still have been a wearying and gloomy thing.

The twilight was adding its gloom ■ the other glooms now, yet Dorothy did not put her knitting away. The clock ticked slowly, the fire burned dimly, her father still walked up and down from the dresser to the door, still kept on uttering the words that seemed filled afresh with sad meanings.

At last, quite suddenly, the old man stopped. He was close to the window.

“Whisht!” he said, in a strange, awe-struck whisper. “Whisht, Dolly! . . . What's he singin' for? What's he singin' oot there for, where the snaw's drifun'? It's allus drifun' ower Langbarugh Moor!”

Dorothy Craven was not a weak woman, not impressionable, yet she felt that the colour fled from her face. It was her father's strange utterance that moved her more than aught he said.

“Who's singin'?” she said, putting her knitting down, and going up to her father as he stood there in the attitude of one who listens intently.

“Who's singin'?” the old man said, with a smile. “Whya listen t' her! She pretends she disn't know Ishmael Crudas's voice! . . . Hearken, then! hearken! Whaist at sings yon sang?”

“It's oh, I'm wae, I'm very wae,
An it's o' the barbarian Allan!”

For a moment Dorothy felt faint, yet unconsciously she was impelled to listen herself. But she could hear no sound save the sound of the withering wind, and the driving snow, and the heaving rain that was upon the wide hearthstone.

Doubtless this was a new fancy of her father's weakened brain, yet she knew that he was not given to new fancies, and there was that in his manner that compelled more than her attention.

“He's oot yonder,” the old man went on, with a new keen sparkle in his faded eyes, and a small spot of burning colour coming into either cheek. “Ishmael's oot yonder, ower by Havenah Mere. . . . But what's he singin' for?—what said he stae there singin' r' th' drifun' snaw for, the snaw that drifts for ever upon Langbarugh Moor?”

With a quiver on her lip Dorothy went out to the door that opened upon the stack-yard. The snow was falling less heavily; there was a lurid gleam of light up over the edge of the white moorland. But the only sound she heard was the sound of the milk streaming into Hanson's pail in the cow-house close at hand, and the pitiful bleating of the sheep huddled together under the stable-wall. The wind was lulled for a moment.

Her father came out ■ her as she stood there. "Ya can hear him noo, Dorothy? ya can hear him noo?" the old man said excitedly. "He's up yonder, over by the mere. Ya can hear him singin'. Harken, then! harken!"—

"Oh slowly, slowly, rise air up, to the place wher he was lying;
And whi a bit do the curtain in Young man, I think ye're dying!"

Was she dreaming? Was it not possible that the sound of a man's voice should reach from the road that crossed the moor to Hunsgarth Hagg? The distance was said to be nearer two miles than one. Surely it was impossible! And yet—yet, if she had ever heard Ishmael Cruden singing

then assuredly she heard him now

She did not stop ■ think. There was an old plaided shawl lying folded on a chair which she threw round her as she went out. "Hanson!" she cried, as she rushed past the open door of the cow house, "Hanson! follow me!"

And Hanson followed her, out through the stackyard-gate into the deep drift that was lying there in the upland pathway. The snow was harder than it had been, yet they sank at almost every step. Fortunately, the wind was not just then in its fiercest mood, and the snow was only falling lightly, softly, in the gathering twilight. But though things were so favourable, it was a whole long hour before they stood by the edge of the tiny moorland lake known as Haverah Mere.

Dorothy had not spoken, nor had she heard any sound to guide her on her way. That one line of the song that she had heard before she left the house was ringing in her ears still, it had certainly come, as her father had said, from that quarter of the moor where the mere was; and though ■ must have come against the wind, the seeming absurdity of her proceeding never struck her.

She had said to herself in the beginning that she would go as far as the mere if that were possible, and now she stood by the edge of the basin that enclosed ■ on three sides. It was frozen, the snow was lying smoothly upon it, higher ■ one end than the other apparently, but she could not see quite across to the other side. And yet it was not a dark night. Though it was long past the hour of sunset, and the moon had not yet risen, a light seemed to strike upward from the great uneven plain of snow.

Hanson was by her side, wondering, breathless, half-angry, wholly chilled. What could be his mistress's motive for such a wild vagary as this? He could only hope from the bottom of his heart that compensation would be made to him in a supper that should not consist of "pigeon broth."

Miss Craven had stopped on the northern edge of the mere. There was no sound, no sign. If there had been any footmarks it was too dark to discern them.

Should she cry aloud? Should she make known her presence there, so that, if any wanderer were falling into that sleep which is the sleep of death he might be roused to effort? Her lips parted to make some sound, but none came. She was nerveless, powerless. If she had had any hope it had lost its spring.

So she stood on the wild, snow-covered moorland. The wind was beginning to rise again, her shawl fluttered past her face. She was growing cold and chill since her purpose had begun to fail.

Then suddenly, as she stood there, a shrill sound broke upon the night, it seemed close at hand in the darkness when ■ began. Dorothy turned, stifling a sob that arose lest it should prevent her hearing. Whence exactly did it come? It seemed farther away at ready. She clasped her hands passionately together as she stood with the snow-flakes drifting into her face. In her ears the words were thrilling —

"She had a grave a mile but two,
When she heard the dead bell ring in
And every eye the death-light glint
It cried 'We're to Barbara Allen'"

"Was, indeed?" she said to herself, as she went flying over the frozen snow. There was no sound now to guide her. For some minutes she went wandering on in the gusty darkness, now stopping for a moment, now stumbling, and rising again and hurrying on. Then, again, there came a sign; again the shrill voice rose on the wind, crying only, —

"We're to Barbara Allen!"

She reached the spot from whence the sound had come ■ last. It was no delusion, no false voice sent to lure her to her destruction, as she had imagined more than once it might be. There, in the drifted, trackless snow a man had fallen by the side of a fallen horse, and the man was Ishmael Crudas.

The horse was dead; some seizure had come upon him, and the snows of Langbarugh Moor were making for him a grave.

His master was lying there with his head upon the flank of the dappled grey that had been ■ him as a friend. It was doing him service still, being protection from both wind and snow. At the moment when Dorothy Craven reached the spot Ishmael Crudas slept, but his sleep was the sleep that comes between the delirious moments of high fever.

He awoke to her voice, ■ her touch, when she dashed away the snow that was gathering about him, but he had no power to rouse himself. If he opened his eyes she could not see, but when he spoke, or rather sang, faintly and out of tune, she heard all too plainly —

"It is I, my dear, I'm very sick,
An' it's I, but Barbara Allan."

"But 'Barbara Allan' is here," Dorothy said, "Or if it is not 'Barbara Allan,' it is Dorothy Craven, and I guess one will do as well as the other just now."

But the prostrate man did not understand. It was some time before he was able to rise to his feet and go. Miss Craven supported him on one side, Hanson on the other, and that weary way from Haverah Mere to Huntgarth Higgs will never be forgotten by any one of those three who travelled over it that wild February night. The moon was up by the time they reached the brow of the moor. It hung like a golden lamp in a fast-changing world of grey and golden cloud. At times it was obscured altogether, and the three went on less bravely. The clock was striking ten when they entered the kitchen of that lone upland farm.

"Lh' but I was reecht then," the old man said, with a new and beautiful light spreading over his worn face as they went in. "Lh' but I was reecht 'twas you that was singin' upon Langbarugh Moor, then? I said you were singin' there, though the snow was driftin' ... I' snow's allus driftin' over Langbarugh Moor!"

CHAPTER IV.—"FRESH AS THE WILDER-INDI-KONE CUP"

WILL it not be refreshing to find that the scene has changed with apparent rapidity—that Muik-Marishes with its barren and profitless farms, Langbarugh Moor with its drifting snows, Southgrif Hight with its homely fisher-folk, have all had to give place to the summer sunshine of the south, to civilisation, to all the softness of a rich pastoral beauty?

The house at Havilands stands in a hollow between wood-crowned hills—round-topped gently-curving hills, disclosing no bare riven craggs, no masses of sterile sandstone. It is very truly one of those "places of nestling green for poets made." For a moment, looking down on a June day into the hollow, you see nothing but that soft, feathery, waving green that makes the beautiful distinctiveness of early summer. Presently you perceive some clusters of twisted Tudor chimneys, then a low red gable, and a little farther on an opening between the trees discloses to you a flower-filled garden, a mossy arbour or two, a great fish pond where white and yellow water lilies float, and where tall amber-tinted irises stand in thick clusters. The sloping banks of the pond are covered with flowers of every hue.

Already George Kirkoswald was beginning to think that he had done an unwise thing in presuming to enter this earthly paradise uninvited and unannounced. Yet the plan had had an irresistible attraction for him beforehand, and when all was said, he was but intending to make a call. Surely any friend of Miss Bartholomew's might venture to call to see her in the house where she had made her home.

Only a very few days before, Canon Gabriel had dropped a hint which had startled George not too pleasantly. The Canon had received a letter from Miss Winterford in which that lady had spoken of the possibility that was of her going to Switzerland for a few weeks, and taking Miss Bartholomew with her. The matter was not settled, but Genevieve was needing change, she said. The girl had begun to droop in unaccountable ways, and nothing would be so certain to revive her as the foreign travel for which she had always longed. Mrs. Winterford would write again when anything definite had been come to.

George had left Uselsby the next day, and now he was wandering here, alone, in Mrs. Winterford's garden. He had found a wicket-gate at the further end of the place, and an old woman, who was evidently supposed to be weeding, had directed him to make his way up ■ the house between the avenues of flowers that were standing tall, and still, and beautiful on every side. For a moment or two he had a sense ■ reminiscence, and then it occurred ■ him that it was Noel Bartholomew's lovely garden scene that was behind the momentary confusion of his brain. The white, graceful Madonna lilies seemed as if they whispered together of the dead artist; the rose-sprays moved with little gestures of sadness—or so he fancied, as he stood there in that woven wilderness of emerald green bestarred with all the summer flowers of the land. Accustomed as he had been to the sight of beauty of all kinds, this beauty came to him like a new emotion.

No sound broke the perfect stillness of the place. It was the time of day when birds are mute. A hot sun was pouring down

White fleecy cloudlets were floating up the sky, butterflies hovered by on silent wing.

George went on wandering slowly up toward the house. There was a little rustic arbour with wreaths of purple clematis dropping over it, and a table and two chairs inside of it. On the table there was a piece of embroidered satin, and a tiny work-basket that he knew. He felt his face grow hot as he stood there, and when he turned away his heart was beating. This nearness, this knowledge was almost enough for the moment.

He went on a little faster, nervously, uncon-

• By the side of the still water • sciously, and a sudden turn brought him to the side of the lakelet where the water lilies were floating among the great, cool green leaves, and the flags standing straight, and still, and double, being reflected downward as clearly as they stood upward. He had not seen before that there was an inlet in the middle of the water, all covered with flowering shrubs and trailing branches, and rosy drooping blossoms. What was that gleaming line of blue and white half-hidden among the scarlet honeysuckle? Surely it was a little boat. . . . He went onward. The boat was drifting slowly, the oars dropped upon the rowlocks, the crimson cushions pillowed a golden head half-hidden by a straw hat with a black ribbon on it, a white shawl was thrown over a heavy black dress. . . . It was Genevieve, and she slept. . . . The boat drifted onward toward an outlet that the water had at the farther end of the tiny lake. It was moving slowly, very slowly, brushing the yellow irises and the drooping woodbine. Still it moved. Still Genevieve slept.

George had time to think a thousand things as he sauntered as noiselessly as might be over the turf-covered pathway, turning now and then that he might keep near the drifting boat. There was a hedge of flowers between him and the lakelet, sometimes a tall hedge, sometimes a low one, but he never lost sight of the golden head that lay sleeping upon the crimson cushions.

He remembered distinctly the moment when that fair, pure, impressive face had first struck upon his sight. The storm wind of Soulegrif Bight was lying rudely with the yellow rippling tresses, the deep violet grey eyes were lifted to his in anxious pain, the curved coral lips were parted to ask for any word of hope that he might have to give. Surely it was but yesterday!

All that storm scene came back upon him—the dragging of the life-boat overland through the snow, the difficulty of launching it from the sands of Soulegrif, the disabling stroke, the return, the second and successful attempt to save the lives of the crew of The Viking. But the one scene that came more vividly than all the rest, was the tall, white figure standing out against the black rock just above the wild, roiling rushing of the yeasty waves. And as he thought of it, he felt the thrill that went through him as he held Genevieve Bartholomew for one perilous moment in his arms—perilous and precious, and to be remembered for evermore.

And as he walked on there came to him the memory of that second time when his arm had enfolded her. Then also there had been peril, and pain and dark fear below the surface of the moment.

Surely if there had been night omens about those days the omens had spent itself now. Love's way had never run smoothly since. But this was no time for looking back, and looking sadly. He very much about him, the stir and heat of the flowers, the sprinkling of the glossy water all about him, and one thought of doubt or fear or sadness.

And still the enchanted boat went on over the enchanted lake. It was near the lower end now, where a great elm tree over-shadowed the water, and where the white children of the lilies were more thickly clustered together. The little boat went on there with a slight shudder when the keel caught a jet of troubled root, and then the golden head was raised, the face that was as a wild June rose was lifted in wonder. Surely she had not been sleeping!

Genevieve stooped for her hat which had fallen to the bottom of the boat, and the next moment she turned suddenly. There was something moving among the rose bushes—some one was there!

"Can I help you to land?" asked a clear, penetrating voice that seemed as if it were subdued by the softness of the beauty that was everywhere. A tall, dark figure stood by the elm tree bole, a little cry answered him, quick, hot blushes poured like a tide over the face that was so near to his. George's hand was already on the bow of the boat driving it into a tiny green and golden creek. There was no doubt about anything, no hesitation. Genevieve gave him both her hands with a look of unutterable tenderness and sweetness, and rapture. Then she stepped from the boat, and only knew that once more she was folded close to a heart that was beating as wildly and as warmly as her own. No words were said—there was no need of right so poor and inadequate as words.

That one supreme hour of life, the hour to which the poet turns in his fullest ecstasy of mystic singing, was theirs, though pressed by, it would be theirs for evermore.

Such hours are typical, and attest the higher element in man—his capacity for exaltation above himself. To have attained to this height and dignity of loving, is to have known the glory of humankind in transfiguration.

You may step down from that height into the everyday life of humanity on earth, but you shall take with you as an abiding possession, the insight and the gain of that hour of measureless grace.

Mrs Winterford was in London that day, she had gone there on business, and declined to take Genevieve into the heat and dust of the crowded city on a hot day in June.

The little lady was too well bred to show the surprise she felt when she returned in the evening and met her daughter in the chestnut avenue leaning on the arm of a tall, dark, distinguished-looking stranger.

"Mr Kirkowald, I am sure," she said, accepting his assistance as she stepped from her carriage. Then she gave him her hand, looking into his face with a look that he could not but feel to be critical. Happy as he was that was a nervous moment.

Mrs Winterford was not a woman to permit the stranger within her gates to feel strange for any length of time if she could help it, and she usually did help it. She had a quiet way of settling things, or rather of seeming to accept them as already settled. The great news of the day was all understood without a word.

"I cannot talk of it," she said, sitting down in her pretty drawing room to have a cup of tea before she went to dress for dinner. She was speaking more particularly to George Kirkoswald. "You will understand that though I am so glad, it is half a pain. I mean to be very good, but you will let me be good in my own way, and I fear my way will be a very silent way so far as this is concerned. I am glad from the bottom of my heart, but I cannot hide the fact that I am also very sorrowful."

George had already arranged to stay for a few days at the station hotel half-a-mile distant, where he had left his luggage. He would have gone back to dress for dinner, but this, Mrs Winterford would not permit. There was no one but Genevieve and herself, and though the little lady was somewhat ceremonious she knew how to excuse ceremony with perfect grace at the right moment.

That evening, and many subsequent evenings, George dined at Havilands, and it hardly need be said that he found his way to the garden that nestled in the green hollow at hours when there was no question of dinner. Those days went by in such a passionate peace as he had never known, such as Genevieve had never dreamed.

If the memory of him who was not came there at times, making "one and one with a shadowy third," the remembrance had no pain save the pain of separation. "I have learnt," Genevieve said, "to feel almost glad for him, that he is at rest. Everything beautiful and peaceful speaks to me of him, and I seem to know that he is near. It is only at times now that I have that terrible aching because I cannot see him, nor hear him speak as he used to speak. He was so brave, so patient, and it made me feel patient only to be with him."

"And now you will have ■ help to make me brave," George said. They were walking down by the side of the still waters. The flowers were sleeping in the late twilight, the tops of the tall trees stood against the deep blue of the summer evening sky. "I believe that is the secret of half my love for you," he said, raising the white hand he held to his lips as he spoke. "The yearning I have always had to live a higher life seemed to become more than a mere yearning from the day I met you. I suppose one ought to be capable of living up to one's best alone, but there are minds that need the warmth of human contact, and mine is one of them. Since I have known you, such good as may be in me has been a different thing—a more vital thing, with more practical desires, and keener insight into human needs. I see more clearly now how certainly, and how pitifully—

"The world waits
For help. Followed let us love so well
Our work shall still be better for our love,
And if our love be sweeter for our work,
And both command us to the side of life,
By all true workmen and true lovers bound."

EPILOGUE.

"No cloud across the sun
That proves it dead, and none so black
The fur of Gollenc men."

CHARLES JENNINGS. The Heart's Travail

Not that summer, but the summer that came after, when the heather of Langanough Moor was just turning ■ purple, the master and mistress of Usselly came back from summer lands to their own home by the North Sea. All the neighbourhood was glad to know of their coming.

Is it forgotten, all that ethical and æsthetic discussion of long ago? Mrs Kirkoswald had not forgotten, she took it up where Genevieve Bartholomew had left ■ off, being moved to new remembrance by the beauty of the home that her husband had prepared for her during the previous spring while she was abroad with Mrs Winterford. He had to point out to her how simple its charms were, to limit over the many things he might have done but for that wholesome fear which had been laid upon him.

"Here are chairs cuttuns, where silk or plush should have been," he said; "and English carpets where I would have preferred carpets from Turkey or Persia, and there is not an inch of gilding about the place."

"Because you know that gilding has gone out of fashion," said Genevieve, not disposed to allow her husband ■ too triumphant over such self-denials as were visible here. But not even for the sake of keeping up the pleasure of disapproval would she refuse to admit her complete delight with the true taste which had been displayed. The whole drawing room with windows looking out over the sea had been entirely refurnished. Soft pale tints were blended together so that no colour seemed ■ prevail, but yielded a general harmony of tones that was as pleasant as a piece of good subdued music. There was a new grand piano of exquisite touch and tone. The walls were half-covered with her father's water-colour drawings beautifully framed.

"How did you get these?" Genevieve asked, laying her hand gently on her husband's arm, and speaking in a voice that was not free from tremulousness.

"I bought them at the sale, little one."

"You were there, ■ that sale? . . And you have never told me?"

"I thought it better not to tell you, not till now," George said, putting his arm round her tenderly as if to shield her from any pain there might be in going back over the past.

And in a sense it was certainly painful. As soon as Bartholomew's death had become known there had gathered instantly about his name and work that buzz and babel of idle praise which, when it has been denied while the life was being lived and the work done, is almost as much a disgrace to the living as it is an insult to the dead. This had been Bartholomew's own view of a state of things which he had anticipated for himself. "It will be with me as it was with Millet and Meisson and scores of others," he said, and his prophecy had been fulfilled to the letter.

He would hardly have been surprised if he could have known that his beautiful Annons, for which in his more sanguine moments he had expected to get five hundred pounds, had risen in value by his death till it was considered to be worth three thousand. That was the sum paid down for it at Messrs. Meyer and Calman's.

It was the same with the Judith. Genevieve did not know what price his father had expected to get for this picture, but he had certainly not expected to receive the sum of two thousand two hundred and fifty pounds.

Everything else that had been sent to the sale, the nicest sketches, nay, the very sweepings of the studio, had been bought in the same reckless and uncomprehending manner. The sketch for the Good Samaritan, done in the two days preceding Bartholomew's death, sold for a sum that would have done more than cover the expenses of the household at Northbank during all those days of hardship and distress of mind, and actual want. It could not be that Genevieve should hear of this, and not weep as she heard it.

"Tell me of those other pictures, the two?" she asked presently.

"They also were sold at the sale . . . I thought it better that I should be so," George answered.

Genevieve was silent till they had passed on into another room, then she looked up, and her husband saw that she was smiling through her tears.

"Then I have some money of my own now?" she asked.

"You have a very respectable sum of your own," replied George. "What is it your instant intention to do with it?"

"I shall give a grand entertainment in Soulgnif Bight the day after to-morrow."

"Very well, dear, then I will leave you to make out your list of guests, and compose a programme."

"You must certainly not leave me, I shall want all the help you can give."

The feast was not made that week, but it was made at the end of the week following, and the poor and the rich were called together in a way which had become quite fashionable in the neighbourhood of Monk-Marshes since the building of the music room. Mrs. Winterford, who was staying at the Hall, went down with Mr. and Mrs. Kirkoswald, the latter dressed in a pretty white dress and a straw hat with white wild roses on it. Canon Gabriel came, the beautiful smile playing more sweetly than ever about his fine worn face, and lighting up the patient, pathetic, spiritual eyes. Mr. Summerhayes, the curate who had taken Mr. Severn's place, was still at Thurkel Abbas. He was an oldish young man with red hair, a stout figure and that general air of humble gratitude for the small courtesies of life which always seems to insure a man's social success in the quickest manner possible. The society of Thurkel Abbas looked down upon Mr. Summerhayes, but the poor of Soulgnif Bight looked up to him, having proved him as a friend.

It need hardly be said that Mr. and Mrs. Crudis had received a special invitation. They came over from Swathcliff Top in the newest and neatest little dogcart that was ever driven down a steep cliff side. Dorothy was looking radiant in her wedding dress of lilac silk, and a pretty bonnet to match.

"She didn't look a day more nor five-and-thirty," said Mr. Crudis, speaking to Mrs. Kirkoswald. "Ah, declare there's times when Ah feel shamed o' goun' aboot wiv a young lookin' wife like that at my age. Never mind. Ah's a good bit off sixty yet, an' they tell me Jacob was seventy when he began to wait them fourteen years for Rich!"

Mr. Crudis was not an uncommunicative man, but he never told the world what wild errand had led him over Langbarough Moor in the middle of a heavy snowstorm. Three days before, when the storm was only just beginning, he had ridden over the moor to Gorthwaite station and had left his horse there while he took the train and went on to York. He had no business at York save the transfer of a cheque for the sum of £200. The cheque was made out in the name of a friendly banker's clerk, and it was enclosed in a letter addressed by the same obliging young man to Miss Dorothy Craven, and left to be posted five days later, so that there might be no suspicion. A little note was enclosed intimating that the cheque was "conscience money."

Returning to Gorthwaite, he had stayed there two of the five days, fearing much that his continued absence would reach the ears of Miss Craven. On the third day he set out, choosing to run some risk of being lost in the snow rather than run the risk of failing to help the woman he loved in a strait so desperate as hers was then.

But though he has never disclosed his errand, he is to this day fond of telling the story of how he was lost and how he was found in a snow-storm on the heights of Langbarough Moor. His experience had certainly been peculiar. After the stage of suffering, and misery, and darkness was over, a whole world of pleasant dreams and hallucinations had taken possession of his brain. He had seemed to enter into warm, brilliantly lighted, and richly furnished houses, to see the tables loaded with glittering glass and silver, and tempting food and wine. He had seemed to himself to be hot and thirsty, and rich fruits of all colours and all kinds had been placed before him, piled in profusion on dishes of sparkling crystal, but he had not been allowed to touch the fruit. When he put out his hand it was drawn away. It was the same with the other food and the wines; he might only see them there. He had no recollection of any face or voice, nor had he any remembrance of having heard his own voice to sing "Barbara Allan." . . . Now Mr Cudde sings, "Barbara Allan" no more, and he says he is looking out for a song to take the place of it.

Poor Ailsie Drove was there when the people gathered that they might be glad together, and so the better remember their gladness. Ailsie went about smiling gently, uncomprehendingly. Of late she had displayed a strong liking for Mrs Gordon, and she had no greater pleasure now than to knit fine woollen stockings for her and for her son. Wilfrid Stuart was married long ago to see that the poor woman had no care nor any pain that could be avoided. . . . She still walks up and down over the rocks in the light, still looks out for her little Davy, expecting to see him as she saw him in her dream, far out upon the waters of a wide and shining sea.

Most of the people there were known to

Mr. and Mrs. Kirkoswald, but a few new faces were in the crowd. There were the new people who had come to Hunsgarth Haggis, and the carpenter who had taken the cottage at Netherbank, and had restored the studio to its original use. He has a young wife, and a wee girl who can trot along the corn fields and stand at the stile to watch for the pretty lady who rides by with her husband, and who manages somehow to hide a pocket for sweets in the folds of her habit.

Mrs. Caton, Mrs. Damer, the Pencefolds, Miss Standen, indeed the élite of Thurkeld Abbas generally, went down to Soulgrif light on the day of rejoicing. The entertainment was very much of the nature of a picnic, and luncheon was served out of doors in a given sheltered spot between the cliffs beyond the music-room. The local band played its loudest, ladies fluttered about in dresses of the gayest fashion, the blue sea was at its bluest, and a soft cool wind came off the water, tempering the heat of the August sun. Perhaps there was no greener, fresher, happier spot than dry in England than the bright under the tall cliffs of Soulgrif.

Keturah was there—proud of being under-housemaid at Usselby, and Jael and old Charlock were among the guests. These two had just retired to a cottage at Thurkeld Abbas, and were not sorry to retire. They were old now, both of them, and it was not to be expected of them that they should put up with the new-fangled ways of the new servants who had come to Usselby. They live rent-free in a cottage with a garden large enough to require all the thought and strength that old Ben can give.

More than once as the day went Genevieve found herself looking out toward the turn of the road where once before she had so unexpectedly seen Miss Richmond's carriage descending. It was just possible that Diana might come down to-day, and Mrs. Kirkoswald half hoped that she might. They had met once—one day when there was quite a little crowd in the drawing room at Usselby, and Genevieve had seen at a glance the change that had come over the face and the ways of the proud, impetuous, changeable woman who had always been so puzzling and so bewickering, and who yet had had power to compel at least a strong interest in herself. The thing she had compelled she was able to win now. The wistful and pathetic sadness on her face lent to an altogether new beauty. It was hardly possible to see that look of intense loneliness, of hidden pain and regret, and not desire to pass beyond the conventionalities that condemn people to the superficial intercourse which has value neither for him who gives nor for him who receives.

In answer to Genevieve's invitation for to-day Miss Richmond had written a brief note, asking if she might leave the matter undecided. She would have been glad to go, yet she dreaded going, and when the day came her dread was greater than her desire. 'They may forgive me,' she said to herself, 'they may even forget, but I cannot—I would not if I could forget. If, as George Kirkoswald says, there is any hope for me, it can only come by ceaselessly remembering.'

Genevieve was sorry, the first time she went, that she could not find that Miss Richmond was not at home. She had gone up to the moon, Kuddie said, and George Kirkoswald and his wife went home by another way.

But now it is this later day the shadow is beginning to move slowly from Miss Richmond's shadowed life. Changes are happening, breaking up the old associations. Cecil is intending to be married, and Sir John Burland comes and goes, urging the fact that for Yarell Croft to have two mistresses while Burland Brooms has none is not in accordance with his views of what should be. Sir John is a kind-hearted man and Diana Richmond is a woman to be impressed by tender and persistent kindness. He knows all that lies behind her reticence, and the knowledge does but lend a depth to his tenderness.

Is this the end of my history touched upon here? All lives have a history, and it does not need effective incident to make a true human story interesting. How very interesting my tale is that is told simply and openly and not by parables! But it is certain that the truth should be veiled at times. We throw a veil over the very life we are living, over a statue or a picture that is not completed. It is Death who comes and gives the finishing touches and leaves the completed work all rounded, and secure, and intelligible.

At Usellby Hall it is well understood that life has only just begun. The time to understand this fully is unknown, and always to be the present time. And just now that is the month of May. The very bush compels hand it the thrush and the blackbird, the chaffinch, and the warbling willow with. And the trees attest the golden sycamore that shines in the morning sun like the burning bush on Mount Horeb, the fringed and travelled larches, the alder with its soft display of tiny flowers and downward drooping leaves. The fruit trees flush to crimson for the coming gladness of the land, and yet again the wild flowers dance in the green meadows where the lark drops suddenly down to a restless hidden silence, like a poet seeking seclusion while the world praises his latest song.

"This is the kind of morning to feel one's life in all its fulness," George Kirkoswald says. He is walking up and down the terrace in front of the house, and he is speaking to his wife who is by his side. She is wearing a white morning dress but golden hair catches the sunshine, her dark beautiful eyes are full of life's gladness and holiness.

"Yes," she replies, "I have just been wondering over the fulness of life, wondering if the next two and twenty years could possibly be so full of experience as the two and twenty that are gone. I feel rather like the philosopher who grieved lest it should some day be discovered that there could be no new combinations of musical sound."

"I do not know enough of music to be able to set a philosopher's fears to rest on that point," George answers, "but I do know something of human life, and I know that life, if it be lived with any truth and earnestness, can never fail to present to him who lives it enough of the beauty and vitality to make it worth living. If a man would live fully he must live deeply. It seems to me that the fault of the day is the fear of going below the surface. The upheaval will come from below, and it will come before long if oil be not poured upon the troubled waters presently. Even in these remote districts the consciousness of distressful I may almost say outraged humanity is awakening. And we are altogether blind, blind and deaf. It is neither our money nor our lands that the people desire. The majority of the suffering poor would recoil from the idea of taking by violence the things that justly belong to others. It is not our possessions that they crave. It is our due sympathy, our thought for their welfare, our good will, our care for their lives, our human and Christian loving kindness. Had we but ever so faintly apprehended that Sermon on the Mount, there had not been that dread among Christian nations which is rising and gathering now. We can build but a stone to repair the ancient pathways in God's name let us bring it so, we shall find our life here, and even so we may trust us hereafter."

THE NOONDAY REST.

AT rest amid the flush of golden corn,
When rest is short and sweet,
At rest from toil begun at early morn
By willing hands and feet

Above, the sky, in all its wide expanse,
Laughs with its deepest blue,
And stray winds waking upward from their trance,
Scarce stir a stalk or two.

How sweet such rest is to each working one!
That mother sitting there
Suckles a tender babe but late begun
This life to struggle and pain.

And he, the father, looking down can feel
A new strength in his arm,
And life and toil in softer tones reveal
A deeper sacred charm.

O weary ones that rest at labour's cill!
Toil on in hope and pun,
A sure rest cometh when at evenfall
Death stoops to reap his grain

ALEXANDER ANDERSON

JOHN TENNIEL AND CARICATURE ART

By R. WALKER

"SOUS aucune forme littéraire, plastique ou pittoresque, dans aucun art, le caractère d'une race ne s'accommode d'une façon plus ouverte, ne se manifeste en traits plus lisibles, que dans la caricature." These are the opening words of the chapter on Caricature in England in "La Peinture Anglaise," by the accomplished art critic and historian, Monsieur Ernest Chéreau, and they embody a truth, the force of which does not occur to the ordinary reader, who, during a railway journey, glances at Punch in the odd intervals when he is tired of trying to see the scenery. From the very nature of the purpose he has in view, the caricaturist must appeal to the knowledge, the beliefs, the prejudices of the majority of his contemporaries. In order to be understood by them and influence them, he must reflect and interpret their manners and their temperament. He must enter into the spirit of his age and be sensitive to all its tendencies and teachings. If he is worthy of his calling, he is a very mirror held up to the nature among which he moves and has his being. In the works of the great caricaturists, we see reproduced the features of the world's show that was being enacted around the artists, we can read its character, its ruling principles, its lighter influences, as well as its more serious interests. To the student of social manners, and to the historian endowed with the modern historian's largeness of view, the records and examples of caricature art supply hints and information, give the lights and shadows and vivifying touches of actual life, that will in vain be looked for in graver chronicles.

The history of caricature in all ages, and all the world over is deeply interesting, whether we study on Egyptian monuments, on Greek and Roman pottery, and on the walls of Pompeii, the earliest known attempts of men to express pictorially the incongruous and fantastic elements in life and manners, or whether we follow the development of the art from its rude utterances in the Middle Ages, through the resurrection stir of the Renaissance, the busy-busy of the Reformation, and the confused and turbulent politics of the eighteenth century, until we reach the more refined and thoughtful form it assumes in the best burlesque literature of the present day. There has been a gradual progress onwards as the thoughts of men have widened, but through all the progress, one purpose runs, and Hogarth and Leech, Gallyard and Tenniel, Daumier and Cham of modern times are the artistic descendants and heirs of the early sculptors of grotesque church ornaments and of the monks who introduced into their illuminations the myriad nightmares of medieval demonology.

I cannot do more, here, than touch on one or two points in the history of caricature art in England. Those who wish for full information on the subject in general cannot do better than read the works of the Frenchman Champfleury, an acute critic and a scholar, and of the English author, Thos Wright, an interesting and animated, although a less learned writer. On the beginnings of caricature in this country, much light has been thrown by the indefatigable and well directed labours of Mr ■ G. Stephens in compiling the "Catalogue of the Satirical Prints and Drawings in the British Museum," now in process of issue.

Pictorial caricature was later in becoming a power in this country than on the Continent. The political and theological disputes of the age of Charles I and the Commonwealth, and the animosities following the Revolution of 1688, gave ■ vitality, and laid a foundation for its vigorous after progress. ■ was hardly, at the outset, of native growth. According to Mr Wright, "Modern political caricature, born in France, may be said to have had its cradle in Holland," and, for long, most of the satirical prints that circulated in England were either drawn by Dutchmen or based on their designs. Under the Georges, English caricature became in every sense distinctly national. The Sacheverell episode, the South Sea Bubble, the warfare between Whigs and Tories, the intrigues of civil parliamentary leaders, the clamour of "Wilkes and Liberty," the wild riot of elections, called forth a school of political caricaturists, whose versatility and rough wit must not be overlooked because of their unscrupulous party spirit, and almost entire lack of true artistic feeling. Social caricature grew up alongside of political, and the manners of the eighteenth century have been portrayed for us by shrewd and outspoken observers. It is a coarse life they reflect, coarse in its pleasures and its vices, coarse even in ■ virtues and its graver pursuits. It was, however, let us bear in mind, the life of the past that has made possible the life of the present, and has therefore its lessons for all time. The genius of Hogarth ("le premier roi de caricature," declares Champfleury, "fut un Anglais—Hogarth") could, from its hotch potch of incident, draw stories of comedy and tragedy that will never lose their interest so long as men's hearts throb with passion, or wridle with temptation. The English school of caricature grew rapidly in importance, and early in this century its activity reached, for a time, a culminating point. The great war with France gave rise ■ floods of satirical drawings, directed against "hog-eating Moscos," and their leader, Buonaparte, the peculiarities of our kings and their courts and the ever-varying vagaries of fashion supplied endless themes on which artists of more or less ability exercised their wit. Out of the cloud of oblivion that has fallen on most of those caricaturists, a few names stand clear and distinct, and one or two are among the immortals of English art. Hogarth, the greatest of them all, Sandby, Sayer, Bunbury, Gillray, Rowlandson, Isaac Cruikshank, George Cruikshank, Seymour, and "Phiz," have secured for themselves abiding places, of more or less honour, in our remembrance and respect.

On 17th July, 1841, appeared the first number of an illustrated weekly paper that has had down to this day a career so honourable that Englishmen may justly feel pride in its success. Punch, or the London Charivari, has made itself a necessity to the people of these islands. Our mental life would be poorer, wanting Punch, the innocent gaiety of the nation would be eclipsed, if Punch ceased to laugh with us, and to make ■ laugh. The position of Punch is unique in the world. The best comic papers of the Continent, those of Paris, for example, are poor beside it. Champfleury admits that the true principles of caricature are better understood in England than in France, and Punch is a witness on his side. The satire of the French journals is, for the most part, either ferocious or indecent, they gibbet their adversaries to eternal infamy, or they grin with a double meaning that suggests all things that are unwholesome and impure. Punch is, and always has been, healthy, manly, and honest. Mistaken, we may think it sometimes, it looks at life, perhaps, too much through cockney spectacles, it does not, except at rare and very happy moments of inspiration, quite understand a Scotchman; but it has never been mean or vindictive. It is a standing proof that gaiety and innocence go gladly hand in hand. Grown men find amusement in its pages, and ■ never brought a blush to the cheek of an innocent girl. Think of the abuses it has exposed, the absurdities ■ has ridiculed, the reforms it has advocated, of the merry laughter ■ has caused, of the kindly feelings it has promoted! "The Song of the Shirt" appeared in its columns, "The Snobs of England," "The Caudle Lecturer," and "Happy Thoughts," and these with their wit, philosophy, satire, fun, and pathos, are typical of the contents ■ Punch every week.

Punch, the establishment of which was suggested by Mr J W. Laist, an enterprising London printer, had, at its start, its own vicissitudes, but it soon took firm hold of public favour. The galaxy of literary talent employed on it, and the strong individuality of each contributor, were enough to attract attention and in the long run to insure success. As every one knows Mark Lemon the Mithras, the Bicketts, Douglas Jerrold, Tom Hood, Thackeray, Shirley Brooks, Tom Taylor and many others of the brightest wit and blindest spirits in English literature have spoken through its columns and helped to build up its prosperity. The pictorial element in Punch is what mainly concerns us here. Going over the old volumes (and I know of no pleasanter or more profitable companions than the whole series of the merry and wise old jester) we are struck as we proceed, with the growing improvement in the illustrations. When Punch started it was rather a dead time for English caricature, and the new journal gave new impetus and a new tone to burlesque art. The little black silhouettes, with punning titles, of the earlier volumes are clever certainly, but they become monotonous, while the larger illustrations are comparatively thin forced, and mannered. The demand for the work, however, produced its own men who were ready and able to supply it. The contrast is great between the drawings in Punch and those of the caricaturists a century ago. They show us a different life, almost a different national temperament or at least a temperament modified very much in its manifestations. The old ferocity, the old rough-and-ready homeliness have given place to the grace of life, and the dignity and purity of manners. We have much yet in our ways for which we may well bow our heads in shame, but we may at least hope that we are progressing to a higher type of character only we must beware lest we should, in a nation, foster strength away in over refinement. Among those who have drawn for Punch are Birket Foster, 'Crowquill', Sir John Gilbert, and Henry Meadows, but the artists who have made its fame in the past are pre-eminently John Leach and Richard Doyle.

*Yours very truly,

The artists of to day on the staff of Punch sustain splendidly the reputation of the paper. Du Maurier, Keene, Sambourne, are household names among us, and we are their debtors for many a pleasant moment. One of the most illustrious of the band is John Tenniel, who is to-day the foremost living political caricaturist, not of this country only, but of the world. The steady purpose, the conscientious industry, and the enlightened common sense shown in all his works and ways, make his career an instructive one to artists.

John Tenniel was born in London in 1823. He received his general education in Kensington, but did not pass through any regular course of art training. Like almost all true artists, however, he had art instincts from his youth, and his dexterity and precision of touch to-day show how laboriously he must, in his young years, have disciplined his eye and his hand. He was for a time a pupil in the Academy school, attended life classes, chisel, studied anatomy, and, full of delight in his art, grudged no trouble that led him to increased facility and knowledge. He understood his own capabilities, and he trained them thoroughly, although his method of training may have been in its details a little desultory. At the age of sixteen he exhibited his first picture in the Suffolk Street Galleries, and it was bought, we are told in Truth (September, 1883), by T. J. Power, the actor. He was one of the successful competitors in the great Cartoon competition, and a fresco in the Poets' Chamber is by his brush. To this day he continues to practice both oil and water colour painting, especially the latter, and is a member of the Royal Institute, to whose exhibitions he is a regular contributor. His fame, however, has been won altogether as a draughtsman in "black and white." He began his description of work at an early age, and his admirable drawing, the result of the strict drilling he had given his manual powers, soon secured for him employment as an illustrator of books and periodicals. I have before me the number of Sharp's London Magazine for 7th February, 1846, in which the principal illustration (to a story called "St. Michael's Eve") is by Tenniel. In it his style is already clearly marked, he had evidently found where his true strength lay. Since then he has worked for many journals, and drawn designs, humorous and serious, for several books. The most noted, perhaps, are his illustrations to the "Arabian Nights," and to "Alice in Wonderland" and "Through the Looking-Glass." The pictures in the last two, and especially in "Through the Looking-Glass," are about as happy examples as we could wish of pure, unadulterated fun, utterly free from all taint of vulgarity.

The great event in Mr. Tenniel's life, his connection with Punch, began about 1851, and, at the present day, only one other member of the staff, Mr. Percival Leigh, Leech's friend, and "an original literary contributor," can count more years of service. It is said that Douglas Jerrold admired greatly some illustrations by Tenniel in a new edition of "Esop's Fables," and suggested him as a "likely" man, Mark Lemon, then editor of Punch. Tenniel fortunately accepted Lemon's invitation to join the staff. We can trace his hand from the first design he drew. For some time his principal work was initial letters and small vignettes, and in these, the graces of his largest cartoons of later years are plainly seen in miniature. He is always classical, correct, and careful, even when his humour is most exuberant, and his character most strongly indicated. His smallest figures are full of action, and the severity of his drawing never passes into stiffness. Certain subjects appear to have a fascination for him. He displays from the first his ability to draw animals, and delights in costume bits, in fully armed knights, in prancing steeds caparisoned for the tourney, in ultra-theatrically atrocious bandits, in gallant tars, wide-trousered and broadsworded, in ancient Romans, more Roman-minded than ever Latin was, in parodies of old times and old manners. All these excellencies are present in drawings that are frequently not much larger than a thumb-nail. But Mr. Tenniel, in his earlier efforts as in his later, is not only humorous and witty, he can be tragic and pathetic as well, and many good judges hold him to be greater in tragedy than he is in comedy. Witness his "Mortmain" in vol. xxi., where "the shadow feared of man" is rendered with as much dramatic force as ever was in any old symbolic "Dance of Death," and with more suggestive dignity and self-restraint. In the number for August 1, 1863, we have another masterly drawing of a kindred subject, a ballet girl on a high tight rope, and death's grim hand stealthily dividing the strands with a knife, a powerful protest against the sin of needlessly dangerous acrobatic performances. Among the other earlier examples of Tenniel's work that may be specially noted, are "The Virginian Slave" in vol. x., "May Day," 1851; "Punch's Illustrations to Shakespeare," 1855-56, and "Punch's Book of British Costumes," 1860. The last might be greatly extended, but the drawings I have mentioned are eminently characteristic of the artist.

Alice and the Dove

It is as the designer and draughtsman of the weekly cartoon in Punch that Tenniel is most widely known. His predecessor, Richard Doyle, had a strong dash of genius. The present cover of Punch is his work, and his contributions were considered almost indispensable to the success of the paper. Doyle closed his connection with Punch from conscientious motives. He was a Roman Catholic and when, about 1851, we felt alarmed a Catholic progress in this country and Punch attacked the Pope and his claims, Doyle decided that he could no longer remain a member of the staff. Leech then took up the cartoons. Tenniel, who had only recently joined, doing one occasionally. The latter gradually came to design them more frequently, and after January, 1863, when Tenniel's now familiar initials began to be affixed regularly to his pictures, Leech's appearances as a cartoonist are few and far between. John Leech died on October 29, 1864, and Tenniel had then, of course, the field entirely to himself. Leech great as his genius was as a social satirist—and we have had no better in England—is not equal to a political caricaturist to Tenniel. His drawing is rougher and fuzzier and his composition and his lines lack the stichiness and sweep of Tenniel's. Since 1864, with the exception of during a short interval some years ago, and on another single occasion in July of this year, Mr. Tenniel has every week executed the principal drawing in Punch.

The subject of the political cartoon is fixed by, or suggested to, Mr. Tenniel at the weekly Punch dinner on Wednesday. On Thursday he puts into definite shape his thoughts on the matter, and on the Friday, without using models, he draws and finishes his design completely on the wood, ready for the engraver. This is no light task, and involves a very great mental strain. Mr. Tenniel must be abreast of the topics of the day, and keenly alive to the ever-varying currents of public opinion and he must always work at high pressure with the absolute necessity upon him of having his block finished by a certain hour. The blocks are generally admirably cut, but it sometimes happens that the engraver makes mistakes. Mr. Tenniel says, however, that he has grown used to such accidents, and can bear them philosophically. That he has been able, through so many years, to produce with undeviating punctuality and with practically no intermission, his weekly contribution, is a high testimony to his readiness, industry, and determination. We must also take into account Mr. Tenniel's labours on the frontispieces of Punch, and his important drawings in the "Almanacks" and "Pocket Books." Few men have so honourable a record of work to show.

The excellencies of Tenniel's cartoons are known to all the world. ■ has been truly said that "it has been his mission through life ■ purify parody and cannoble caricature."

The brutality, the coarseness, the unscrupulous personalities that mar the ablest productions of such as Gillray are all gone, gone too are the loose draughtsmanship, the indecent allusions, the buffooneries, the confused composition that were the features of pictorial burlesque in the days gone by. Tenniel's satire is severe, but ■ is not malicious. He smites, but not as Daumier smote, vindictively or viciously. His unfailing humour takes all needless cruelty from the blow he gives. His cartoons are pictures, invested with the graces of true art. Good taste directs his pencil and he never allows his fancy to run away with his judgment. In his seemingly most spontaneous designs, in his most exuberantly comic as well as in his most solemn moods, he is self-restrained and self-respecting. His sketches are produced not by wild comic liberties, absurd contortions, or unearthly exaggerations, but by good composition, correct and crisp drawing, and an acute insight into and appreciation of the varieties of character with which he deals.

Whether we agree with Mr. Tenniel's political predilections or not—and it is not difficult to see to which side his sympathies lean—we can do nothing but admire the skill with which, allowing himself exaggeration sufficient to reveal and emphasize individualities, he has reproduced the salient characteristics of our greatest statesmen. Palmerston, Disraeli, Bright, Gladstone, and a host of other luminaries, will through him remain familiar to all succeeding generations of Englishmen. His versatility is wonderful. He ranges from grave to gay, he is witty and ■ is tender; he draws with equal facility cads and ruffians,

(After the Day of the Lion)

soldiers and divines, "Punch" and "Britannia," his female figures, allegorical and real, are graceful and dignified, his animals spirited and life-like. He hits off neatly the peculiarities of political parties and their leaders, and with unsparring satire exposes social shame and abuses. As examples of his animal drawing, no one will readily forget the British Lion springing on the crouching Tiger, during the Indian mutiny, the same

Lion and the Bear meeting on the rocky ledge, at the time of the Afghan difficulty, and the sleigh horses in the Reform Bill cartoon, "They're saved!" Among the many successes of Tenniel's, it is a difficult matter to single out individual cartoons. I have space to mention particularly only the following: his Indian Mutiny cartoons; his parody of a famous picture, "The Order of Release" (September, 1857), "The American Juggernaut" (September, 1864), and, indeed, all the designs bearing on the American Civil War; "The Brummagem Frankenstein" (September, 1866), some of his Fenian satires, "The Two Augurs," and, above all, his magnificent series of drawings connected with the Franco-German war. I think it would be difficult for Mr. Tenniel himself to surpass the last I have named. In them we see his genius in one of its highest and best-sustained flights. Their mingled strength, tenderness, and breadth of view reveal their author's well-trained hand, sympathetic heart, and cultured intellect.

With the kind consent of Messrs Bradbury and Agnew, we reproduce from Punch two cartoons—one humorous, "The Discovery of the Nile," and the other, "The Order of the Day," full of tragic force and salutary lessons. To Messrs. Macmillan we are indebted for permission to reproduce the cuts from "Through the Looking Glass."

Our portrait is from a photograph recently taken by the London Stereoscopic Company. Mr. Tenniel is too true an artist to have about him any "professional" affectations or conceits. In his erect, agile figure, grey moustache, and keen face, there is a stronger suggestion of a beau sabreur than of one of the best draughtsmen in Europe. Long may he be with us to brighten our lives with his pleasant fancies and his genial humour!

THE RELIEVING-OFFICE.

By THE RIVERSIDE VISITOR.

THE relieving office stands as the dreary toll-house that marks the entry to the last stage upon the downward journey of poverty. From this point, the road of life lies through the gloomy regions of pauperdom. It may end in the workhouse, or it may be in that "paupers' drive," in connection with which the poor are given to the small but bitter pests turning upon the point of pauperism being in their carriage.

To the poor, and those working among them, the relieving office is a highly important institution, and we have thought that, having regard to the nature of the public duties discharged through its agency, some account of its work will not be without interest even for the general reader.

The office of our district is a new one, and is very completely fitted up after its fashion. It is plainly and stoutly built, with its gates and doors noticeably strong, and furnished on the inside with skilful reconnoitring grilles, presents rather a fortress-like appearance. The situation strengthens this impression. The structure has, so to speak, been dropped down into the very heart of a network of narrow streets and alleys, by two of the narrowest of which it can alone be approached. It is strong, could be easily defended, and would be hard to operate against, for in its gorge-like approaches "a thousand might well be stopped by three." To the uninitiated this may seem a curious rather than a practical point, but it is of material importance nevertheless. In specially hard times, such times as, by driving the less patient of the honest poor to desperation, and affording the more ruffianly of the no-viable means-of-support classes an excuse for violence, lead to local riots—in such times as these the relieving office is always in danger of attack. Nor is this danger one that affects property only. Bread or blood is the war cry of the rioters on these occasions, but there are generally those amongst them whose desire is for bread and blood, and rather more for blood than bread. It is one of the functions of the relieving officer to thwart the designs of idle and habitual charity hunters when they attempt to prey upon the forms of charitable relief by law provided. For this he is held in hatred by them, and a broad net, in which members of this class are always lending performers, is looked upon as an excellent opportunity for exercising vengeance.

The interior of the office is a large, lofty-rooted oblong, with boarded floor, white-washed walls, and abundance of window light and ventilation. It is divided into two unequal compartments by a passage running across its width. The larger compartment is the general waiting-room, where applicants wait their turn, and those on the books for out-door relief assemble each Friday to receive their weekly doles. It has

A large fireplace, and is liberally furnished with seats in the shape of long forms. Its floor is at all times kept well scrubbed, and in periods of epidemic diseases, which are very frequent in the neighbourhood, is plentifully bestrewn with disinfectants. In one corner of ■ stands a weighing-machine, used for verifying quantities of goods delivered. ■ another corner are piled up sundry little lots of furniture and bedding belonging to aged couples or "lone lorn" women, who, though at present in the workhouse or its infirmary, have hopes of coming out again and once more having a home of their own. The smaller compartment is the office proper, the place wherein the routine work of the practical administration of the Poor Law is carried on. It is a good-sized office, and occasionally serves as a board room for the guardians, though their regular board room is at the workhouse, a mile and a half away. In the centre of the apartment is a large double desk, at one side of which works the relieving officer, and at the other his assistant. One wall of the office is entirely occupied from floor ■ ceiling by a range of broad shelves, on which are stored the hundreds of boxes distributed each week as part of the out-door relief. Opposite the broad shelves are the capacious drawers in which are stored the made-up packages of tea, sugar, sago, oat meal, and other like light "nourishments" of the non-perishable kind, which are served out direct from the office, instead of by orders on tradesmen, as is the case with meat and milk. Under the windows opening into the passage which separates the office from the waiting room are counters supplied with a number of good sized money tills, and the windows are also counter-lighted, for it is through these windows that relief, whether in money or kind, or both, is paid out. A specially constructed case holds the numerous books and forms required in the business of the office.

But the thing that would be most likely to attract the first notice of a stranger visiting the office is the strait-waistcoat hanging from the wall. The conveyance of pauper lunatics to the asylums to which they are assigned is one of the duties of the relieving officer, and hence the presence of the strait-waistcoat as part of the equipment of his office. It is made of canvas, and fastened with stout tapes; and ■ a much more humane contrivance than was the horse harness-like arrangement of padded straps and iron buckles which formerly did duty as a strait-waistcoat.

A notice board on the outer wall of the office announces to all whom it may concern that the hours during which application can be made are from nine to one, and three ■ six; and to this is added an intimation to the effect that on no account are children to be sent to the office. This latter is a wise and salutary regulation. The relieving office is the hubicon between independence and pauperism. The self-respecting poor will make the bitterest struggle to avoid crossing it, but those who do once cross ■ rarely fail to cross it more than the once, even if they do not remain permanently on the pauper side. The atmosphere of the relieving office seems to have a morally enervating effect. It is highly desirable, alike in the interests of the children and of society at large, that the dispensing of those receiving public relief should be kept clear of the relieving-office. One of the most unfortunate aspects of the pauper question is that so many of the class are bred and born in it.

Though, having regard to its nature, the work of the relieving office is always painfully large, ■ is not a fixed quantity. The law of its fluctuation is that of an inverse proposition to the fluctuations of work generally, its busiest periods being those of unusual trade depression. Large numbers of the working classes are constantly upon the verge of pauperism, and any lengthened "spell" of dull trade is certain to bring a considerable percentage of them "upon the parish" in some phase, for the forms of relief are many.

The first daily proceeding of the relieving-officer is to get out his pile of order books—orders for medical attendance, a separate one for each of the several doctors who divide the district between them, orders for milk, for wine, for brandy, orders for meat alone, and combination orders for meat, meat, tea and sugar, orders for admission to the workhouse and to the workhouse infirmary, orders for the fever or small-pox ambulance, and orders for the cabs for the removal of cases of non-contagious diseases; labour orders for the stone yard, and orders for a variety of other things, including the last orders that will ever be required on behalf of those for whom they are made—orders for coffins and funerals.

As soon as the doors are open applicants begin to arrive at the office. The first-comers—among the habitués, at any rate—are those seeking orders for medical attendance for themselves or friends. This class of order is only issued between the hours of nine and ten, not with any view to limiting the output, so to speak, but because the doctors must be informed in time of the cases they are called upon to visit. In cases that are represented as urgent, however, the regulations as to medical orders are relaxed. In ordinary cases the orders are given almost without question, no relieving officer caring to risk the consequences that might arise from any delay in giving or from a refusal to give an order. The position on this point is quite understood by the regular pauper classes, and they, as a body, make the most of it. They fricly call in medical attendance where the struggling but unpaupersed poor would "doctor themselves," or be entitled to the assistance of the provident dispensary, or some other form of sick benefit society. One chief reason for the run upon medical orders is the hope that they may lead to nourishment orders—a hope that is often enough realised, as it all times a large percentage of the very poor are unmistakably underfed and 'low, even when not suffering from any specific disease.

After the first hours the more miscellaneous applications begin to come in. Most of them are to go before the board, on the ensuing weekly board-day. These are entered in the Application Book—a bulky volume, with a formidable array of tabulated columns. In many instances the applications are mainly for renewal or continuance of relief, the periods for which it had previously been granted having expired. These are entered up off-hand, but in new cases the applicants are pretty closely put to the question chiefly with the view of ascertaining, firstly, whether they are really in destitute circumstances, and, secondly, whether they have relatives who, if in a position to assist them, are legally bound to do so. The applicant is a deserted wife, the questioning is particularly stringent. Genuine cases of wife desertion are of duly occurrence, but cases in which the alleged desertion is a plot between husband and wife are by no means unknown in relieving office experience, and even where there is no suspicion of collusion it is generally found that the women are very reluctant to give any information that may lead to the apprehension of their runaway husbands.

The bulk of the applicants for regular outdoor relief are widows with two or more children dependent upon them. Women under sixty years of age, and having no child, or only one, under fourteen years of age, are classed as "Able bodied, and are not entitled to outdoor relief." The only form in which they can claim relief is in the shape of an order for The House. Men under sixty are also accounted able bodied, but with them there is an alternative in accepting the House, namely, to accept an order to labour in the parish stoneyard. Beside the callers for the various orders, and applicants wishing to be "took down" for the board, all manner of odd and incidental visitors put in an appearance at the relieving office. One woman comes to complain that there is an unfair proportion of bone in the two pounds of beef supplied to her under a meat order, and the beef, which she produces, bearing out her complaint, a letter is at once dispatched to the offending butcher. Another comes to ask what she is to do with a nurse child, on whose account she has received no payment for two months past, and whose mother has moved away and gone she knows not where. A third, who has heard that the relieving officer had been taking a case to the county asylum on the previous day, and knows that it is his practice on such occasions to make special inquiries about all inmates of the institution coming from his district, calls to ask for news of her husband, who is a patient there. A fourth woman wishes to know on what day she may be allowed to visit two of her children who are in the district school. And then, by way of variety, comes a man who desires to be officially informed if it is not "the law of England that you can place a drunken wife in the workhouse if you are prepared to pay five shillings per week for her keep." Occasionally an indignant interpreter or a spiteful neighbour turns up at the office to denounce, as an impostor or something worse, some individual who is receiving outdoor relief. But as a rule this kind of denunciation is accomplished by means of anonymous letters. There is probably no other public official who receives so many or such ill-written and ill-composed communications of the anonymous order as the relieving officer. To the relieving office also come, to gain or give information, or compare notes, Charity Organisation officers, Vaccination officers, School Board officers, and others. By working in combination such officers are enabled to do a good deal in the way of checkmating the professional charity hunters, whose weak point generally lies in variation of their story.

We have here but briefly described the machinery of the relieving office. With how much misery, how much of suffering, of sorrow, of sin, its working is associated, may we think easily imagined.

THE STORY OF JOHN WYCLIF

By PROFESSOR A. F. MITCHELL D.D. St. Andrews

IN—THE TRIALS OF HIS LATER YEARS—

HITHERTO Wyclif's career had been singularly prosperous. He had succeeded in carrying with him the sympathies of the friends of learning and religion in the university and in exercising a mighty influence for good among the more talented and thoughtful of its alumni. He had faithfully maintained its honour and independence, and had been at once "its pride and terror." He had also won the confidence of the English nation. On various occasions he had been summoned to their aid by its leading statesmen who had experience of his sagacity, integrity, and courage. Whoever flinched or temporized, he had stood firm as the advocate of its rights and liberties against the persistent encroachments of popes and cardinals abroad, and half-hearted worldly-minded churchmen at home. His bold and resolute antagonism to these last, and his unremitting efforts to rouse the nobles and people to provide an effectual remedy for the abuses the higher clergy had long tolerated or fostered, evoked those retaliatory measures which embittered the remainder of his life and arrested for a century and a half the progress of that practical reformation in Church and State which he had so hopefully begun. Now certainly evil days came on him and years wherein he was painfully to feel how fickle was the applause of the populace, how fleeting the favour of princes and politicians, and how little to be relied on were even many who had intellectually grasped his principles. But by the grace of God he was enabled to hold fast his integrity, to stay himself on Him who is a sure refuge and support in sorest need, and to witness a good confession before many witnesses. No doubt the opponents who now combined to assail him were largely influenced by political considerations, and mainly anxious to discredit the ablest and most popular man in the ranks of their opponents. But there were others whose views went further who dragged on their more tolerant associates. Chief among these was William Courtney, at this date Bishop of London. Descended from the noble family of Devon, of good abilities and popular manners, and better skilled in the arts of the courtier, the statesman, and the demagogue than in the work of a Christian divine or pastor, he rapidly attained to high position in the University, the Church, and the State. Clearly perceiving that there was no chance of permanent victory for the party opposed to the Duke of Lancaster till Wyclif was discredited he gave his brethren no rest till he had got them to cite the Reformer, and to be in the station which was to put back for so long the cause of reform in England. The following was the first act in this venal drama. On Thursday, February 29, 1377, the convocation met behind the High Chapel of Old St Paul's. July 25 was the hour the lay peers of the party were duly there to lend their countenance to the ecclesiastical nominees in the questionable work they had in hand. The rise of the Catholic had been aided with the resources of the riches and nobility in London of London who were friendly to their cause. When the Reformer came, attended by the Duke of Lancaster and Percy Earl Marshal of England, difficulty was experienced by the Marshals' men to clear a way for them through the crowd. The hierarchy perhaps not over-pleased that the culprit should come into court attended by such powerful protectors, and indignantly a high officer of State should have taken on him by his supporters to clear the way in his cathedral church where his exclusive right of control should have been recognised, is the party came up broke out once in the following strain: "Lord Percy, if I had known what miseries you would keep in my church, I would have estopped you out from coming thither." The Duke immediately retorted that Lord Percy should keep miseries there, even if the bishop said so. Notwithstanding this ominous beginning, it is said seats were offered to the Duke and Earl Marshal, whereupon the latter requested Wyclif to sit down, adding that he had many things to answer to, and had need of a soft seat to repose on. This provoked the Bishop anew, or, to use the words of Fox, "effrains cast him into a furious chaf." He declared that Lord Percy's proposal was altogether unreasonable, and that the culprit must stand in the presence of his judges. The Duke rejoined that Lord Percy's proposal was only reasonable, and added, "As for you, my Lord Bishop, who are grown so proud and arrogant, I will bring down the pride not of you alone but of all the prelacy of England." The Bishop thereupon drove the Duke to do his worst, and much angry altercation ensued. In fine, the Duke having remarked aside that he would rather drag the Bishop out by the hair of the head than suffer such treatment at his hands, the citizens present declared they would sooner lose their lives than see their bishop treated so. A tumult forthwith rose and the convocation was dissolved or adjourned. Comments very unfavourable to Wyclif and his friends have been made in connection with this scene. His friends may be left to the tender mercies of their cities though their conduct was only such as was to be expected of the aristocrats of the age checked by such a peck as the bishop had made and brought face to face with their political opponents, met in circumstances which meant not only defiance of them, but of the English crown and laws of which they were the guardians. As for the Reformer himself even Dr Hook has suggested that his silence may be regarded as a tacit consent on his friends.

The second act in this drama is supposed to have occurred in the following year. It was now too clear that there was no power in England strong enough to cope with the veteran champion of the national independence and aspirations while shielded by the safeguards of English law and still favoured by a large part of the nobility and people. So help was sought and got from abroad. On the 22nd of May, 1377, Gregory XI, who shortly before had abandoned Avignon for Rome, announced his return to the old capital of Christendom by issuing five documents bearing on this memorable case. Four of them were termed bulls, having attached to them the well-known lenden bulle, bearing on one side the heads of Sts. Peter and Paul, and on the other the title of the reigning pope. Three of its articles (along with a schedule of the errors charged against him) were addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, authorising and requiring them to investigate the charges which they had too long overlooked and report on them to his Holiness, and if they could, to clear and imprison the culprit, and if they could not to take him to appear at Rome. The fourth was addressed to the University of Oxford.

It was a demand for their long tolerance of this 'master of errors' and of urging them to see that he gave obedience to the citation of the delegates. The fifth was a massive and apocalyptic letter addressed to the King urging and requiring him, as he valued the peace of his kingdom, as well as the honour of the Church, to aid the delegates in every possible way in the work intrusted to them. "Kalam the said John in sure custody and in chains" such was the treatment the Pope designed for the bold Reformer and such the treatment to which some of the English clergy who would have yielded him had English law then been what under their learning it was soon after in a tale or had it been safe or then in fact that it law it defiance in 1381 it is afflicted with the regulations of the canon law and the injunctions of the Pope. In the nation was not yet so in kith to itself as to be in to abandon to such a fate its old clergy. Even the University he tried for a time whether it should not resist its dependence and reject the bull but in the end it agreed to make the required citation. If the monkish chroniclers are to be trusted, the delegates talked long of their determination to carry out the behests of the Pope. But when they actually met they did so not as before in great state in St. Paul's, but privately in the Archbishop's chapel at Lambeth. And even so they were not known, lest in doubt how their proceedings were recorded both by the Court and the people. As Dr. Vaughan has it, 'The people, alarmed for the safety of the accused, surrounded the place of meeting and forced their way into the chapel where the papal commissioners were sitting.'

The dismay was augmented when Sir Lewis Clifford, an officer of the Court appeared and in the name of the Dowager Princess of Wales—the head of the Reformation—'forbade the delegates to proceed to any definitive sentence in regard to the doctrine and conduct of Wyclif. Whereupon as Vaughan remarks "they, who were all the authority of the apostolic see, shaken as they were by a read with the wind, they became softer than oil in their speech to the public infestation of their own dignity and the injury of the whole Church.' Something however had apparently been done before the delegates departed. The impact or protestation drawn up by the Reformer had probably been lodged, and an injunction to silence on the points in dispute been imposed on him. The death of the Pope in that very month put an end to the process.

The schism in the papacy which broke out soon after the death of Gregory seems to have roused anew all the energy of Wyclif. He fervently appealed to the Christian duty to sever the occasion to rid themselves of evils and burdens under which they had long groined. He himself enjoyed it by devoting himself more than ever to Church reform. He began now to speak more definitely on several important doctrines which had long occupied his thoughts. In his treatise on

The Truth of Holy Scripture he takes up resolutely Protestant position contending resolutely for the authority and sufficiency of Scripture as the divine rule of faith, and while allowing due weight to the testimony of antiquity and the interpretations of the great doctors he maintains firmly the right of private judgment and the right of the duty to have the Bible in a language which they can understand. He deduces from it the great doctrines of grace which were so dear to Augustine and Luther and in it he had not attained full insight into the doctrine of justification by faith he shows no lack of knowledge of faith and of the justifier, divine in His nature and work, yet the centre and heart of humanity, in whom all good comes. But the doctrine which above all others engaged his thoughts at this time was that relating to the nature of Christ's presence in the sacrament. He now ventured to teach that the substance of the bread and wine remain after consecration, and that the body and blood of Christ are not substantially or corporeally, but only spiritually and sacramentally, present. This in early times was the generally received doctrine of the Church and had been maintained down to a comparatively late period by the Anglo-Saxon theologians, but the Norman priests held and enforced the later Roman doctrine. This teaching of the Reformer occasioned great alarm and discussion in the University, and the twelve theses in which he embodied his views were examined and condemned by the vice-chancellor and the doctors he called to his assistance. The condemned propositions were prohibited to be taught or listened to in the schools. The Reformer, when the prohibition was intimated, expressed his unswerving adherence to the doctrine he had taught and sorrowfully withdrew from the scene of his long labours and triumphs. With him went not a little of the life and light of Oxford.

The closing scene in the strife was soon followed. Courtney, who after the Peasants' rebellion was advanced to the see of Canterbury, determined without delay to resume consideration of the heretical and erroneous opinions of the Reformer. He submitted a schedule of them to certain divines, who after examination pronounced ten of them heretical and fourteen erroneous. The Archbishop decided accordingly, and had the decision publicly pronounced, first in London and then in Oxford. His dealing individually with Wyclif's chief adherents and with a solitary exception got them all to recant. He then it is supposed, cited the Reformer himself to a convocation at Oxford in November, 1383. Whether he excused himself from appearing because of the paralytic stroke with which he had been visited or actually appeared and once more expressed his adherence to the doctrines he had taught, is not clearly ascertained. But if he did go he was allowed to depart unbound. Interim work was henceforth the only phase of his activities, and earnestly and faithfully did he do his duty to his humble parishioners. Soon will have it Chaucer had him in view when he drew his portrait of the good parson. Beneath his work among his parishioners, these last years of his life were fruitful in labour more valuable than any that had gone before. ■ was then that several of his English and Latin works were put into final shape. It was then that with the assistance of the few friends who yet remained faithful to him, he completed his translation of the Holy Scripture, beyond all question the greatest of ■ the great services he rendered to his nation, and one for which he deserves to be held in everlasting remembrance by the whole Anglo-Saxon race.*

Once more ere life closed was his retire ment broken in on, by a summons from Urban VI, and the half-serious half-sarcastic reply he sent was worthy of his pulchritudine.

The end was now near at hand. On the 28th December, 1844 while attending service in the church of Lutterworth he had another and more severe paralytic seizure under which he rapidly sank. On the 31st of the same month his heroic and faithful spirit returned to God who "we" but by the memory of his consistent and self-sacrificing Christian life and by the multylication and diffusion of copies of his final sermon of the Scriptures, and of his expository discourses, he still lived and exercised a mighty influence for good on the destinies of that English nation in whose independence and true intellectual, moral, and religious he had ever taken so deep an interest. Times of reaction and peril were fast to come, and the heavens should be clothed with blackness till the night should seem darker than before yet was it but the darkness which precedes the dawn.

 the darkness to guide them following steps and cheer their fainting spirits under the heavy trials through which they had to pass on their way to the better land whither he had gone. The vengeance which he on them

 His doctrine was condemned at the Council of Constance and his bones were ordered to be burned. They were left undisturbed however in the church of his much loved church till 1427, when, in fulfilment of the order of the Council, they were exhumed and consigned to the flames on the old bridge over the Swift, which he had so often passed on errands of mercy and goodwill. The ashes were collected with care and cast into the brook that they might no more pollute God's earth. That brook, as Fuller has quaintly said, "did convey his ashes into Avon, Avon into Severn, Severn into the narrow seas, and they into the main ocean. And thus the ashes of Wyclif became an emblem of his doctrine, which is now dispersed all the world over." There came a time even in England when the sanguinary laws against his adherents fell dead in their places, and liberty and religion revived and throve.
 "Then, as one has said, "his quickening the air, burst into voice as if touching a thousand souls ■ once." This country had no Luther in the sixteenth century because it had its Wyclif ■ the fourteenth, and its Reformation was cast so much into the mould he had shaped for it that no name can yet be named which has a right to eclipse his. Still earlier on the Continent, "John Huss, Jerome of Prague, Savonarola of Florence, but repeated the on yet his dauntless spirit had begun, and not one of them repeated it in

In a copy of a Missal containing the Hussite Liturgy—richly illuminated by loving hands—Wyclif is pictured at the top lighting a spark, Huss below him blowing ■ to a flame, Luther still lower waving on high the lighted torch. It is a true picture of that succession in which one after another they followed with brightening lustre this morning star of the Reformation, till the sky glowed through all its arch with the radiance of the upspringing light."

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

A Modern Romance.

BY SARAH TYLER, AUTHOR OF "GERAINE JOUQUINE," "LADY BRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.—A TIME OF TRIAL.

IRIS hung her head, and gave a piteous sigh at the lamentable coincidence, but before she could say a word she heard a voice she ought to know, and looking round she saw Marianne Dugdale hurrying down the "lounge" to the blacking men. In a moment the swollen burn, the spread-out clothes, and the peasant figure of Jeanne, with her sleeves rolled up to her shoulders, and her linen apron, seemed to wheel round with Iris and vanish out of her sight, and the folly ■ last evening, and the abandonment and flight of this morning, ■ dwindle into the faintest confused dream.

"I have come back for you, Iris, as soon as I could," Marianne kept saying, "we must start immediately and join granny."

"But I thought she had gone by the first train," said Iris, in bewilderment.

"No, she missed it, by the greatest good luck. Oh! I've been so vexed, but we can't stay to talk about it now. We'll have plenty of time afterwards. It was a horrid shame—but she has heard from Sir William, and she has been forced ■ give in, stubborn as she is. Come along, like a duck. I've ordered out your trunk, which was left behind, too. I tell you Lady Fermor is half dead already, lying on a sofa in the waiting-room. We can't keep her there all day, and propose to travel by night. It would be the death of a woman at her age, and I'm sure we don't wish to have her death at our doors, whatever she may have done to us. The stableman is giving us fresh horses, and if we don't lose a moment we shall still be in time for the mid-day train."

"The mid-day train!" cried Iris excitedly, "but Sir William Thwaite ■ going by the mid-day train!"

"What although he is?" protested Marianne impatiently. "He won't take a bite of us. We've travelled long enough with him to know he's perfectly inoffensive. Besides, he's not at our station. I told you he wrote to granny, and though she did not show me the note I believe he must have driven to the next station. Oh! don't be a goose, Iris. Let us get away instantly."

There was little power of resistance left in Iris, even if she had not seen, so far as she was able to see, that Marianne's presence was protection, and that ■ rejoin Lady Esmor at once, however disagreeable it might be for both, would probably save as the best refutation to any attempt to maintain an outrageous story. But Iris did not go without bidding good bye ■ Jennie, thanking her for her sympathy, and pressing on her a little gift by way of remembrance. "You see my friends have come back for me, Jennie. ■ was all ■ I said."

"Awful, miss, I hope it may end as you wish," said Jennie doubtfully, as if she were taking one of her grand far outlooks, and seeing rocks and shoals ahead. "I'm sure I trust so for your sake," much more cordially, in answer to the wistful look in Iris's eyes. "I think the master wanted a word w' you, but he's awful thrang w' a party o' strangers seeking rooms for the fishing, and canna be spoken to the noo, while the young laddy winna wait a blink. Since yer ain folk here turned up again and are takin' you awa' w' them maybe it doesna matter. I'll keep your braw broochie and wear it to mind me o' the young laddy who didna think hersel' aboon makin' a frien' o' me. Gude gang w' you, mem, an'—"

My yer hoo! I say, and it chaps
And never drink one's a dry clog!

Jennie inadvertently wound up her face well with one of the commonest compliments in use among her class for the benefit of a bride and bridegroom. It bore a startling resemblance to what it really was—a curse from a people's epithalamium.

Marianne would hardly wait for the leave taking. She dragged Iris away to the chaise, and Iris did not look back—she felt there was no need. The steep roofed white house with the red roses and the honeysuckle about its windows, standing ■ the paddock among the old trees, which she had greeted at first sight with so light a heart, seemed as if it were branded on her memory.

When the girls were in the chaise, the door shut, and the horses started, neither the rapid motion nor any amount of jolts on the country road could keep Marianne's mouth shut or take away her breath. "What a dreadful affair it has been! Could you have beheved ■ possible for so old a woman to be possessed by such an evil spirit? I don't mean evil in a general way, to which one has got accustomed, I mean daring, defiant wrong-doing! But I must tell you about my share in it. Of course, when I was awakened in the middle of the night, and told we were going to the station, to breakfast at the ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ and start with the early train—after I had got over the impression that King Lear had come back—and the alarm that the house had gone on fire—and the fear that granny was taking leave of her senses, I was so cold, and sleepy, and stupid, that I might have been standing on my head all the time. Sooner than up every five minutes to beg me ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ make haste, and as I was getting so much attention I thought you were in good time and were with Lady Esmor. I never missed you till we were in the chaise, and even then I imagined that it was by a blunder you were being left behind, just as I concluded Sir William was on the box. I cried out to granny that you were not there, and I called you by name, but she had the strength to pull me down on the seat, and put her hand on my mouth. I was so taken by surprise that I could not free myself. Besides, all the time she was chuckling and laughing so as to put me off my guard, and persuade me the whole manoeuvre was some good joke, of which I should presently see the point, and then I might laugh with my neighbour. But when the explanation came ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ a string of cock-and-bull nonsense, of which I did not believe one word. She said Sir William Thwate and you had been lovers years ago. What a story, Iris! She told me that you had not behaved well ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ another story!—but had trifled with him, and pretended to put him off. Then he went away in a pet and made a low marriage. But all that was over, and now you wanted to make it up with him, and you would have done so a great deal sooner if I had not stood in the way—she had the coolness to say so. She assured me that your coming in as the bride last evening was not to serve me, or anybody save yourself, though I had been so silly as to be taken in. You intended the step as a piece of encouragement to Sir William ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ come on again. I might be sure he understood it perfectly and accepted it, so now you both understood each other; and it would ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ the kindest service your friends could render you—it would be doing by one's neighbour as one would be done by one's self, to go away and leave you ■ each other. You were really married in the Scotch fashion, and if you cared to be married over again in church with flying colours, you could be so any day, though it was not at all necessary. Everybody knew that Border marriages were perfectly good ■ the eyes of the law. Now, Iris, did you ever hear such a rignmarole? Would you not have thought that granny, however full of malice, had too much brains ■ concoct such sensational trash?"

Iris sat dumb for a moment, then she asked desperately, "And what did you say, and do?"

"Oh! I was so disgusted and enraged on my own account that I behaved beautifully, yes, I did, Iris. I was perfectly quiet and polite. I said it was an entire mistake, I knew it to be so and that the moment I got to the station I would look out for a carriage and go back and fetch you. I would explain everything to the station-master, and if he refused to attend to me I would demand to be taken before a magistrate and tell my story. She and her maids might go on if they pleased, you and I would follow after. We were old enough to take care of ourselves, indeed, I was not sure that we should not manage it better than some of our elders could do it for us. Anyway, I would be torn to pieces by wild horses before I entered the train without you. She gave an ugly grin, and asked if I wanted Sir William for myself. But I was her match for once. I said she was at liberty to think so if she chose. I had made up my mind she meant ■ give me up as a raging lunatic before I could open my mouth to the station-master; but the train steamed out of the station just as we drove up. Then she was so stiff, and had such difficulty in getting out of the carriage, that I could not leave her to Soames, who looked frightened out of her wits. I had to help and see poor, miserable old granny land on a sofa, and order brandy and tea for her. She was nearly two hours in coming round. I think now it was a trick, but at the time I got as frightened as Soames, and dared not turn my back. What brought her to herself at last was a man on horseback, with a letter from Sir William Thwaite to her. Then, sure enough, she looked like herself in a second, sat up, and read the letter. I think she said something about a weak fool, who did not know his own mind, and could not play his game, though the cards were put into his hands. At last she turned round and told me, 'Girl, do as you will; you are a deluded idiot for your pains. Do you think Sir William has been making up to you all these weeks? He may have given you reason ■ think so, ■ serve his own purpose, but he has been sighing and dying for that saint and fool of a cousin of yours since first he set eyes on her. There is no accounting for tastes. But if he is not man enough to grasp his prey when ■ within his reach he is not worth my help. Take your own way, and much good may it do you. But remember, if you are not back before the next train, I shall start with Soames, and my dutiful grand children may find their way back to me as they can.' As if we could not, Iris! Never mind her, darling, don't look so horribly crestfallen. Why should we care? Don't we know granny by this time? And though she is a ■ it misfortune to everybody connected with her—nobody can deny that—still don't you think ■ worst of all for herself? And you have me, I have not failed you."

"I cannot help caring, Marianne," said Iris, with a wan wailing smile. "It was so cruel."

"But it is not as if there had been any thing in it, as if Sir William had cared for you, or you for him, that you should take it so to heart and not laugh at it now that it is over, as at any other passing annoyance. Iris, was there ever anything in it, my foundation for what she said? Have you been hiding the truth from me all this time?" said Marianne, dropping the late caring touches she had been indulging in, drawing back into her corner of the chaise and staring at her cousin suspiciously and jealously.

"There was nothing ■ conceal," said Iris faintly, "except that long ago as it seems to me now, when Sir William first came to Whitehills, we were thrown a good deal together. Grandmamma encouraged it and wished to make a match between us, until he fancied he cared for me, and asked me to marry him and I refused him—that is all, Marianne."

"And enough too," said Marianne sarcastically, "and I suppose you also refused Ludovic Acton."

"Oh no!" declared Iris with a weary little laugh, "for the very good reason that I never had the opportunity—King Lud to my knowledge never cared for any girl save one."

"I don't know," said Marianne discontentedly, "I feel as if I had lost my faith in mankind, and womankind to boot. Why, I might have fallen in love with Sir William!" she exclaimed naively.

Did you ever hear of a man digging up a dead man?

"When he would doubtless have returned the compliment."

"No, not if he had begun by sighing and dying for you, as Grinny said. I am not an utter fool, Iris," protested Marianne hotly, "though I may be a simpleton in believing in those I thought my friends. You are not a girl likely to be forgotten by a man like Sir William Thwaite. I should never have dreamed of putting you out, any more than of your keeping all this back from me, when I believed I knew everything about you, even when I told you—what I told last evening."

"My dear little cousin, be reasonable,"

Iris exerted herself to entreat. "The story was an old one, dead and buried for years. Was it for me to dig it up, out of its grave, to go and boast that an unlucky man had once put himself into my power, and I had abused his confidence after many days? Would you have had me do that? You could see for yourself that there was nothing between Sir William Thwaite and me, that we were no more than friends."

Marianne was silent for a long time, with her dark eyes cast down and a lowering brow. She suddenly looked up and darted into her head that Iris's little face had grown colourless in the course of twelve hours, that there were dark rings under her eyes, and that her hands trembled as they lay loosely in her lap. She had been insulted and persecuted almost more than she could bear, and here was the girl in whose favour Iris had interposed, proceeding to persecute the victim, in turn, out of sheer unworthy vanity and exacting pride. "I am a heartless creature, worse than I could have thought possible," Marianne cried. "I beg your pardon, in any part, if you will let me call you so, you who were so good to me, and it must have cost you much more than I guessed."

"Yes, it cost me something," said Iris simply, "because I did not like the play in itself and it was inevitable that there should be some awkwardness. But neither of us knew what we were doing or had any notion what it might lead to. Don't speak of it," said Iris with a shiver, "I cannot talk of it yet."

"Just let me say one thing if I had been in your place and she had done it to me, and if I had quarrelled with King Lud and he had come to hear the garbled story, oh, Iris, Iris, I should have been lost. My dear, my dear, I ought to go down on my knees to thank you, and I do thank you with all my heart."

"I know it, and it is some comfort to have served you."

"At your own expense! Oh! I must do something for you—not that I can ever repay you, but to prevent your being a scape goat for me. If not, I shall break my heart for having brought you into such trouble, and he will never forgive me after all, for he is as fond of you as if you were one of his sisters."

"Don't speak of it," Iris repeated imploringly.

"It drives me wild when I think I have been deceived," confessed Marianne ingenuously, after another pause, "not that you deceived me—it was just you could not help it. But I wonder if it was all a piece of imagination on my part that Sir William liked me a little?"

"I am sure he liked you very much," said Iris promptly, "you were so bright, you made him chide you and laugh with you as I never saw him do with any one else. You know, I am rather silent and serious for a young man."

"Yes," said Marianne, doubtfully, "but I thought he sometimes looked at me sadly, as well as kindly, as if he would like to take care of me. He knew granny of old and he thought I was not in very good hands, and he might be a better protection; but that would have been a great mistake," shaking her head, "and I believe I was thinking of his old love, his true love yesterday when I brought you to him. A great glow came into his face—I was looking more at King Lud, naturally, but I saw it, and don't you remember he said 'I will,' as if his heart was in his mouth? Could he have fancied for an instant that the scene was real? Then what a temptation to him granny's behaviour must have been! Dearest Iris, can the jest not become earnest, and you two friends be as happy as King Lud and I shall be some day?" cried Marianne, clasping her hands on her knees and leaning over to her cousin.

"For shame's sake don't talk such nonsense, Marianne!" said Iris with asperity at first. "You ought to know that there is no foundation for your suggestion," and Marianne was silenced for once.

The girls arrived in time for the train, and Lady Fermor had so far recovered that she was on the platform. She looked them over, then spoke to Iris with an effrontery which was almost without parallel. "So you have taken us in, Iris," she said lightly and audibly, with a double meaning in her words, and yet as if nothing had happened.

It gave her grand-daughter strength to assert herself, "You have not kept your promise to me, Lady Fermor," Iris said. "You might have told me that you wished to get rid of me and I should have gone away honourably, as I did before. I shall go away again as soon as I can."

"Without asking my leave, no doubt?" exclaimed her ladyship, raising her eyebrows.

"I did ask your leave, and now I may take it for granted."

"As you will, Miss Compton. I am too old to part with you."

It was a silent party that travelled across the grey border moor, through the more fertile portion of Dumfriesshire up to the heathery hills of Annandale.

When the train drew up in the Moffat Station, long shadows were falling across the platform, but Iris, who sat by the nearest door, distinguished a well-known figure in the shadow and drew back aghast. Sir William Thwaite had come on from Dumfries, and was standing like a sentinel on duty—with only a heightened colour indicate any trace of discomposure—prepared to hand the party out.

"You here, Thwaite?" cried Lady Fermor in loud challenge. "Well, we've been playing at cross purposes, I seem, but it is hicky that we have shaken ourselves right, come together and all turned up at our destination. Have you made any inquiry about the moor—whether the birds are—why or not?”

He had no reply for her, beyond helping her carefully out of the carriage and leading her away. By that time his understood what his change of plans meant. His presence there, as well as hers, was best for making everything be as it had been, and for putting out of mind the unpleasant d'heure which had intervened. If he had not come immediately, and the two had not met again without delay, she felt as if there is encountering each other would have been intolerable. Now it was still so much a matter of course, and the true glow was so impressed on an idle face, that before he parted from them in the lobby of the hotel his could go up to him in the presence of Lady Fernor, Muriel, and Sorrel, and gently return to him his little packet saying, “Thank you very much Sir William, you see I have not needed your loan.”

CHAPTER XL—A SURPRISE

For the next few days the party returned to their former habits. The sole evidence that there had been any disturbance of the company's tranquillity remained in a certain constraint which clung about their intercourse, a disinclination to allude to their halt on the Borders and in utter avoidance of a topic which had been much discussed before.

Yet the forbidden topic cropped up occasionally, even without Lady Fernor's intervention. When the ladies and their square were strolling about the streets of the little town, and had come back to the street in which their comfortable old inn was situated, some conjecture was hesitated about its age. Mariann Dugdale insisted they would not find an old inn in Scotland of later creation than Prince Charles's time. A respectable tradesman passing by, and catching the tenor of the conversation, took it upon him to supply the data and oblige the party with a gratuitous piece of information. “Auld Loll Dundonald, the great squire, came on here with his bride after their marriage. Ye may mind the marriage was disputed in a court of law after Jim Cochrane had bidden a long farewell both to his honour and his disgrace, and my leddy was a bitter-tongued, weedow woman, driven, poor soul, to fecht baith for and against her ain son.”

“The folly is in the an,” said Lady Fernor sarcastically. “shall we consult you sister, I write, and flee back to England?”

“I do not know myself in any danger, my lady,” said the person addressed stiffly and sternly, while Muriel, like a host to his of climbing the hill behind the town, which was somehow connected with hanging and the gallows. The younger members of the party continued as undisturbed as ever in their business of sight-seeing. They walked rode, and drove to the pretty municipal well in its rock among the hills, to some St. Mary's Loch, with its silver stream where the images of Scott and Lloyd, and Wordsworth for the moment entered its phantoms, to the spot where Macbeth, Chieftain, and Annan were anathema in their origin to the weird sisters covered oaks of Lochwood, like trees of another world to the cold and green hollow known as the Devil's bedchamber for his kilt connel. And the scene of the most wildly tragic and deeply pathetic of Scotch ballads, which greatly took the young people's fancy.

On the little company's return from one of their excursions they were amazed to find the big body, big face, and sturdy mountaineer of King Lud in the man who was standing smoking and looking out for them at the inn door. He had done more than keep his word. He had spoken of seeing them again before he sailed, but that was comparatively a vague prospect, he had said nothing of returning so soon to make up their party and finish their excursion. He looked solemn in answer to the gay banter which Muriel Dugdale, after an instant of silent delight, was able to run up to him. “Were all your friends from home, Mr. Acton? Has your ship sailed without you? Did you think we should be robbed and murdered without the protection of your doughty arm in the old land of Border reivers? I could do better than that, if I tried—the duchess in Wonderland, I could make myself picturesquely charming, and come over the Scotch loon with my soft English tongue.”

Her whose nerves had been thoroughly shaken, was divided between two sources of apprehension. Had Ludovic Acton taken it into his head to read up information, and somehow discovered for himself the dangerous nature of their late entertainment, and had he come all the way from the Rectory, during the small amount of leave that was likely to remain to him, to put her on her guard, to volunteer his evidence, and to save everybody from sorrow and injury, or was his mother worse, and, if so, why had he quitted her?

The first time the old friends were alone for a few minutes, King Lud cleared up the mystery, his manner presenting a nice blending of sheepishness and burning anxiety. He had got his promotion, he was now a captain in her Majesty's navy, with his appointment to a ship a matter of days. But before these days were ended he must avail himself of his promotion ■ bring to a close the suspense which, he maintained, was worse than sharks, torpedoes, and submarines all taken together. (Of course he could not run away with Marianne Dugdale, though they were in Scotland. He was so bent on his narrative that he did not notice how Iris winced at the dry joke. Neither could the most sanguine man in his profession have hoped to marry her before sailing. But if Miss Dugdale, and her friends for her, would consent to have anything to say to him, would consent to an engagement, he did not think, unless she was less freshly simple and modest in her tastes, less nobly and gloriously unworldly, than he believed her to be, that the engagement need be very long. He could show flattering letters from some of the swells of the Admiralty and good natured commendations from his old commanders, which he had never so much as given to the family at home to read and exult over, because, naturally, his people would think a great deal too much of such trash, and he hated bounce and palaver. It would be the first time that he had counted on them as any good, if they would satisfy Marianne Dugdale and her friends that a fair, sturdy rise in his profession lay before him. He had not let the grass grow beneath his feet. Modest, retiring King Lud, under the influence of the great passion of his young manhood, had already rushed down to Devonshire, introduced himself to Mr. Dugdale, and interviewed him. The spark-and-spin captain had explained his not too elevated but hopeful position, and requested the father's permission to address his eldest daughter. The poor gentleman was neither propitious nor unpropitious. He was engrossed with his own affairs, to which the marriage of one of his daughters belonged certainly, but only in a subsidiary degree. Young Action might end by becoming a rear-admiral, when Marianne would have done very well for herself. Even if he stopped short with being a commodore he was not to be despised. Nay, a naval captain's pittance did not mean such starvation to a small family as a country gentleman's reduced rents, from an estate groaning under a burden of mortgages, threatened ruin to the head of the house with his helpless wife and daughters. The officer and his wife would begin housekeeping with only a couple of mouths to fill, while Mr. Dugdale had nearly half-a-dozen to satisfy.

On the other hand, what had the dowager Lady Fernor to say on the matter? By making a marriage displeasing ■ the late Lord Fernor's testatrix she might be lost—not only to Marianne, but ■ the whole family of Dugdale.

Mr. Dugdale had a natural affection for his daughter but he could not afford the sacrifice. In the end the eager suitor was referred to his father's prodigal parishioner.

The sentence filled King Lud with chagrin—well nigh hopelessness. "I know she has other views for her grand-daughter," he groaned in Iris's ear. "Do you think there ■ the slightest chance for me in applying to the old lady?"

Iris could not in sincerity say she had an exalted opinion of his chances in that quarter, but she managed to remark with some ambiguity she did not think Lady Fernor had any definite designs at present for the disposal of Marianne.

"There is Ishwut," alleged King Lud gloomily, "almost a member of the family. He has been its cavalier ever since Lady Fernor and Miss Dugdale came up to town."

It was clear that he had heard nothing of the sequel to the border pity in which he had taken part—not was he likely to hear, Iris was thankful to think, unless his relations to the family became very intimate.

"There would be disgusting advantages in that match," King Lud bemoaned himself.

"But Marianne is not mercenary," Iris reminded him.

"Of course not, her dear vagaries, her sweet waywardness and irresistible originality are all utterly destitute of mercenariness."

Iris laughed and nodded, it was comical to her to hear King Lud, who had been wont to take things easy, by his own confession violently in love.

"But Thwate himself is a good fellow, for all that has come and gone. I always liked him. If he made a great mistake, went wrong and smarted for it, ■ has come honourably through a lengthened probation since then. She is just the generous girl to long to make up to him for what he has suffered, ■ glossy in overlooking his small deficiencies and be willing to risk herself to keep him straight. No, said Ludovic Acton in dolefully magnanimous self-deprecation "I cannot pretend to Thwates' advantages in any respect. Why even in the matter of looks he has it all on his side. He is a comely, well drilled lout, while I am a whay-fried, moon-faced clumsy set-lubber."

Iris laughed till the tears came into her eyes she wanted so much ■ comfort and encourage him without breaking faith and without buoying him up with false hopes where Lady Fernor was concerned. I think I may say if grandmamma has not entirely given up contemplation, Whitechills as a possible establishment for Marianne she has not been looking at it in that light very lately.

"Oh thank you. Is your mind good now? I don't wonder that Marianne loves you and Ludovic is grateful to us if Iris had gone far to secure ■ him the passionately coveted boon. Only Marianne might spare a little common civility to a fellow who loves her."

A girl's little
W. (dashed) love it

"Have patience, Iris told him. "Do they know at the Rectory? What does Lucy think? What does the Rector say? Is the mother pleased?"

"Oh my people are as good as gold is usual. They say if my happiness is concerned that is everything. They are only longing to make her better acquainted. What a fool I am to speak of her as if she were certainly mine! I can depend upon them doing everything they can to befriended her when I am away."

"Happy man! at least you have acted on the most manly straightforward principles and whatever comes of ■ you will have the comfort of that reflection," said Iris warmly.

But the newly-made captain did not see what else he could have done. The result was more and more according ■ his heart than his or any one else would have dared to hope. Strange ■ say, Lady Fernor did not oppose the engagement, beyond saying that she thought it as foolish as such contracts usually were. But if the young man chose to enter into this one she would not interfere. She craved leave to inform Captain Acton, in case of awkward mistakes, that her grand-daughter Marianne Dugdale would have no more money from her than a couple of hundred pounds to buy her trousseau if she ever needed one, and perhaps another couple of hundreds to buy her mourning on the death of the speaker. She had never intended to give Marianne more, unless on a contingency of which there had ceased ■ be any possibility. She would write to Mr Dugdale to this effect.

The truth was that Lady Fernor did not believe in engagements, short or long and never had cured a straw for Marianne Dugdale except as a living toy to amuse the old lady, and an instrument of vengeance upon Mrs. Compton.

King Lud was free to address his mistress yet even the freedom might have had a disastrous issue but for recent events and the knowledge that the sutor would sail and very likely be in another hemisphere within the month. Marianne was taken unawares. She laughed and pouted and even cried a little as if she were a very ill-used little person then suddenly threw down her arms and surrendered at discretion, making no terms, beyond the sight of using King Lud, which the infatuated fellow was only too content to receive, to incant example, to let her do. Even this amount of power was in danger of being wrested from her every time his approaching departure clouded her mind and clouded over the whole universe to her.

It was something to see a good fellow and an innocent child so radiantly happy ■ those two though his happy leave was to subside their happiness long before the summer ended. Lady Fernor called the pair a couple of humbugs, but Iris caught herself and Sir William regarding the two with the mild patient benignity of true guardians and sponsors.

There was no evidence of resentment on Sir William's part on account of his family and fitfully foreshadowed office of "guide, philosopher, and friend" to Marianne Dugdale being taken from him. If a kind of wistful look came into his blue eyes at times it did not interfere with the perfect cordiality of his congratulations to King Lud and the young lady and she received such demonstrations better from him than from any one else Iris not excepted.

It seemed as if nothing were ■ be wanting to the happiness of the lovers. King Lud had been proudly and affectionately desirous that if it could be managed, Marianne should go on a visit ■ the Rectory before he got his sailing orders. Included in the desire was the natural longing ■ take leave of her in his father's house, and to consign her under the ordeal to the tender keeping of those who would ■ sharing her sorrow with her. Even this wish was granted. Lady Fernor became complacent to an almost alarming extent; Marianne might go since she had got her father's permission. The old lady even volunteered to render the project more feasible by sending Soames to chaperon the lovers, and bring back some articles of dress which Soames's mistress wished her maid to get from Lady Fermor's wardrobe at Lambford.

So this idyl disappeared from the contemplation of the edified spectators at Mostat, and anything more they were to learn of it, in the meantime, must be from letters—Marianne's hurried but highly appreciative announcement of her safe arrival and good reception, Lucy Acton's kind if more composed and modified reports. Yes, Marianne was a dear girl, and it was delightful to see King Lud so exultant, who could resist it? Marianne was original and a little wilful. She had found a broken mouse trap which had exercised his spirit a good deal. She had sent the children to fetch all the mouse traps in the house to be inspected by her, and had set about mending them on the spot, so that Gerald was her chum from that moment. Marianne had got round the Rector by looking out his sermons for him, and practising the hymns he liked best in order to help the choir in church. She had won all the hearts of the children—of the boys especially—at the school feast. As for the curate she rivaled her, Lucy, an immense amount of trouble, for Marianne could twist them round her finger, and did so without once provoking King Lud to jealousy. Yes, they all liked dear Ludovic's future wife very much, and Lucy was convinced that though there might be a little hitch here and there—as there was there not in human relations?—till the family circle into which the stranger had entered, instead of being divided into hostile factions with the members set against each other by her means, would continue as united and attached as ever.

It was plain the Actons were behaving well, as might have been expected from them. They were making the best of their son and brother's engagement to Marianne Dugdale, and so taking the wisest course to preserve his and their dignity and happiness.

CHAPTER VII.—LATE SEWING.

DURING as nearly as possible contemporaneously with the departure of Ludovic Acton and his promised wife under the staid wing of Soames, there began for his one of the strangest experiences of her tied life. She was alone with Lady Fermor and Sir William Thwaite. Lady Fermor continued in the blindest mood. Whether she were seeking to atone for her late outrage, or whether she were "fey," according to the old Norse superstition, and her last days had come, there could be no question of her indulgence to her grand-daughter and her kindness to Sir William, even when they crossed her will and thwarted her plans.

But along with the old lady's bluff good-humour there commenced to peep out an inference drawn by Lady Fermor which was almost intangible in its expression at first. Yet it was a subtle, entangling, bewildering implication, leading to a spirit of perturbation and confusion on the part of those who could not deny what was not charged against them. They feared so much as to admit the hint, lest the faintest whisper of its existence should lend tangibility to the light material and afford a basis for a whole towering edifice of doubt and suspicion.

She treated the two young people as if they were a couple of children, or the nearest relations. She would have sent them out, in the intervals of Sir William's sport, on the longest tete-a-tete rambles and riding excursions without so much as a groom to bear them company. When, because of the unaccustomed nature of the liberty extended to them, they were instinctively shy of it and of each other, she chided them gaily for not availing themselves of their privileges, as if they abstained from them entirely on her account.

"You two"—she had got to coupling them together continually—"are a great deal too considerate. It ain't in me to be a kill joy, but you make me ashamed, though I must confess that it is a failing I am not given to indulging in. Why should you not have your good time as well as others? Don't let me interfere with you."

Lady Fermor had naturally her special seat in her own window of the drawing-room, and she took to barricading herself in it with screens, cushions, foot stools, and little tables for her various refreshments—biscuits, fruit, wine, tea, as her habits and the hour required. She had always been sufficient for herself, but she appeared to be becoming impatient even of the company of a young man of her own choosing, and to be contracting a passion for solitude.

"You can keep your own window. You must have a great deal to talk about—young couples always have. Old people have done with everything save thinking, and that, too, goes, I suppose, so that there is only sensation left, poor creatures that we are! But say your say while you have it to do, and want to be out with it, never mind me, I shan't hear a syllable at this distance.'

While the party had been travelling Lady Fernor had resigned the herd of the tribe to one of her grand daughters, but she had left the foot vacant. Now she elected that Sir William should play the host opposite Iris as the hostess. And Lady Fernor told them their facts, in the most innocent manner possible, so that they felt themselves behaving foolishly to blush that they became then relative positions and discharged their respective duties admirably.

Iris did her best to supply Scornes's place in the maid's temporary absence, and was often alone with her grandmother in her bed room. On these occasions Lady Fernor was even ostentatious in professing her entire satisfaction with Iris's efforts to save her which grew bungling, from sheer astonishment and trepidation at the gorgeous forbearance with which the girl's worst blunders were borne, and the praise indiscriminately awarded to the whole performance.

"I am very much obliged to you, child, you are too attentive, but I ought not to keep you from other duties."

"Grandmother, you are laughing at me, cried Iris in desperation. "What duties have I in comparison with the obligation to wait upon you if you will let me? I know I do it very badly, but I hope to improve and become a proficient before long by the time Scornes comes back."

"You undervalue yourself far too much. There are plenty of formal, caressing persons to be met with everywhere, much more than that excessive humility, which is often affectation, does not suit your station in life. There now, said Lady Fernor, after Iris had enveloped her grandmother in her dressing gown and removed her wig, rephrasing it by one of the exploded night caps, which are only in vogue to shelter the bald patches of octogenarians, "go down and entertain William."

Lately Lady Fernor had taken to dropping the "Ihwaite" in the "Sir" before the Christian name, in speaking of it with Iris of the Square of Whitecholls. The new habit smote upon Iris's ears with a peculiarly familiar home-like effect, when the name was coupled with a domestic recommendation to "entertain its bearer. Iris's breath was taken away. She was not even fit to meet the cool command with the calm assurance that Sir William could entertain himself. She did not say it, but she retired to her own room, and put her hands before her face.

At the same time neither Iris nor Sir William could invent more insinuations, which after all might owe the most of their significance to what might have become their morbid self-consciousness and troubled fancies. She knew as well as she had heard it what would have been her grandmother's answer if she, Iris, had protested against the inference cunningly drawn. Lady Fernor would have cried in the height of incredulous astonishment "Child, what did I say? What could you think was my meaning?" and an explanation of what Iris might have thought, as it appeared unjustifiably even in all the horrible mischief that had been set on foot, was too difficult for a delicate-minded girl to face without the utmost necessity for the encounter.

Iris seriously revolved the dilemma, doubt if her grandmother's mind were giving way at last, when one day, on two occasions, both when the ladies were sitting by themselves and when Sir William was with them, Lady Fernor did what she had once done before on paper addressed to Iris as "Lady Ihwaite."

What is your opinion of the weather, Lady Ihwaite? "I Lady Ihwaite, have you seen the lady in Sir William's house?"

Iris did not answer. She only looked down with startled dismay in confusion, colour. She could not have raised her eyes to meet Sir William's for the world.

The incorrectly applied title might have proceeded from a lapse of memory in an old woman, though Lady Fernor hitherto had not been liable to such lapses. Anyhow she did not sit on that she had observed her mistake by calling herself back or apologising, for it. Her next comment on Iris's dead silence on both occasions was by repeating, her inquiries with a little more distance, without any naming, the person spoken to. "Did you hear me? What is your opinion of the weather?" "If you have seen Sir William's house?"

If the misapplications of the name were not a slip of the tongue, if they formed an index that Lady Fernor's once acute and powerful, though neither fine nor cultivated intellect, and clear steady brains, were, as she had predicted, losing their edge, even reeling on their throne, the shape which the disorder of her faculties had taken would not be at all wonderful. It would be almost natural that the first of a throng of coming delusions should point to her conviction of the accomplishment of a scheme on which she had so set her imperious will that one of her last acts had been to seek to establish an unpardonable fraud by coercing the victims to submit to it, and ratify it, out of shame and terror for a woman's good name.

It was a new social danger to be dreaded, along with the constant material embarrassment to be endured.

Iris could hardly say how much Sir William Thwaite was struck or what he felt. It was impossible to consult him on the point. Once he had betrayed every emotion of his soul in his face as in a mirror. Further experience of life had taught him to wear a mask to some extent, but in the course of the last few days the mask had fallen occasionally, though only with the effect of electrifying and baffling the beholder more completely. For the shifting expression was, after all, more perplexing than any steadiness of impenetrability.

The very material world around Iris, the old fashioned inn to which Thomas Cochrane and his young wife had come after their runaway marriage, the brasses over which the old moon-troopers had sped in many a moonlight foray, which had sometimes included a disconsolate bride snatched along with her living dowry of lowing kine and bleating sheep from the English side of the Border, the holiday watering-place among the hills, with the holiday company in which were various specimens of lovers, and no lack of newly wedded pairs come to spend their simple honeymoons—all began to assume an unreal sympathetic, or mocking aspect to Iris. The strain was becoming too hard for her. She said to herself with despairing deliberation she could not bear it much longer. Her grandmother if she had been in her right mind had been very wicked to bring such trouble upon two people who had never wronged her, one of whom was her own flesh and blood. So soon as Soames returned, the girl would go away as she had gone before, to return no more. Lady Fernor or to Lambford. King Lud would be gone, and Murielne Dugdale ought to come back.

She would tell no one of her departure this time. She was to be a runaway twice over, but never a runaway bride. She felt she would rather die than tempt Sir William Thwaite to believe she had been willing to appropriate her share of the role which had been imposed upon them both. She would see Miss Haigh, and if she could not receive her, she might find a place for Iris, wife however humble. She would work her fingers to the bone and her eyes till they were blind in their sockets, to maintain her self in honest, honourable independence, beyond that nothing signified.

Iris's purpose was deferred by Soames's protracted absence. Lady Fernor did not grudge it, in fact she was at the bottom of the delay. She had caused a journey which might have been accomplished in less than twenty-four hours, to be broken by a halt of half as many days. She was lengthening the halt by keeping Soames at Lambford executing commission after commission for her mistress at Knotley, Birkett and Cavesham, commissions sent to Soames at the rate of half a dozen fresh orders every morning. Iris gave the woman credit for fretting over the length of her holiday. But Iris could wait—all the more easily in the end, that Sir William had gone away on an unexplained errand which was his last day, but detained him for a couple of days. Lady Fernor extended her afternoon drive on both days so that she might finish by taking the station on her way home and there await her friend's return. Iris told herself that she wished he might not return at all during her stay at Modfat, and she thought the wish must have looked out at him from her eyes when he did appear and Lady Fernor was calling to him—careless who might hear her, that he was a naughty man to put her to the trouble of bringing Iris twice to the station to fetch him back to the inn, for after he had driven home with them, assisted Lady Fernor to alight, and handed her over to the landlady and her subordinates, he detained Iris for a moment behind her grandmother, to say, with an undercurrent of vexation and reproach in his voice, "I will go abroad and stay there, Miss Compton, if you wish it—you need fear no annoyance from me, you have but to say the word, I should be gone already, were it not that you are alone with Lady Fernor."

That was her own motive for delay, she reflected with an undefined, unreasonable sense of bitterness. Well, perhaps it was better they should understand each other thoroughly. But she only said, "Don't let any consideration with regard to grandmamma or me interfere with your arrangements, Sir William, we shall do very well. You can see we have managed perfectly for ourselves during these two days, besides, Soames will turn up presently."

CHAPTER XLII—THE WRONG ROOM.

THE mail from the south had come in and Iris had left Sir William reading the news papers to her grandmother and gone out for a solitary walk. She wanted to walk far and fast till she was wholesomely tired from bodily fatigue, to be braced by the strong north-country air, and ■ have the moorland wind blow away the cobwebs which had lodged in her brain, stifling her common-sense and torturing her nerves. She had climbed the hill Marianne had spoken of—one of those hills which are appendages to various towns in Scotland, being memorials of the last gruesome scene which followed the exercise of the jurisdiction of a baron's court.

Iris did not anticipate much seclusion in her walk, for the hill was not only frequented by visitors in the season, it was haunted from late spring ■ late autumn, as she could guess, by children seeking in succession bark nests, blaeberries, and blackberries, still she could find a quiet spot where she might sit down and rest and look at the wide, free view of hill and hollow and river, just broken here and there by patches ■ yellow corn-land, stretches of green pasture grass, bits of wood. She could realise that she was in a pastoral country where, whatever human discord broke the stillness, there was always a harmonious undertone made up of the bleating of sheep and the humming of bees among the heather, the occasional bark of a shepherd's dog, the constant trickle fit and near of innumerable threads of water which rose and were fed among the hills, to feed in turn the bigger burns and the rivers rushing on to the sea. Overhead was the solemn grey sky of the north country, in which, though there was no sign of rain, the blue was not left long, uninvaded, and the white of the fleecy clouds was brushed with a silvery grey, passing here and there to deeper, darker, though still clear tints of slate colour.

Iris would fain have let the simplicity and peace of the landscape sink into her harassed mind, from which a fantasmic nightmare could not be driven out. But she was not left alone ■ reason with herself, re-assure and calm herself by recovering mental balance and spiritual faith, for almost the first thing she saw was Sir William's glengarry rising above the bracken as he pushed his way, regardless of the obstacles on a wrong track, to reach her. She was not safe even on the hill of ancient hangings. In despair, she sat quite still and let him come up and speak to her.

"I beg your pardon for intruding upon you, Miss Compton," he said humbly enough, panting a little from his reckless exertions to gain her side. "But I have something to say which I am taking the first opportunity to tell you by yourself. It is what you ought to know at once, I have no doubt you will be glad to hear it."

XXV—59

Iris turned upon him a questioning, apprehensive, half-indignant glance. Then she bethought herself that he was not knowingly to blame for all the misery he had caused, that he was himself involved in the last misfortune. A rush of remorse amounting to tender friendliness came over her for the manner in which she was beginning ■ treat him, so that she spoke to him quite kindly.

"In place of requiring you to apologise for interrupting my important meditations," she said, with rather a forlorn attempt ■ gaiety, "I ought to thank you heartily, Sir William, for taking so much trouble about something in which you think I have an interest," and she made room for him to sit down by her.

He threw himself down where she indicated and was silent for a moment, plucking the heather and looking, not at her, but straight before him with a far-away expression in his eyes. Perhaps he felt what he had already experienced more than once during this year, he was realising the literal circumstances of a bygone dream, in which, however, all the premises had undergone a variation. Not least of all, though that was not in his count, his personal appearance and general air were changed since Iris had first known him. His manliness was more matured, much that had sat constrainedly and uneasily on him he now carried lightly and unthinkingly. He had the look of a plain, brusque, but not undignified country gentleman of the class into which his first sanguine backers had argued he would merge. The chestnut beard covered the somewhat dogged squareness of the jaw and the weakness of the chin, while the lines from the nose to the corners of the mouth were so defined as to give the lionine cast to the face. The fulness of forehead beneath the waves of hair had already a furrow or two, and the slight contraction of the brow seemed to set the blue eyes more deeply, and to cast a shadow over them. The face was still massive, tending to ruggedness as it grew older, with more ■ thoughtfulness and of calm repression and patient pain at the present moment than of its old stern tension or passionate impulse.

To Iris's surprise Sir William drew out his pocket book and unfolded ■ written paper.

"I must first tell you where I have been, Miss Compton," he said, and his colour deepened like a girl's while he spoke. "I've been back to —," and he mentioned the inn at which the party had made their last momentous halt.

She would have said, "What took there?" but her lips would not utter the words.

He went on hurriedly, "I wished to see the landlord who, so far from seeming a regular blackguard, appeared a respectable enough man. My object was to seek an explanation from him—if an explanation were needed—to ascertain what he had to say of the farce which Lady Fernor wishes on keeping up."

"I dare say you were right. His forced herself to say, half inaudibly with her eyes turned away and flashing by chance on the little bare hind, without the bridegroom's gift of a ring lying ■ gaily on her gown."

"I did not see him at first. By a curious coincidence Lady Fernor had written to him ■ come here. But he had ■ attend some sale. I waited for his return and had a conversation with him. He told me the whole truth and I made him write it down and have it witnessed. I took a copy for Lady Fernor and gave it to her within the last half hour. This is for you. All you have to do is to keep it, and ■ will save you from further anxiety and vexation."

Iris took the sheet of ruled blue paper in bewilderment. The writing was the round clerical hand of the best old Scotch parish school. The diction was not so unexceptionable, but there is the intelligence it conveyed threw a new light on everything the style ought not to have been incommensurable, if it had not been that the letter and the sense of the words dimmed before Iris's eyes and understanding. She could not take them in for some moments. ■ was only by a supreme effort at self-control that she at last mastered the contents of the paper.

"This is ■ certify that my house of entertainment — I mean, built on the very boundary line between the two countries — is there are plenty of records to prove what the 'Marches' are — some of its rooms are in England and some in Scotland. The sitting-rooms which were lately occupied by Lady Fernor and party are both in England. No marriage ceremony performed according to Scotch law within the bounds of either of them would be legal, or could stand. This would be the case even though the contract had been entered into in good faith, with the full knowledge and concurrence of all concerned — where as I am assured by Sir William Ighave, who acted as the bridegroom ■ performance of which I got a glimpse that the whole thing was a mere play or frolic, never intended by the principal persons engaged in it to go any further."

"I wish to say for myself that I believe the fact of part of the house being in England and part in Scotland did not exist without abuse lang syne. Sometimes, to extort rewards and bribes, the couples who had whistles betrayed others were themselves betrayed and were handed over unawed when they had thought otherwise, to the friends at their heels. Or, what was baser still, bride and bridegroom had to cower their whole life lang before the auld innkeepers and the mock minister, and pay sweetly for their silence on what, in point of law, was no better than a mock marriage. Or if the bridegroom were a villain he could cast off his bride through the villainy of his helpers."

"I had no suspicion of what was going on the other night till I was warned by one of the servant lasses who mistook jest for earnest. I came up, as fast as my feet would carry me, to shut the party into the opposite room which had first to be cleared of its company. By the time that had been done the business was all but finished, while it looked to me more like a foolish joke than a serious wedding. In that case, with no harm intended or done, I appeal to any innkeeper in his senses if it was for me to come for what and affront and displeasure titled customers. If I had got any proof that the marriage was really meant for a wedding which was to be carried out I hardly solemnly declare that I would have come forward and talked the truth at any cost."

I admit when the old lady sat at the head of the table, leaving the couple behind, I mistook the joke and tried to get speech of her but she would not hear me. Maybe she has minded that though and so has sent for me to go all the way to Moffat ■ speak with her. And when the gentleman that stood for the bride-room who has now come back to clear up the story, left next that same morning, I thought like the lave that he would be back again in no time, and that ■ would be soon enough then to warn him. It was rather a foolish thing if so be he thought he was wad to tell him he was mistaken and bear the wyle of the English rooms which belonged to the building of the house on the very border a good while years before I was born."

I meant also to speak to the young lady, though she had sustained no wrong that I know of but before I had word of her intended departure she too had gone off with a friend that was sent back for her just at the moment when I was engaged with some press ing customers, and I could not think she would suffer harm in her friend's hands. However, the affair has been on my mind, and I have not been without fear that, just or earnest, me, and more than me, might get into trouble about it yet. And I was on the eve of travelling as far as Moffat at my own all convenience to obey the said lady's orders and make a clean breast of it to her, when the gentleman calling himself Sir William Thwaite, who is, according to his own account, hiding at the same inn in Moffat, came express to me, and saved me the journey. He has caused me to write this paper, which he is to show to the ladies. He'll certify that I have been ready to answer all his questions and to communicate to him the local disqualification, which attests beyond dispute that no legal marriage was, or could have been, celebrated in the front or in the back parlour on the second floor of my house of — on the evening of the 7th of August, 187—.

IRIS was free, no further glamour could be thrown over an ill incident, and the finger of scandal would never point to her, even in her grave. But the result was something altogether different from what she had been brought to dread, and the man who had freed her, who thus voluntarily renounced the far-fetched ghost of a claim to her, was the same who in the hay field at Whitehills had persisted against every remonstrance in declaring his desperate love for her, and maintained it was no light fancy, but a lifelong passion and sorrow. This was the man who dissolved the masquerade that yet seemed to bind them strangely together. But while it somehow smote her to the heart that he could do it, she cried out against herself for her disloyalty to herself and him, and told herself the truth, that if he had acted otherwise he must have degraded himself in her eyes, and she would have had the double anguish of learning to despise him at this date. She must not let him see what she thought, she must give him his due. She turned to him with her hands clasped tightly, and brilliant roses in the cheeks that were growing thin. "How shall I ever thank you, Sir William? You had failed me and made me suffer for a piece of folly, what would have become of me, and of you also? But you have behaved like the perfect gentleman and true friend that I have long known you to be."

"Come," he said, catching his breath and speaking with something of the old roughness, "don't make it too hard for a fellow. But I must speak out just this once, since we shall never allude to the subject again."

"You might have paid me back for what must have struck you as a girl's intolerable arrogance," she said, half under her breath.

"No, no," he corrected her quickly, "you are talking nonsense now. You could never be arrogant. It was I who was a presumptuous, deluded idiot."

"You have shielded and delivered me," she said still, "while I—I believe I have done nothing, save injure you since the first time we met."

"How can you say so?" he cried impatiently—almost indignantly. "You made a man of me—by causing me to look up to what was far above my reach certainly—but when I fell back into the beast again have you forgotten how you came and saved both me and poor Honor?"

"Poor Honor!" echoed Iris, and the tears began to trickle down her cheeks in spite of herself, for she had been much tried lately, and the strain on her was becoming more than she could bear.

"Don't cry, Miss Compton, for mercy's sake," he implored. "I could not stand it, I could not answer for myself, though at my worst I would not have taken advantage of you in the way you seem to think I might have done. To make out, after one mad moment, that you had married me truly according to the Scotch law, or any law, and to call Lady Fermor to bear me out in the assertion, would have been to act like a rascal as well as a brute, to have lost your friendship, and I have been proud to possess that at least."

"And now we shall be friends always," she said wistfully.

"I don't know," he answered restlessly. "Yes, friends in heart I hope, if you will do me the honour. But it isn't as if I were another woman or a better man. I think I shall go abroad as I proposed."

"All the same, you will come back. Whitehills one day," she ventured with a faint smile.

"What, to find you——" he began vehemently, then stopped for an instant, and went on more quietly. "If I cared for you as you deserve to be cared for, I should not regret finding you in a happier and safer home than where I first saw you, and shall always remember you, Mr. Lambford. But I am a selfish dog."

She was silent now, breathing with soft quickness.

"I need not say Lady Fermor, though she has tried to be my friend," he remarked with rather a grim smile, "is no protector for you, any more than she was for your cousin, Miss Dugdale. But you are another sort of girl—so much wiser and stronger in your gentleness. It is exactly as I said the other night at the station, forgive me for the liberty, but I cannot, as I am a man, endure to leave you with her."

She continued dumb. She did not say, as she had implied before, that whatever risk she ran it could be nothing, to him, she did not upbraid him with hurting her by reminding her of her friendlessness, she did not bid him again.

He looked at her with the keenest, most earnest scrutiny, flushing high while he looked. "I am sure you would not trifle with me, Miss Compton. You did not do it before, when I was a foolhardy ass. Perhaps you think it is impossible one man can twice err in the same indefensible way. You know I was such a blockhead as not to see through your cousin's merry fencing, and guess on which side her deliverance lay. I was tempted to feel that, if she would let me, I ought to come to the rescue, and not see her sacrificed as I had seen another bright, kind woman perish. It seemed all that was left for me to do. It was not giving up much, for I had not a grain of hope besides. But I could not venture to approach you, and propose to be your protector, not even after what has come and gone—you are too far above me."

She made a hasty deprecating movement to interrupt him, but he did not heed it.

"And it would be too great a mockery, I may as well say it, since I am in for it, though I may affront you again. You have said enough to show you will not mistake me—I love you as I love my life. I have done so from the first moment I saw you, I shall do it to my last gasp though you mayn't like it. I can't help it any more than you can. And I might have been content with your tolerance—like a scrap thrown to a dog—in the past, but though I've been down in the depths since then, things are different. Some how with me, I could not be satisfied to-day with what I should perhaps have caught at years ago. I am wiser, or I am prouder, though I have little enough to be proud of. I should not ask much, but I must have a grain—a living seed fit to sprout and grow. I know only too well what I have been, and how unworthy I am still, but if you could ever look over it, like the generous, gentle soul you are and were to poor Honor, why then I should be the proudest, gladdest fellow on earth. I would keep you as far as my life could save you, from care and sorrow. I would serve you with my best, and ask only a crumb of kindness, and that you yourself should be happy."

She spoke at last, "Not for Honor's sake," she faltered, "though I did care for her, but for your own—not a crumb, but all. Has it not been well won?" She laid her hand in his as she spoke, and her pure lips were there for his reverent awed lips to press, her sweet eyes to return shyly his blissful glances.

After the two had talked long together, Sir William suddenly announced, with a laugh which spoke volumes for the terms to which they had attained, "I have forgotten to tell you that Lady Fermor was so put out by the paper I brought her, she said she would set off for Lumbord to-morrow, she would not wait for Sunday."

"Well, it won't matter—will it? She did not forbid you to accompany her, I hope. I shall be very glad to see home again, to see them all at the Rectory, and hear what they will say. Perhaps we may be in time to catch up King Lud, before he runs. Poor, dear Marianne, I am sorry for her now."

"Why in the world should you be sorry?"

"Because you are not going to sail, Sir William—ought I to tell you that?"

"If it does not hurt you to say it, it is very agreeable for me to hear it."

"But it will spoil you, and is it was only the other day that I refused to entertain you, I think you may have some notion how far I was from contemplating spoiling you then. We must not get on quite so fast. But I will say this, that I doubt if King Lud and Marianne are quite so happy as we are."

"I doubt it too, though I have only one reason to give for the doubt."

"I don't wish to hear that reason again to-day, I think I have heard it already. I mean because they have not been tried."

"Perhaps he would not agree with you, poor chap."

"Oh! but that was all a man's stupidity not to see through her flattering opposition. They have come together without one real tribulation to test them. They strike me at this moment as two quite inexperienced, light-hearted young persons, so that one fears—though one hopes not—that the cares and trials may all be before them. Now we, though doubtless we have troubles by the score as store for us, have passed through fire and water we know and can trust ourselves and each other."

"There was trouble in his eyes at that very minute. "Trusted and tried, and never found wanting, I can say that of you, my sweetheart, but can you ever trust me?"

"Yes, William," she said with simple sincerity, and so earnestly that there was a little solemnity in her tones, "with all my heart. You have fought a good fight, and He who strengthened you for the battle will never suffer you to be vanquished. I shall be glad to be home again," she added more lightly, "I have been very unhappy there sometimes, but I feel as if that were all to be forgotten now, and only the peaceful, happy days to be remembered. I was never so long away from home before. Now that I have time to think of it, I want very much to see what changes have taken place in my corner of Eastwich during my absence."

"And you want to see Whitehills again, for Lambford cannot long be your home, you will begin to look on Whitehills very differently. We may go abroad and see the world, but we must settle at Whitehills, that will always be the most important place to us."

"You cannot tell how long ago I was told to give my most serious consideration to Whitehills. Your cousin, Lady Thwaite, will think I have taken her advice."

"Never mind what she thinks. I suppose she will be pleased, and she will forgive me. Well, she has forgiven me long ago. But I shall take to her now, for I cannot forget that it was by her means I saw my lady first."

"It was after that meeting I called you 'a good sort of young man' to grand-mamma."

"I am afraid I did not deserve the character. But, Iris, Lady Thwaite is the only pretence to a friend I can give you."

"And how many can I give you?" she said with an answering sigh.

"I think if you had known my sister Jen, you would have loved her, though she had to work to earn bread for her and me, and was a washerwoman the last day that I left her in peace."

"I am sure I should," said Iris with conviction. "Nobody, not you yourself could have been so much obliged to her, and we should have had one chief source of interest in common."

"There is a good fellow who has been, next to you, since I lost Jen, the best friend I had in the world, though he would never call himself anything save my servant. He will be as proud as a peacock, as pleased as a pike-staff to hear the great news."

"I know," said Iris, with a bright smile, "Bill Rogers. Tell him from me to wish us both joy. His sister has sometimes said that if I ever had a house of my own she would like to go with me. She may if grand-mamma consents, mayn't she? Why we have loads of faithful friends, William."

When the couple returned to the inn, they had tarried so long that Lady Lennor, in great dudgeon from another cause, had eaten her luncheon without them, and set out on her afternoon drive alone.

Sir William and Iris strolled into the inn-garden. She found an old-fashioned rose-bush still covered with roses, the same as some she had seen at the last halting-place. A few hours ago she would have tried not to see those roses, she would not have spoken of them—least of all to Sir William Thwaite, she would have wished to forget that they were there. But a single morning had brought such a change to the depressing, distracting conditions of his life, that she hailed the flowers. She caused him to gather clusters of them, shared them with him, put some of them as before in her jacket. "Do you remember ever seeing such roses?" she asked him mischievously.

"You are out if you expect to find my memory in fault here," he told her. "It isn't the best of memories, but there are some things I don't forget. I could show you the marrow of them in my pocket-book."

"Then keep them carefully, for they were my single ornament at the rehearsal of the greatest event in our lives."

The girl was laughing and jesting already, girl-like, at the nightmare of the last two or three weeks. And he was a proud and happy man to note the change in her—proud and happy to have her squaking him in this fashion.

The whole party dined that day for the first time, by Lady Lennor's choice, at the table d'hôte of the inn. There were some inquisitive people present who had seen the titles of two of the party in the visitors' book, and were attracted by the aristocratic old nun who asserted her importance, and the handsome young couple under her charge. The girl had a head like a cherub, and her companion looked a comely young fellow in the heyday of his life. Clusters of the same rose were in her hair and in his button-hole, and the eyes of the wearers had a trick of straying to each other, even in an august presence. It was remarked if my Lady Fernor did not approve of that match, she had brought the pair into a dangerous neighbourhood.

The truth was that at the close of Iris's grandmother's afternoon nap, she had heard of the accomplishment of the marriage, for which she had so long planned, schemed, and striven by fair means and foul, of which that very morning she had received cause to despair. She had got her will, but the question was how far it had lost its charm and become embittered to her by the circumstance that her instrumentality had little or nothing to do with the attainment of her end. She had even been foiled in her last daring, heartless, shameless move, and it was only by their own choice, which they might have exerted any day, that Sir William and Iris were about to marry. Lady Fernor had heard Sir William with little snorts and something not far from a scowl. She had said, "You have plenty of chuck, Thwaite, to come me with such a proposal after the paper you showed me this morning. You two have taken your own time and mode to make up your minds, and have been rather long about it. What if I decide to have my objections now, to say I un-such—which is a fact—of the tiresome titan, and to forbid the alliance to go any farther?"

But though Lady Fernor had been as soundingly ungrievous and unreasonable in eyes which might have read her better by this time, she was a woman of the world. She did not dismiss Sir William, she accepted, however grumblingly, his escort back to England, and she proceeded to announce the marriage, as if it had been from beginning to end of her making.

Before Iris was in across the Border she sent back a letter to Jeanne, the maid at the inn. "I have taken your advice, Jeanne—not because a happy accident has enabled your master, with James Murgrove and Catherine Preston, whoever they may be, to testify my deliverance from an unknown danger, not because I think any scandal in the future, but because I now know certainly what I just guessed before, that Sir William Thwaite is one of the best of men, and that I shall be one of the happiest of women if I marry him in such earnest. I owe it to your kindness to let you know the happy end of the story, and remember, Jeanne, I can ever serve you in return count upon me. I enclose Sir William's address for this purpose."

Lady Thwaite was profuse and tolerably sincere in her congratulations. "I am glad you have thought better of it, my love. You are a lucky girl, not everybody gets the opportunity of changing her mind. Some purpose I shall be charmed to have you reigning in my place in dear old Whitehills. We will shut our eyes and forget that there was an infatuated, miserable interregnum, with another dreadful Lady Thwaite, between. He will only think the more of you, if he should ever look back and contrast the two. I speak as a relation of the family, my dear Iris."

"But you are mistaken, Lady Thwaite," said Iris, with the old involuntary drawing up of her figure and rearing of her little head, "neither Sir William nor I will ever forget poor Honor. There can be no invidious comparison or contrast between us two. We were brought up very differently, yet we were friends, in spite of every obstacle, when we were children and girls. Do you know the first thing she did before she left Whitehills was to come across to Lambford to bid me farewell? I am glad to think of it."

"Oh! Well, just as you like, my dear. You and Sir William are two very remarkable people—about the most remarkable in my circle, and if it please you to recollect what most persons would prefer to forget, it is only a matter of taste, it does not necessarily signify."

Marianne Dugdale first stared, then said, a little drily, "I was led to suppose the penchant was all on one side, that is, after I had got the faintest hint of a penchant. In short, there have been so many different accounts that upon my word, one is puzzled which to believe." Then she added, while she struggled between a frown and a smile, "So you two will be married long before we shall." But presently the smile gained the supremacy and grew wondrous sweet, and Marianne cried, "All right!" and kissed Iris with effusion, before the whole company, looking as much affronted the next moment as if King Lud had been the object of the caress. His congratulations were frank and hearty, the Rector and his wife and all the others were complaisant, but Lucy held back a little.

Lucy had been much exercised lately on the subject of her brother's engagement. She had been affectionately impressed by the prize Marianne Dugdale had won King Lud's virtue from childhood, his unblemished character in every respect, had been the frequent theme of Lucy's laudations. She had dwelt with justice on these lustrous jewels in King Lud's crown, until she felt truly, that for any man to be without them or ■ have tarnished their lustre was ■ flaw indeed. Thus the very girl who had given ■ her early adherence to Iris's accepting the fate assigned to her, and complying with her grandmother's wishes, now sought anxiously to hold the willing bride back, and to remonstrate with her on concluding the contract.

"Yes, darling," said Lucy, hesitating a good deal, "it ■ delightful to have you settled so near us after all. It is very pleasant to think that you can bring yourself to do what Lady Fermor has so long wished. But oh Iris, so many things have happened since we talked of this before. You will not be angry with me for alluding to Sir William's origin, which is the same as it ever was, of course, but then we had not the enlightenment of his low marriage and of his terrible unsteadiness for a time. I would not vex you for the world, Iris, but we are such old friends! Is it not too great a task? Are you not frightened?"

"No," said Iris, without anger, though with a heightened colour, "and I am glad that you have spoken out this once to me, Lucy, for I know you mean it kindly, and I can tell you everything. Love casts out fear, and I love him! I have long loved him. Would you turn from the creature you loved, because he had been subject to some deadly disease, which, in spite of all his brave desperate struggles to throw it off and regain perfect health, it was just possible might return and prostrate him again? Would you not rather cling to him and help him to meet the enemy? You know there can be no defeat in the end, because the very soul of evil was vanquished long centuries ago, and I have no thought that there will be a partial defeat. Oh, Lucy, think what his trials and disadvantages have been and how he has risen above them, and then measure him, if you dare, with those who were never really called upon ■ bear the burden and heat of the day, never thrown and trampled in the mire—down in the place of dragons—or faint with the deadly weakness of ignorance, evil habits, and undisciplined passions."

And ■ was made a conqueror. Is it so strange a thing to believe that a man who has been once caught in the toils, may yet again go free, with God's own heaven above him, a loving, faithful woman by his side, and little children clasping his knees?

Iris's screen with the working out of the great artist's idea of the contest between Atachne and Minerva, found a place in the Whitehills drawing-room among some relics of poor Honor'sinery, tenderly dealt with for her sake. Sir William had an immense admiration for his wife's screen, which the embroideress tried ■ vain to lower to a reasonable moderation. Rumour darkly whispered that the master of Whitehills preferred that comparatively stilted piece of embroidery—begging the great artist's pardon—not only to all the old tapestry, but to one of the glories of the house, the semblance of his ancestors with the toy rake, designed and executed by the king of English portrait-painters.

Mrs Haigh and Ju ju came and saw the screen in its place of honour, and the former on her return to her boarders evallied Lady Fhwite still more than she had evallied "the honourable Mrs Compton."

Marianne Dugdale was a great deal with her cousins, even after she had changed her name, before she had a settled home with its nursery, when the least gust of wind at night among the old trees in the park sent her down to breakfast next morning with her temper in a particularly rapping condition. Then she would rail ■ the Admiralty for parting husbands and wives, and not letting her sul with King Lud, when she would have lent efficient aid in setting every bolt and spar of her Majesty's ship to rights.

Whitehills was a great rendezvous of the Actions, from the Rector with his flowery but honest compliments to the youngest of his offspring. Indeed, the place became established in the records of the neighbourhood as a most pleasant and hospitable country house, in which the dowager Lady Fhwite was fain to claim a vested interest.

Lady Lennox having established her granddaughter very creditably, behaved as if she had done enough, and concerned herself very little with young Fwly Fhwite and her doings. The old woman did not grow fonder of the young one, even after Lady Fermor's infirmities increased until she was forced to admit some of Iris's gentle good offices. But to the last Lady Fermor much preferred the attentions of Sir William, to whom she had long ago been utterly reconciled, and any softening of her stout-hearted looks and cynical words was always for him.

So completely were Iris's bugbears dispersed by the genial influence of a good husband and a happy home, that in walking down the main street of Knotley one day, and meeting the wreck of a broken-down old man dragging himself along by the help of a servant's arm and a stick, she crossed over, stopped and inquired kindly for him, listening with commiserating interest ■ his mumbled complaints. Her first words when she next saw her husband were, "I met poor grandmamma's friend, whom she used to call 'old Pollock,' in Knolly to-day, the first time for many months. I don't think he was ever very likeable, but how silly I must have been to feel such a horror of him! and now he looks so wretched, feeble, and friendless, poor man! William, ■ there nothing we can do for him?"

A GOSSIP ABOUT LONDON.

THE attractions of London are inexhaustible. Not only ■ it the largest city in the world, but, if we except Rome—and perhaps this exception is doubtful—it contains more things of fame, more that claims the attention ■ the antiquary and historian, more even that is fitted to inspire the imagination of the poet, than any European capital.

The Englishman who has once learnt what may be called the secret of London, which is not an "open scheme," will feel that, despite its fogs and soot, there is no city like it in the world. He can sympathize with Johnson's exclamation that there is in London all that life can afford, and with the tears shed by Charles Lamb in the struggle from fullness of joy at so much life. The fact that it cannot be wholly understood adds to its impressive ness. We can never know London as we can know Edinburgh or Munich, Brussels or Antwerp. Even if the pedestrian can traverse a city which covers an area of nearly 100,000 acres—a feat said to have been accomplished by Macaulay, when it covered less space, some fifty years ago—the mind cannot grasp it, and thus ample play is always left for the imagination.

The boundless wealth of this "provincet covered with houses" would yield to an enemy the most splendid prize in the world, and our means of defence, in the judgment of military authorities, would be wholly inadequate were it not for the protection afforded by the sea. It is due to the Channel that England has been saved from the conscription, and it is due, under God, to the same cause that modern London, unlike most European capitals, has never been in possession of a foreign foe. More than once, especially in the early years of this century, it has been in danger, but the power of the English fleet frustrated all the designs of the first Napoleon.^{*}

A GOSSIP ABOUT LONDON.

"Thus the Poultry was the poultry market. Adjoning it was the Stock Market, so called from a pair of stocks for disorderly people on a site now covered by the Mansion House. In Friday Street leading to Old Fish Street were to be found provisions suitable for fast days, the bakers had their shops in Bread Street, there was a Honey Lane, a Milk Street, a Wood Street, a Soapu's Lane, and so on."

As late as the thirteenth century an open field existed, called Crown Field, in the middle of Cheap, which was a vast permanent market or fair. Fitzstephen thought the air of London wholesome, and so it probably was when compared with towns less favourably situated, but it must be remembered that in those days plagues of the most virulent kind sometimes visited the inhabitants. There are no tables to tell the number of London citizens who died from the Black Death in the fourteenth century, but, according to calculations which appear to be based on sound data, that pestilence in two years swept away at least one half of the population of the kingdom. Indeed, the most unhealthy conditions of life prevailed for centuries. Erasmus states that in his time the houses of the lower classes were filthy beyond description, and when the disease now known as the Great Plague—it was the second bearing that name—broke out in 1664, London was probably swayed in large measure from further epidemics on a scale so gigantic by the fire that succeeded it. "A consuming pestilence, and a more consuming fire," to quote a phrase of Dryden's, served to purify the city, and then followed the construction of the New River by Sir Hugh Myddelton, one of the principal benefits, in Mr. Loftie's judgment, which the City ever received from a private individual.

"When the old walls," he writes, "were killed by the rains after the fire the New River water became universal. In the city as rebuilt it was everywhere laid on, and London must acknowledge Sir Hugh Myddelton to have been its greatest modern benefactor. He changed it from having been ruinously bad as Naples or even (deuts) to be one of the safest places of abode in the world."

Thanks to Defoe's picture, which is more faithful than many histories, Pepys's fascinating Diary, and to other reminiscences of the period, the plague and fire which destroyed the metropolis in the reign of the second Charles are among the most familiar incidents of history. It was fortunate for London that she possessed, in Christopher Wren, an architect capable of rebuilding the city; and it would have been still more fortunate had free scope been allowed to his art. No doubt he made mistakes, but the blunders of genius are often more tolerable than the merits of mediocrity. What a vision it would be, were it possible to bring the city clearly before the mind's eye during the many centuries of its existence! What lessons might be learnt from the stormy and brilliant scenes our London streets have witnessed! So wide a subject is far beyond the range of a brief paper like this, but it may be observed, in passing, that the more we know of English literature the more clearly shall we see the mighty influence exercised by London from the days of Chaucer to our own. It might be said, perhaps without much exaggeration, that the poets and essayists have told us more about the metropolis than the historians, more, that is to say, which is likely to fix itself in the memory. To all we are indebted, and from each we gain fresh aspects of the teeming life which is at all times, especially to foreigners, London's most impressive feature.

Nathaniel Hawthorne relates how he wandered through the streets and alleys of London—the dream-city of his youth—with insatiable curiosity, and found it better than his dream. "The result was," he adds, "that I acquired a home feeling there, as nowhere else in the world." And this feeling, although stronger in degree, is shared by the Englishman who knows how much of the history of England is written in the thoroughfares and lanes of the city that he loves. The picture of his walks, however, is not wholly unmingled with pain. Within the last thirty years, if much has been done to adorn the city with fine architecture, the convenience of railway companies and the growth of traffic have led to the destruction of buildings that possessed the charm of age as well as of historical associations. The feeling with which Mr. Ruskin regarded modern Venice will be understood by many who watch, with a jealous eye, the so-called improvements of the metropolis. Yet there can be no doubt that the London of to-day, in its sanitary, moral, and social condition, as well as from the æsthetic standpoint, is infinitely in advance of the London so dear to Dr. Johnson. The grumbler at changes will do well to remember this, and to place himself as far as possible in the position of a citizen under Queen Anne or the Georges, when inclined to denounce the "Vandals" who have endeavoured to improve the London of Queen Victoria. In those "good old times," for which some people pretend to sigh, the state of the gaols throughout England, and especially in London, was so intolerably bad that it is scarcely possible to exaggerate their violence. And when the law declared a prisoner free, the gaoler had power to inrarefied him again until he obtained his fees. A man, it has been truly said, might be left to die of starvation or fever in a goal for not being guilty of any crime, and he might be hanged for breaking a hop burl in a garden in Kent, or stealing in old coat of the value of five shillings in Mill Lane.

 I thank you John Howard and others equally earnest in the good cause, our jails are no longer a shame to England, and the cruelty due to ignorance which made asylums for the insane so terrible belongs also to what may be called ancient history. Strange to say, a visit to Padman was, in the last century
 one of the regular amusements of London In the North, edited by Edward Moore, we read —

I gratify the curiosity of a country friend I am in, I'll tell him a few weeks ago to Medford. It was in the latter week when I was at a wedding
 I found a hundred people in the hall who were there twice as many as were in the hall
 I was in, I was in the hall, I was in the hall
 I was in the hall, I was in the hall, I was in the hall

Miserable, indeed they must have been the more violent of the patients being chained like dogs and like dogs sleeping upon straw.

As if we go back to other pictures of what was then called the Town which records will be found that the law was as weak as it was cruel. Citizens indicted were forced to defend themselves from violence, since there was no efficient protection of life or property. We read in the Spectator how when Sir Roger de Coverley went to the play at four o'clock in the afternoon his servants were provided with good oaken plants to guard the knight who asked if there would not be some danger in coming home late in case the Mohocks should be abroad a set of so-called gentlemen who inflicted the most infamous cruelties on defenceless victims. In Gray's remarkable poem Lines on the Art of Walling the Streets of London, the poet laments —

WJ 1 16 7 2 1 10 9 1 8

And he warns the citizen after nightfall to keep in the oil-lighted streets, and to avoid all dark paths—

The bad state of the streets added to the peril of London travel. Lord Haverly, writing from Kensington in the winter of 1736 says there was 'a great insupportable gulf of mud between that suburb and London, and that highwaymen sometimes pursued them calling even in the metropolis itself' as testified by Horace Walpole, who writes in 1750 that a highwayman attacked a post chaise in Piccadilly, not fifty yards from his house. Knightsbridge, some years later, was said to be infested with highwaymen and in 1744 two men were hanged at Eybourn for robbing the Knightsbridge stage coach. At that time or a little earlier in the century people of fashion lived in Covent Garden, and another fashionable resort was Soho Square.

That which Chark's Iamb called "the sweet security of streets" was unknown in London during the last century, and had there been the personal liberty and regard for law with which we are now familiar, the plots of Richardson's novels invented in the days of Hogarth and Sir Joshua Reynolds, would have been too incredible to be tolerated. We may add that Hogarth and Tiddling the coarse but faithful representatives of the time have painted in unlyric colours the London they knew so well.

In a map of London Bridge in the possession of the writer, dated 1616, one of the towers of the bridge bustles with the decapitated heads of traitors, but this barbaric vindication of law was in vogue also during the days of Sheridan and Burke. It was the sight of heads upon Temple Bar as most readers will remember, which led Goldsmith, while looking up at them with Johnson, to utter one of his wittiest sayings.

Then and still later, the criminal law of England sanctioned punishments which appear to us infinitely more atrocious than the crimes committed. Not until 1736 were the laws of unjust witchcraft repealed, and it was more than fifty years later when a Bill for the abolition of burning, then for high treason passed both Houses. Not only men and women but even young children were conveyed through the streets to execution for trifling or doubtful offences without exciting the fury, or even the pity of the populace. —

When I was a child I saw Samuel Rogers (he was I am sure) collecting a whole cartful of various tubs in droves of various colours on their way to be executed at Tyburn. They had all been condemned on mere indictment for having been concerned in (that is perhaps for having been spectators of) the burning of some houses during Lord Georges' rebellion. It was quite horrible to see me present at one of the trials consequent on those acts and heard several boys sentenced, then shown executive punishment, to be hanged. 'Never and forever with you' said I see boys cry so.

Then "No Popery" riots took place in 1780, when Newgate was destroyed by the mob. King George III was on the throne, and London under that highly respectable king, and with Dr Johnson as its moralist, was far removed one might have thought.

from the barbarisms of an earlier age. Yet, as we have observed, the law was still terribly severe, although probably it did not appear so to men who might have seen women burnt to ashes at the stake not fifty years before.

The subject is a tempting one, but we must not linger. Absorbing as is the interest of old London, which presents to the eye and the imagination a vivid history of the past, living London, when once we feel its impressiveness, draws us with a more powerful attraction. The pulsations of its mighty heart are felt by all ■ us; and who is there so dull in thought as to be insensible to its glory and its shame? We do well to be proud of the London that spreads forth so many beneficent influences at home and abroad. Its cosmopolitan charity, its scientific and literary acquisitions, the unwearying efforts made in it by Christian philanthropists, the liberty which is the life blood of its citizens, the stupendous magnitude of the affairs settled within its precincts, may well make Londoners feel that they belong to no mean city. Nay, more, the congregations that crowd our churches, and the large incomes obtained by societies formed for charitable purposes, might lead us to think that the religion which has been fighting for nineteen centuries against the world, the flesh, and the devil, had its firmest stronghold and widest sway in the capital of the British Isles. It may be so, but no one can walk through our West-End streets, or witness the vice and degradation which seem in possession of the East of London, without feeling how little, after all, has been done by Christian men and women in comparison with what remains for them to do. It is well known that we have in our midst men, women, and children living, or rather starving, on a pittance which forbids all thoughts, not of comfort merely, but of common decency, and who know no respite from the most grinding toil, that we have also whole herds, for such they must be called, who live in open vice and on the proceeds of crime, for whom morality has no meaning and punishment is no penalty, that in this, the greatest city in Christendom, there are streets and courts which no honest man will venture to enter after nightfall, and where even a policeman dares not walk alone, that in these pestiferous haunts of physical and moral filth children, born to crime, are dragged up to deprave and degenerate the coming generation, and that against this mighty torrent of misery and iniquity our many agencies for good seem ■ wage a desperate strife. It may be said that without State aid in this stupendous work private labour and charity are comparatively vain. The question is too huge a one to be discussed here. But it may be asked whether much of the failure we deplore is not due to causes over which we have a distinct control. We waste our strength in futile controversies, we object to join with men who do not wear our badges and utter our shibboleths instead of remembering "the one touch of nature," we divide class from class, not by law, indeed, but by custom, and thus it comes to pass that there exist in London at this day some of the worst vices of heathendom, and the desperate social miseries of a civilization which, despite much that is noble and of good report, has not yet learnt how to humanize the great mass of the people. JOHN DINNIE.

DUTY.

SURELY the happiest life for man
■ not the fevered life that brings
A storm of stubborn questionings,
And baffled ends where all began,

But his who neither looks behind,
Nor on the shallow space before,

Nor swerving sideways to explore
Life's darkness learns that he is blind:

Who, heedless of all vain dispute,
And weary voices of the night,
Seeks only to observe aright
The bit of path before his foot. J. DO

SUNDAY READINGS.

By THE EDITOR.

DECEMBER 7TH

Read Isa. ch. 24. 1-12, and 1st John 2:1-11.

IN the long history of humanity there has lived only One who could say with truth, "Father, I have glorified Thee on the earth. I have finished the work Thou gavest me to do." And that there should ever have been such a life, at once without sin and perfectly glorifying God, is the most precious treasure which humanity can possess. There have been perfect works of genius which have proved priceless heritages. The perfect painting fixed on the canvas of Raffaele or Leonardo, the perfect building crowning the Acropolis with its matchless proportions; the perfect poem which has interpreted man's deepest secrets—these have been for countless generations exhaustless sources of elevating thought. But a perfect character presents a more precious ideal than ought we can conceive. Nothing, therefore, should so arrest our attention as the life of Him who alone was without sin, and who could say with truth to God Himself, "I have glorified Thee on the earth."

We can do no more than suggest some thoughts in reference to the manner in which Christ glorified God.

The glorifying of God cannot mean any increase of His majesty. He cannot be made holier, wiser, better than He has been, is now, and ever will be. To glorify Him signifies rather the making manifest of what He is. The sun would shine with the same intensity were the heavens emptied of all objects which, catching his rays, reveal the light that is everywhere present. A heaven without such objects would be utter blackness. And so, if God were alone in an empty universe, without angel, or seraph, man, or thing, He would yet be the all-wise, all-holy, all-glorious One. But He would not be God glorified, because manifested and reflected. It is in this sense that the heavens are said to glorify God, because they show His power and wisdom. The earth also is full of His glory, for every form and colour of land and sea, every season, the wealth of summer and the snows of winter, every clime, from where the iceberg's grand through the long Arctic night, to the lustrous heat of the tropics all speak of Him. Verily, "All the works of the Lord bless the Lord, they praise and magnify Him for ever."

But we do not require to show how different is the plastic obedience of mere things, from the intelligent appreciation which belongs to those beings who can have fellowship with God, and glorify His will by reflecting it in loving obedience. Thus to glorify God in the least measure must be the highest aim of the creature. But that any being should regard himself and his actions as an actual embodiment of the divine glory, adequately and without a flaw setting forth what God is, seems to our mind to claim an equal divinity. The realisation of such a work is far above any human effort—nay, even to conceive beforehand the elements necessary for its accomplishment is beyond the power of human imagination. For how vain would be the effort to picture the kind of life which should faultlessly represent Deity to man! Nevertheless, there has lived One in the flesh who professed to have lived such a life, and after nineteen centuries of closest scrutiny the verdict remains fresh as ever, that nothing worthier of God can be imagined than the life and character of Him, who said long ago in the upper room in Jerusalem, "Father, I have glorified Thee on the earth."

And yet He Who thus spoke was a young man, and His public ministry had lasted only three brief years. He was not only young but very poor. He had lived as a wanderer among the homes of the common people. The scenes which He consecrated belonged to the every-day life of man. And looking back upon it all, He could say, with calm consciousness of the truth of His claim, "I have glorified Thee on earth."

Wherein did He thus make manifest the glory of God? We might reply by pointing to the works of healing and mercy which were signs of the merciful order that underlies the confusions of our miseries and sinful life. He also glorified God in His teaching, in which, through words pure and luminous, falling like a sun-lit shower whose every transparent drop is charged with light from heaven, He unfolded the mind of God. Yet more than by word or work did He glorify God by His own life in its perfect response to the will of the Father. He was in a world regarding which He said "O righteous Father, the world doth not know Thee," and it became His joy at all times and under all circumstances to show how worthy that Father was to be loved and obeyed supremely. The disobedience of the first Adam had been ever repeated in human life. Men were trying each one to be a God to himself. Into this scene of rebellion Christ came and glorified the Father by His perfect Sonship. Every trial but revealed the rooted strength and immovable fixedness of His life as a Son towards God, and of His brotherhood towards man. The essence of all religion was there incarnated. His Sonship perfectly reflected the Father's will. He finished the work given Him to do in loving obedience.

And this way of Sonship betokens the One way to the Father. What He was, becomes for us the truth of God and man. His life is eternally the life which is right for us as men and children of the Highest. To be saved is to possess, in some measure, at least, the kind of life which dwelt in Christ. His righteousness as a Son must become vitally ours. The old man that shared the rebellion of self will must perish, and the new man which shares the Spirit of Christ's Sonship must be found in us. And this requires no change of outward circumstances, for there are none wherein we may not glorify the Father by living as sons of God. Christ has shown that there is no duty too simple, no position too humble, to be elevated by the grandeur of love and holy obedience. Even a cup of cold water can be so given as to be an act of worship. And whenever God sees a man or a child trying to do the right because it is His will; trying to subdue selfishness and to become loving, pure, and helpful, He can there behold the blessed fruit of Christ's life and death, and recognise the glorifying of His name. For that life so far reflects the glory of Christ. It is one with the life of that great family in heaven and earth of which God is the Father and Jesus the elder Brother.

Read Psalm 138, and St. Matthew's 23 to end

Few things do greater injury to character than to hold a low estimate of our brother men. If we wish to be noble ourselves we must cultivate noble and generous ideals. When we love truth in mankind we soon lose faith in any possible attainment of excellence. When we think mainly of others we are on the road towards acting meanly. And yet those who decry others frequently do so on the assumption of their own superior virtue. And some too—brilliant youths perhaps—would gain credit for knowledge of the world by an affected cynicism. They look big with importance as they tell you that they know what the world is, and sneer at faith in humanity. Such assertions may be ludicrous in their pretentiousness, but they often betoken something worse than folly.

In contrast to these tendencies we are commanded in Scripture to "honour all men." This is a remarkable injunction in a book which presents the sinfulness of man in its darkest colours. And yet it is not so remarkable when we remember that it is also the book which has presented the highest ideal of humanity, and which calls upon all men to reach that ideal. There is no book which so "honours all men," even while it lays bare the corruptions which universally affect mankind.

The command applies to the spirit in which we ought to regard so called inferior races of mankind. It was originally addressed to Jews accustomed to despise the Gentile world, and to enjoin them to honour Greek and Roman, Persian and Egyptian. And the pride of race is perhaps nearly as characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon now as it was of the Jew then. Our vast empire brings us into close contact with men of every type, from the lowest grade of savage up to the polished representatives of ancient culture. Wherever we go among these races we are supposed as Christians to carry the spirit of Christ with us and to manifest its influence. And yet the old prejudice of the Jew against which our Lord combated, and with which St. Paul dealt as being the antithesis of religion, finds a vivid antitype in the attitude which we British frequently assume towards the Negro or the Asiatic. We, forsooth, cannot understand why it took so long to teach the children of Abraham that the men of Italy or Gaul were to be treated as brethren in Christ. But when it becomes a question between the white man and the black, between the British settler and the Maori or Kaffir, then the command, "Honour all men," or the statement that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men," are found to be as great stumbling-blocks as ever. It is when the vital and essential demands of Christianity are pressed home in matters like this that we see how little national life has been really Christianised. There may not be much difficulty in getting support for any effort to promote certain opinions or some ecclesiasticism among these subject races, but when we are called on to give them the honour which St. Peter claimed from the Jew for the Gentile, then we can measure the strength of that pride of race which still dwells in us.

But the injunction, "Honour all men," applies equally to our dealing with individuals the society which surrounds us. When thus viewed, obedience to the command is still more difficult. For how is it possible to honour men who are dishonourable? Is it right to honour the bar, the selfish debauchee, the swindler, or the hypocrite? Nay, is it possible to honour merely disagreeable people, who without positive wickedness have yet the unhappy art of wounding our susceptibilities, and who are wearisome, if not offensive?

Now we must remember that it was just as difficult to obey the command when St. Peter wrote, as it is now. The society with which

Christians then came in contact was that of the time of Nero, when the basest men were in power. ■ was not easy then to preserve faith in human nature

■ may, however, assist us to obey the precept if we keep in memory certain general truths

(1) Let us remember that there is some good, some unquenchable spark of a higher nature even in the worst. We see when men fail, but we do not see how terrible may have been their struggles. There is in every one some spot which, if it could be reached by us, would show that there is a true man beneath the evil one. There is ever some memory or affection that remains undefiled. Could we follow the history of character step by step, marking the terrible reactions and the agonies that have been endured, we might find in the meanest wretch some trace of a higher nature which we can still honour. There is even in the lowest degradation some cherished recollection, some face that gazes in upon it from a bitter past and entreating yet to trust and love. We should honour the humanity that belongs to the very worst, for it is a light from heaven yet unextinguished and remains a pledge of what yet may be.

(2) We may also remember what this sinful humanity was and is to Christ. He came to the very worst and died for them, because He saw in the worst something which was capable of being redeemed. And the sinners and outcasts knew the saving power of that honouring of their humanity by One Who did not despair of them, but by the love with which He hoped the best things as possible for them, inspired them with hopefulness and with an undimmed courage against evil. When we think thus of Him, one may well feel ashamed of our Pharisaic pride, and learn ■ pay honour to the fallen humanity for which Christ died.

(3) We may be helped to honour all men when we think of what even the very worst may yet become. It was difficult for the Christians, whom Saul the persecutor dragged to prison, to give any credit ■ the fallen ■ which thought it was doing God service at the expense of their own sufferings. And yet this same enemy became Paul the Apostle. The comfortable Pharisee ■, in his pride, think, "If this man had been a Prophet, he would have known what manner ■ woman this is that toucheth Him, for she is a sinner." But he knew not the capacity for good that was in her "who loved much." And when we remember who those are that shall one day surround the throne of God and of the Lamb, and how the brother or sister against whom we now raise the barrier of pride and contempt may become one of God's sweet saints in light, we may learn a lesson at least of patient forbearance.

We can in this way honour all men without any sacrifice of truth. We can try ■ follow in the footsteps of the Master, and by tenderness instead of harshness, by caring for them instead of repelling them, by hoping the best for them instead of crushing them, and by seeking out the good that is in them instead of the evil, we, in this spirit of meekness, may perhaps even restore the brother overtaken in a fault, and so "fulfil the law of Christ."

DECEMBER SIXTY.

Read Luke 11: 1-17 and St. Luke 11: 1-17

What unlimited joy there is in the message of the angel to the shepherds of Bethlehem! To him who had just fled from the presence of God, nothing could exceed the rapture of the thought that men and women were to be called sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty and heirs ■ the life eternal. This is in painful contrast to the dulkened thoughts ■ religion which men often entertain.

And the angel knew no measure in his annunciation of universal gladness. It was a message of "great joy to all people." We could not imagine that the heavenly host, which were ready to burst forth in the song "Glory to God in the highest," would have been touched with such rapture, had there been any exception to the all embracing fulness of the glad tidings. And let us take heed lest we ever speak or think as if there was something less intended than what is here declared. There is no stint or shadow in the broad stream of heavenly sunshine which is poured here over the whole earth. It is wide as mankind and glorious ■ God.

And the reason of the gladness of the angel is the very gospel of grace. "Unto you there ■ born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." Let us briefly glance at the simple but exhaustless truths here unfolded —

There are two facts here, which, when conjoined, are of vital importance. One is the personality of the Saviour—He is Christ the Lord, and the other ■ that this "Christ the Lord" is born our Saviour. The expression, "Christ the Lord," is unique. ■ occurs nowhere else in the New Testament, and could have conveyed to those faithful Jewish shepherds nothing less than the loftiest conceptions of the Child of Mary. ■ must have recalled the great prophecies of how from the little Bethlehem there would go out Him that was to be ruler in Israel, "Whose goings forth are from everlasting." "For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given, and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." When we lay a firm hold on the truth of Christ as the Eternal Son, how grand becomes that other one, which tells that Christ the Lord is born into the race of man, and has taken our humanity to Himself! Remembering His glory, let us "go even to Bethlehem and see this thing which has come to pass." There is a woman, meek and pure and motherly, most highly favoured among women, yet no more than woman. What makes the Nativity so sublime is just that this mother is one of ourselves, and that this child is completely a human child. Every doctrine like that of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, which aims at separating Christ from the common condition of our humanity, arises from unbelief in the magnificence of the incarnation, and instead of springing from true reverence, rather implies distrust of the Eternal Son having so humbled Himself. But that same "sign" which evoked "the sudden blaze of song" from the choir of angels is what ought to stir our hearts into praise, for the attending angels were silent till they heard how Christ the Lord was to be found as a weak babe, a human child, "wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger." At this sign of His actual entrance into our humanity, having emptied Himself of the glory He had before the world was, then in an instant the whole heaven became lit with the song, "Glory to God in the highest."

As He thus became "born" our Saviour, He entered into a relationship with every child of man, which we may deny, but remains, nevertheless, for each and all of us. As He "is born" our brother and our Saviour, a relationship is already established, and we have but to recognize it. There is a glorious answer here to all those questions sometimes put in great anxiety, "How am I to know that Christ loves me, or is a Saviour for me?" Surely, if He is born your brother, the relationship already exists, and your sin is that you have not confessed it by treating Him as a brother and Saviour. The act of faith can not make Him more truly yours than He now is. It is but the act of self-surrender to what has been always true in spite of your unbelief.

And so is it that when the sands of the old year are fast running out, and when memory is perhaps busy in recalling past days, and fancy is engaged in forecasting a future as yet unknown—it is well for us to come back to thoughts which have a far more real significance than any which belong to the brief interests of our transitory life. For "the world and the lust thereof" may be allowed calmly to pass away for ever, when we know that we belong to a humanity that is redeemed, and to which God is reconciled, and dropping the rebellion and misdeeds which have so often shut out the grace of Christ from our own souls, we confess Him who has been born our Saviour and is now exalted in our humanity to the right hand of God on high.

DECEMBER 28TH.

RE of Psalms, 117; John 11: 1-27.

Whoever wrote the nineteenth Psalm—whether Moses, as tradition asserts, or another—there are moments when we can all understand the sentiment it expresses, when the sense of the mystery and transitoriness of life drives us back on the living God; when all human glory dwindles into insignificance, and when the all-encompassing Deity appears the only sure dwelling-place for our being.

But there is a healthy and an unhealthy form which such sentiments may assume. There is that of the cynic, who gathers bitterness from reflecting on the vanity of a life which looks baseless "as a dream when one awakes," and there is the elevating lesson expressed in the prayer with which the Psalmist concludes his half-sad musings, "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

Let us, on the evening of the last Sunday of the year, try to number our days for the same blessed end of receiving lessons of wisdom to help us to the right use of life.

(1) Consider how much is involved in the fact of existence. Because each one of us is a human being, we possess the gift of a life that is as imperishable as that of God. We may wish it were otherwise, but that does not alter the fact. When millions of years shall have passed, each one of us will be able to say "I am" with as distinct a consciousness of our personality as now. But there are other possibilities involved in endless existence. For endless existence must be endless misery except it brings us that kind of life, with the sympathies and affections, as well as the objects which are highest and most satisfying. It is not enough to say, "I exist now, and I will exist for ever."

This is too negative a statement. Our life is more than a throbbing pulse. We must not merely say, "I am," but complete the description by adding "I am" good or evil, godly or ungodly, hopeful or despairing, loving or hating, satisfied or miserable. A consideration of existence ought therefore to lead to a consideration of character and of the sympathies and tastes we are now forming.

(2) The numbering of our days may teach us the brevity of life, and that impression will be affected by the point of view from which we regard it. There are facts which may make all human history appear as less than a handbreadth. How strange it is, for example, to see the uncarving of an Egyptian tomb, to unwrath the mummy, and to gaze upon the long hair which was so carefully plaited before the days of the Ptolemies, and to realize all that has taken place since that last sad toilet was finished! Or how suggestive of the brevity of life is it to examine the spoil taken from the graves of Homeric heroes, and to handle bracelets which had clasped the arms of men and women who lived between two and three thousand years ago, and which were as trifles when Christ was born! Human history seems very short when we can thus look at so remote an age in the very face.

But there is another point from which we may view this life of man and vindicate it from the sneer of the cynic. For the life of the fairest infant, when we regard it in the light of its immortality, rises into a magnitude before which sun, moon and stars are as nothing. Time may waste its satire upon the kingly splendour which so costly tomb can preserve from ignominy, yet of the weakest babe whose birthright is immortality it can be said, as truly as of God Himself, "The heavens shall perish but thou remainest, yet, all of them shall wax old as doth a garment, but thy years shall never fail."

(3) But this numbering of our days is intended to teach us wisdom. Now there are two mistakes into which men fall according as they exaggerate the present or the neglect of the future, or the future to the neglect of the present, and which a wise consideration of existences should prevent. There are those who are absorbed in the present. Their aims, pleasures, hopes, or fears are girdled by the horizon of things seen and temporary, the life immortal, which is their inalienable destiny, has as little effect upon them as speculations on the politics of the moon. Such are all those whose life consists only in the abundance of the things they possess, be they great or little. But death has the terrible power of diverting all men of what they have and of leaving them only what they are. And this is a distinction which makes a vast difference in our calculations of what a man is worth.

But there is almost as great folly in exaggerating the future to the neglect of the present, as has sometimes been done by ascetics and fanatics of various kinds. The present is the only sphere of duty that is within our power, and the best use we can make of a belief in our immortality is so to walk every day under the influence of that belief that the commonest duties may be consecrated by the spirit in which we fulfil them. If the brevity of human life sometimes almost appals us, we may remember that there is a kingdom which cannot be moved, and that we are called to recognize ourselves as being now members of it. This is the kingdom in which Christ reigns, for it is at once the truth of man and of God.

As the old year closes it is well, therefore, thus to number our days, that we may gain wisdom to choose the things that shall abide when the world and the lust thereof shall have passed away, and which shall remain with us in that solemn moment when our whole life shall be as much a thing of retrospect as all the days and months whose course is now ended.

MEN AND MOUNTAINS.

Short Chapters of Swiss History

NO III

I SAID, last month, that it was the men of the lower lands, not of the highest, who made Switzerland independent. I am the more convinced of this, as with Oswald Schen's splendid pictorial history before me, I sit here a prisoner, on the Lucerne Lake, close by the very cradle of that independence. This Gersau has no glacier, it is even relaxing in summer; yet its men (a rare sample of their kind) fought in all the great battles—one of them brought home the banner of the Hohenrollern who was killed at Sempach—and they were (and are) infinitely fuller of "the Swiss spirit" than the beggars of the Oberland.

Boothow, after Nancy, the Swiss League was more and more drawn to France and alienated from Germany. They found the French first rate paymasters, while from the Empire they got nothing but attempts at taxation. Maximilian, who, like Louis XI, had profited by the downfall of the House of Burgundy, showed the Swiss no gratitude. Very anxious to bring the Empire back to something like its old unity, he founded a new Imperial Court of Justice, and laid a tax on all his dominions, but the Swiss would neither pay his tax nor admit his jurisdiction. The burgomaster of Zurich said this at Innsbruck "I'd advise your highness not to try to bring us obedience, for, verily, if needs be, the großen Schweizer won't spare even your imperial crown." Maximilian got the Pope to threaten them with excommunication, but they defied even that threat, and when the Archbishop of Mainz, Chancellor of the Empire, showed the Ammann of Zurich and the other deputies the pen with which he was going to sign the decrees against them, one of them said, "They used to attack us with halberds, do you think to frighten us with your goose quill?" Hostilities did not break out at once, for Maximilian had plenty to do in the Low Countries, but in 1499, angered beyond measure at another "League" in Upper Rhenia, which meant the severance of another slice of his pot province the Tyrol, the Emperor took the field, and the so called Swabian war began. In this the Swiss won six victories. Dornach, the scene of their last triumph, is only four miles from Jacob (their Thermopylae), in the romantic Münstertal, by the little river Birs. Here a handful of Swiss defeated 15,000 Imperialists. The latter had been carelessly plundering, replying to some who urged caution "No, no, it's not going to snow Swiss this July weather." The Swiss fell upon them, driving in corps after corps; but the enemy took courage, seeing the small number of those opposed to them, and would have won the day after all, had not the mountain gale and the well known forest horn sounded all of a sudden, followed by the fierce charge of the men of Zug and Lucerne. This band of deliverers had been met by some runaways, who cried "All is lost, it's no use going on." But on they went, nevertheless, and the "Swabians" found that it snowed Swiss from two quarters at once. After the battle came the monks of Basel, humbly praying that the bodies of the nobles might be given to them. "No," replied the victors, "nobles and peasants shall all rest together." They refused even to give Maximilian the corpse of his general, Turenberg. And there, in a big mound, with a little chapel beside it, knight and hardman, count and common soldier, are all buried together.

The Swiss are vastly proud of Dornach, it was won, not over mere princes like the Austrian Archduke or the Duke of Burgundy, but over the German Emperor himself. It opened Maximilian's eyes, he made peace, the peace of Basel, and, without opposition from him, Basel, Schaffhausen, and Appenzell joined the League, and within a few years the Swiss wrested from Milan the oft contested district which now forms the canton of Ticino, and in fighting for which, some eighty years before, 600 Swiss had actually defeated 15,000 Milanese, by acting on the advice of Stanga, the head man of the Leventino Valley, and flooding the country. It was mid winter, and by morning the whole was a sheet of thick ice. On this the mountaineers moved about nimbly enough, while their enemies slipped, stumbled, and fell into such irretrievable confusion that, though more than twenty to one, they were utterly defeated—"the blood running down as far as Bellinzona." This was bravery, but it was certainly not patriotism.

Not can I praise the conduct of the Swiss in Louis XII.'s Italian wars. Louis was attacking the Milanese and Venice. The republic of the Adriatic appealed to her sister republic across the Alps to help her, or at any rate to stand neutral. But with the Swiss it was a question of pay, and Louis bid highest. So, with Swiss aid, the Venetians were crushed. But there were Swiss and Swiss, and while some fought for France, others joined Pope Julius II.'s Holy League (urged thereto by Matthias Schinner, Bishop of Sion, in the Valais), and helped to defeat the French at Novara. Novara was perhaps the culminating point of Swiss military glory, they had beaten the most warlike king in Europe. The Pope called them "liberators of Italy and defenders of the freedom of the Church," and presented the lordships of Domus, Lugano, and Locarno to the League.

Soon after a turn came. Francis I. burst upon Italy, and though Schinner, by preaching a crusade in the Valais and elsewhere, had got together 30,000 Swiss, they were badly beaten at Marignano. Patriotism being stronger than creed, Cardinal Schinner and Zwingli were fighting on the same side. The Swiss deserved what they got, for they had just made a treaty with Francis, when the Papal envoys came up and persuaded them to break ■

Marignano (1515), according to Swiss accounts, was a battle of giants. The Swiss began, as usual, with prayer, and then the Aummann of Zug flung over their heads three handfuls of earth, crying "In the name of Ither, Son, and Holy Ghost, Confederates, forget your homes, here shall be our church yard or victory. Think on your forefathers. Onward fearlessly." Then they marched on with their pikes eighteen feet long, the French trying thirty times ■ break their column. I ven Rivard lost his helmet, and fled for the first time in his life. The Swiss, with a band of wild young fellows from every canton, actually took a French battery and turned the guns on Francis's troops. The fight went on by moonlight till almost midnight, and then the armies lay down side by side. During the hours of rest the Swiss leaders held a council. Schimper advised falling back on Milan and awaiting the Papal reinforcements, but he was overruled, and at dawn the forest horns rang out and the fight began again. At last the French began to give way on all points, one of the Guises fell, the Prince of Lalmont was down, and all Francis's efforts could not keep his men from wavering when, about midday, in the rear of the Confederates was heard the Venetian warcry, "St. Mark! St. Mark!" For now, in the strange and rapid changes of Italian politics, the Venetians had got round to the French side or rather against the Pope's, and then coming down all the day.

The Swiss formed in square, taking their wounded and their guns into the middle, and slowly made their way towards Milan. The French were too exhausted to march in pursuit. But the banner of Basel was taken, that of Appenzell the standard bearer tore off and tied round his body, the great silver-mounted horn of Uri was lost, and 6,000 Confederates (with at least as many French) had fallen. "I've been in eighteen battles, and I never saw a battle like this."

From that time till the Revolution the French and Swiss never lifted sword against each other. Indeed, very soon an arrangement was made by which the League allowed the King of France ■ take 16,000 Swiss ("the Swiss Guards") permanently into his pay.

Then came the troubles of the Reformation. Zurich (Zwingli's home), Schaffhausen, Basel, Berne, held with the new faith. The rest—partly, no doubt frightened by the excesses of the Anabaptists—clung fiercely ■ Romanism. I am sorry to say that Zwingli was for war, which he looked on as the only means of setting Switzerland at one again, and under his influence Zurich, in 1529, took up arms "to spread the knowledge of the truth." Zwingli was among the troops, mounted on a charger with a halbert in his hand. The Protestants made three bands, one marched on Rapperswil, another into the Aargau, the third along the Albis towards Zug. This last was met near Kappel by 6,000 Romanists from Zug and Lucerne. Before the fight there were great attempts ■ reconciliation. Berne sent a strong message to Zurich, saying "It is not by halberts that the Reformation can be spread," and adding that 10,000 Bernese were on their march, ready to fall on whichever party began the unholy strife. Lindmann Albi, of Glarus, was equally earnest in another way, he ran from party to party, beseeching the chiefs with tears in his eyes, not to suffer the shedding of brothers' blood. What most incensed the Zurichers was that the Romanist cantons had just concluded a close alliance with that persecutor of all Protestants, Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria and King of Hungary. They demanded that this alliance should be dissolved, the others refused. Albi got possession of the treaty-paper, tore it up before their eyes and threw it into the fire. "Kill me, if you like," said he, "but don't bring in the Austrian between us." This speech shrank both parties into a peace, which unhappily only lasted two years. In 1531 they met again ■ Kappel, the Zurichers were put to the rout, and Zwingli was killed. An Unterwalden man came upon him as he was lying wounded, and when he refused to call on the Virgin and saints, gave him his death wound, "You can kill my body, but not my soul," were his last words. I am sorry to say that the Romanist fanatics shamefully ill-treated his body, and that (in spite of the remonstrances of priest Schonbrunner of Zug, who said "No matter what was his faith, I know he was a true Confederate") the victorious party adjudged his corpse ■ be burnt by the public hangman.

Zurich had to make peace, she was allowed to hold her own religious opinions, but was forbidden to proselytize in the direction of the Confederates, and, of course, had to pay the cost of the war.

Even in religious wars there are now and then deeds which make us proud of our common humanity. Such was the way in which Nicholas Wengi, Schultheiss of Soleure, the year after Kappel, prevented bloodshed in his native town. The Soleure Protestants were but a few, and had all taken refuge in a big house by the river. The other party, headed by some monks, brought up a cannon to batter them into submission. The match was almost on the touch-hole, when Wengi dashed in among the crowd, and, putting his breast close to the cannon's mouth, said, "If our fellow townsmen's blood is to be shed, you shall begin by shedding mine. Think that you are Christian men, and restrain yourselves. Let them go, I say, in God's name." And, in spite of the cry, "Down with the heretics!" he persuaded his citizens to let the Reformers go safely off to Berne.

Geneva had its share in these politico-religious troubles, just at the time when our Elizabeth lay a-dying. The Duke of Savoy's soldiers were trying to climb its walls. They all but succeeded, they had opened the terrace postern, and were actually in the town, when Syndic John Chanal made such a heroic resistance that the guard had time to come up in force. Chanal fell, but the Savoyards were driven out. There is shown in the Geneva Museum, a precious relic, one of their dark lanterns, picked up next day in the town ditch.

Worse troubles by far befall the Valais. Here, as very generally in Italy, the Reformation was spreading far too fast to please those of the old faith. In some places it has lasted, if you ever go over the Bernina Pass, notice the two churches of Puschavo. You will see that the Protestants had made them into a strong fortress, so great was the danger of sudden attacks during service. I overtook the Adda the Protestants were got rid of altogether—on principle rather than on religious grounds. The country had for some time been restless. The "Grey League" had long ago wrested it from Milan, but, like the Swiss elsewhere, they were harsh masters. The Italians hated them, Spain (which then held Milan) encouraged their discontent, France took, of course, the opposite side, and when the "Grey League" proclaimed full religious freedom throughout its dominions, a fresh element of bitterness was introduced. Just then Monte Canto came down bodily (September, 1618), burying the thriving village of Pizzo with 2,500 people, of whom not a soul escaped. But man determined to add to the horrors wrought by nature. Robustelli, an outlaw, well furnished with Spanish gold, got together a band of ruffians and fanatics, and, raising the cry of "No Swab, no Zwimghaus," broke into Tirano one July night in 1620, and began massacring the Protestants, without distinction of sex or age. The same was done at Teglio, Brusio, and elsewhere. And so Protestantism was stamped out, the wretched few who survived wandering away northward. Robustelli was hailed as "a second Maccabæus," and made Captain-General of the Valais. The other side had its victories too, the valley of Prättigau was saved by an Austrian "converting party," but, patriotism here working in the opposite way, the Prättigauers took to the woods, turned then knives into diggers, made "morning stars" of their clubs by driving big nails into them, gathered heaps of stones, and then (wives and daughters helping) rushed down upon the enemy, driving him clean out as far as Chur, and actually taking the fort of Castels. If you go into Prättigau now you'll find they all talk German, though they are of Romance stock, and spoke Romance certainly till the sixteenth century. I suppose it was the German Bible, and the gradual drawing towards the great mass of German Protestantism, which brought about the change. Nothing is gloomier than the history of these politico-religious wars in the Logadine, and all along that side of Swiss land. The Federation would not help, Oswald Schon hints that the Romanist cantons preferred seeing Popery brought in by foreign arms rather than not brought in at all. Lucerne and Zurich sent down volunteers, who did little. Austria (Spain with her) had it pretty much her own way till France took the matter up, and her claims were so plainly personal that the date-men would have been better without her. They were simply a bone of contention between the rival armies, one of which had no sooner gone than the other came sweeping through the land. How glad they must have been of the Peace of Westphalia (1648), which definitively joined them, and also the Valais, on to Switzerland, and so made the religious question no longer a matter of foreign politics.

Religious troubles being over, social difficulties began. You have heard of the peasants' war in Germany soon after the beginning of the Reformation. Well, nearly two centuries later, Switzerland had her little peasants' war. Her republics were, as I have said, very exclusive, and exceedingly hard masters to their subject States. In the Forest cantons every man was as good as his neighbour, however they might treat others, no Uri or Schwytz or Unterwalden man thought of setting himself up above any other man belonging to those three communities. But with Berne, Lucerne, Zurich, and other big towns, it was quite different, they were "aristocratic republics," and the peasants found that burghers could be quite as hard masters as nobles.

At the end of the Thirty-years' War they began to cry out for more freedom. The Entlebuch Valley men (they who had risen upon and destroyed the English "Guglers") sent to Lucerne a list of grievances, but the burghers told them to go back and mind their cheese-making, or they would pretty soon hire a foreign army and be down upon them. The Entlebuchers rose, their clergy at their head, and Lucerne, in alarm, sent deputies to offer terms. There was a grand meeting at Schupfheim, three huge mountaineers, in the old Swiss garb, personated "the three men of Gruth," and Alp horns were blown and speeches made, but the deputies insisted that the peasants should, as a first step, lay down their arms and submit. "We've got Scripture on our side," said the Schultheiss. "It is written, 'He that resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God.'" "True," cried a sturdy peasant, "if your power is just, it is of God, if it's unjust, it is of the devil."

So the conference came to nothing (1653), the Bernese peasants rose too, and the burghers of the two towns sought help on all sides—from the Low Countries, from Zurich and Freiburg and Basel, and (strangely enough) from the loiest cantons, who, thoroughly democratic themselves, yet scrupled not to help in putting down a democratic rising outside. The peasants, under Leuenberger (one of themselves) and an old soldier, Christian Schibi, found themselves threatened on all sides. Most of them dropped off, leaving the Entlebuchers almost single-handed. Leuenberger, however, gave the invaders the slip, and suddenly appeared before Berne, which he attacked so furiously that the Government came to terms, the peasants were to lay down their arms, and Berne was to move Lucerne to redress grievances. The peasants were in high glee, but no sooner had troops come from Neuchâtel and Vaud than the Bernese broke the treaty, and Leuenberger found himself between two fires. The peasants fought desperately. Erlach with the Vauds on one side, Werdmüller with the Zurichers on the other, rained shot and shrapnel (Zwingli's home), Schaffhausen before Berne, held with the new faith as usual, partly, no doubt, frightened by the counsels rained the peasants' cause. Schibi was for a sudden attack that very night on the Zurichers, but the others preferred treating with Werdmüller, and while negotiations were going on a great many stole off to their homes. The negotiations failed, and the Lucerners began firing on the peasants before the flag of truce was down. So cruel were they that the Forest canton men cried shame, saying "We came here to help Lucerne, not to see peasants murdered." Schibi made a desperate stand on the bridge of Gislikon, but he was taken, and the whole body of peasants dispersed. Then the hanging began, and it was done wholesale, Schibi being first cruelly racked. So ended the Swiss peasants' war. If it had succeeded its leaders would have been put in the same rank as Stauffacher and the rest, for their aims were just the same—only they sought to gain them from Swiss burghers, instead of from Austrian nobles.

From this time to the French Revolution Swiss history is an absolute blank, with the exception of Major Davel's bold attempt (1733) to free Lausanne and the Vaud country from the hard sovereignty of Berne. He was a well meaning patriot, protesting against undoubted oppression, for the Bernese were hard masters, but his countrymen were afraid to rise. He died on the scaffold, and it was left to the French sans culottes to deprive Berne of its ill treated dependency.

Harsher even than the burghers of Berne were the cowherds of Uri. Then oppression forced on a revolt in 1735 in the Val Leventina, of which they had been masters since the sixteenth century. It was crushed, and the heads of the ringleaders were nailed to chestnut trees in the presence of the whole of the Leventina folk, whom the Federation forced to go down on their knees and beg for mercy while their chiefs were being killed. So much for republican readiness to do to others as you would be done by.

Of Switzerland in the French Revolution I shall say nothing. It was unfortunately divided. At Geneva there were republican excesses rivaling those of Paris. In the Valais and towards Lucerne (notably in Stanz—Brother Klaus's Stanz) deeds were done which recall the memories of Morgarten and Sempach. But Switzerland was forced to become "the Helvetic Republic one and indivisible;" then Napoleon remodelled it, giving Neuchâtel as a little kingdom to his Marshal Berthier, and, lastly, it was put pretty nearly into its present state by "the Holy Alliance" after 1814.

"Edward? Edward?" he does not know what he is saying."

AND THEIR INHERITANCE

By MISS OUPHANT,

AUTHOR OF 'CHRONICLES OF CARLINGFORD' 'THE WIZARD'S BOY'

CHAPTER I

"IS it to night he is coming, Winnie?"

"Yes, father. I have sent the dog cart to the station."

"It was unnecessary, quite unnecessary. What has he to do with dog-carts or any injury? He should have been left to find his way as best he could. It is not many dog-carts he will find waiting at his beck and call. That sort of indulgence, it is only putting nonsense in his head, and making him think I don't mean what I say."

"But, father——"

"Don't father me. Why don't you speak like other girls in your position? You have always been brought up to be a lady, you ought to use the same words that ladies use. And mind you, Winifred, don't make any mistake, I mean what I say. Tom can talk, none better, but he will not get over me, I have washed my hands of him. So long as I thought these boys were going to do me credit I spared nothing on them, but now that I know better—— Don't let him try to get over me, for ■ is no use."

"Oh, papa, he is still so young, he has done nothing very bad, only foolishness, only what you used ■ say all young men do."

"Things are come to a pretty pass," said the father, "when girls like you, who call themselves modest girls, take up the defence of a blackguard like Tom."

"He is not a blackguard," cried the girl, colouring to her hair.

"You are an authority on the subject, I suppose? But perhaps I know a little better. He and his brother have taken me in, me, a man that never was taken in in my life before, but now I wash my hands of them both. There's the money for his journey and the letter to Stafford—No—on second thoughts I'll not give him the money for his journey, he'd stay in London and spend it, and then think there was more where that came from. Write down the office of the Cable Line in Liverpool he'll get his ticket there."

"But you'll see him, papa?"

"Why should I see him? I know what would happen, you and he together would sing yourself ■ my feet or some of that nonsense. Yes, you're right—on the whole, I think I will see him, and then you'll know once for all how little is to be looked for from me."

"Oh, papa! you do yourself injustice, your heart is kinder than you think," cried Winifred with tears.

Mr Chester got up and walked from one end to the other of the long room ■ was lighted up as if for a great entertainment, though the father and daughter were alone in it. He drew aside the curtains at the farther end and looked out into the night.

"Raining," ■ said. "He would have liked a fly from the station much better than the dog-cart. These puppies with their spoiled constitutions they can't support a shower. I am kinder than I think, am I? Don't let Tom presume on that. If I'm better than I think myself, I'm a deal worse than you think me. And he's cut me to the heart, he's cut me to the heart!" This was said with a little vehemence which looked like feeling. He resumed, a few minutes after "What a fine thing it seemed for a man like me, that began in a small way, to have two sons to be educated with the best, just as good as dukes, that would know how to make a figure in the world and do me credit. Credit! two broken-down young profligates, two cads that have never held up their heads, never made friends, never done anything but spend money all their lives! What have I done that this should happen to me? Your mother was but a poor creature, and her family no great things; but that my boys, my sons, should take after the Robinsons and not after me! Hold your tongue and let me speak. It should be a warning to you whom you marry, for mind you, it's not only your husband he'll be, but the father of your children, taking after him perhaps to wring your heart." He had been walking about the room all this time, growing more and more vehement. Now he flung himself heavily into his chair. "Yes," he said, "it will be better that I should see him. He'll know then, once for all, how much he has to expect from me."

"Papa," cried Winifred, drying her eyes, "if my mother had lived——"

"If she had lived!" he said, with a tone in which it was difficult to distinguish whether regret or contempt most predominated. Perhaps it was because he was taken by surprise that there was any conflict of feeling. "We should have had some fine scenes in that case," he added with a laugh. "She would have stuck to the boys through thick and thin, and perhaps you would have been more on my side, Winnie, they say the girls go with their father. True enough, you are the only one that takes after me."

"Oh, papa! George is the image of you."

He got up again from his chair as if stung by some intolerable touch. "Hold your tongue, child," he said hoarsely, then seating himself with a forced laugh, "Kin to face, sworn enemies in everything else," he said.

The room in which this conversation went on was large but not lofty, occupying the whole width of the house, which was an old country house of the composite character, so usual in England, where generation after generation adds and remodels to its fancy. It had been two rooms according to the natural construction of the house, and the separation between the two was marked by two pillars, one at either side, of marble which had been brought from some ruinous Italian palace, and were as much out of place as could be conceived in their present situation. The room, in general, bore the same contradictory character, florid ornament and gilt work of the most baroque character alternating with articles of the latest fashion, and with pieces of antiquity such as have become the test of taste in recent years. Mr. Chester preferred cost above all other qualifications in the decoration of his house, and his magnificence was bought dearly at the expense not only of much money, but of every rule of harmony. He did not himself mind that. It need scarcely be added that he was not the natural proprietor of the manor-house which he had thus made gorgeous. He was a man of great ambition who had made his fortune in trade, and whom the desire, so universal and often so tragically foolish, though so natural, of founding a family, had seized in a somewhat unusual way. His two sons had received "the best education," that is they had been sent to a public school and afterwards to Oxford in the most approved way. They had not been used to much literature nor to a very refined atmosphere at home, and it is possible that the very ordinary blood of the Robinsons, their mother's family, had more influence in their constitution, than that fluid which their father thought of so much more excellent quality, which came to them from the Chester fountain. The Chesters had been pushing men for at least two generations. From the fact that their name was the same as that of their native place, it was uncharitably reported that Mr. Chester's grandfather had been a foundling picked up in the streets. But as he figured in the pedigree which hung in the hall, as George Chester, Esq., of the Cloisters, Chester, strangers at least had no right to lend an ear to any such tale nor to inquire whether, as report said, it was as a lay clerk that he had found a place in that venerable locality. William Chester, the link between this mythical personage and Mr. Chester of Bedloe Manor, had begun the family fortunes in Liverpool half a century before, and his son, whose education was that of a choir boy in Chester Cathedral, as his father's had been, established upon that foundation a solid and, indeed, large fortune, which he had fondly hoped by means of George and Tom to hand down to a whole prosperous family of Chesters, transformed into landowners, great proprietors, perhaps—who could tell?—Lord Chancellors and Prime Ministers. The disappointment which comes upon such a man when his children, instead of doing him honour, turn out the proverbial spendthrifts and consumers of the newly-made fortune, does not meet with any great degree of sympathy in the world. A tacit "scold

him right" ■ in the minds of most people. Much righteous indignation has been expended upon a very different matter, upon the ambition even of such a man as Scott to found a family: the moralist has been almost glad that ■ came to nothing, that the children of the great man were nobodies, that his hope was a mere dream. And how much more when the man had, like George Chester, nothing but his money and a certain strenuous determination and force of character to recommend him! But the disappointment was not less bitter to the new man than if he had been a monarch mourning over a degenerate son. Neither George nor Tom did anything but get into scrapes at the University. They had no heads for books, and they had the habit of rash expenditure, of self-indulgence, of considering themselves masters of everything that could be bought. Mr. Chester would have taken their extravagance in perfectly good part, he would have winked at their peccadilloes, and forgiven everything had they done him credit as he said, nor was he very particular as to the nature of the credit, had either manifested any power to take university prizes, or to a good degree, that, though he would have understood it little, would have delighted him. Had they rowed in the eight or played in the eleven, he would have received the distinction with pride. Failing those legitimate paths to honour, had they brought a rabble of the young aristocracy to Beiloe, had they gone visiting to great houses, had they found a place even among the train of any young duke or conspicuous person, he was so easily pleased that he would have been content. But they did none of these things. George, with the beautiful voice, of which his father was not proud, since ■ awakened memories of hereditary talent which he did not wish to keep before men's minds, had not used this gift as a way of making entrance into select circles, but reared it out in undergraduate parties made up of clergy men's sons, of young schoolmasters, of people, as he said bitterly, no better, nay, not so good as themselves, and made friends with the lower class of the musical people, the lay clerks at the Cathedral, the people who gave local concerts. He was quite ready to join them, to sing with them, to take his pleasures among them, with a return to all the old habits of the singing men at Chester, which was bitterness to the father's soul. It scarcely made it any worse that George fell into ways of dissipation and went wrong as well. That his father, perhaps, might have forgiven him had it been done in better company but as it was, the sin was unpardonable. When news came to Beiloe that George was about to marry a poor organist's daughter, the proceedings Mr. Chester took were very summary: he stopped his son's allowance instantly, provided him with a clerkship at Sydney, and sent him off to the end of the world, requesting only that he might see him no more.

Then Tom became his hope, Tom had aspirations higher than George's, but he went, if possible, more hopelessly astray. How it was that the tendencies of the old singer who three generations before had originated the Chester family, should have leapt over two strata of the race and broken out in his great grandson, who can say? It is a problem perhaps more interesting to the human race than evolution, but neither Darwin nor any other philosopher has thrown any light upon it. Tom had, or seemed ■ have, something more of fancy and imagination than belonged to the rest of his family; but he was indolent and fitful, incapable of keeping for two hours together to any one subject. He let himself go upon the tide, led in any direction which his companions chose, drifting along in the society of those who chose to seek him, displaying no particular will of his own, yet tending always rather to evil than to good. Sometimes his dissipations amused, but very frequently only bored him, but he found it too much trouble ■ make any effort to free himself. If George had fallen among the lower class of professionals, Tom's company was, his father declared, composed of the outscourings of the earth. And when the inevitable moment came in which Tom was plucked (or ploughed, as the word varies), his father's bitter disappointment and disgust came to the same result as in his brother's case. The civil letter in which his tutor lamented Tom's foolishness exasperated Mr. Chester almost to madness. No doubt ■ had blagged in his day of his two boys who were to carry all before them, and his humiliation was all the more hard to bear. He was uncompromising and remorseless in the revenge he took. According to his code, ■ who failed was the most criminal of mankind. Whatever a man might do, so long as he attained something, if ■ were no more than notoriety, there were hopes of him: but failure was insupportable to the man of business—the self-made, and self-sustaining. It was with a pang that he gave up the idea of all possibility ■ regarded his sons, but ■ did so with the same decision and promptitude with which he would have rejected a bad investment. He had still a child, who was, indeed, one of the inferior sex, a mere girl, not for a moment to ■ considered in the same light as a son, had the sons been worthy but something to fall back upon when they failed. Winifred, so long as the boys were in the foreground of their father's life, had cost him little trouble. She had been so fortunate as to be provided with a good governess when her mother died, and unnoticed unhought of, had grown up into fair and graceful womanhood—in mind and manners the child of the poor gentlewoman who had trained her, and who still remained in the house as her companion and friend. Insensibly it had become apparent to Mr. Chester that Winnie was the one member of his family who was not a failure. The society around, the people whom he revered as county people, but despised as not so rich as himself, received her with genuine regard and friendship, even when they received himself with formal civility. As for George and Tom, not even their prospective wealth during their time of favour had commended them to the county neighbours whose pride Mr. Chester cursed, yet regarded with superstitious admiration. Winifred had broken through the stiffness of these exclusive circles, but no one else, and even while he fumed over the downfall of Tom, he had begun to console himself with the success of Winnie. At the recent county ball she had been if not the beauty, at least the favourite of the evening. Lord Eden himself had complimented her further upon her looks. He had tasted the sweetness of social success for the first time by her means. All was not then lost. He condemned Tom, as he had condemned George, by attituder and confiscation of all his rights, and Winifred was elected to the post of heir and representative of the Chesters. Perhaps the decision gave the father himself a pang. It was coming down in the world. A man with his sons about him has something of which to be glorious—but a mere girl! At the best it was a humiliation. But in default of anything better it was still a mode of triumph, after all. ■ secured his revenge upon the worthless boys who had done nothing for his name, and a place among those who recognised in Winnie, if not in any other member of the family, their equal in one way, their superior in another. He was a man of rapid conclusions, and he had made up his mind on this point on the evening of the day on which he had heard of Tom's disgrace—for disgrace he had felt it to be, accepting no consolation from the fact that many young men not thereafter to be despised met with the same fate. He would not allow his son to return home, but had his fate intimated to him at once by the solicitor whom Mr. Chester chose to employ in business of this sort. ■ was to New Zealand this time that the unfortunate was to be sent. His passage money and fifty pounds, and a desk in an office when he reached his destination—this was the fate of the unhappy youth, fresh from all indulgences and follies. No hope even was held out to him of ever retrieving his lost position, and Tom knew with what remorseless decision George had already been cut off. Perhaps he had not lamented as he might have done his brother's punishment, which left such admirable prospects ■ himself, but ■ left no doubt on his mind as to his own fate. He had asked, what George had not had the courage to ask that he might come home and take farewell of his water, at least. And this had been granted to him. If any forlorn hope was in his mind of being able to touch the heart of his father, it was a very forlorn hope indeed, and one which he scarcely ventured to whisper even to himself.

He had arrived at the country station which was nearest Deiloe while his father and sister were talking of him, and had been received by the groom, with that somewhat ostentatious sympathy and regard for his comfort, with which servants are wont to show a consciousness ■ the situation. The groom was very anxious that Mr. Tom should be protected from the rain, the soft, continuous drizzle of a spring night. "I've brought your waterproof, sir, the roads ■ heavy, and will be a long time getting home—"

"Never mind the waterproof," said Tom, "I like the rain."

"It's cooling air, but after a while, when you're soaked through, if you get a chill, sir?"

"It don't matter much," said Tom, "how are ■ at home?"

"Pretty nicely," said the man, "though Mrs. Pierce do say that she don't like master's looks, and Miss Winifred is that pale except when she flushes up—"

"How's Bayleaf?" This was Tom's hunter, which he never mounted, yet felt a certain property in all the same.

"Nothing to brag of, sir. That poor animal, he's like a Christian. He knows as well when there's something up—"

THE PRODIGALS AND THEIR INHERITANCE

"You had better drive on," said Tom
"How dark it is!"

"It's all the rain, sir, like as if the skies themselves—— But we're glad as the equinoctials is over, and you'll have a good season for your voyage. Shall you see Mr George, sir, where you are going?"

At this Tom laughed, with a most un-mirthful outburst. "No," he said, "that's the fun of the thing, ■ in one country and I in another. It's all very nicely settled for us."

"Let's hope, sir," said the man, "that when things gets a little more civilised there will ■ a railway or something. We should all like to send our respects and duty to Mr George."

To this Tom made no reply. He was not in a very cheerful mood, nor did this conversation tend to elevate his spirits. There was nothing adventurous in his disposition. The distant voyage, the new world, the banishment from all those haunts in which he could glide along shipshod through life, with an occasional conjunction indeed, but nothing strong enough to disturb the tenor of his way, were terrible anticipations to him. Some lurking hope there was still in his mind that his fate was impossible, that such a catastrophe could not really be about to happen that his father would relent at the sight of him or at Winnie's piteous. It did not enter into Tom's thoughts that Winnie would ever forsake him. The thought of her own advantage would not move her. He was aware that, in the question of George, it had more or less moved himself, and that he had not, perhaps, thrown all that energy into his intercession for his brother which he hoped and believed Winnie would employ for himself. But then he had feared to irritate his father, who would bear more from Winnie than from any one. At this moment, while he drove shivering through the rain, shivering with nervous depression rather than with cold, for the evening was mild enough, he had no doubt that she was doing her best for him. And was it possible that his father could hold out, that he could see the last of his sons ■ away to the ends of the earth without emotion? The very groom was sorry for him, Bayleaf was drooping in sympathy, the skies themselves weeping over him. When the fate is our own, it is wonderful how natural it seems that heaven and earth should be moved for us. In George's case he had seen the other side of the question. ■ his own the pity of it was far the most powerful. His mind was almost overwhelmed by the prospect before him, but as he drove along in the rain, with the groom's compassionate voice by his side in the dark, expressing now and then a respectful and veiled sympathy, there flickered before Tom's eyes a faint little light of hope. Surely, surely, this, though it had happened to him brother, could not happen to him. Surely the father's heart was not hard enough, or fate terrible enough, to inflict such a punishment upon him. Others, perhaps, might deserve it, might be able to bear it, but he—how could he bear it? Tom said to himself that in his case ■ was impossible, and could not be.

CHAPTER II.

IN family troubles such as that which we have indicated, it is generally a woman who is the chief sufferer. She stands between the conflicting parties, and, whether she is mother or sister, suffers for both unable to soften judgment on one hand, or to reduce rebellion on the other, or else securing a ground of reconciliation by intricate and ways which she would not use on her own behalf, and often by the sacrifice of her own reason and power of judging, and conscious humiliation to all the unbecomings of peace-making. A woman in such circumstances, has to pledge herself for reformations in which, alas, her heart has but little faith. She has to persuade the angry father that his son erred less than appears, to invent a thousand excuses, to exhaust herself in pillation of offences which are far more offensive and terrible to her than to him whose wrath she deprecates, and she has to convince the impatient and resentful son that his father is acting rather in love than in anger, and that his sins have wounded ■ much as they have exasperated. Those women who have no judgment of their own to exercise, and who can believe everything, are the happiest in this ever returning necessity, as indeed in many complications of life ■ is so much better for all parties that the woman should be without judgment, the soft and boneless angel of conventional romance. Winnifred Chester was not of this kind. She was a just and tender-hearted woman, full of affliction and compassion, to whom nature gave the hard task of mediating between two parties whose conflicting errors she was, alas, but too well able to estimate—the father whose indignation and rage were in fact sufficiently just, yet so little righteous, and her brothers, of whom she knew that they neither felt any real contrition nor intended any amendment. There is, let us hope, some special indulgence for those luckless advocates of erring men who have to promise reformation which they can put no faith in, and plead excuses which to their own minds have no validity.

After the conversation which had been held in the great drawing-room, when Mr. Chester settled himself to a study of the evening papers which had just been brought in, Winifred left the room softly, and stole upstairs to the window of her brother's room which commanded the avenue, and from which she could see his approach. The room was faintly lit with freelight and full of all the luxurious contrivances for comfort to which a rich man's sons are accustomed. Poor Tom, what would he do without them all, without the means of procuring them? Poor George, what was he doing, he who now had some years' experience of work and poverty? She stole behind the drawn curtains, and looked out upon the darkness and the falling rain. There was little light in the wild landscape, and no sound but that of the rain pattering upon the thick ivy which clothed the older part of the house, and streaming silently down upon the trees which were still bare though swelling at every point with the sap of spring. The air was soft and warm, the rain and the darkness full of a wild sense of fertility and growth. Winifred's imagination depicted to her only too clearly the state of half despair yet unconvinced in which her brother's mind would be. He would not believe it was possible, and yet he would know. He was very well aware that his father was remorseless, yet he would not be able to understand how ruin could overtake him. The circumstances brought back before her vividly the other occasion on which she had implored in vain the reversal of the sentence on her elder brother. George too had been taken by surprise. He had not believed it, and when at last he was convinced, had burst forth into wild defiance and consuming wrath. But Tom would not do so. He would break down altogether. There was no stronger fibre in him to rise against the too severe sentence, and he would never believe that all was over, that it was not possible to make another and another appeal. Winifred stood and watched for his coming, feeling that if by any will hers she could bring about an accident either to delay her brother's coming, or even to bring him into the house in a condition which would compel a prolonged stay, she would have done it. Tom would have arrived, he is to be feared, with a broken leg, or the beginnings of a fever, could his sister have procured it, or he would not have come at all. Railway accidents occur in many cases when they do harm without doing any good, but a railway accident which should awake some natural movement in her father's mind, which should perhaps make him anxious, which would force him to exert himself on Tom's behalf, what an advantage that would be! Alas! such things do not come when people wish for them. A broken arm or leg, what a small price to pay for the moral advantages of reawakened interest, anxiety, the softening charm of an illness and convalescence! No father could turn out of his house the wounded boy who was brought home to be cured. But Winifred's wishes, it need not be said, were quite unavailing. By and by she heard the steady tread of the horse, the roll of the wheels over those little heaps of gravel with which the avenue was being mended. Evidently Tom was coming, without any interposition of Providence, to his fate. She ran softly down the stairs to meet him and prevent any unnecessary sound or attempt to usher the returning prodigal into his father's presence. The door was open, the water-proof of the groom glistening in the light, and Tom scrambling down from the dog-cart with that drenched and dejected look which is the result of a long drive through steady and persistent rain. He scarcely looked at the butler as he stepped past, saying, "Is my father in?" in a voice as dispondent as his appearance, and not pausing to listen as the man began to explain—

"My father is at home, sir, but——"

"Tom! oh, how wet you are! You must run up-stairs and change first of all."

"I shall do nothing of the kind. I suppose there is a fire somewhere," said Tom. "Where are you sitting? In the dining-room? No supper for me. I don't want any supper. To arrive like this is calculated to give a fellow an appetite, don't you think?"

Winifred put her arm through her brother's, wet though he was. She whispered, "Don't say anything before the servants," as she led him towards the open door of the room in which the table was laid for him before the shining fire. Tom was mollified by the second glance at its comfort and brightness.

"It looks warm here," he said, sufficing her to guide him. "Though why I should mind warm or cold I don't know. Look here, Winnie, there is this interview with the governor, I'd better get me over, don't you think?"

"Oh, Tom, come in and get warmed and eat something."

"Is it going to be very bad, then?" the young man said.

"I think," said Winifred anxiously, "you had much better change those wet clothes, your room is ready."

"Look here," he cried, "all that about New Zealand, that's all nonsense of course?" ■ watched the changes of her countenance as he spoke.

Winifred shook her head. "Oh, Tom, I told you long ago, you must never take what my father says as nonsense. He is not that sort of man. Come to the fire, then, if you will not change your clothes. And here is Hopkins coming with the tray. Don't say anything before Hopkins, Tom."

"Why shouldn't I? If he means that, they'll know soon enough. I don't believe he means it. The governor—the governor—" Tom's voice died away in his throat, partly because it trembled, partly because of Hopkins' presence. "Yes, yes, that'll do," he said furtively, as the butler placed a chair for him, and stood waiting. "I don't want anything to eat, thank you. I'll have a drink if you like. The governor," he resumed, with a sort of laugh, as Hopkins, knowing the virtue of the drink required, went off to fetch it "would never repeat himself, Winnie. He is not such a duffer as that. All very well once perhaps but to send George to Sydney and me to New Zealand, oh, that's too much of a good thing. I can't believe he means it—thank you, that's more to the purpose," he added, as he took a large silver glass out of Hopkins' hand.

"You need not wait. We have everything my brother will want," said Winifred. "Oh, Tom, what can I say to you? You know how my father had set his heart on your success—success anyhow, he did not mind what kind."

"Well, well," said Tom sulkily; "you women are always harping on what is past. I know very well I have been an ass. But there is no such dreadful harm done after all. I'm not fifty if you come ■ that, and this time I'll work, I really will, and get through."

Winifred said no more for the moment. She persuaded him to put himself at the table, ■ fortify himself with food. "We can talk it all over when you have had your supper. There's plenty of time; and what a wretched journey you must have had, Tom!"

"Wretched enough but nothing so bad as the drive from the station with the rain pouring down upon one, and that fellow Short prying one all the way. Talk of not speaking before the servants—he knew as well as I did I was in disgrace with the governor, and was sorry for me, my own groom! Why didn't you let me get a fly from the station? it would have been twenty times more comfortable."

"That is what my father said," said Winifred with a smile.

"Oh, he thought ■ that, did he? The governor has a great deal of sense," said Tom, brightening a little. "He understands a fellow better than you can. I don't say anything against you, Win—you are always as good as you know how."

Winifred looked at her brother with a tremulous smile of wonder and pity. Nothing could be more forlorn than his appearance, the steam rising from his wet coat, his hair limp on his forehead, his colourless face more eloquent of anxiety and suspense than his words were. He swallowed with difficulty the clumsy food, the dish he sputterily liked, and pushed his chair from the table with relief.

"Am I to see him to-night?" he said. "If it's got to be, the sooner the better. It will be a thing well over."

"Tom," Winifred's voice faltered, she could hardly say what she had to say, "I am afraid it is all a great deal worse than you think. He did not want to see you at all, and if he has condescended at last, it is chiefly because he thinks you will then see how little you have to expect."

Tom's countenance fell, and then he made an effort to recover himself and laughed. "Nobody ever was so hard as the governor looks," he said, "he wants to frighten me, I know that."

He looked anxiously in her eyes, and Winifred's eyes were not encouraging. Her brother broke out again with a stifled oath. "You can't mean me to suppose that that about New Zealand is true, Winnie? You don't mean that?"

"Dear Tom," Winifred said with tears in her eyes.

"Don't dear Tom me! that's not natural, you don't mean it. Good heavens! I'd sooner you were taking your sun out of me, it is a moment for that. I won't go, I'm not a child to be ordered about like that. I tell you I won't go!"

"Oh, Tom! if you could but do anything at home if you would but let him see that you could manage for yourself! That might be of some use if you could do it, Tom."

"I won't go," he repeated hoarsely, "to the other end of the world away from everything I care for! There is a limit to everything. You can tell him I won't do that. And ■ for what? for having been unlucky about my books, as half the men in the university have been one time or the other. What does it matter being ploughed? It happens every day. Winnie, I swear to you I'll work like a—like a navvy, if I can only have another chance."

"Oh, Tom! I have ■ everything I have tried every way. I think if you were to do ■ you said just now ■ say to him that you won't go to New Zealand, that you can manage for yourself at home, that would be your best chance. Show him that you can maintain yourself, do something, write ■■■■■ thing, it does not matter what it is—"

"Maintain myself!" said Tom. He had left his seat and was standing in front of the fire, ■ pale face, and dishevelled, dump his shoulders against the black marble of the mantelpiece, his eyes had a bewildered and discomfited look. "Do something." It is so easy to talk. What am I to do? Write! I am not one of the fellows that can write. I have never been used to that sort of thing. I say, Winnie, for God's sake speak to my father! I can't, I can't go to that dreadful place!"

"Oh, Tom!" she cried, turning her head away.

To see him standing there, helpless, feeble, sure only of one thing, and that that he himself was good for nothing, was like a sword in this young woman's heart. It is the most horrible of all the tortures that women have to bear, to see the men belonging to them whom they would so fain look up ■ breaking down into ruinous failure. He gave her a distracted look and when she withdrew her eyes, went and plucked her by the sleeve.

"Winnie for heaven's sake tell my father. It's all dreadful to me. I can't work in an office. I can't go a long voyage. I hate the sea. I am not strong nor a man that can rough it and knock about. George was different, he was always that sort of fellow, and then he married Winnie, speak for me. You can do it if you like."

"I have done nothing the ever since he told me, Tom, and I dare not say any more. He will not listen, he says he will send me away too. I shouldn't care for that if I could help you, but I can't—I can't. It is almost worst for me, for I can do nothing—nothing!"

"Oh no" said Tom, "don't make believe,

Winnie. Worst for you! Why, what does it matter to you? While I am out at sea, perhaps in danger of my life, you'll be snug at home, with everything that heart can desire. And who is he going to leave his money to if he casts me off? You? Oh, I see it all now! Why should you speak for me? It's against your own interests. I see it ■ now."

She could only look at him with an appeal for pity in her eyes. She could not protest that her own interests were little in her mind. There are some things which it is impossible to say as ■ ought to be needless to say them. Tom for his part worked himself up to an outburst of miserable, artificial rage which it is to be supposed was a relief to his excitement.

"Oh it is you that are to be his heir!" he cried. "a girl! I might have known. No wonder you don't speak up for me when it all in your own favour. I'm to be cut off and George is to be cut off, all for you! Oh I might have known! a girl ■ always at home, wriggling and wriggling into favour cutting out the lawful heirs. And what do he think he's going to make of you, that haven't even a name of your own, that is no more good for the family than a stranger? George wasn't enough. I might have had the sense to see that, there was me that had to be got rid of too, and now you've done it now you have succeeded. Yes, yes! and this is Winnie." He cried in a burst of despair, rage. "Winnie! I thought Winnie was my friend whoever ruled me and all this time you were plotting to get rid of me too."

Tom had been advancing towards her, gesticulating with fury his hand raised, his bloodshot eyes gleaming, when the door opened suddenly. In a moment he fell back, his hand dropped by his side, the look as of a broken hand came into his eyes. Mr. Chester had come in, and set his back against the door.

CHAPTER III

THEY were little and he was tall, they were slight of form and he was massive and big—a vigorous man with a great "wind of going" about him like one who could push through every difficulty and make his way. He stood against the door, and looked at them, a man who felt more life in him than was in both put together, to whom they were nobodies, insignificant creatures whom he could make or unmake at his pleasure. He looked at his son with contempt unminged with pity. He was not touched by Tom's miserable looks, his air of hopeless dejection or furtive, trembling hope. And for the moment Winifred's want of grace and importance struck him more than the fact which had been forced upon him that she had done him credit. He despised them both, the products of a smaller race than his own, taking after their mother, like the Robinsons. The Chesters were a better race in point of thaws and sinews, though nobody knew very well from what illegitimate source these sinews came.

"Look here!" he said, "I don't permit you to bully your sister. What's she done to you? She has always stood up for you a deal more than you deserve. ■ I let you come here ■ all ■ was because she insisted upon it. I never could see what was the use of it, for my part."

Tom's rage had been subdued in a moment. He was supposed to be a being of small will, unable to restrain himself, but he was capable of an effort of the will when it was necessary, as most people are. He looked at his father with a piteous desire to conciliate and touch his heart. "I thought, he said, "papa—I hope you'll forgive me—that I had a right to come here."

"Don't call me papa, sir. I like Mr. to do it, since others do it, but when do you ever find a man with such a word in his mouth? Not that I have to learn for the first time to-day that you are no man, and nothing manlike is to be expected from you. No, I don't see what right you have here. If it had been your great grandfather's house, as many people think, you might have had a certain right; but it's my house, bought with my money—and I have washed my hands of you." He had been a little vehement at first, but now was perfectly calm, delivering his sentences with his hands in his pockets, looking down contemptuously upon his son.

"I know, sir, that you have a right ■ to be angry," Tom began.

"I am not angry. I don't care enough about it. So long as there was some hope of you I might be angry, but now that you've gone and made a fool of me—the rich man that tried ■ make a gentleman of his son—I might as well have tried ■ make a gentleman of Winnie. As soon as I understand it that's enough, and I've learned my lesson, thank you. You are no good, and I have washed my hands of you."

"I father, I know I've been an ass. You can't say more to me than I've said to myself. And I've learned my lesson too. Give me another chance, and I'll do all you wish," he cried, holding up his hands, almost falling on his knees.

"Come, I'm not going to have a scene out of the theatre," said Mr. Chester roughly. "I've given you all you have a right to ask of me—a start in the world. When I was your age fifty pounds in my pocket would have seemed a fortune to me. And if you like—there's no better field for a young man than New Zealand—you may come home in twenty years with as many thousands as you like pounds to take with you, or hundreds of thousands if you have luck. The only thing is to exert yourself. You'd thank me for the chance if you had any spirit. That's all, I think, there is to say. Winnie will tell you the rest. Cable him—Liverpool—I've taken you a first class cabin, though on principle I should have sent you in the steerage (good luck to you, my boy! Work and you'll do well. Winnie will tell you the rest."

"I father, you are not going to throw me overboard like this?" cried the miserable young man, rushing forward as Mr. Chester turned round to open the door.

"You are going to the bottom as fast as you can, and I throw you into the lit boat, which is a very different matter. You'll find a decent salary and an honest way of getting your living on the other side. Only don't think any more of Bedloe and that sort of thing. Good-bye. If you do well you can send Winnie word, if not—" He gave a shrug of his shoulders. "I am all to you, once for all, and don't think I am either to be coaxed or bullied. What's done is done, and I make no new beginnings. Get him up in time once in his life, and let him leave to-morrow by the first train, Winnie. I shall have to speak to Hopkins if I cannot trust you."

"Let him stay to-morrow. Oh! papa, don't you see how ill he is looking—how miserable he is? Let him stay to-morrow, let him get used to the idea, papa."

"I must speak to Hopkins, I see," Mr. Chester said. "Hopkins, Mr. Tom is going off to-morrow by the first train—see that he is not late. If he misses that he will lose his ship, and if you let him miss it, it will be the worst for you. That's enough, I hope. I am, good-bye."

"I can't—I can't get ready at a day's notice. I have got no outfit—I have nothing—"

"All that's been thought of," said Mr. Chester, waving his hand. "Winnie will tell you. Good-bye!"

He left the mother and sister alone with a light step and a hard heart. They could hear him whistling to himself as he went away. When Mr. Chester whistled the household trembled. The sound convinced Tom more than anything that had been said. He threw himself down in the great easy chair by the fire, and covered his face with his hands. What the sounds were that misery brought from his convulsed bosom we need not pause to describe. Sobs or curses, what does it matter? He was in the lowest deep of wretchedness—wretchedness which he had never believed in, which had seemed to him impossible. He could not say that it was impossible any longer, but still it seemed incredible, beyond all powers of belief. His sister flew to him to comfort him, and wept over him, not understanding the misery he had offered her, and he himself forgot, which was more wonderful, and clung to her as his only consolation. Misery of this kind which has no nobleness in it but only weakness, cowardice, compunction in which is no repentance, is of all things in the world the most terrible to witness. And Winnie loved her brother, and felt everything that was unworthy in him to the bottom of her heart.

Next morning he went away with red eyes and a pallid face and quivering lips. It was all he could do to keep up the ordinary forms of composure as he crossed the threshold of his father's house. He was sorry for himself with an acute and unvaried anguish, broken down, without any higher thought to support him. He never believed it would have come to this. He could not believe it now, though it had come to pass. He feared the voyage, the unknown world, the unaccustomed confinement, everything that was before him, that he should be no longer the young master, but a mere clerk, that he should have to work for his living, that all his little false importance was gone, that he should be presently, he who could not endure the sea, sick and miserable on a long voyage. All these details drifted across his mind in the midst of the current of miserable consciousness that all was over with him and the impulse of frenzied resistance that now and then rose in his mind, resistance that meant nothing, that could make no stand against inexorable fact.

Winifred stood at the door as long as he was in sight, but the horse was fresh and went fast, which was a relief. She stood there still with the fresh damp morning air on her face, after the wheels had ceased to sound in the avenue. It was a dull morning after the rain, but the air was full of the sensation of spring, the grass growing visibly, the buds loosening from their brown husks on the trees, the birds twittering multitudinous, all full of hope in the outside world all dismal in that which was within. Many people envied Winifred Chester—and if her father carried out his intention and made her the heir of all his wealth many more would envy and many court the young mistress of Ludloe, but Winifred felt that there was scarcely any woman she knew with whom she might not profitably change places at this moment of her life. There was old Miss Farrell, sitting serenely among her books and still anxious about nothing, but a new pattern amusing herself with the recollection of the part which she accounted to her favourite and best pupil day after day as they sat together. Winifred knew them all, yet was never tired of these chapters in life. Though Miss Farrell was sixty and Winnie only twenty-three she thought she would gladly change places with her companion—or with the woman at the lodge who had such children for whom to work and mend. No one in the world she thought had at that moment a burden so heavy as her own. She was called in after a while to Mr Chester's room which was a large and well-filled library though its books were little touched except by herself. He was seated there as usual surrounded by local papers—attending the moment when the Limes should arrive with its more authoritative views—with many letters and telegrams on his table, for though he went seldom to business he still kept the threads in his hand. He demanded from her an account of Tom's departure, listening with an appearance of enjoyment. 'It is the best thing that could happen for him,' he said, 'if there is anything in him at all. If there isn't of course I will go to the wall—but so he would do anyhow.'

"Oh, papa! He is your son."

"And what of that? He is no more like me than Hlopkins is. You are the only one that is like me. I have sent for Balington to make another will."

"I do not want your money, papa."

"Softly, young woman, nobody is offering it to you. I don't mean to be like King Lear. Indeed, for anything I know, I may mutter and put all your noses out of joint but in the meantime—"

"I will never supplant my brother," said Winifred. "I will never take what does not belong to me. I wish you would dispose of it otherwise, father. It is yours. I do what you like with it, but I have a will of my own too."

"That you have!" said she with a snarl, "that's one of the things I like in you. Not like that cur that could do nothing but snarl and crouch and cry."

"I am did not cry," she exclaimed indignantly. "He did not think you could have the heart. And how could you have the heart? Your own son! I ask myself sometimes whether you have any heart at all."

"Ask me, you are at liberty to do in your own opinion, but I will not humouredly."

"That fellow had faced me as you do now—but mind you, Winnie, if you go against me I am not so partial to you, but that I shall like me to have my own way. What I have nobody in this world has any right but myself. I have made it every penny and I shall dispose of it as I please. If you think you will be able to do what you like with it after I am gone you're mistaken—but take care—there are ways in which you can dispose of me now, as much as I am laid me. So you had better think a little of your own affairs."

She looked at him with settled eyes. "I don't wish to displease you, papa—I don't know—"

"Not what I mean perhaps? Remember that the sort of match which might be good enough for Winnie, with two brothers over her head, might not be fit for Miss Chester of Ludloe. I don't want my any more."

Her silence Winifred, whatever it might mean. She said no more but with her heavily with a paleness and determination which was little like the girl and indignation with which she entered the room. Her father looked after her with a chuckle. "That has settled her, I hope," he said to him self.

CHAPTER IV.

MISS FARRELL came home next day from her visit. She was a little old lady of the period when people became old early, and retained the dress and the habits of age before it was at all necessary. She was about sixty, but she had been distinctly an old lady for ten years. She wore a cap coming close round her face, and tied under her chin. Whenever she had the least excuse for doing so she wore a shawl, an article

THE PRODIGALS AND THEIR INHERITANCE.

the putting on of which she considered to afford one of many proofs whether or not the wearer was "a lady," which was to Miss Farrell something more than a mere question of birth. She was very neat, very small, very light hearted, seeming the best of everything. Even Mr Chester, though she saw as little of him as possible, she was able to talk about as "your dear father" to her pupil, for, to be sure, whatever might be the opinion of other people, every father ought to be dear to his own child. Miss Farrell had gone on living at Redloe since Winifred's education was finished, for no particular reason, at least, for no reason but love. She was a person full of prejudices in favour of aristocracy and against persons of low birth, but she was sufficiently natural to be quite inconsistent, and contradicted herself whenever she pleased her—for, as a matter of fact, she preferred Winifred Chester, who was of no family at all, to several young ladies of the caste of Vers de Vers, whom she had formerly had under her care. How he had managed to 'get on' with Mr Chester was a problem to many people, and why she could choose to stay in the house of an individual so little congenial. As a matter of fact, it was not so difficult as people supposed. She was a woman who instantly put the best interpretation upon everything, moved thereto not only by natural inclination but by profound policy for it did not consist with Miss Farrell's dignity ever to suppose, or to allow any one to suppose, that it was possible for her to be slighted. She would permit no possibility of offence to herself. It occasionally happened that people had bad manners, which was so very much worse for themselves than for any one else. Miss Farrell had made up her mind from the beginning of her career never to accept a slight, nor to look upon herself as a dependant. No offence was so thrust upon her that she could not refuse to be aware of it, she left the house at once, but on less serious occasions presented a serene obtuseness apologising to others for the pecuniaries which were "such a pity," or the "want of taste" which was so unfortunate. In this way she had overawed persons more confident in their own savoir faire than Mr Chester. She had always been admirable in her own sphere, and the alarm of an anxious mother who had obtained such a treasure, lest the peace of the house should be endangered by the sudden departure of the governess, may be supposed. Once it had occurred to her in her life to be compelled to take this strong step

She never required to do it again. As for Winifred, it was long since the relation of pupil and teacher had been over between them, but the motherless girl of the partie, to whom she went with reluctance, and chiefly out of compassion, had entirely gained the heart of the proud and tender little woman. She did not hesitate to say that Winifred was beyond all rules. "It does not matter who her father was—I have always thought the mother must have been a lady," Miss Farrell said, with a conception of the case very different from that of the master of the house. "But at all events Winifred is—born. I never said I insisted upon a number of quarters. I don't care who was her great grandfather—nothing could be worse than in the father, if you come to that—but she is a lady—as good as the Queen."

"You have made her so," said the wife of the Rector, who was her confidante.

"No one can make a lady, except the Almighty. It is a thing that has to be born," was the prompt reply.

But notwithstanding, Miss Farrell was able to speak to Winifred about "your dear father," and to look upon all the proceedings of the boys with an indulgence which sometimes almost excited their sister, yet was an unspeakable consolation and support to her in the troubles of the last years. For to have someone who will not believe any evil, who will never appear conscious of the existence of anything that needs concealing, who will know exactly how not to ask too many questions, yet not to refrain from questions altogether, in the midst of family trouble, a help and comfort unspeakable. Winifred's mind was full to overflowing when her friend came back. She had felt that it was almost impossible to exist without speaking to some one, delivering herself of the burden that weighed upon her. It had been a relief to have Miss Farrell away at the moment of Tom's visit, and to feel that no eye but her own had looked upon her brother's discomfiture, but it was a relief now to meet her frank look and unhesitating question—

"Well, my dear, and how about poor Tom?"

"He is gone," Winifred said, the tears coming to her eyes. "He is to sail from Liverpool to-day."

"My dear," said Miss Farrell, "it is very natural for you to feel it, but do you know it is the very best thing that could have happened for him? He will no doubt be the making of him. He has never had any need to rely on himself, he always felt his father behind him. Now that he is sent into the world on his own account it will rouse all his strength. Yes, cry, my dear, it will do you good. But I approve for my part. Your dear father has been very wise. He has done what was the best for Tom."

"Do you think so? Perhaps if that were all— But ■ does not seem to have been the best thing for George, and how can we tell if it will answer with Tom?"

"George, you see, has manied, which brings in a new element—a great deal more comfortable for him, but still what the gentlemen call a new factor, you know, that we are not acquainted with. Besides, he is a different kind of boy. But Tom wants ■ be thrown on his own resources. Depend upon it, my dear, ■ is the very best thing for him. I should have thought that you would have seen that with your good sense."

"Oh! Miss Farrell, if that were all!"

"And is there something more? Don't tell me unless you like, but you know you take a darker view than I do."

"There ■ but one view to take," Winifred said. "It makes me miserable. My father—I hope he does not intend it to be known, but I cannot tell—anyhow you must know everything. My father says he has made up his mind to cut off both the boys, and to leave everything to me."

Miss Farrell grew a little pale. She was old fashioned and strong upon the rights of sons and the inferior importance of girls. She paused before she spoke, and then said, with a little catching of her breath, "If it is because you are the most worthy, my dear, I can't say but he is right. A girl of your age is always more worthy than the boys. You have never been exposed to any temptation."

"But that is no virtue of mine. Think what ■ is for me—the boys that were brought up to think everything was theirs, and now cast away, one after another, and everything fixed upon me."

"My dear," said Miss Farrell, recovering her courage, "you must not disturb yourself too soon. Your father will live to change the disposition of his property a hundred times. It ■ a sort of thing that only wants a beginning."

"But don't you see," said Winifred, with great seriousness, "that is poor comfort, for he may ■ displeased with me next, and leave ■ all to some stranger. And then who would care for George and Tom?"

"I see what you mean, you are going to share with them, Winnie. My dear, you may take my word for it, that will ■ better for them, far better than if they got your father's immense fortune into their hands."

"But injustice can never be best," she said.

They were in Miss Farrell's pretty sitting room, seated together upon the sofa, and here Winifred, losing courage altogether, threw her arms round her old friend, and put her head down upon the breast that had always sympathy for her in all her troubles.

"I am very unhappy," she said. "I do not see any end to it. My brothers both gone and I alone left, and nothing but difficulty before me wherever I move. How can I tell how my father's mind may change in other ways, now that he has made up his mind to put me in this changed position—and how can I tell—even ■ that were not so——"

These broken expressions would have conveyed little enlightenment to any stranger, but Miss Farrell understood them well enough. She pressed Winifred in her arms, and kissed the cheek which was so near her own.

"Has anything been said about Edward?" she asked in a low tone.

"Nothing yet, but how can I tell? Oh! yes, there was something. I can't remember exactly what—only a sort of hint, but enough to show— Miss Farrell, you always think the best of every one. What can make him do it? He must love us—a little—I suppose?"

The doubt in her tone was full of pathos and wondering bewilderment. Winnie, though she had already many experiences, had not reached the length ■ understanding that love itself can sometimes torture.

"Love you, my dear! why of course he loves you! Whom has he else to love? You must not let such foolish thoughts get into your mind. Thank heaven, since you were a child you have never had any doubt that I loved you, Winnie, and yet I often made you do things you didn't like, and refused to let you do things you did like. Don't you remember? Oh! I could tell you a hundred instances. A man like your dear father, who has been a great deal in the world, naturally forms his own ideas. And I can tell you, Winnie, ■ very, very difficult when one has the power, and when one sees that young people are silly, not to take matters into one's own hand, and do for them what one knows ■ be best. But, unfortunately, one never can get the young people to see it—they prefer their own way. If they went according to the ideas of their fathers and mothers perhaps there would ■ less trouble in the world."

"You don't really think so," cried Winnie, indignant. "You would never have one go against one's own heart."

"I say perhaps, my dear," said Miss Iremell mildly, "only perhaps. It is a thing no one can be arbitrary about. To have one's own way is the most satisfactory thing, so long as it lasts, but often 'thereof comes in the end perplexity and madness.' Then one thinks, if one had but taken the other turn, nobody knows, till time shows, which is for the best."

"Is that a proverb?" asked Winnie with some youthful scorn.

"It sounds a little like it," said the cheerful old lady with a little laugh, "but the rhyme was quite unintentional, and as a matter of fact, we know that whatever happens to us in God's providence is for the best."

"Is my father's hardness God's providence?" said Winifred, her face becoming almost severe in youthful gravity.

"It was not a question easy to answer. She secretly listened to the little lecture Miss Iremell gave, as to the wickedness of condemning her father, or calling that hardness which, probably, was the highest exercise of watchful tenderness. "I don't know that I should have the strength of mind to carry it out, but, my dear," she said, "I have not the very slightest doubt that this is by far the best thing for Tom. He will come home a better man, he will have found out that life is different from what he thinks. It may be the making of him. Your dear father, who is stronger-minded than we are, does it, you may be sure for the best."

"An' if I am ordered to give up everything I can for pushing you will think that for the best," said the girl withdrawing, half sorrowful half indignant. The older woman gave her a look full of love and sorrow, and the smiling of her cheerful little countenance there was that consciousness which belongs to experience that teaching of a long life which it herself shows confusing lights upon much that is plain and simple to the uninitiated. Miss Iremell in her heart answered this last indignant question in a manner which would have confounded Winifred, but she said nothing. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

CHAPTER V

WINIFRED it will be divined was not without visions of her own which were indeed kept in the background by the more urgent complications of her family life, but yet were always there, and in every moment repose came in to fill up with sweetness mingled with pain all the intervals of her thoughts. A few years before, when Mr. Chester had retired from business and had come to live permanently at Bedloe, had begun his life of ease by a long illness, an illness at once dangerous and tedious, which he had been "pulled through" by a young doctor, still quite unknown to fame, who had devoted himself to the case of his patient with an absorbing attention such as elderly gentlemen of mercantile connections rarely call forth. Mr. Chester was a man who was always sensible of services rendered personally to himself and to young Dr. Langton gave up both time and ease to him, watched by his bedside at the crisis of the disease, and never grudging to be called out of bed or disturbed at any moment of the day or night, was natural that a grateful patient should form the highest idea of the man who had saved his life.

It did not detract from the merits of the young doctor that he belonged, though remotely, to a country family, the ancient owners of Bedloe, and that he held a higher place in the general estimation than the new millionaire himself, whose advent had not been received with enthusiasm. Dr. Langton, indeed, was of considerable use to the new established household. He decided several important points to call who had no immediate intention of calling and described with so much fervour the sweet new and good manners of the young lady of the house that the way had thus been smoothed for that universal acceptance of Winifred which had opened her father's eyes to the fact that she alone of all the family did him credit. Unfortunately Dr. Langton went a little further than this. He was young, and Winifred was but just taking upon her the independent position of mistress of her father's house. They saw each other every day, watched together at the sick bed, and met in the most unrestricted intimacy—and the natural result followed. Had Winifred been poor, all his friends would have protested that she was a very bad match for Edward Langton, who was believed to have what is called a fine character before him, but as she was instead, the daughter of a very rich man, it was permissible that on her side of the question Edward Langton should be supposed a very poor match for Winifred. It had been accordingly with very doubtful feelings and a great screwing up of his courage that the young doctor had presented himself before the rich man and asked him for his daughter. The reception he received was less terrible than he feared, but more embarrassing. Mr Chester had received the proposal as a joke, a strange but extremely amusing pleasantry. "Marry Winnie!" he had said, "you must wait till she is out of long clothes—or of short frocks—is it?" And this had been the utmost that could be extracted from him. But at the same time he had taken no steps to discourage or separate the lovers. They had gone on seeing each other constantly, and had been sufficiently confident that no venous obstacle was to be placed in their way—but never had been able to extract a more definite decision or anything that could be called consent. For some time in the freshness of their mutual enchantment, the two young people had gone on very easily with this imperfect sanction, but there had then come a time when Edward, impatient, yet not venturing to risk a definite negative by using pressure upon the father, had filled Winifred's life with agitation, urging upon her the claims of his faithful love, and even now and then proposing to carry her off and trust to the chance of pardon afterwards, rather than let it tantamount to unnecessary delay. Winifred, with mingled happiness and distress, had spent many an hour in curbing this impetuosity, and it was strange to her, a relief, but yet a surprise and wonder when he suddenly ceased all intimacies of the kind, and assumed the aspect of a man quite satisfied with the present state of affairs, though very watchful of all that happened, and curious to know the details of every thing. The change in him filled her with surprise, and at first with a vague uneasiness. But there was no appearance of any failure in his devotion to herself, and it was in many respects less embarrassing than the constant entreaties which she had found it so difficult to resist. Still she would wonder sometimes, accepting, as women so often accept, the unexplained decision of the men who are nearest them, with that silent desire of ever understanding the motives of the other half of humanity which men too so often feel in respect to women.

As for Miss Farrell, who had seen so much both of men and women, she divined, or thought she divined, what Dr Langton meant. But she said not a word to her pupil of her divinations. She said, "What a good thing that Edward has made up his mind to it. You never would have given in to him, Winnie?"

"Oh, never," said the girl, with a silent, unexpressed sense that perhaps it might have been better if she could.

"No, you never would have done it, it is against your nature, and it would have been the worst policy. Your dear father is a man of very strong principles, and he never would have forgiven you. It would have been quite past all hoping for. It is such a good thing Edward perceives that it is!"

Winifred did not receive this explanation with all the satisfaction that her friend hoped. She felt uneasily the existence of some other with which she was not acquainted, but so long as there was no doubt of Edward's love what did it matter? And she was not herself impatient. She saw him every day, she knew (or supposed she knew) all his thoughts, she had his confidence, his full trust, his unbroken devotion, what more can a woman want? It is sometimes aggravating in the highest degree to a man that she should want no more, that she should be content with relations which stop so far short of his wishes, and Edward had often expressed this fond exasperation. But now he took it quietly enough, seeing possibilities which Winifred had not begun to see.

Now, however, the calm of this unexpected content was interrupted from the other side. Tom was suddenly gone, shaking off the dust from his shoes as he crossed for the last time the threshold of his father's house, when Winifred learned all that was involved in the disastrous promotion which had already made her so miserable—not only to supplant her brothers (which yet it might be possible to turn to their advantage), but to expose herself to risks which were worse than theirs, to fall perhaps in her turn and in the hour when unable to help him, them, or for their sake to resign all that was to herself best in life. Winifred had retired from her father's presence with this sword in her heart. And Miss Farrell's consolations, though they soothed her for the moment, did not draw it out. She felt the pricking and quivering anguish through all her being. What if she should be called to act the heroic part which is so shameful to hear about, so terrible to perform to give up love and life for the sake of family affection lightly returned, or not returned at all, rewarded with suspicions and unkindness by those for whom she sacrificed everything? To give up her love, her husband, for her brothers! She did what those who are disturbed in mind instinctively learn to do. She went out by herself into the park, and took a long solitary walk, communing with herself. She had looked forward to Miss Farrell's return as something which would help and strengthen her. And for the moment that new event and all the gentle philosophies that had come from her old friend's lips had helped her a little. But at the end every one must bear his own burden. She went out into the park which, though the sun had come out, was still wet and sodden with last night's rain. The hali opened leaves were all sparkling with wet, the sky had that clear and keen sweetness of light which is like the serenity which comes into a human face after many tears. The sod was soft and spongy under her feet, but Winifred was not in a mood to observe anything. She walked fast and far, carrying her thoughts with her, praying everything in review with the simplicity and frankness which is impossible when we have to clothe our thoughts in words. She would not have said even to herself, that George and Tom would never understand her motives, never believe in her affection, but she knew it very well, just as she knew that the grass was damp and that she was wetting her feet, a consciousness that neither in one case nor the other meant any blame. She knew, too, that her feelings and her happiness would matter little more to her father than did to himself the feelings, if they had any, of the thorns which she put out of her way. To put these consciousnesses into words is to condemn, but in one's thoughts one takes such known facts for granted without any opinion. To leap into the midst of such complications is at once a very hard for a young soul. Ordinarily the girl to whom it suddenly becomes apparent that she may be called upon to give up her love, has at least something to rest upon in the way of compensation, when it is in fiction she tries to save her father from ruin, and often it happens in real life that the delight of all her friends, the approbation of her parents, the satisfaction of all who love her, is the reward for her sacrifice. But poor Winifred was without any such consolation. If she gave up her happiness for the sake of retaining and retaining their inheritance to her brothers, they would revile her in the meantime, and take it as the mere restitution of something stolen from them, in the future. Or she might find that the inheritance came to her under restrictions which made her sacrifice useless, and her desire to do justice impossible. What was she then to do? There came into her mind a sudden wish that Edward was still as he was six months ago, vehement, impatient, almost desperate. Oh, if he would but take the matter in his own hands, risk everything, carry her away, make it impossible once for all that she should be the traveller of all this trouble! She said to herself that she ought to have consented when he had urged this upon her. Why should she have hesitated? They had been held in suspense for two years, a long time in which to exercise patience, to linger on the threshold of life. And it was not as if her father wanted her love, or would feel his house vacant and miserable without her. He who could cut off his sons without a compunction had never shown any particular love for his daughter. His thoughts were concentrated upon himself. She was not so necessary to him as old Hopkins was, who understood all his tastes. When Winifred suffered herself for a moment to think of herself, to leap in imagination from Dedloe with all its luxuries, from the sombre life at home undisturbed now by any joyous expectation of the boys, with no hope even of family letters that would afford anything but pain, to the doctor's little house full of sunshine and pleasantness, the life of two which is the perfection of individual existence, her heart, too, seemed to leap out of her bosom towards that other world. Oh, if she could but be liberated without any action of her own, carried away, transported from her own dim life to that of him to whom above all others she belonged! This flight of fancy lifted her up in a momentary exaltation above all her troubles. Then she tumbled down, down to the dust. She knew very well it would not be. He could not, even if he wished it, which now it seemed he did not, carry her away without consulting her, without her consent. And she could never give that consent. She could not abandon her home, her duties, the possibility of saving her brothers, the necessity of serving her father. One must act according to one's nature, however clearly one may see a happier way, however certain one may be of the inefficiency of self-denial. Sometimes even duty becomes a kind of immorality, a servile consent to the tyranny of others, but still to the dutiful is a bond which cannot be broken. Winifred felt herself look on like a spectator, and sadly assent to the possible destruction of her own life and all her hopes. It might be delayed, it might not come at all, but still it was impending over her, and she did not know how she was to escape, even in that one impossible way.

She had reached the edge of the park without knowing it in the fulness of her preoccupation, when the sound of a dog cart coming along the road awoke her attention. It was no wonderful thing that Edward should be passing at that moment though she had not thought of it. Neither was ■ extraordinary that he should throw the reins to his servant and join her. "I have just time to walk back with you," he said.

"I don't see how it is ever to begin

CHAPTER VI.

It was scarcely in nature that the appearance of her betrothed, coming so suddenly in the midst of her thoughts, should be disagreeable ■ Winifred, but it was an embarrassment to her, and rather added to than lessened the trouble on her mind. He led her back into the park, which she had been coming out of, scarcely knowing where she wandered. As was his way when they were beyond the reach of curious eyes, he took her arm instead of offering her his. There was something more caressing, more close in this manner of contact. When they were safe beyond all interruption he bent over her tenderly.

"Something is the matter," he said.

"Nothing new, Edward."

"Only the trouble of yesterday, Tom's going away?"

"It is not the trouble of yesterday. It is a trouble which lasts, which is going on, which may never come to an end. I don't think you can say of any trouble that it is only of yesterday."

"That is very true, still you and I are not given to philosophising, Winnie, and I thought there might be some new incident. I suppose he sails to-day?"

"Yes, he sails to-day and when will he come back again? Will he ever come back? The two of them? Oh, I heard, life is very hard, very different from what one thought."

"At your age people are seldom so much mixed up in it. But there is the good as well as the bad."

"Perhaps," said the girl, faltering, "I am looking through spectacles, not rose coloured all the other way. I don't see very much of the good."

He pressed her arm close to his side. "Am not I a little bit of good, is not our life all good if it were only once begun?"

"But what if it never begins?"

"Winnie!" he cried, startled, standing still and drawing her suddenly in front of him so that he could look into her face.

"Oh, Edward, don't add to my troubles, I don't see how it is ever to begin. My father means to put me in Tom's place, as he put Tom in George's place, and already he has said——"

"What has he said?"

"Perhaps it means nothing," she went on after a pause, "I should have kept it to my self."

"Winnie, that is worse than anything he can have said. What he says I can bear, but not that you should keep anything to yourself."

"It was not much. It was a sort of a threat. He said the much that was good enough for Winnie might not be good enough for——"

"His honesty. He might enough," young Langton said.

At this Winifred, who had been interrupting in her own mind all that was involved, trembled as if it had never occurred to her before, and turned upon him with an air, and indeed with the most real sentiment of grieved surprise. "What?" she said, with wonder and reproach in her voice.

"A country doctor," said the young man, "a fellow with nothing, is not a match for the honesty of Bidloe. He is right enough. We cannot contradict him. You ought to make an alliance like a princess with some one like yourself."

"I did not think," said Winnie, raising her head with a flush of anger, "that you would have been the one to make it worse."

He smiled upon her, still holding her closely by the arm. "Did you think I had not thought of that before now? Of course, from his point of view, and, of course, from all points of view except our own, Winnie——"

"I am glad you make that exception."

"It is very magnanimous of me to do so, and you will have to be all the more good to me. I am not blind, and I have seen all coming, from the moment of Tom's failure. Why was he so silly as to fail, when a hundred booties get through every year?"

"Poor Tom!" she said, with a little gush of tears.

"Yes, poor Tom! I suppose he never for a moment thought—But, for my part, I have seen it coming. I have seen for a long time what way the tide was turning. At first there was not much thought of you, you were only the little girl in the house. If it had not been so I should have run away, I should not have run my head into the net, and exposed myself to certain contempt and rejection. But I saw that nobody knew that there was in the house an angel unaware."

"Edward, you make me ashamed! You know how far I am——"

"From being an angel? I hope so, Winnie. If I saw the wings budding I should get out my instruments and clip them. It would be a novel sort of an operation. I thought their ignorance was my opportunity."

She was partly mollified, partly alarmed. "You did not think all this before you let yourself—care for me, Edward?"

"I did before I allowed myself to tell you that I cared for you, as you say. One does not do such a thing without thinking. There was a time when I thought that I must give up the splendid practice of Bidloe, with Shipington into the bargain, the rich appointment of parish doctor, the fit fees of the Union——"

"You can laugh at it," she said, "but it is very, very serious to me."

"And so it is, very, very serious to me. So much so that six months ago I wanted to throw everything up, if you would only have consented to come with me, and seek our fortune. I did not mind where——"

"Ah!" she said. There was in the exclamation a world of wistful meaning. What an escape it would have been from after-part! Winifred said this with the slight shiver of one who sees the means of safety which she could never have taken advantage of.

"But now," he said, "it is too late for that."

His tone of conviction went to Winifred's heart like a stone. She would never have consented to it, but yet why did he say it was too late? She gave him a wistful glance, but asked no question. To do so would have been contrary to her pride and every feeling. They went on for a few minutes in silence, she more cast down than she could explain—he adding nothing to what he had said. Why did he ask nothing? Things could not be left now as they were, without mutual explanation and decision what they were to do. 'Too late!' She felt in her heart, on the contrary, that now was the only moment in which it could have been done, in which she could have wound herself up to the possibility—if it were not for other possibilities, which, alas! would thrust themselves into the way.

"I have something to tell you," he said, "something which you will think makes everything worse. I might have kept you in ignorance of it, as I have been doing, but the knowledge must come some time, and it will explain what I have said—"

She withdrew a little from him, and drew herself up in all the height she possessed, which was not very much. "I here went to her heart a quick dart like the stab of a knife. She thought he was about to tell her that his own mind had changed, or that her coming wealth and importance had made it incompatible with his pride to continue their engagement. Something of this kind seemed certain that it must be. In the sudden conviction of the moment it did not occur to Winifred that such a new thing could scarcely be told while he held her so closely to him, and clasped her hand and arm so firmly. But it was not a moment for the exercise of reason. She did not look up, but she raised her head instinctively and made an effort to loosen her hand from his clasp. But of these half-involuntary movements, he took no note, being fully occupied with what was in his mind.

"Winnie," he said in a serious voice, "your father talks at his ease of making wills and changing the disposition of his property. I don't suppose he thinks for a moment how near he may be—how soon these changes may come into effect."

A little start, a little tremor ran through her frame. Her attitude of preparation for a blow relaxed. She did not understand what he meant in the relief of perceiving that it was not what she thought.

"My father? I don't understand you, Edward."

"No, I scarcely expected you would. He looks what people call the picture of health."

She started now violently and drew her arm out of his in the shock of the first suggestion. "My father!" she stammered, "the picture of health—you do not mean, you cannot mean—"

"I have been cruel," he said, drawing tenderly her arm into his. "I have given you a great shock. My darling, I had I be done sooner or later. Your father, though he looks so well, is not well, Winnie. I never was satisfied that he got over that illness as he thought he did. But even I was not alarmed for a long time. Now for several months I have been watching him closely. If he does not make this new will at once he may never do it. If he does, it will not be long before you are called on to assume your place."

"Edward! you do not mean that my father— You don't mean that there is absolute danger—to his life—soon—now? Edward! you do not think—"

"Dear, you must show no alarm. You must learn to be quite calm. You must not betray your knowledge. It may be at any moment—to-day, to-morrow, no one can tell. I am not certain, nothing is certain, he may go on for a year."

The light seemed to fail in Winifred's eyes. She leant against her lover with a rush and a whirl of hurrying thoughts that seemed to carry away her very life. It was not the awful sensation of a calamity from which there is no escape, such as often overwhelms the tender soul when first brought face to face with death, but rather a horrible sense of what that doom would be to him, the cutting off of everything in which so far as she knew he took any pleasure or ever thought of. The idea of a spiritual life beyond would not come into any accordance with her consciousness of him. Mr. Chester was one of those men whom it is impossible to think of as entering into rest, or attuning immediate identity by the sudden step of death. There are some people whom the imagination refuses to connect with any surroundings but those of present humanity. They must die, too, like the most spiritually-minded, but there comes upon the soul a sensation of moral vertigo when we think of them as entering the life in an unseen world. Thus, though it may seem unnatural to say so, was the first sensation of Winifred, a sense of horror and alarm, an immediate realisation of the terrible inappropriateness of such a removal. What would become of him when removed from earth, the only state of existence with which he had any affinities? It sent a shiver over her, a chill sense of the unknown and unimaginable which seemed to freeze the blood in her veins. It was only when she recovered from this that natural feeling gained utterance. She had leant against her lover in that first giddiness with her head swimming her strength giving way. She came slowly back to herself, feeling his arm which supported her with a curious beatific sense that everything was explained between him and her, mingled with the sensation of natural grief and dismay.

"I do not feel as if it could be possible," she said faintly. Then with trembling lips, "My father?" and melted into tears.

"My dearest, it is right you should know. It is for this reason I have tried to persuade you not to go against him in anything. The more tranquillity he has the better are his chances for life. Let him do as he threatens. Perhaps if you withdraw all opposition he will delay the making of another will, as almost all men do, for there seems time enough for such an operation and nothing to hurry for. Get him into this state of mind if you can, Winnie, don't oppose him; let it be believed that you see the justice of his intention, that you are willing to do what he pleases."

"Even——" she said, and looked up at him, pausing, unable to say more.

He took both her hands in his, and looked at her smiling. "Even," he said, "to the length of allowing him to believe that you have given up a man that was never half good enough for you; but who believes in you the same like heaven."

"Believes in me—when I pretend to give up what I don't give up, and pretend to accept what I don't accept? That the kind of woman you believe in?" she cried, drawing away her hands. "How can I do so? How can I consent to cheat my father, and he perhaps—perhaps——"

She stood fluttering, trembling, crying, but detaching herself with nervous force from his support, a passion of indignation and trouble and dismay.

He answered her with a line in which is the climax of heart-rending tragedy, holding out to her the hands from which she had escaped—

"Faith unfaithful kept him falsely true."

"That may do for poetry," she said; "but for me, I am not great enough or grand enough to—to—to be able to brave it. Edward, do not ask me. I must tell the truth. I tried to do anything else, my face, my looks would betray me. Oh, don't be so hard on me. Ask me something less than this, ask me now to——"

She stopped terror-stricken, not knowing what she had said; but he only looked at her tenderly, shaking his head. "If I had ever persuaded you that," he said, "I should have been a cad and a rascal, for it would have broken your heart. But now I should be worse, I might be a murderer. Winnie, you must yield for his sake. You must let him live as long as God permits."

"And deceive him?" she said, almost inaudibly. "Oh, you don't know what you are asking of me. You are asking too much cleverness, too much power. I can only say one thing or another. I cannot be falsely true."

"You can do everything that is necessary, whatever it may be, for those you love," he said.

She stood faltering before him for a moment, turning her eyes from one side to the other, as if in search of help. But there was nothing that could give her any aid. The heavens seemed to close in above her, and the earth to disappear from under her feet. If she had ever consented to an untruth in her life, it had been to shield and excuse her brothers, for whom there were always apologies to be made. And how to deceive she knew not.

They went on together across the park, not noticing the wetness of the grass or the threatening of the sky, upon which clouds were once more blowing up for rain, so much absorbed in their consultation that they were close to the house before they were aware, and started like guilty things surprised when Mr. Chester came sharply upon them round a corner, buttoned up to the chin and with an umbrella in his hand.

CHAPTER VII.

"Why don't you come to the house and have your talk out? She has got her feet wet, and if she does not look sharp we shall all be caught in the rain—a doctor should know better than to expose a young lady to bronchitis. Besides, her life is more important than ever was before."

"We forgot how the skies were looking. You should not be out of doors either; it is worse for you than for her. I told you this morning you had a cold."

THE PRODIGALS AND THEIR INHERITANCE

"You are always telling me I have a cold. I shan't live a day the less for that," said Mr. Chester, with a jestiness which made Winifred's heart tick.

"I hope not, but we must take care," said young Lington. "Come back now, don't go any farther. I hope you were coming, only to bring Miss Chester back."

"I was coming to bring Miss Chester back—and for other things," said her father significantly. He put a little emphasis on the name, and Winifred had been painfully affected by hearing her name pronounced so formally by her lover. He had never addressed her familiarly in her father's presence, but now there seemed a narrowing in every thing, and as her father repeated it, there seemed in it a whole new world and new disposition of things. "But as it is, come, to be a wet night," he added, and we shall have a dull time of it, nothing but myself and two females at dinner, you had better come and dine with us, doctor, if you have nothing better to do."

"I will come with pleasure," Lington said. He had perfect command of himself, and yet he could not get on from a momentary glance at Winifred, which said much. She, too, divined, with a sinking of her heart, that it was not merely for dinner or to relieve himself from the society of two females, that her father gave the invitation. He was unusually gracious and smiling. "You know you're always welcome," he said. "The ladies spoil you. A young doctor is something like a curate, he is always spoiled by the ladies, but they don't have so much of you coming in as they expect, for I have got several things to talk to you about."

"As many as you like," said Lington. "But let me entreat you to go in now."

"You see how anxious our friend is about my health, Winifred, he did not care half so much for yours and you are a deal more liable to take cold than ever I was. You take that from your mother, who was always a feeble creature. The stamina is on the Chester side. Very well, doctor, very well. I don't like the wet any more than you do. I'm going in, don't be afraid. Dinner at seven, sharp, and don't keep us waiting."

Mr. Chester's laugh seemed to the young pair to mean much, the very wave of his hand as he turned away, his insistence upon the hour of dinner, all breathed of fate. The two young people exchanged one look as they shook hands, on his side it was a look at once of encouragement and entreaty—on hers of terror and wistfulness. She was afraid and yet anxious to be left alone with her father. ■■ seemed to Winifred that she could bear what he said to herself however painful it might be, but that an insulting dismissal of Edward was more than she could bear. She could not linger, however, nor say a word to him beyond what ordinary civility required. Even the momentary pause did not pass without remark.

"Some last words?" Mr. Chester said, "one would think you had seen enough of each other. You should make your appointments a little earlier in the day."

"It was no appointment, papa. I was walking, and Dr. Lington came up in his dog cart."

"Oh, very likely, those things fall in so pat don't they? I suppose I am past the age for encountering people in dog carts just when I want them. But you must not calculate too much on that," he said with a laugh. "There is no reason why I shouldn't marry and provide myself with another son, but that might be more to my mind than you."

To this Winifred made no reply. The threat had offended her on other occasions, now it affected her with that dreadful sense of the intolerable to which words can give no expression, it brought the blood in a rush to her face, and she looked at him in spite of herself with eyes in which pity and horror were mingled. He met her look with a laugh.

"You are horrified, are you? That's all very well for you. But let me tell you, many an older man than I and less pleasing, perhaps, has got a pretty young wife before now. It has to be paid for like every other luxury, but women are plenty, my dear, though you mayn't think so."

"Papa, do you think this is a subject to discuss with me?"

"Why not? You are the only one except myself that it would be much affected by. It might interfere with your comforts, and I would interfere very much with your importance. I can tell you, Miss Winnie."

"Then, father," the girl said, "for heaven's sake do it, and don't talk of it any more. Rather that a thousand times than to be forced to agree to what I abhor, than to be put in another's place, than to have to give up——"

He turned round and looked at her some what sternly. "What do you expect to be obliged to give up?" he said.

Between her fear of doing harm to him, whose tranquility she had been charged to preserve, and her fear of precipitating matters and bringing upon herself at once the prohibition she feared, and that natural nervous desire to forestall a catastrophe which was entirely contradictory of the other sentiments, Winifred pause! and replied to him with troubled looks rather than with speech. When she found her voice, she answered, faltering, "What you said to me yesterday meant giving up the truth and all I have ever cared for in my life. I have always wanted, desired more than my life, to be of use to—the boys—and to be made to appear as if I were against them—"

Her voice was interrupted with sobs. Ah! but was not this the beginning of treachery? It was the truth but not the whole truth, the boys were much, but there was something which was still more. Already in the first outset and beginning she was but falsely true.

"This is all about the boys, is it," he said coldly, "as you call them? I should say the men, who have taken their own way, and had their own will, and like it I hope. If it comes to a bargain between you and me, Winnie, there must be something more than that."

"There can be no bargain between you and me," said Winifred. In the meantime looking at him she had thought his colour varied, and that a slight stumble he made over a stone was a sign of weakness and her heart sank with sudden compunction.

"Oh, no! I begun, papa. It is you to tell me what to do and mine to—obey you." Her voice weakened and grew low as she said these words. She felt as if it were a solemn promise she was making instead of the most ordinary of dutiful speeches. He nodded his head repeatedly as she spoke.

"That's as it should be, Winnie—that's as it should be—continue like this, my dear, and you shall hear no more of the new will. So long as you are reasonable I am quite content with my daughter, who does me credit. It is your duty to do me credit. I am going to do a great deal for you and I have more claim than just the ordinary claim. Go in now, the run is coming. As for me, for all that young fellow says, I don't believe a mutter. I feel as fit as ever I did in my life. Still bronchitis is a nuisance, he told me coughing a little as he followed her unobserved.

Winifred did not repeat again till the hour of dinner. She was, like every one who hears a sentence of death for the first time, apprehensive that the event which seemed at one moment incredible might happen the next, and she stood along the corridor at least half a dozen times to make sure that her father was in the room called the library, in which she read his news papers. If any sound was heard in the silence of the house, she conjured up terrible visions of a sudden fall and catastrophe. How was it possible she oppose him in any thing? If he told her to abandon Edward she would have no reply, as if he had asked her to go out for a walk or drive with him in his carriage, "Yes, papa." It would not matter what he asked. She must make the same answer, conventional, meaning no little as if it had been a request for a cup of tea. And about his will the same assent would have to be necessary. She must appear to him and the world to be very willing to supplant her brothers, she must appear to give up her lover because now she was too great and too rich to marry a poor man. This was the charge her lover himself had laid upon her. She must consent to everything. The true feelings of her mind and all her intentions and hopes must be laid aside, and she must appear as if she were another woman, a creature influenced by the will of others without any of her own. Even that was a possible position. A girl might give up all natural will and impulse. She might be a passive instrument in other people's hands. She might take passively what was sent to her, and passively allow something else to be taken away—that might be weak, miserable and unworthy—but it need not be false. What was required of her was more than this. It was required of her that she should pretend to be all this till her father should die, and then turn round and deceive him in his grave. The thought made Winifred shiver with a chill which penetrated her very heart. After, could she undo all she had done balk him after he was dead, proclaim to all the world that she had deceived him? Was that what Edward meant by being subtly true? She said to herself that she could not do it, that it would be impossible. In the case of her brothers perhaps, where only renunciation was necessary, she might do it, but to gain happiness for herself she could not do it. "I cannot, I cannot," she cried to herself under her breath and then lower still, with an anguish of resolution and determination, "I will not." She gave him up it should be for ever. She would not play a part and pretend submission, and deceive.

But, to the astonishment of both these young people, Mr Chester that evening did not say a word on the subject. During dinner he was more agreeable than usual; but when the ladies went out of the room, young Langton, as he met the eyes of his betrothed, gave her a look which told that he knew what was coming. He was so nervous when he was left behind that for the first few minutes he hardly knew what was being said to him, but when he calmed down and came to himself, an astonished sense that nothing was being said took the place of his dread and bewildered him altogether. All that Mr. Chester had to say was to ask for some information about a small estate which was to be sold in another part of the county which was better known to the doctor than to himself. He asked his advice in order as to whether he should or should not because its purchaser in a way which made young Langton's head go round, for it was the manner of a man who was consulting one of those who were concerned, an intimate friend, perhaps a son-in-law. He said to himself after a moment, when this subject was exhausted, that now it must be coming. But on the contrary there was not a word. When the two gentlemen went into the drawing-room Winifred asked him with her eyes a question which was full of the anguish of suspense. He mimed behind the cover of a book to say to her, "Nothing has been said," but this was so wonderful that the relief was too much, and neither could she believe in it. They both felt that the pain, though almost insupportable, could not be real, and that the coming storm was all the more certain because of this delay.

Late that night Mr. Chester felt unwell, and sent into the village for the doctor just as he was going to bed. Langton put on his coat, and jumped into the dog cart which had been sent for him, with a sudden quickening of all his pulses, and the sense of a miraculous escape more distinctly in his mind than solitude for his patient. Winifred met him at the door with wild anxiety and terror, and followed him to her father's room, with all her nerves strung for the great and terrible event of which she had been warned. She thought nothing less than that the hour of calamity had come, and the whole house was now filled with a vague horror of anticipation, although no one knew that there was anything to fear. The doctor's practised eye, however, saw in a moment that it was a false alarm, and it was with a pang almost of disappointment that he reassured her. He could only appear glad, but there was no doubt in his own mind that it was a distinct mistake of Providence. Had Mr.

Chester died then he would have left the world with one or two sins the less on his conscience and a great deal of human misery would have been spared. "You think I should not have roused you out of your comfortable bed without the excuse of dying, or at least something more in it?" the patient said, "but you will find I am a tough customer, and likely to give you more trouble before you are done with me."

"It is no trouble," the doctor said with a grave face, "but you must learn to be careful."

"Phaw!" said the rich man. "I tell you I am a tough customer. I am not a bit of an evening walk that will free you of me."

"We will do our best to fortify you for evening walks, but you must be careful," Langton said. Upon which his patient gave a chuckle, and turned round in his bed and went to sleep like a two-year's child.

CHAPTER VIII.

A THIRTIEN life is said to last long. Winifred Chester lived in great alarm and misery for a week or two, watching every movement and every look of her father, expecting almost to see him fall and die before her very eyes. The horror of a catastrophe which she could not avert, which nothing could be done to stave off, intensified the natural feeling which makes the prospect of another's death, even of an indifferent person, overawing and terrible. And though it was impossible to believe that a man like Mr. Chester could inspire his daughter with this unreasoned filial love which many daughters bear to their parents, yet he was her father, and all the habits of her life were associated with him, so that the idea of his sudden removal conveyed almost as great a shock to her mind as the warmest bonds of love, instead of a natural affection much fettered by involuntary judgments given in her heart against him, had been the bond between them. And there can be nothing in the world more dreadful to the mind than to watch the life and actions of a human creature whom we know to be on the brink of the grave, but who neither suspects nor anticipates any danger, and lives every day as though he were to live for ever. To hear him say what he was going to do in the time to come, the changes he meant to make, the improvements, the new furnishings, the plantings, all that was to be done during the next ten years, filled Winifred with a thrill of misery which was not unmingled with compunction. Could she say nothing to him, give him no hint, whisper in his ear no intimation that his days were numbered? She shrank within herself at the thought of presuming to do so; and yet to be with him and walk by him, and listen to all his anticipations and never do it seemed horrible. All his thoughts were of the world in which he had, as he did not know, so precarious a footing. He was a man who wanted no other, whose horizon was bounded by the actual, whose aspirations did not exceed what human life could give him. He had met with disappointments and probably had felt them as bitterly as other men, but his active spirit had never been arrested, he had turned to something else in which he expected compensation. The something else at present was Winifred, she had done him credit, and might do so in a higher degree than had been possible to her brothers. She might marry anybody. As for the doctor, when the moment came Mr. Chester knew very well how to make short work of the doctor. And Winnie, of whom there could be no doubt that she was a lady, would marry a lord, and satisfy her father's pride and make up for everything. His mind had taken refuge in this with an elasticity which minds of higher tone and better inspirations do not always possess; and those plans which to her were so frightful, those arrangements of years which he should never see, were all with a view to this satisfaction which he had promised himself. He was going to preserve the game strictly, a duty which he had not much thought of hitherto, he was going to enlarge the house—to build a new wing for my lord, as he began within himself to name his unknown son-in-law. In these arrangements he forgot his own sons, putting them aside altogether, as if they had never existed, and forgot also, or at least never took into consideration, any uncertainty in life, any thought of consolations less positive. To see a man so terribly off his guard is always a spectacle very terrible and surprising when the mind of the spectator is roused to it, just as the sight of any indifferent passer-by going lightly along a road on which death awaits him round the next corner, is almost more appalling than the sight of death itself, especially if we cannot warn him, or do anything to save. And how could he die? A man who cared for nothing that was not in the life he knew, how was he to adapt himself to another, to anything so different? Winifred's brain swam, the light faded before her as she sat watching him, unable to take her eyes from him, full of terror, compassion, pity.

"What are you staring at so?" ■ asked on more than one occasion.

"Nothing, papa," Winifred replied incoherently, consciousness suddenly coming back to her as his voice broke the giddiness and throng of intolerable thoughts.

"One would think you saw a ghost behind me," he said with a laugh. "That's the new æsthetic fashion of absent-mindedness I suppose," and this explanation satisfied and even pleased him, for he believed Winnie to be of the latest fashion and "up to every thing" with the best.

Miss Larrell, on the other hand, scolded her pupil as much as she could bolder any one, for this sudden alarm which had seized her. "It is just a fad," the old lady said. "Edward has his fads like other people doctors have: they are fond of a discovery that leads to nothing. I never saw your dear father look better in his life."

"He does not look ill," Winifred allowed with a faint movement of relief.

"Ill! he looks strong, younger than he did five years ago, and such a colour, and an excellent appetite. But I am glad to hear that is what Edward thinks, for it explains everything."

"Glad!" it was Winifred's turn to exclaim.

"My dear, when you are my age you will know that one is sometimes glad of an explanation of things that have puzzled one, even though the explanation itself is not cheerful. I think this fright of Edward is a piece of folly, but yet it explains many things. As for your dear father, if he were a little unwell from time to time, that would be nothing to wonder at. Gout, for instance—one is always prepared for gout in a man of his age. But he is up early and late, he has the complexion of a ploughboy, and can eat everything without even a thought of his digestion. I envy him," she said with fervor. Then giving Winifred a kiss as she leant over her, "You are seeing everything en non, my dear, and Edward is giving in to you. Don't think any more about it for three days, in the meantime I will watch him, give me three days, and promise me to be happy in the meantime."

This time Winifred did not repeat the inappropriate expression, but only looked at her old friend with tears in her eyes. "I don't think I have very much to be happy about," she said.

"You have life before you, and youth and hope, and you have Edward and your dear father, so far as I can see, in perfect health; and the others—in the hands of Providence, Winnie."

THE PRODIGALS AND THEIR INHERITANCE.

"Are we not all in the hands of Providence," said the girl, "those who live and those who die, those who do well and those who do ill? and it does not seem to make any difference."

"That is because we see such a little way, such a little way—never what ■ morrow is going to bring forth," Mrs Farrell said.

But this conversation did not do very much to reassure Winifred, and at the end of the three days the old lady said nothing. Her experienced eyes saw, after a close investigation, certain trifles which brought her to the young doctor's opinion, or at least made her acknowledge to herself that he might possibly be right. It is to be feared that Mrs Farrell did not look upon this possibility with horror. She was calmer, not so much interested, and less full of that instinctive horror and awe of death which ■ most strong in the young. She had seen a great many people die, perhaps she was not for that more reconciled to the idea of it in her own person than others. But she had come ■ look upon it with composure when others were concerned. She thought ■ likely enough that Edward might be right, and she thought that, perhaps, things might happen which were more to be regretted. It would leave Winifred free. If he did not alter his will, it would restore the boys to their rights, and if he did alter his will, Winifred would restore them to their rights. On striking a balance of the greatest happiness of the greatest number, no doubt it would be for the best that Mr Chester should end his career.

After these three days, ■ the end of which Winifred asked no explanation from her friend, many other days followed, with nothing happening. The force of the impression was softened in her mind, and though the appearance of Mr Chester's man of business on two or three several occasions gave her a renewed thrill of terror, yet her father said nothing on the subject of his will, and she was glad on her side to ignore it, feeling that nothing she could say or do would have any effect upon his resolution. On the last evening, when Mr Babington, after a long afternoon with Mr Chester in the library, stayed to dinner, the cheerfulness and satisfaction of the master of the house were visible ■ everybody. He had the best wine in his cellar out for his old friend, and talked to him all the evening of "old days," as he said, days when he himself had little expect-tation of ever being the Squire of Bedloe. "But many things have changed since that time," he added, "and the last is first and the first last, eh, Babington, in more senses than one."

"Yes, in more senses than one," the lawyer said gravely, sipping the old port which had been disinterred for him with an aspect not half so joyful as that of his patron, though ■ was wine such as seldom appears at any table in these degenerate days.

"In more senses than one," Mr Chester repeated. "Fill your glass again, old Bill, and, Mrs Farrell, stay a moment, and let me give you a little wine, for I am going to propose a toast."

"I am not in the habit of drinking toasts," said Mrs Farrell, who had risen from her chair, "but as I am sure it is one which I fully need not hesitate about, since you propose it—"

"No lady need hesitate," said Mr Chester, "for it is to one that it is a true lady, as good a lady as if she had royal blood in her veins. You would not better her, I can tell you, if you were to search far and wide, and as you have had some share in making her what she is, Mrs Farrell, it stands to reason you should have a share in her advancement. I have a great mind to call in all the servants and make them drink it too."

"Don't," said the lawyer hurriedly, "a thing is well enough among friends that is not fit for vainglory, or servants either. For my part I wish everything that is good to Mrs Winifred, but yet—"

"Hold your tongue, Babington, it is none of your business. Here's the very good health of the heirs of Bedloe, and good luck to her, and a fine title and a handsome husband, and everything that heart can desire."

The two ladies had risen, and still stood, Mrs Farrell with the glass of wine which Mr Chester had given her in her hand, Winifred standing very straight by the table, and white as the dress she wore. Mrs Farrell grew pale too, rising from one to the other of the two gentlemen, who drank their wine, one with a flushed and triumphant countenance, the other in little thoughtful gulps. "I can't refuse to drink the health of Winifred, however it is put," she said tremulously. "But if this is what you mean, Mr. Chester—"

"Yes, my old girl," cried Mr. Chester, "this is what I mean and I don't know what anybody can have to say against it—you, in particular, that have brought her up, and done your duty by her, I must say. She has always been a good friend to you, and always will be, I can answer for her, and you shall never want a home as long as she has one. But if you have anything to say against my arrangements or what I mean to do for her——"

Miss Farrell put down the wine with a hand that trembled slightly. She towered into tremendous height, or so it seemed to the lookers on. "I say nothing about the term which you have permitted yourself to apply to me, Mr Chester," she said. "I can make allowance for bad breeding, but if you think you can prevent me from forming an opinion, and expressing it——"

"Be quiet, Chester," cried the lawyer, kicking him under the table, but in the height of his triumph he was not to be kept down.

"You may form your opinions as you please, and express them too, but, by George, if you express anything about my affairs, or tilt it upon you to criticize, it will have to be in some one else's house."

"That is quite enough," said the old lady. "I am not in the habit of receiving affronts. This day is the last I shall spend in your house. I bid you good evening, Mr Babington." She waved her hand majestically as she went away. As Mrs Winnet, who had accompanied to step him with an indignant cry of "Father!" she turned upon Mr Chester a pair of eyes, large and full of wrath, which blazed out of her pale face in passionate protestation as she hurried after her friend. The exit of the ladies was so sudden after this soft and hot interchange of hostilities that it left the two men confounded. Mr Chester gave vent to a exclamation of two and turned to his supporter on the other side.

"What did I say?" he cried. "I haven't said anything, have I, to make a tragedy about?"

"It would have been a great deal better to say nothing at all, was all the comfort Babington gave him. The lawyer went on with the port, which was at once good and unkind. He thought quarrels were always a nuisance, but that Chester did indeed there could be no doubt of it—want some one to take him down a peg or two. "If your laughter does not much like it herself, it seems to be the case, it's a pity to set the old lady on to make her worse. And Mrs Winnet wants a lady with her," he said between the gulps. He gave no support to the angry man, hot with excitement and triumph, to whom this sudden check had come in the midst of his outburst of angry satisfaction. Mr Chester's countenance fell.

"You don't mean, he cried, "that she will be such a fool as to go away? Pah! She's not such a fool as that. She knows on what side her bread's buttered. She's lived at Bedloe these dozen years."

"Everybody knows Miss Farrell," said the lawyer. "She's as proud as Lucifer, and as fiery, if she is set ablaze."

"Pooh!" said the other, "it's nothing but a breeze, we shall be all right again tomorrow. She knows me, and I know her. She is not such a fool as to throw away a comfortable home, because I called her old girl. Are you determined, after all, that you won't stay all night?"

"I must get home—I must indeed. Tomorrow early I have half a dozen appointments."

"Then if you will go," said Mr Chester, "which I take unkind of you for, of course, the appointments could stand, if you chose, but if you must go, it's time for your trunk."

"Thank you for telling me," said Mr Babington. He jumped up with a slight resentment though he had been quite determined about going away that night, but then he had not known that there would be this quarrel, which he should have liked to see the end of, and that the part would be so good.

CHAPTER IX

The sound of the heavy iron rolling along down the avenue, in the closing of the great door upon the departing guest, came to Winnet as she sat alone, with a dreary sound. Mr Babington was no particularly ally of hers, and yet it felt like the going away of a friend. Presently her father came into the room telling, over his shoulder to old Hopkins about the hot water and lemon which were to be placed in the library ready for him. Ten o'clock will do, he said. It was only about nine, and Winnet felt not with transport, that she was to have her father's society for the next hour. It was by this time too warm to have a fire in the evening, but yet they sat habitually, when the lamp was lighted, near the fire place. Mr Chester came up to this central spot, and drew a chair near to his daughter and sat down. He brought a smell of wine with him, and a sensation of heat and excitement. "Why are you sitting by yourself," he said, "like a sparrow on the housetop? It seems to me you are always alone."

"I shall have to be alone in future, papa Miss Farrell—Winifred could not say any more for the sob in her throat."

"Oh, this is too much!" said Mr. Chester. "Couldn't she say any one else that I was a little excited? She must know I don't mean in any harm. That is all nonsense, Winnie. You shall say something pretty to her from me, and make an end of it. Why, what's all this fuss about a lady's word? She is an old girl if you come to that—But I don't want any botheration now. I want everything to be straight and pleasant. We are going to have company, people staying in the house, and you can't do without her, that is clear."

"Oh, papa," said Winifred, "I wish you would not have any one staying in the house. I don't know what you meant to night, but if it is anything about me—I don't feel able for company. It is so short a time since poor Tom—"

"You had better let poor Tom alone. I want to hear nothing more of him, and the father. Mind what I say. I mean to make a lady of you, Winnie, but if you turn upon me like the rest I am just as fit to do the same to you."

"I would rather you did than I see what should be there," said Winifred. Her heart was beating wildly in her breast with apprehension and dismay, and she could not be prudent as she had been bidden to be, nor consent to be what was so odious to her, but even in the warmth of her protest Edwin's words occurred to her, and she faltered and stopped, with an alarmed look at her father. He was flushed, and his eyes were fiery and red.

"You are going a little too fast, he said. "It is neither there nor yours, but mine, and I should like to know who has any right to take it from me. Now if it were begun on this subject we'll have it out, Winnie. You've been living your own way more than was good for you. Perhaps, after all, Miss Farrell, he has let you do as you pleased, can go and comebody else be got who knows better what is suitable to a young lady like you. I can have no more flirtations, with doctors, or curates, or that sort. You are old enough to be married, and I want no more nonsense. That sort of thing, though it means nothing, is bad for a girl settling in life."

Winifred had turned from white to red, sitting gazing at him, yet shrinking from his eyes. "Papa," she said, "I don't know what you mean," in a voice so low and troubled that he carried his hand over his ear, half in pretence, half in sincerity, to hear what she had to say.

"What I mean?—oh that is very easy—you are not a child any longer, and you must throw aside childish things. I have asked a few people for the week after next. It's too early for the country, but I know some that are soon tired of town, and there is a young fellow among them who—well, who is very well disposed towards you, and will worth your catching were you twenty times an heiress. So I hope you'll mind what you're about, and play your cards well, and make me father-in-law to an end. That's all that I expect of you, my dear—and it's more for your own advantage than mine, when all is said."

He was very much flushed she thought, and his eyes almost starting from his head. Fear seized her, as though some dreadful catastrophe might happen before her eyes. "Papa," she said, with an effort, "this is all very new, and there is so much to think of. Please let it be for to-morrow. There has been so much to me to-night—my head is quite confused, and I don't seem to understand what you say."

"You shall understand what I say, and it is better to be clear about it once for all. Here is the young fellow coming, as I tell you. He would suit me very well, and I mean him to suit you, so let us have no nonsense. If Miss Farrell thinks fit to leave you just when you want her, she is an ungrateful girl—But we'll find another woman. I mean everything to be on a settled footing when these people turn up."

"Papa, of course I will do all I can to please your friends."

"Well, that's the first step," he said. "And it's very much in your own advantage. You would not be my daughter if you did not think of that."

She made no reply. If this was all, she was pleased to hear. If it was anything, she thought, with natural hesitancy. But Mr. Chester was not satisfied. He drew his chair close, so that the odour of his wine and the excitement in his mind seemed to make a haze in the air around.

"And look here, Winnie. I don't want to send Edward Lington away. If he's been a fool in respect to you, and you've been a fool, and so have I, for not putting a stop to it at once. But the fellow knows what's what better than most. And he knows my constitution. I am not going to part with him as a doctor because he's been a presuming prig, and thought himself good enough for my daughter. It's for you to let him see that that's all over. Come, a word as good as a wink."

"I rather," Winnie said—she looked at him piteously, clasping her hands with the unconscious gesture of anguish—"oh! don't take everything from me in a moment," she cried.

"What am I taking from you? I am giving you a fortune, a title probably, a husband far above anything you could have looked for."

"I want no one, papa, but you. Let me take care of you. I will ask for nothing but only to stay at home quietly and make you comfortable."

Mr Chester pushed back his chair noisily with a loud exclamation. "Do you take me for a fool?" he said. "Have I ever asked you to stay at home and make me comfortable? I can make myself comfortable, thank you. What I want is that you should do me credit. Your confounded humility and domesticity and all that, may be very fine in a woman's novel. Taking care of her old father, the sweet girl's remarkable angel, and so forth. Do you think I go in for that sort of rubbish? I can make myself a devoted devil more comfortable than you could ever make me. Come, Winnie, no more of this folly. You can make me father-in-law to a British peer, and that is the sort of comfort I want."

His eyes were red with heat and excitement, the blood boiling in his veins. The girl's spirit was cowed as she looked at him, not by his violence, but by the signs of physical disturbance, which took all power from her. "Oh! papa," she said, "don't say anything more to night. I am very unhappy. I will do anything rather than make you angry, rather than disturb you. Have a little pity upon me, papa, and let me off for to night."

"To night!" he said, "to night ought to be the proudest day of your life. Who could ever have expected that you would be the heiress of Bedloe, a little child of a girl? Most fathers would have married you off to the first comer that would take you and your little bit of fortune. But I have behaved very different. I have made you as good as an eldest son—let that I can't take it all away again, as easily as I gave it, if you don't do your best for me."

He advanced forward a little as he spoke, in his excitement, and Winifred, whose terrified eyes were quite prepared to see him fall down at her feet, rose up hastily, with a little cry. She put out her hands unconsciously to support him. "Oh! papa, I will do what ever you please," she cried.

Mr Chester pushed the outstretched hands away. "You think, perhaps, I want something to steady me," he said. "That's a delusion. I am as steady as you are, and more so, and know quite as well what I am saying. However, as long as you have come to your senses and obey me, that's all I care for. I look here, Winnie," he said, again sitting down suddenly and pushing her back into her chair, "I don't want to be huddled upon you. If old Farrell wants an apology I'll make it—to a certain extent. I meant no offence. She's very useful in her way. She's a lady, I always said so, and she's made you a lady, and I'm grateful to her—more or less. You can say whatever's pretty on my part, or I'll even say a word myself, if you insist upon it. To have her go now would be decidedly awkward. Tell her I meant no offence. I was a little elevated, if you like. You may take away my character, if that will please her," he added, with a laugh. "Say what you like, I can bear it. Getting every thing done as I wished had gone to my head."

"Oh! papa, if you had but wished some thing else! I am not—good enough. I am not—strong enough."

"Hold your tongue. I hope I'm the best judge of my own affairs, her father said. When he yawned largely in her face. "I think I'll go and have my whisky and water. It is getting near bedtime, and I've had an exciting day, what with old Bob, and old Farrell, and you. I've been on the go from morning to night. But you've all got to knock under at the last," he added, nodding his head, "and the sooner the better you'll find, my dear, if you have any sense."

Winifred sat and listened to his heavy step as he went across the hall to the library, and down the long corridor. He seemed to be irregular and heavier than its wont, and it was an effort of self-restraint not to follow him, to see that all was safe. When the door of his room closed behind him, which it did with a louder clang than usual, rousing all the echoes in the silent house, another terror seized her. Shut into that library with no one near him, what might happen? He might fall and die without any one being the wiser, he might call with no one within hearing. She started to her feet, then sat down again trembling, not knowing what to do. She dared say nothing to him of the terror in her mind. She dared not set the servants to watch over him or take them into her confidence—even Hopkins, what could she say to him? But she could not go to her own room, which would be entirely out of the way of either sight or hearing. Sometimes Mr Chester would sit up late, after even Hopkins had gone to bed. The terror in her mind was so great that Winifred watched half the night, leaving the door of the drawing room ajar, and sometimes starting out into the darkness of the hall, at one end of which a feeble light was kept burning. The hours went by very slowly while she thus watched and waited, trembling at all the creakings and rustlings of the night. She forgot the pledge she had given, the new bit that was opening upon her in the midst of these terrors. Visions flitted before her mind, things which she had read in books of dead men sitting motionless, with the morning light coming in upon their pallid faces, or lying where they had fallen till some unthinking servant stumbled in the morning over the ghastly figure. It was long past midnight when the library door opened, and shrinking back into the darkness she saw her father come out with his candle. He had probably fallen asleep in his chair, and the light glowing upon his face showed it pallid and wan after the flush and heat of the evening. He came slowly, she thought unsteadily, along the passages, and climbed the stairs towards his room with an effort. It seemed to her excited imagination almost a miracle when the door of his bedroom closed upon him, and the pale blue-ness of dawn stealing through the high staircase window proved to her that this night of watching was almost past. But what might the morning bring forth?

The morning brought nothing except the ordinary routine of household life at Bedloe. Mr Chester got up at his usual hour, in his usual health. He sent for the doctor, how ever, in the course of the day, partly because he wanted him, partly to see how Winnie would behave. "I have the stomach of an ostrich," he said, "but still that port was a little too much. To drink port with impunity one should drink every day."

"It is a great deal better never to drink it at all," said the doctor, but Mr Chester patted him on the back and assured him that good port was a very good thing, and much better worth drinking than thin claret.

"I believe it is that sour French stuff that takes all the spirit out of you young fellows," he said. Winifred was compelled to be present during this interview. She heard her father give an account to Edward of the expected guests. "You shall come up and dine one evening," he said. "You must make acquaintance with the girl, who may be of use to you. I shouldn't wonder if we had him often about here." To Winifred, looking on, saying nothing but vividly alive to her father's offensive tone of patronage, and to the significance of this intimation, there was torture in every word. But Edward looked at her with an unclouded countenance, and laughingly assured her father that he had known the Earl all his life.

"He is a very good fellow, but he is not very bright," he said.

"He may not be very bright, but he is a peer of the realm, and that is the sort of society that is going to be cultivated at Bedloe. I have had enough of the little people," Mr Chester replied.

Edward Langton laughed with the slightest, but only the very slightest, tinge of colouring in his face. "The little people must take the hint, and disappear," he said.

"But, of course, present company is always excepted. That is nothing to do with you. You're professional, you're indispensable."

Young Langton gave Winifred a look. It was swift as lightning, but it told her more than a volume could have done. The indignation and forbearance and pity that were in it made a whole drama in themselves. "I hope I shall prove myself worthy of the exception in my favour," was all he said.

"I have no doubt you will, you were always one that knew your own place," said Mr Chester.

"Father!" cried Winnie, crimson with shame and indignation.

"Hold your tongue!" he cried, "the doctor knows what I mean, and I know what he means. We want no interference from you."

It was the first trial of the new state of affairs. She had to shake hands with him in her father's presence with nothing but a look to express all the trouble in her mind. But Edward on his part was entirely calm, with a shade of additional colour, but no more. He played his part more thoroughly than she did—upon which, with the usual self-torture of women, a cold thought arose in her that perhaps he was not entirely an assumed part. From every side she had much to hear.

CHAPTER X.

Miss FARRLE did not add ■ her pupil's trouble. When she heard the state of affairs she gave up with noble magnanimity her intention of going away. "You must not ask me ■ meet any one—till the visitors come," she said. "I shall remain to give you what help I can, but you know my rule. When I am treated with rudeness I make no complaint, I take no offence, but I go away."

"You would not have the heart to desert me," Winifred said.

"No, that is not how it is—I have not the heart; but I will take my meals in my room, my dear. Your dear father"—habit was too strong in Miss Farrle's mind even for resentment—"no doubt his meaning was quite innocent but we can't meet again, at all events for the present," she added with much dignity.

"So long as you do not forsake me," cried Winnie, and Miss Farrle, touched, declared "I will never forsake you!" with fervour.

This added an element which was tragicomic to Winifred's distress. With all the grave and terrible things that surrounded her, the misery of her new position, the sense of falsehood in her tacit acceptance of all her father was doing, her fears for him, the dull of alarm of another kind with which Edward's composure filled her, there was something ludicrous in having to provide for Miss Farrle's retirement into her own rooms, and the two different spheres thus established in the house. Perhaps this gave her a little relief in the more serious miseries that were always so near. ■ threw a slight aspect of the fictitious into the sombre air of the house, which seemed charged with trouble.

But in the meantime the preparations went on for the expected guests. Mr. Chester meant that they should be received magnificently. Some ■ the rooms were entirely furnished with a luxury and wealth of upholstery enough to fill even a millionaire with envy. Nothing so fine existed in the county as the two rooms which were being ornamented for the use of the very active-minded and energetic woman who was the young lord's mother. To describe the sensations with which Winifred saw all this is well-nigh impossible. She had been made to consent in consequence of the arguments used by the very man whose interests were assailed. But for Edward she would have refused to be any party to the proposed arrangement—and now she asked herself how far was it to go? Was she to be forced to consent ■ a further proposal were made to her? Was she to be driven to the very church door, in order to avert an evil which began, to her, every day to appear more visionary? Could it be that Edward, Edward himself, who had always been the soul of honour in her eyes, had lent himself ■ the conspiracy against her? Her heart cried out so against the coil of falsehood in which her feet were ■ he caught that lie truly became a misery to her—false to her brothers, false to her father, false to herself. She could not say false to Edward, since ■ was Edward himself who exacted this extraordinary proof of devotion. Every principle in her being rose up against ■ as it went on from day to day. She asked herself whether it was doing a less wrong to her father thus to deceive him by pretended submission than to tell him the truth even at the risk of an illness. And he had not ■ her the least air of being ill. He was a strong man, stronger than almost any other man of his age, more ruddy, more active. Her head swam with the multitude of her thoughts. Winifred's mind was too simple and straightforward to accept that idea of faith unfaithful. It became like a joke of iron upon her shoulders. Mr. Chester grew stronger and more active, and louder and gayer every day, while she faded and shrank visibly, unable to make any head against that sea of troubles that carried her soul away.

The eve of the appointed visit had arrived, and all the preparations were complete. Mr. Chester insisted that his daughter should go with him over all the redecorated rooms to see the effect. "You think perhaps that this is all for my lady's gratification," he said, "that's a mistake. It's for the gratification of Winifred, the new Countess, which she comes home."

"If you mean me, papa——"

"Oh no, of course not, how could I mean you?" cried her father rubbing his hands. "I mean Miss Chester, who is going to marry the Earl. Perhaps you don't know that young lady? She will bring her husband a pretty estate and a pretty bit of money in her apron, and please her father down to the ground."

"But, papa. Oh, I cannot, I cannot deceive you!" It ■ deceiving you even to seem to—even to pretend to——"

"You had better hold your tongue, Winnie," he said sternly. "You had better not go any farther or you may be sorry for it. You should know very well by this time what I am capable of when I'm crossed. But I don't mean to be crossed this time, I can tell you. It would be hard if a man couldn't do what he likes with his own daughter. Go along with you, and don't speak back to me."

But, papa——"

"Go. I tell you before you put me in a passion, her father cried. And Winifred was terrified by the glare in his eyes, and the quick recurring fear that she might harm him took all power from her. She hurried away leaving him to achieve his object solitary by himself. And that afternoon in listening her distant wailing she could not consult Miss Farrell. She would not see Edward. Things had come too far indeed to be talked of or submitted to any other decision than that of her own heart. Once or twice in a hundred times the desire of the crowd, to run away occurred to her. But how could she, think of nothing more, leave her father in the lurch and expose him to all the comments of the recent unfriendly acquaintances whom he thought friends? Winifred was one of those to whom the abandonment of a post was impossible, but such was the confusion of her misery that flight, now or at another moment—flight alone—hopeless, without leaving any trace behind her, seemed to be the only way of escape. At dinner her father seemed to have forgotten her attempt at rebellion. He talked incessantly of the guests, rolling their titles with an enjoyment which was half ludicrous, half pitiful. "You must try and persuade old Durell to show, he said. 'She's very well thought of by all these grandees, and she can talk to them of people they know—besides there's her music. Winnie, that's first rate. I'll come and apologize if she pleases, but we must take care my lady's not dull of an evening, and she must show.' He was in such good spirits that in the evening, with much clucking of his throat and something like a blush, he made her sit down to the piano and accompany him in one of the old songs for which he had been famous before he began to lose the memory of the singing, in an old Chester cathedral. He had the remains of a beautiful voice, and still sang well in the old-fashioned style which he had learned when a boy. To hear him crooning forth these songs, of that period when Moore was monarch, was to Winnie a wonder and portent which took away her very breath. She trembled so in her part of the performance that the piano became inaudible in competition with the fine roll of Mr. Chester's grace-notes. "Why, I thought you could play at least," he said roughly. "I'll have old far rell—she knows what she's about—to-morrow night."

Well, my dear Miss Farrell said, when this conversation was reported to her, "you know what my feelings are, but I am not dull to the credit of the family. Being fully understood what my motive is, I shall certainly appear to-morrow evening, and do my very best to make things go off well. I will play your dear father's and my innocent with the greatest pleasure. He has the remains of a very fine voice, and he has science, too, though it is old-fashioned. So his poor brother George, a beautiful soul, I always wished him to cultivate it. We must do everything Winnie, both you and I to make things go off well. You are not in good spirits, it is true—neither am I—but we must forget that for the credit of the house. And how do you think he is himself?" she added after a pause.

"He looks very well," said Winnie. "I see no signs of illness. Edward—she pressed a little with a faint smile, 'I think I should try Dr. Lington, for I never see him——"

"Oh my dear, don't judge him unjustly!—he thinks that is necessary."

"You all think it is necessary," cried Winnie with a little outburst of feeling, "to make me as unhappy as possible. I mean to say that I think—I hope he is mistaken. I've doctors she said with a smile, "have been much taken before now."

"That is very true," said Miss Farrell gravely, and then she rose and kissed the pale face opposite to her. Anyhow, my dear you and I will do our best for him as long as there are strangers in the house."

Winnie was worn out by the strain of these troubled days, and by the self-controversy that had been going on within her. She fell asleep early in profound exhaustion. The sleep of forces overruled and burst abruptly with trouble. She was so idly in the early dawn of the morning, while is yet every thing was in confusion. What had she heard, or if it was any external incident at all that had done so. He could not tell at first. It seemed a trill and vibration in the pale air. Was it the early twittering which had begun faintly among the thick foliage outside? She listened, raising up in her bed, with an intensity for which there seemed no reason, for no definite alarm occurred to her mind. Every thing was still, not a sound audible but those first faint chirpings, interlusive, tentative from the trees. She was about to compose herself to rest again, when suddenly there sounded ringing through the silence the sound of a bell, a little angry, impatient jingle repeated, tearing the stillness. Winifred was too much startled and confused to realise what it was, but she got up hastily and, throwing her dressing-gown round her, opened her door to hear better. The thought that came first to her mind was, that the summons was at the door, and that it meant one of the boys coming home. Her heart leaped to her throat with excitement. The boys had come home at all sorts of hours in the time which was past, but now what could this summons be? It came again while she stood trembling, wondering; and then, with a cry, Winifred flew along the corridor. Mr Chester's room was in the wing at some distance from the other sleeping rooms of the house. Everything was silent, an atmosphere of profound sleep, calm tranquillity in the dim air, through which the night-lamp in the hall below burned with a ward glimmer. The blueness of the dawn in its faint pervasion seemed more ghostly than the night. As Winifred hurried along another door opened with a hasty sound, and old Hopkins stumbled forth. "What is it, Miss Winifred?" She had no breath to reply. She put him before her, trembling as they reached Mr Chester's door. She was troubled by the thoughts of what she might see. But there was nothing that was terrible to see. A voice came out of the curtains querulous, with an outburst of abuse at old Hopkins, who never could be made to hear "Send for Langton," Mr. Chester said. "It's the middle of the night, please sir," old Hopkins replied. "Send for Langton," repeated the voice. It had a curious stammer in it, a sibilant sound. "S—S—Send for Langton," with another torrent of exclamations. The old butler hurried out of the room, muttering to himself, "It will be half an hour before I can wake one of those grooms, and he'll take the skin off me before that. Miss Winifred, oh, it's only the doctor he wants, it's nothing out of the common!"

"I will go," she said.

"You! But it's the middle of the night, and not a soul awake."

"Is he very ill? Tell me the truth. I will be quicker than any one else."

"Miss Winifred, you've no call to be frightened. He's been the same fifty times. He don't want the doctor no more than I do. Oh, goodness, there he is at it again!"

Then the bell sent a wild, irritated peal into the air, which evidently ended abruptly at the breaking of the bell rope.

"I will go!" Winifred said, and the old man, relieved, hurried back to his master. She put on quickly a long ulster, which covered her from head to foot, and hurried out into the strange coolness and freshness of the unawakened world. There was no need, she said to herself, but it was a relief and almost pleasure. The great stillness, the feeling of the dawn, the faint blue-tinted atmosphere, a something which came before the light, all breathed peace about her. It was like a disembodied world, another state of existence in which nothing real or tangible was. She flew along, the only creature moving save those too early questioning birds, and felt in herself a curious elevation above mortal boundaries, as if she too was disembodied and could move like a spirit. The strange abstractedness of the atmosphere, the keen yet soft coolness, the unimaginable solitude possessed her like a vision. She felt no sensation of anxiety or fear, but seemed carried along upon her errand like a creature of the air, unfamiliar with the emotions of the world. As it happened, Langton's groom was already preparing his master's horse for some early visit. He stared at Winifred as if she had dropped from the skies, but made no remark, except that his master would be ready instantly; and she turned back through the sleeping village, still wrapped in the same abstraction, walking along as in a dream. One labourer setting out to work at distant fields passed, and stared dumb and awe-stricken at her, as if she had been a ghost. He was the only figure save her own that was visible. When she was half way home, a dwarf galloped past, waving his hand to her as he hastened on. For her part, Winifred felt that there was no longer any need to hurry. She wandered on under the trees, where now all the birds were awake, chatting to each other—forming their little plans for the endless August day, the age of sunshine and sweet air before them, now that night once more was over—before they began to sing. She was unspeakably calmed, consoled, rested by that universal tranquillity. The dew fell upon her very heart. She lingered to look at a hundred things which she had seen every day all her life, which she had never noticed before. It was not sunrise as yet, the world was still a land of dreams, waiting the revelation of the reality to come. Thus it was some time before she reached the house, and yet she was surprised when she reached it, having got so far away from that centre of human life with all its thrummings, into the great quiet of the morning world.

Something, an indefinable disturbance, a change of a kind which made itself felt, was in the place. The door stood wide open, a scared groom was walking Longton's horse up and down, the windows were still closed, except one, at which two or three indistinct figures seemed looking out. There rose a flutter, she could not tell why, in Winifred's breast. She almost smiled at herself for the involuntary sensation which marked her return from a world of visions to that of real life. Then Edward Langton appeared coming out, as if to meet her in the open door.

CHAPTER XI

EDWARD came out to meet her, and took her hand and drew it through his arm. He led her in tenderly, holding that hand in his, without a vestige of the reserve and restraint in which they had been living of late. Winifred was greatly surprised. She drew away her hand, half-angry, half-astonished. "Why is this?" she said. "Is it because it is so early that you forget—?"

"It is but now there is no longer any need of precaution, he said very gravely, pressing her arm close to his side.

She gazed at him with an incapacity to understand, which would have been incredible did it not happen so often at the crises of life. "I don't know what you mean, nothing is changed," she said. "But you have not come to talk of you and me. I would, how is my father?" She asked the question with scarcely a fear. Then suddenly looked in his face, flung his support from her, and was up and gone without a word.

The door of his father's room was closed. She rushed at it breathless. It was half-opened after a little interval, by old Hopkin, who burst the entrance. "You can't come—yet, Miss Winifred, not yet," he was whispering, his head. Hopkin was full of the solemn importance and excitement of one who has suddenly become an actor in a great event. He closed the door upon her as he entered it. There she stood, gazing at it blankly, her brain swimming, her heart beating. That door had closed not only upon her father's death, but upon a completed chapter of her own life.

Edward had hurried up stairs after her, and was now close by to console her. But she would not give him her hand, which he sought. She walked before him to the door of her own sitting-room, which stood wide open, with an early glow of the newly risen sun showing from the open windows. Then she sat down and motioned him to a chair, but not beside her. A more woeful countenance never haunted the most beloved of fathers. Her dark outer garment was wet with dew, and clung closely about her, her hair had a few drops of the same dew clinging upon it, her face was entirely destitute of colour. "Tell me how it is," she said.

"It was as I told you it would be. We must be thankful that no act of ours, no contribution of our, quickened the catastrophe. He was in perfectly good spirits last night. I hear. By the time I arrived all was over. Winifred—"

"Oh, do not touch me!" she said. "We deceived him we lied to him! if not in word yet in deeds. And now you are glad that he is dead."

"Not glad," said the young man.

"Not, 'lad' and I?" she cried with an exclamation of despair.

"Winnie, do not make yourself more miserable than you need be. You are not glad. And you will reproach your self and be wretched for many a day, without reason. I declare before Heaven without reason. Winnie! All that you have done has been for his sake. And there is nothing for which you can justly blame yourself. All that has been done has been a merit on your part." He came to her side and put his arm round her to comfort her. But his touch was colder than he could bear. She put out her hand and put it away. He looked at her earnestly without saying anything, and then asked, with a little bitterness, "Do you mean to get me off then Winnie? Leave me alone? If I shall?"

"Oh I know! I shall give you her hand, 'don't you want of yet a little? I cannot tell you what I am—now I feel not now. To be sure as while he lived and the moment—the very moment he died—"

She rose up and began to walk about the room in a feverish misery which was more like personal despair than the grief of a child for a father, very miserable even because of the very sense of deliverance which it had with the anguish. The painful interview was broken by the knock into the room of Mrs. Furrell, her white locks all disordered about her pretty old head, stumbling over her long, dressing gown, and throwing herself with tears and curses upon Winifred's shoulder. "Oh, my darling, your dear father! Oh my child, come—me and let me comfort you!" she said. Edward Langton withdrew without a word. There were a thousand ways in which he could serve Winifred.

without insisting upon the office of comforter, which indeed he gave up with a pang yet heroically. A man when he strikes a sacrifice, perhaps does it more entirely, more silently than a woman. He made no stand for his rights, but gave up without a word and went forth to the external matters which there was no one but he to manage. Mr. Chester had died, his young physician had known he would do. He had forgotten the rules of life which had been prescribed to him in his triumph and satisfaction on the previous night. He had said to himself "Soul, take thine ease, and the catastrophe had been as prompt as that of the parable. The alarmed and startled household was all up and about by this time, the minds huddled in a corner discussing the dreadful event and comparing notes, now all was over as to their respective apprehensions and judgment of mister's looks. The men were huddled about, sometimes paying a brief attention to their ordinary work but lost he mightily going up and down the tower Mr. Hopkins wanted nothing, or if something, new to report could be gleaned anywhere. Dr. Langton took command of the household with instant authority, unknown to him a new interest in the bosoms of the household, removed. He was the new master, they all felt some with a desire to oppose him, some to sympathize. He cut off the forms with a sort of savage pleasure to the household and the other expected it and he summoned Mr. Binton who was the official authority, under whose directions all arrangements had to be taken. Dr. Langton had no idea of his place, it was in part to be own rights, my mother then had my sense of guilt in regard to the dead man, out of consideration for who he had temporarily ignored them. He had decided to return to his previous life, Chester's death in this, but now that she was over with it, my life to my own, he did not deny that the relief was great. He even to Winifred, whose actions of all reproach were so poignant, the matter was not missed while it was relieved by a sense of deliverance, too.

When she came alone to herself she insisted that her brothers should be telegraphed for instantly. This was before Mr. Lington's arrival, and it is possible that Edward would have objected had he been able to do so. He was not entirely above consideration of his own interests, and he had believed that Mr. Chester from his point of view had not behaved unwisely, nor even perhaps unkindly in sending his sons away. That Winifred should relinquish all the advantages which her father's will had secured cost him perhaps a pang. It would not have been unpleasant to Edward Lington to find himself master of the house. He knew he would have filled the post faster than either of the two thoughtless and unsentimental young men who then father himself had sent off, and who probably would sell him before the year was out. For his own part he should have liked to compromise, to give to each of them a sufficient compensation and keep the estate, and rejoice in the fact that the old name that had been associated with it so long that he should have had this dwelling, his safety before him and yet have obeyed her wishes and sent off the estate, and said much for his self-interest. He knew that Mr. Lington when he came would probably have objected strongly to such a proceeding, and with reason. The doctor saw all the elements of it as he rode into the little town to carry out Winifred's instructions. The two brothers would hurry home each with the conviction that he was the heir, and the disappointment would tell on him. He decided to come to him with the very objection that in his own mind he did not all the more to carry out Winifred's wish. He was not disappointed as she was. He did not feel any real affection to her brother. He thought them much more sympathetic to the other side of the world than he had ever found them near. And there were few things he would not have done in his hour to secure Edward. All the arguments he never made it necessary that he should come out to him or delay what he would do this with him put in the uncertainty whether he entirely approved or not. Afterwards when they were in a midwife he might have a more definite word to say. He telegraphed not only to George and Tom, but also to the father, that in any case he should be provided for their return, and have done so, but he was with a mind full of anxiety, the sense of deliverance of which he felt it had been full of deliverance over with this skin return of the complications and evil arrangements of life.

Mr. Lington did not arrive till next day and he looked very grave when he heard what had been done. "Of what use is it?" he said, "the poor young fellows will find them else out of it altogether. They will come thinking that the inheritance is theirs, and there is not a penny for them. Why did not you wait till I came?"

"I should have preferred to do so," said

Langton, "but at such a moment Miss Chester's wish was above all."

"Miss Chester's wish?" said the lawyer with a doubtful glance. "Perhaps you think Miss Chester can do what she pleases? Poor thing, it is very natural she should wish to do something for her brothers. But what if he were making a mistake?"

"If you mean that after all the money is not in his hands—"

Langton with a slight change of colour.

"Before we go further I ought to know—perhaps her father's death has brought about some change—between her and you."

"No change at all. We were pledged to each other two years ago without any objection from him. I cannot say that he ever gave me formal consent."

"But it was all broken off. I heard as much from him. By mutual consent."

"It was never broken off—I saw what was coming, and I remained perfectly quiet on the subject, and advised Miss Chester to do the same."

"Ah! and he was taken in?" the lawyer said.

"I have brought the colour to Langton's face."

"I am not aware that there was any taking in in the case. I knew that agitation was dangerous for him. It was better for us to wait it out than to have the self-reproach afterwards. This was all true, yet it was unbearable to my."

"I see," said Mr. Babington, "a warning game does not always recommend itself to the lookers-on, Dr. Langton. It might have lasted for years."

"I did not think," said Langton hastily, "that it could have lasted for weeks. He has lived longer than I expected."

"And you were there at one side of him and his daughter at the other, waiting. I think I'd rather not have my daughter engaged to a doctor, meaning no disrespect to you."

"It sounds like something more than disrespect," said Langton with offence. "It you think I did not do my duty by my patient—"

"Oh no, I don't think that, but I think you will be disappointed. Dr. Langton, I don't quite see why you have sent for the boys. If the one was for your interest, the other was dead against it. It is a disagreeable business altogether. If they were to set up a plea against you of undue influence—"

"I think," said Langton, "that this is not a subject to be discussed between us. You know very well that my influence with Mr. Chester was—"

"About the same as every other man's, and that was nothing at all," said the lawyer with a laugh. "It is unseemly to laugh in a house all draped and shrouded in mourning, and the sound seemed to produce a little stir of horror in the silent place, all the more that Winifred came in at the moment, as white as a spectre, in her black dress. Her look of astonished reproach made the lawyer in his turn change countenance."

"I beg your pardon, Miss Winifred. I beg you a thousand pardons. It was not my fault. I assure you it was in very sober earnest. My dear young lady, I need not say how shocked I was and distressed—"

The sudden change of aspect, the gloom which came over Mr. Babington's cheerful countenance, would have been more comical than melancholy to an unconcerned spectator, but Winifred accepted it without criticism. She said, "Did you know how ill he was?" with tears in her eyes.

"I—well, I cannot say that I thought he was strong, but I see he like this is always unexpected. In the midst of life—" said Mr. Babington solemnly. "But here he caught Langton's eye and was silenced. "I hear you have sent for your brothers."

"Oh, at once! What could I do else? I am sure that he would have wished me to do it."

Mr. Babington shook his head. "I don't think he would have wished it. Miss Winifred, I don't think they would care to come if they knew the property is all left away from them."

"He said it was left to me. But what could that be for? only to be given back to them," said Winifred with a faint smile. "My father knew very well what I should do. He will know now, and I know that he will approve, she said with that exaltation which the warm body and excited soul attain by turns, a kind of ecstasy. "Even, she cried, if he did not see what was best in this life he will see it now."

Mr. Babington looked on with a blank countenance. He did not realize easily the instant conversion of the man he knew so well to his her views. He could not indeed conceive of Mr. Chester at all except in the most ordinary human conditions, but he knew that it was right to speak and think in an exalted manner of those whom death had removed. "We will hope so," he said, "but in the meantime, my dear young lady, you will find he has made it very difficult for you, as he had not then attained ■ those enlightened views. Couldst thou send another telegram? They're expensive, but in the circumstances—

"We have made up our minds, and Winifred with a certain solemnity 'do you know what we had to do, Mr Babington?
We had ■ deceive him, to pretend that I would do as he wished. Oh Edward I cannot bear to think of it. I never said it
■ so many words. I did not exactly tell a lie, but I let him suppose— I wonder—do you think he knows what I say? surely he knows, and here worn out as she was the tears which had been so near her eyes burst forth.

Langton brought her a chair and made her sit down and soothed her, but his face was blank like that of the lawyer who was altogether taken at rack by this sudden spiritualising of his old friend.

'I dare say it will all come right, Mr
Babington said.

CHAPTER VII

MR BABINGTON remained in the house, or at least returned to it constantly, giving most of his time there till the funeral was over, after which he read the will to the little company consisting, only of Winifred, Edward and Miss Lorrill who remained in the house. It was a will which excited much agitation and distress and awoke very different sentiments ■ the minds of the two who were chiefly concerned. Winifred received its stipulations like so many blows, while in the mind of her lover they roused a sort of involuntary elation, an ambition and eagerness of which he had not been hitherto sensible. The condition under which Winifred inherited her father's fortune was that she was not to divide or share it with her brothers, that Mr Chester had meant to tell many other bonis and directions which would have left her without any free loan of individual action ■ all matters of little, but this one stipulation had been appended at once to the will and was not to be avoided or ignored. In case she attempted to divide or share her inheritance or alienate any part of ■ she was to forfeit the whole. No latitude was allowed to her in power of compromise. This information crushed Winifred's courage and spirits altogether. It made the gloom of the moment tenfold darker, and subdued in her the rising tide of life. That tide had begun to rise involuntarily even in the first week, while the windows were still shrouded and the house full of crape and darkness. She had shed these few natural tears, which are all that in many cases the best parents have ■ look for and though moved 13 times with a compunction equally natural was yet prepared to dry them and go on to the sunshine that awaited her and the setting of all things right which had seemed ■ her the chief object in life. But when she saw this great barrier standing up before her, and knew that her brothers were both on their way hoping great things ■ be met on their arrival only by this impossibility her heart failed her altogether. She had no courage to meet the situation. She felt ill, worn out by the agitations of the previous period and the blink despair of this, and for a time turned away from the light and would not be comforted.

Upon Edward Langton a very different effect was produced. While Winifred's heart sank in her bosom his rose with a boundless exultation in his eye. What he saw before him was something so entirely unhopful for, so unthought of that it was no wonder if it turned his heart, as the vulgar say. Mr Chester, who had retained the property of his undertakings in their moment of need, unrighteously as he believed it lying upon them necessaries seemed to him now, with all the force of a dead hand, to thrust compensation upon him. It was not to Winifred but to him that the fortune seemed ■ be given.
That this was the reverse of the testator's intention that he had meant something totally different, did not affect Langton's mind. It gave him even in a delusion of satisfaction the jewels of gold and of silver borrowed from his Egyptian master might live satisfied the mind of a fierce Hebrew, defrauded for a lifetime of the recompense of his toil.
The mill-mill's plunder by gun which had been extracted from the sweat of other men was to return into the hands of one of the family, at least of which he had taken advantage. For once the revenges of time were fully just and satisfactory. He thought about his gun work and visited his poor patients with this elation in his mind, instinctively making notes as to things which he would have done and improvements made.
Mr Chester, who had the practical interest of a man whose first thought has always been to make money had, indeed, done a great deal for the cause, but he had spent nothing neither thought nor money, upon the condition of the poor, for whom he cared much less than for their cattle. Langton's interests were strong in the other way. He thought of sanitary miracles to be performed, of disease to be extirpated, of wholesome houses and wholesome faces in the little clusters of human habitations that were dotted here and there round the enclosure of the park. Inferior minds take these pleasures in different ways. He was not dull to the delights of a well preserved cover, but with a more lively impulse he anticipated a grand battue of snells and muskams, drains of stagnant ponds, and destruction to all quies and fevers which haunted the miasmatic country. This idea blended with the intense subdued pleasure of anticipation with which he thought of the estate returning to the old name, and himself to the house of his father; there was nothing noble in the vision that filled his mind. Perhaps, according to the sentiment of romance, it would have been a more lofty position had he endured tortures from the idea of owing this elevation to his marriage, or even had he refused, at the cost of her happiness and his own, to accept so much from his wife, but Langton was of a robust kind and not easily affected by those prejudices, which after all are not very respectful to women. He would have married Winifred with nothing. Why should he with her from her? He had much? So far as this went he accepted the good fortune which she came about to bring him without a question, with a satisfaction which told him which being a child had not been the better of the choice, but it should be the better for him.

And if there came over him a little chill occasionally when he thought of the two helples people whom he depended on, was the secret from his distant quarters full of hopes which were never to be realized. Langton found it possible to join them side out of his mind, it is always possible to put aside unpleasant subjects. Sometimes there would come over him a chill less momentary when he thought that Winifred might hold her decision on this subject crossed his path. But she was a child, very easily influenced, not the sort of a woman to cast her die. She had yielded to him in respect to her father even when the course of conduct he recommended had been odious to her. That she should have felt so strongly on the subject had seemed somewhat ridiculous to him at the time, but notwithstanding she had yielded to his better judgment and had followed the directions he had given her. And there did not seem any reason to believe that she would not do the same again. She was of a very tender nature, poor Winifred! She could not bear to hurt any one. It was not to be expected, probably it was not even to be desired, that the real advantages of this arrangement should strike her as they did himself. She had a natural clinging to her brothers. She declined to see them in their true light. ■ was terrible to her ■ profit by their ruin. But Langton, though acknowledging all this, could not conceive the possibility that Winifred would actually resist his guidance and follow her own conclusions. She could not do it. She would do as he indicated, though ■ might cost her some tears, and perhaps a struggle with herself, tears which Langton was fully in the mind to repay by such love and care when she was his wife as would banish her sorrowward all tears from her eyes. Like so many other clever persons, he did at his own in the meantime. He was aware that the position in which she was placed, the thought of the future, lay at the bottom of her illness, and even that until the constant irritation thus caused was withdrawn or neutralized her mind would not recover its tone. At least he would have been fully aware of this had his patient been any other than Winifred. She was suffering no doubt, he allowed, but by and by she would get over it, the disturbing influence would wear itself out, and all would be well.

And in the meantime there were moments of sweetness for both in the ■ civil that followed. As Winifred recovered slowly, the subduing influence of bodily weakness hushed her cares. For the moment she could do nothing, and, and as is the way, it was so soothing to have the company and sympathy and care of her lover, that she, too, just as if all disturbing influences, and almost succeeded while he was with her in forgetting. Inactively she was aware that on this point her mind and hers would not be in accord — on every other point they were one, and she listened to the suggestions he made as ■ improvements and alterations with that sensation of pleasure inevitable which arises in a woman's mind when the man whom she loves shows himself at his best. He had too much discretion and good feeling to do more than suggest these beneficial changes, and above all he never betrayed the vision in his own views and intention in his own mind to carry them out himself. But from her sofa, or from the terrace, where presently she was able ■ walk with the support of his arm, Winifred listened to his description of all that could be done, and looked at the little sketch he would make of improved houses, and new ways of effectual succour to the poor, with a pleasure which was more near what we may you can help. Remember there is George to come."

"I will have to say what there is to say at once, I dread. Oh, how could I keep them in suspense?"

"But you must think a little, for my sake, of yourself, dear."

She shook her head, and looked at him wistfully. "It is not I that have to be thought of, it is the boys that I have to think of. Oh, poor boys! how am I to tell them?" she cried.

And he went away with no further explanation. He could not ask in so many words, What do you intend to say to them? And yet he had made up his mind so completely what ought to be said. He said to himself as he went down the avenue that he had been a fool, that it was false delicacy on his part not to have had a full explanation of her intentions. But on the other hand how could he suggest a mode of action to her? There was but one way—they must understand that she could not sacrifice herself for their sakes.

CHAPTER XIII.

WINIFRED scarcely slept all that night. She had enough to think of. Her entire life hung in the balance. And, indeed, that was not all, for there remained the doubtful possibility that she might deprive herself of everything without doing any good by her sacrifice. The necessity to be falsely true seemed, once having been taken up, to pursue her everywhere. Unless she could find some way of accomplishing her duty, and frustrating her father's will, while she seemed to be executing it, she would be incapable of doing anything for her brothers, and would either be compelled to accept an unjust advantage over them, or give up everything in her own favour without advantaging them. She lay still in the darkness and thought and thought over this great problem, but came no nearer to any solution. And she was separated even from her usual counsellors in this great emergency. In respect to Edward, she divined his wishes with a pungent speakable, yet excused him to herself with a hundred tender apologies. It was not that he was capable of wronging any one, but he felt—who could help feeling it?—that he would go better in his hands. She, too, felt it. She said to herself, he would be better for Bedloe, better for the people, that he, through her, should reign, instead of George or Tom, who, if they did well at all, would do well for themselves only, and who, up to this time, even in that had failed. To give it over to two bad or indifferent masters, careless of everything, save what it produced; or to place it under the care of a wise and thoughtful master, who would consider the true advantage of all concerned; who, she asked herself, could hesitate as to which was best? But, though he would be best, it would be founded on wrong, and would be impossible. Impossible! that was the only word. She was in no position to abolish the ordinary laws of nature, and act upon her own judgment of what was best. It was impossible, whatever good might result from it, that she should build her own happiness upon the ruin of her brothers. Even Mrs Farrell did not take the same view of the subject. She had wept over the dethronement of the brothers, but she could not consent to Winifred's renunciation of all things for their sake. "You can always make it up to them," she had said, reiterating the words, without explaining how this was to be done. How was it to be done? Winifred tried very hard through all to respect her father. She tried to think that he had only exposed her to a severe trial to prove her strength. She thought that now at least, even if never before, he must be enlightened, he must watch her with those "larger, other eyes than ours," with which natural piety endows all who have passed away, whether bad or good. Even if he had not intended well at the time he must know better now. But how was she to do it? How succeed in thwarting yet obeying him? The problem was beyond her powers, and the hours would not stop to give her time to consider it. They flowed on, slow, yet following each other in a ceaseless current, and the morning broke, which was to bring her perplexities to some sort of issue, though what she did not know.

Tom arrived by the early morning train. He also had not slept much in the night, and his eyes were red, and his face pale. He was tremulous with excitement, not unmingled with anxiety, but an air of triumph over all, and elation scarcely controlled, gave a certain wildness to his aspect, almost like intoxication. It was an intoxication of the spirit, however, and not anything else, though as he leapt out of the dog cart and made a rush up the steps, Winifred, standing there to meet him, almost shrank from the careless embrace he gave her. "Well, Win, and so here we are back again," he said. He had no great reason, perhaps, to be touched by his father's death. It brought him back from unwilling work, it gave him back (he thought) the wealth and luxury which he loved, it restored him to all that had been taken from him. Why should he be sorry? And yet at the moment of returning to his father's house ■ seemed to his sister that some natural thought of the father, who had not always been harsh, should have touched his heart. But Tom did not show any consciousness of what nature and good feeling required, which was after all, as Winifred reflected next moment, better, perhaps, as being more true than any pretence at fictitious feeling. He gave nods of acknowledgement, half boisterous, half condescending, to the servants as he passed through the hall ■ the dining room, which stood open, with the table prepared for breakfast. He laughed at the sight, and pointed to his sister. "It was supper you had waiting for me the first time I was here," he said with a laugh, and went in before her, and threw himself down in the large easy chair, which was the seat Mr. Chester had always occupied. Probably Tom forgot, and meant nothing, but old Hopkins hastened to thrust another cloth to the table, indicating it with a wave of his hand.

"Here, sir, this is your place, sir," the old butler said.

"I am very comfortable where I am," cried Tom. "That's enough, Hopkins, bring the breakfast." Hopkins explained to the other servants when he left the room that Mr. Tom was excited. "And no wonder, considering all that's happened," he said.

"Well," repeated Tom, when he and his sister were left alone, "so here we are again. You thought it was for good when I went away, Winnie."

"I thought ■ would be—for a longer time, Tom."

"You thought it was for good, but you might have known better. The poor old governor thought better of it at the last?"

"I don't think that he changed—his opinion," Winifred said, hesitating, afraid to carry on the deception, afraid to undecieve him, tired and excited as he was.

"Well," said Tom, addressing himself to the good things on the breakfast table, "whatever his opinion was it don't matter much now, for here I am, at all events, and that horrible episode of New Zealand over. It didn't last very long, thank Heaven!"

It was, perhaps, only because the conversation was so difficult that she asked him then suddenly whether, perhaps, on the way he had seen anything of George.

"Of George?" Tom put down his knife and fork and stared at her. "How, in the name of Heaven, could I see anything of George—on my way home?"

"I—don't know, Tom. I am not clear about the geography. I thought perhaps you might have come by the same ship."

"By the same ship?" It was only by degrees that he took ■ what she meant. Then he thrust back his chair from the table and exclaimed, "What! is George coming too?" in a tone full of disgust and dismay.

"I sent for him at the same time," she replied, in spite of herself, in a tone of apology. "How could I leave him out?"

"You sent for him?" said Tom with evident relief. "Then I think you did a very silly thing, Winnie. Why should he come here, such an expensive journey, stopping his work and everything? Some one told me he was getting on very well out there."

"I thought it indispensable that he should come back, that we should all meet ■ arrange everything."

"To arrange everything!" There was a sort of compassionate impatience in Tom's tone. "I suppose that is how women judge," he said. "What can there be to arrange? You may be sure the governor had it all set down clear enough in black and white. And now you will have disturbed the poor beggar's mind all for nothing: for he is sure to build upon it, and think there's something for him. I hope, at least, you made that point clear."

"Tom, if you would, but listen to me! There is no point clear. I felt that I must see you both, and talk it all over, and that we must decide among us—"

"You take a great deal upon you, Winnie," said Tom. "You have got spoilt, I think. What is there to decide about? The thing that vexes me is for George's own sake. That you might like to see him, and give him a little holiday, that's no harm; and I suppose you mean to make it up to him out of your own little money, though I should think Langton would have a word to say on that subject. But how do you know what ridiculous ideas you may put into the poor beggar's head? He may think that the governor has altered his will again. He is sure to think something that's absurd. If it's not too late it would be charity ■ telegraph again and tell him it was not worth his while."

"Tom," said Winifred, faltering, "he ■ our brother, and he is the eldest. Whatever my father's will was, do you think ■ would be right to leave him out?"

"Oh! that is what you are after!" said

THE PRODIGALS AND THEIR INHERITANCE

Tom "to work upon me, and get me to do something for him." You may as well understand once for all that I'll be no party to changing the governor's will—I'd not have him charged poor old gentleman in his grave."

He had risen up from the table full of angry decision, pushing his chair away, while Winifred sat weak and helpless, more bewildered at every word, and gazing at him, not knowing how to reply.

"He was a man of great sense, was the governor," said Tom. "He was a better judge of character than either you or I. To be sure he made a little mistake that time about me, but it hasn't done me any harm, and I wouldn't be the one to bring it up against him. And I'll be no party to changing his will. If you bring George here it is upon your own responsibility. He need not look for anything from me."

"Tom, I don't ask anything from you, but don't you think—oh! it is not your heart that now that you know what it is to suffer understand yourself?"

"That's all sentimental nonsense," said Tom lightly. He went to the fireplace and warmed himself, for there is always a certain thrill in excitement. Then he returned to the table to finish his breakfast. He had a feverish appetite, and the meal served to keep in check the fire of excitation and restlessness in his veins. After a few minutes hence he looked up with a hurried question.

"Birmingham has been sent for to meet me, I suppose?"

"He is coming on Monday. We did not think you could arrive before Monday, and I expected perhaps by that time—"

"Always George!" he said with an angry frown.

"Always both of you, Tom. We are only three in the world, and to whom can I turn but to my brothers to advise me? Oh! listen a little! I want you to know every thing, to judge every thing, and then to tell me—"

"It was natural enough, perhaps, that Tom should think of her personal concerns. "Oh! see," he said, "you and Iington don't hit it off, Winnie? But it's a difficult question. Well, I'm not much of a match for you. No doubt you could do much better for yourself, but that's not enough to tell George for, from the antipodes. I'll advise you to the best of my ability. If you mean to trust for advice to George—"

"It is not about myself," said Winifred. "Oh! Tom, how am I to tell you? I cannot find the words—my father—oh! listen to me for a little—don't go away!"

"You say anything—to make me think badly of the governor, I will never forgive you, Winnie!" he said. His face grew pale and then almost black with gloom and excitement. "I've been travelling all night," he added. "I want a bath, and to make myself comfortable. It's too soon to begin about your business. Where have you put me? In the old room, I suppose?"

"All your things have been put there," replied Winifred. It was a relief to escape from the explanation, and yet a disappointment. He turned away without looking at her.

"Oh, all right! there is plenty of time to change when I have made up my mind which I like best," he said.

CHAPTER XIV.

GEORGE arrived by the next mail. He did not travel all night, but came in the evening, driving up the avenue with a good deal of noise and commotion, with two flies from the station carrying him and the two children and the luggage they brought, in addition to the brougham which had been sent out of respect to the lady. She occupied it by herself, for it was a small carriage and she was a large woman, and thus was the first to arrive, stumbling out with a huge cage in her hand containing a pair of unhappy birds with drooping feathers and melancholy hearts. She would not allow any one to take them from her hand but stumbled up the steps with them, and thrust them on Winnie, who had come out to the door to receive her brother, but who did not at first realise who this was. "Here, take 'em," said Mrs. George, "they're for you, and they've been that troublesome! I've done nothing but look after them all the voyage. I suppose you're Winnie," she added, putting with a momentary doubt.

"I hope you are not very tired," Winifred said with that uncertainty which extreme surprise and confusion gives. She took the cage, which was heavy, and set it on a table.

"And George—where is George?" she said.

"Oh, George is coming fast enough, he's in the first fly with the childrer. But you don't look at what I've brought you. They're the true love birds, the prettiest things in the world. I brought them all the way myself. I trusted them to nobody. George said you would think a deal of them."

"So I shall—when I have time to think. He was very kind," said Winnie. "Oh, George!" She ran down to meet him as he stepped out with a child in his arm. George was not fat, like his wife, but careworn and spare. "How do you do, Winnie?" he said, taking her outstretched hand. "Will you mind taking the baby till I get George and the things out of the fly?"

The baby was a fat baby, and like his mother. He gazed at her with a placid aspect and did not cry. There was something in his eyes in the situation which Winifred faintly perceived, though everything was so serious. George was not like the long-lost brother of some time. He had shaken hands with her as if he had parted from her yesterday. He scarcely cast a glance at the horse to which he was coming back but turned quickly to the fly and lifted out first a little fat boy and then, then true I after pured with a lightly anxious but quite business-like demeanour.

The maid and the boxes came round to the other door, and, pushing various things in to every rail, I suppose I am I will use things to be brought up later. Winnie? Now George, come along. There's mamma waiting. He did not other to take the baby which was a serious weight upon Winnie's slight shoulders but looked with a stern grave rather than at his progeny.

He quite agreed with you, he said with pleased surprise. There was nothing in the act of his return home but he did I suppose much. Look at the baby how good he is with Winnie. I told you the children would take to her directly.

"Well, I suppose it is only in the child I look to you now, and I'll say I'll take the baby to I'll take it to him, in the fly to I'll take the baby given I am hardly a minute.

"It was very kind," said Winnie, "but the children must come first. That's the way don't you remember to of it? Bring them with the baby."

I don't believe I know my name, or perhaps she's proud, and won't call me by it, George."

Winnie proud? I look how good the baby is with her," said George.

They discussed Winifred thus, walking on either side of her, while she tottered under the weight of the big baby, from which neither dreamt of relieving her. Winifred began to feel a nervous necessity to laugh, which she could not control. She drew a chair near the fire for her sister-in-law, and put down the good-humoured baby, in whose contact there seemed something consolatory, though he was very heavy, on the rug. "I should like to give the other one a kiss," she said— "the George too?—before I give you some tea."

"Yes I would like my tea," said Mrs. George. "I'm really tired after that long journey. Have you seen the Lizzy and the boxes, George? Were they a good passage upon the whole? but I shall never make a good sailor if I were to make the voyage every year. Some people can never get over it. Don't you think, Miss Winnie, that you could tell that old gentleman to bring the birds in here?"

"Is it old Hopkins?" said George. "How do you Hopkins? There is a cage with some birds—"

"I hope I see you well, sir?" said the old butler. "I'm glad I've lived to see you come home. And then two little gentlemen, sir, they're the first little grandsons? and wouldn't master have been pleased to see them? Hopkins had been growing feeble ever since his master's death, and how I a proximity to him, which he had never dared to indulge before."

Well, I think he might have been," said George with a dubious tone. But his mind was not open to sentiment. "They might have a little bread and butter, don't you think? it would not hurt them, and a cup of milk."

No, George, said his wife, "it would not hurt them."

Do you think it would spoil their tea? I am sure Winnie would not mind them having, then I'll have with us, the first evening, and then Lizzy might put them to bed."

Lizzy has got my things, I look to, said Mr. George. "The boxes being put out a little with a new piece, and all that household of crumbs. I shouldn't keep up half of them, when once we have settled down and see how we are going to fit in."

"Some one must put the children to bed," said George with an anxious countenance. His conversation was carried on without any apparent consciousness of Winnie's presence who, what with pouring out tea and making brand with the children, did her best to supply the place of spectator with becoming unconsciousness. Here, however, she was suddenly called into the discussion.

"Oh Winnie," said her brother, "no doubt you've got a man or woman one who knows a little about children who could put them to bed."

"It is in old coddlie about the children," said Mrs. George, "the children will take no harm. Lizzy must see to me first, if I'm to come down to dinner as you'd wish me to."

But George ■ the greatest old coddle." She ran into a little ripple of laughter as she spoke, which was fat and pleasant. Her form was soft and round, and prettily coloured, though her features, if she had ever possessed any, were much blunted and rounded into indistinctness. A sister is, perhaps, a severe judge under such circumstances: yet Winifred was relieved and softened by the new arrival. She made haste to offer the services of her maid, or even her own, if need were. The house was turned entirely upside down by this arrival. The two babies sent a thrill of excitement through all the female part of the house, from Miss Farrell downwards: and old Hopkins was known to have wept in the pantry over the two little grandsons, whom master would have been so proud to see. Winifred alone felt her task grow heavier and heavier. The very innocence and helplessness of the party whom she had thus taken ■ hand, and whom, after all, she was likely to have so little power to help went to her heart. She was not fitted to play the part of Providence. And certain looks exchanged between George and his wife, and a few chance words, had made her heart sick. They had pointed out to each other how this and that could be changed. "The rooms in the wing would be best for the nurseries," George had said: and "There's just the place for you to practise your violin," his wife had added. They looked about them with a serene and satisfied conscious new (though George was always anxious) that they were taking possession of their own house. Winifred felt as she came back into the hall, where Mrs. George's present was still standing the cage with the two miserable birds, laying their drooping heads together, that this unhappiness was more hard to deal with than even Fome's discontent and sullen anger. She felt that she had collected elements of mischief together with which she was quite unable ■ deal: and stood in the midst of them discouraged miserable feeling, herself disapproved and unsupported. Not even Edward stood by her. Edward, least of all, whose want of sympathy she felt to her soul, though it had never been put into words. And Miss Farrell's attempts to make the best were almost worse than disapproval. She was entirely alone with those contending elements, and what was she to do?

Tom had chosen to be absent when his brother arrived, he did not appear even at dinner, to which Mrs. George descended, to the surprise of the ladies, decked in smiles and in an elaborate evening dress, which (had they but known) she had spent all the spare time on the voyage in preparing out of the one black silk which had been the pride of her heart. She had shoulders and arms which were worth showing had they not been a trifle too fat, so white and rosy, so round and dimpled. She made a little apology to Winifred for the absence of crape. "It was such a hurry," she said, "to get away at once George would not lose a day, and I wouldn't let him ■ without me, and such things as that are not ■ be got on a ship," she added with a laugh. Mrs. George's aspect, indeed, did not suggest crape or gloom in any way.

"No, I wouldn't let him come without me," she continued while they sat at dinner. "I couldn't take the charge of the children without him to help me, and then I thought he might be put upon if he came to take possession all alone. I didn't know that Miss Winnie was as nice as she is, and would stand his friend."

"She is very nice," said Miss Farrell, to whom this remark was addressed, looking across the table at her pupil with eyes that glistered, though there was laughter in them. The sight of this pair, and especially of the wife with her innocence and good humour had been very consoling to the old lady. And she was anxious to awaken in Winifred a sense of the humour of the situation to relieve her more serious thoughts.

"But then I had never seen her," said Mrs. George, "and it is so natural to think your husband's sister will be nasty when she thinks herself a cut above the like of you. I thought she might brew up a peck of troubles for George and make things twice as hard."

"I wish you wouldn't talk so much," her husband said under his breath.

"Why shouldn't I talk? I'm only saying what's agreeable. I am saying I never thought she would be so nice. I thought she might stand in George's way. I am sure ■ might make any one nasty that was likely to marry and have children of her own, to see every thing going past her to a brother that had behaved like George has done and taken his own way."

This innocent conversation went on till Winifred felt her part become more and more intolerable. Her paleness, her hesitating replies, and anxious air at last caught George's attention though he had little ■ spare for his sister. "Have you been ill, Winnie?" he said abruptly, as he followed them into the drawing room when dinner was over.

"Yes, George," she put her hand on his may all go. Yes, my dear, you have fainted, that is all. Some girls are always doing it; but it never happened to you before, and it ought to be a proof to you, Winnie, that you are only mortal after all, and can't do more than you can."

Winnifred smiled as best she could in the face of her old friend. "I did not know I could be so foolish," she said, "but it is all over now. Dear Miss Farrell, leave me with them. There is something I must say."

"Oh, put it off till to-morrow," said Mrs. George; "whether you've been our enemy or not, you are only a bit of a girl, and it can't hurt to wait till to-morrow. I know what nerves are myself, I've always been a dreadful sufferer. A dead faint like that, it is very frightening to other people. Don't send the old lady away."

"I am going to stay with you, Winnie—unless you will be advised by me, and by Mrs. George, who has a kind heart, I am sure she has, and go to bed."

Winnifred placed herself in a deep easy-chair which gave her at least a physical support. She gave her hand to Miss Farrell, who stood by her, and turned to the brothers, who were still looking on uneasily, half-conscious that it was their fault, half-distant of her and all that she could say. She lifted her eyes to them, in that moment of weakness and uncertainty before the world settled back into its place. Even their faces for a little while were but part of a phantasmagoria that moved and trembled in the air round her. She felt herself as in a dream, seeing not only what was before her, but many a visionary scene behind. She had been the youngest, she had always yielded to the boys, and as they stood before her thus, though with so few features of the young playfellows and tyrants to whom all her life she had been more or less subject, it became more and more impossible to her to assume the different to which an ill fate had laid upon her. As she looked at them, so many scenes came back. They had been fond of her and good to her in their way, when she was a child. She suddenly remembered how George used to carry her up and down stairs when she was recovering from the fever which was the great event in her childish life, and in how many rides and rows she had been Tom's companion, grateful above measure for his notice. These facts with a hundred trivial incidents which she had forgotten rushed back upon her mind. "Boys," she said, and then paused, her eyes growing clearer and clearer, but tears getting into her voice.

"Come, Winnie," said George, "Tom and I are a little too old for that."

"You will never be too old for that to me," she said. "Oh! you would but look a little kind as you used to do! It was against my will and my prayers that it was left to me. I said that I would not accept it, that I would never, never, take what was yours. I never deceived him in that. Oh, boys! do you think it is not terrible for me to be put into your place, even for a moment? And that is not the worst. I thought when I sent for you that I could give it you back, that it would all be easy, but there is more to tell you."

They looked at her, each in his different way. Tom suddenly from under his eye brows, George with his care worn look, anxious to get to an end of it, consult with his wife what they were to do, but neither said a word.

"After," she said with difficulty, struggling against the rising in his throat, "after—it was found that I could not give it you back. I did so, I too was to lose everything. Oh! wait, wait, till I have done! What am I to do? I put it in your hands. If I try to give you any part it is lost to us all three. What am I to do? I can take no advice from any but you. What I wish is to restore everything to you, but if I attempt to do so all is lost. What am I to do? What am I to do?"

"Winnie, what you will do is to make yourself ill in the meantime."

"What does it matter," she cried wildly, "if I were to die I suppose it would go to them as my heirs."

The blank faces round her had no pity in them for Winnie. They were for the moment too deeply engrossed with the news which they had just heard. Miss Farrell alone stooped over her, and stood by her holding her hand. Mrs. George, who had been listening, bewildered, unable to divine what all this could mean, broke the silence with a cry. "She don't say a word to George. Is there nothing for George? I don't know what you mean, all about giving and not giving—it's our right. George, ain't it our right?"

"There are no rights in our family," said George, "but I don't know what means any more than you."

Here Tom stepped forward into the midst of the group, lifting his sullen eyebrows. "I know what means," he said. "It is easy enough to tell what means. If she takes you in, she can't take me in. I saw how things were going long ago. First one was got out of the house and then another, but she was always there saying what she pleased getting over the old man. Do you think if he had been in his right senses he would have driven away his sons, and put a girl over our heads? I'll tell you what," he said with a sullen, "I am not going to stand ■ if you are." She was there always at one side of him and the doctor at the other. The daughter and the doctor and nobody else. Every one knows how a doctor can work upon your nerves, and a woman that ■ always nursing you, making herself sweet. It there ever was undue influence that it is. And I don't mean to stand ■ for one."

George was not enraged like his brother. He looked from one to another with his anxious eyes. "If you don't stand it, what can you do?" he said.

"I mean ■■■■■■ to trial I mean ■■■■■■ take it into court. There isn't a jury in England but would ■■■■■■ in our favour," said Tom. "I know a little about the law. It ■■■■■■ the bluest case I ever knew. The doctor, Lanyon ■■■■■■ to win ■■■■■■ He has put her up ■■■■■■ I don't blame her so much. He has ■■■■■■ behind her mind, a cat's paw of her. Oh I've found out all about ■■■■■■ He belongs to the old family that ■■■■■■ to own Little ■■■■■■ but ■■■■■■ on this ever ■■■■■■ we came here. The governor was very sharp," said Tom, "he was not ■■■■■■ to be beaten in the common way. But the doctor or she was always handy, that came ■■■■■■ and ■■■■■■ that cured him—the first time ■■■■■■ and ■■■■■■ only."

Tom in his fury had not observed, nor had any of his men, the opening of the door behind the quiet entry into the room of a new comer, who arrested by the words he heard, had stood there listening to what Tom said. At the moment he advanced quickly up the long room. "You think perhaps, that I killed him—the second time?" he said, confronting the previous speaker. Winifred rose from her chair with a low cry, and came to his side putting her arm through his.

'Edward' Edward! he does not know what he is saying, she cried.

The other pair had stood bewildered during all this, Mrs. George, raving with her pretty red lips apart, her husband, always careworn, looking anxiously from one face to another. When she saw Winnie's sudden movement, Mrs. George copied it in a way. She was cowed by the appearance of the doctor, who was so evidently a gentleman, one of those superior beings for whom she returned the tax and a portion of her youth. 'Oh, George, come to bed don't mix your self up with none of this, don't get yourself into trouble!' she cried, doing what she could to drag him away.

"Let alone Alice," he said, disengaging himself. "I suppose you are Dr. Martin. My brother couldn't meet that, but if things are as he says it's rather a bad case."

A fever of excitement, restrained by the habit of self command, and making little appearance, had risen in Langton's veins.

Wounded, he cried with the calm of passion, "you have been breaking your heart to find out a way of serving your brother. You see how they receive it. Hence now you are not able to deal with them, and leave me to

She was clinging to him with both hands clasped, his arm, very weak she 'en both in body and mind, longing for quietness and rest but she shook her head, looking up with pathetic smile in his face. No, Edward she said

"No," he looked at her, not to let her himself. She had never resisted him before, even when his demands were not repugnant to her. And his passionate effort to possession of him. "In that case, he said perhaps it is that ought to with draw and allow your father to secure me of every thing in the way of money."

"Oh, I heard, don't make it harder! It is hard upon us all, both them and I. It is desperate the position we are in. I can't endure it and I they cannot endure it. What are we to do?"

'Nor can I endure it,' he said. 'I cannot contest the will. It is the lot of us, but in that case they cannot remain under your roof.'

Who give you the right to dictate what we are to do?' cried John who was ■■■ himself with passion. 'This is my father's house, not your. It is my sisters, if you like but not yours. Wanda, let that fellow go, what has he got to do be with you? I tell him go away, he has got nothing ■■■ here

"You're of that opinion too?" Langton said turning to her with a pale smile. "Perfectly. I came to look after Miss Chester's health not to disturb a family party."

Edward! Manifested cried the name he gave her went to her heart He had detached himself from her hold, he would not see the hand which she held out ■ him His ear was deaf to her voice She had deserted him, he said to himself. She had brought insult upon him, and an atrocious accusation, and she had not resented it, showed no indignation, rejected his help, prepared to smooth over and conciliate the miserable cad who had permitted himself to do this thing. Beneath all this blaze of passion, there was no doubt also the bitterness of disappointment with which he saw the destruction of those hopes which ■ had been foolishly entertaining, allowing himself to cherish, although he knew all the difficulties in the way. He saw and felt that right or wrong she would give all away, that Bedloe was farther from him than ever it had been. He loved Winifred, it was not for Bedloe he had sought her, but everything surged up together at this moment in a vision of mortification, resentment and shame. She had not maintained his cause, she had refused his intervention, she had allowed these intruders ■ regard him as taking more upon him than she would allow, claiming an authority she would not grant. He neither looked at her, nor listened to the call which she repeated with a cry that might have moved a savage. A man humiliated, hurt in his pride, is worse than a savage. "I take care of her," he said, wringing Miss Farrell's hand as he passed her, and without another look or word went away.

Winifred standing, following with her eyes, with consternation unspeakable, his departing figure, felt the strength ebb out of her as he disappeared. But yet there was relief in his departure, too. A woman has often many pangs to bear between her husband and her family. She has to endure and maintain often the authority which she does not acknowledge, which in her right he assumes over them, which is a still greater offence to her than ■ them, and an instinctive sense that her lover should not have any power over her brothers was strong in her notwithstanding her love. Her agitated heart returned after a moment's pause to the problem which was no nearer solution than before. She said softly, "All that I can do for your sake I will do, whatever I may suffer. There is one thing I will not do, and that is defend myself or him. If you do not know that neither I nor he have done anything against you it is not for me to say it. It is hard, very hard for us all. If you will advise with me like friends what to do, I shall be very, very thankful, but if not you must do what you will, and I will do what I can, and there is no more to say."

The interruption, though it had been hard to bear, had done her good. She went back to her chair, and leant back, letting her head rest on good Miss Farrell's faithful shoulder. A kind of desperation had come to her. She had sent her lover away, and nothing remained for her, but only this forlorn duty. "Edward will not come back," she said in Miss Farrell's ear.

"To-morrow, my darling, to-morrow," the old lady said, with tears in her eyes.

Winifred shook her head. No one could deceive her any more. She seemed to have come to that farthest edge of life on which everything becomes plain. After a while she withdrew, leaving the others to their consultation, they had been excited by Edward's coming, but they were cowed by his going away. ■ seemed to bring to all a strange realisation, such as people so often reach through the eyes of others, of the real state of their affairs.

CHAPTER XVI.

ENOUGH had been done and said that night. They remained together for some time in the drawing-room, having the outside aspect of a family party, but separated as indeed family parties often are. Winifred, very pale, with the feeling of exhaustion both bodily and mental, sat for a time in her chair, Miss Farrell close to her, holding her hand. They said nothing to each other, but from time to time the old lady would bend over her pupil with a kiss of consolation, or press between her own and the thin hand she held. She said nothing, and Winifred, indeed, was incapable of intercourse more articulate. On the other side of the fireplace George and his wife sat together whispering and consulting. She was very eager, he care worn and doubtful, as was his nature. Sometimes he would shake his head, saying, "No, Alice," or "It is not possible." Sometimes her eager whispering came to an articulate word. Their anxious discussion, the close union of two beings whose interests were one, the life and expectation and anxiety in their looks, made a curious contrast ■ the exhaustion of Winnie lying back in her chair, and the sullen loneliness of Tom, who sat in the centre in front of the fire, receiving its full blaze upon him in a sort of ostentatious resentment and sullenness, though his hand over his eyes concealed the thought in his face. The only sound was the whispering of Mrs. George, and the occasional low word with which her husband replied. Further no communication passed between the different members of this strange party. They sepa-

And what does it mean, Winnie rated after a time with faint good nights, Mrs. George eager, indeed, to maintain the forms of civility, but the brothers each in his way withdrawing with little show of friendship. After this, Winifred too went up stairs. Her heart was very full.

"Did you ever," she said to her companion, "feel a temptation to run away, to bear no more?"

"Yes, I have felt it, but no one can run away. Where could we go that our duty would not follow us? It is shorter to do it anyhow at first hand."

"Is it so?" said Winifred with a forlorn look from the window into the night where the stars were shining, and the late moon rising. "Oh, that I had the wings of a dove—I don't think I ever understood before what that meant."

"And what does it mean, Winnie? The dove flies home, not into the wilds, which is what you are thinking of."

"That is true," said the girl, "and I have no home, except with you. I have still you——"

"He will come back to-morrow," Miss Farrell said.

"No, he will not come back. They insulted him, and I—did not want him. That is true. I did not want him. I wanted none of his advice. I preferred to be left to do what I had to do myself. That is true, Miss Farrell. Can a man ever forgive that? It would have been natural that he should have done everything for me, and instead of that—Are not these all great mysteries?" said Winifred after a pause. "A woman should not be able to do so. She should put herself into the hands of her husband. Am I unwomanly? You used to frighten me with the word, but I could not do it. I did not want him. My heart rose against his interference. If I knew that he felt so to me, I—I should be wounded to death. And yet—— It was so—it is quite true. I think ■ will never forgive me."

"It is a mystery, Winnie. I don't know how it is. When you are married everything changes, or so people say. But love forgives everything, dear."

"Not that," Winifred said.

She sat by her fire when her friend left her in a state of mind which it is impossible ■ describe in words. ■ was despair. Despair is generally tragical and embittered, and perhaps that passion is more easy to bear with the excitement that belongs ■ it than the quiet consciousness that one has come to a dead pause in one's life, and that neither on one side or the other is there any outlet. Winifred was perfectly calm and still. She sat amid all the comfort of her chamber, gazing dimly into the cheerful fire. She was rich. She was highly esteemed. She had many friends. And yet she had come to a pass when everything failed her. Her brothers stood hostile about her, feeling her with justice to ■ their supplanter, to stand in their way. Her lover ■ left her, feeling with justice that she wronged his love and rejected his aid. With justice—that was the sting. To be misunderstood is terrible, yet it is a thing that can be surmounted; but to be guilty, whether by any fault of yours, whether by terrible complication of events, whether by the constitution of your mind, which is the worst of all, this is despair. And there was no way of deliverance. She could not make over her undivided wealth to her brothers, which had at first seemed to be so easy a way, and also, far worse, far deeper, far more terrible, she could not make Edward see how she could put him away from her, yet love him. She felt herself to sit alone, as if upon a pinnacle of solitude, regarding all around and seeing no point from which there could come any help. ■ is seldom that the soul is thus overwhelmed on all sides. When one hope fails, another dawns upon the horizon, rarely, rarely is there no aid near. But to Winifred it seemed that everything was gone from her. Her lover and friends stood aloof. Her life was cut off. To liberate every one and turn evil into good, the thing best ■ be done seemed that she should die. But she knew that of all aspirations in the world that is the most futile. Death does not come ■ the call of misery. Those who would die live on. Those who would live are stricken in the midst of their happiness. Perhaps to a more cheerful and buoyant nature the crisis would have been less terrible, but to her it seemed that everything was over, and life came to a stand still. She was baffled and fouled in all that she wished, and that which she did not desire was forced upon her. There seemed no strength left in her to fight against all the adverse forces around. Her heart failed altogether, and she felt in herself no power even to meet them, to begin again the discussion, to hear again, perhaps, the baseless threat which had driven Edward away. Ah, it was not that which had driven him away. It was she herself who had been the cause, she who had not wanted him, who even now in the bitterness of the loss, which seemed to her as if it must be for ever, still felt a faint relief in the thought that at least no conflict between his will and hers would embitter the crisis, and that she should be left undisturbed ■ do for her brothers all that could be done, alone.

Next day she was so shaken and worn out with the experiences of that terrible evening, that she kept her room and saw no one, save Miss Farrell. Edward made no appearance, he did not even inquire for her, and till the evening when Mr. Babington arrived, Winifred saw no one. The state of the house, in which George and his family held a sort of encampment on one side, and Tom a hostile position on the other, was a very strange one. There was a certain forlorn yet tragicomic separation between them. Even in the dining-room, where they sat at table together, Mrs. George kept nervously at one end, as far apart as she could place herself from her brother-in-law. The few words that were interchanged between the brothers she did everything in her power to interrupt or stop. She kept George by her side, occupied him with the children, watched over him with a sort of unquiet care. Tom had assumed his father's place at the foot of the table before the others perceived what that meant. They estranged themselves at the head, George and his wife together talking to each other in low voices while there was no one with whom Tom could make up a faction. The servants walked with strange looks from the one end to the other, serving the two groups who were separated by the white stretch of flower-decorated table. Old Hopkins groaned, yet so reported the matter that the company in the housekeeper's room shook their heads with mirth. "It was for all the world like one of them big hotels as I've been to many a time with mister. Two lots, with a scoff and a scowl for everything that each other did." Notwithstanding this disunion, however, the two brothers had several conference in the course of the day. They had a common interest though they thus pitted themselves against each other. It was Tom who was the chief spokesman in this almost stealthy interview. Tom was so sore and resentful against his sister that he was willing to make common cause with George against her.

"If it is as she says," he said, "there's no jury in England but would find undue influence, and perhaps incapacity for managing his own affairs. We have the strongest case I ever heard of."

"I don't believe you'll get a jury against Winnie," said George, shaking his head.

"Why shouldn't we get a jury against Winnie? She has stolen into my place and your place, and set the governor against me."

"Perhaps she has," said George, "but you won't get a jury against her."

"Why not? There is no man in the world that would say otherwise than that ours was a hard case."

"Oh, yes, it is a very hard case, but you would not get a jury against Winnie," George repeated with that admirable form of passive resistance and incapacity for understanding which is beyond all argument.

This was what they talked of when they walked up and down the conservatory together in the afternoon. Tom was eager, George doubtful, but yet they were more or less of accord on this subject. It was a hard case. No one would say otherwise, and though George could not in his heart get himself to believe that any argument would secure a verdict against Winnie, yet it was a case it was evident, in which something ought to be done, and he began to walk to town's certainty. When Mr. Balmington arrived they both met him with a certain expectation.

"We can't stand this, you know," said Tom. "It is not in nature to suppose that we could stand it."

"Oh, can't you?" Mr. Balmington said.

"Tom thinks," his brother explained in his slow way, "that there has been undue influence."

"The poor old governor must have been going off his head. It is as clear as daylight he never could have made such a will if he hadn't been off his head, and Winnie and this doctor one on each side of him. Such a will can never stand," said Tom.

"But I say he'll never get a jury against Winnie," said George with his anxious eyes fixed on Mr. Balmington's face.

The lawyer listened to this till they had done and then he said, "Oh, that is what you think," and burst into a peal of laughter. "Your father was the sort of person, don't you think to be made to do what he didn't want to do? I don't think I should give much for your chance if that is what you build upon. I live laugh more than all the serious in the world took the courage out of Tom and George had never had any courage. They listened with countenance much cast down to Mr. Balmington's narrative of their father's proceedings, and of how Winnie was bound, and how Mr. Chester had intended to bind her. They neither of them were clever enough to remark that there were some points upon which he gave them no information, though he seemed so certain and explicit. But they were both completely lowered and subdued after an hour of his society, recognising, for the first time the desperate condition of affairs.

That evening when Winnie, weary of her day's seclusion, sick at heart, felt her own predictions coming true, and to realise that Edward had let the day pass without a word, was sitting sadly in her dressing gown before her fire, there came a knock softly on her door, late in the evening, when the household in general had gone to bed. She turned round with a little start and exclamation, and her surprise was not lessened when she perceived that her visitor was Tom. He came in with scarcely a word, and drew a chair near her, and sat down in front of the fire.

THE PRODIGALS: AND THEIR INHERITANCE.

CHAPTER XVII.

THERE is, among the members of many families, a frank familiarity which dispenses with all those forms which keep life on a level of courtesy with persons not related to each other. Tom did not think necessary ask his sister how she was, or to show any anxiety about her health. He drew his chair forward and seated himself near her, without any formulas. "You know how to make yourself comfortable," he said, with a glance round the room, which indeed was very luxuriously furnished, like the rest of the house, and with some taste, which was Winifred's own. The tone in which he spoke conveyed a subtle intimation that Winifred made herself comfortable at his expense, but he did not say so in words. He stretched out his feet towards the fire. Perhaps he found it a little difficult to come to the point.

"I am sorry," said Winifred, "to have been shut up here. If I had been stronger—but you must remember I have had an illness, Tom—and to find that you were both against me—"

"Oh, it doesn't matter about that," said Tom with a wave of his hand. Then, after a pause, "In that you're mistaken, Winnie. I'm not against you. A fellow could not but be disappointed to find what a different position he was in, after the telegram and all. But when one comes to hear all about it, I'm not against you. I'm rather—though perhaps you won't believe me—on your side."

"Oh, Tom!" cried Winifred, laying her hand upon his arm, "I am too glad to believe you. If you will only stand by me, Tom—"

"Oh, yes," he said, "I'll stand by you, I've been thinking over since last night. You want some one to be on your side, Winnie. When I saw the air of— But never mind, I have been thinking it all over and I am on your side."

"If that is so, I shall be able to bear almost anything," said Winifred faintly.

"You will have George to bear and his wife. They say women never can put up with other women. And, good heavens, to think that for a creature like that, he should have stood out and lost his chances with the governor! I never was a fool in that way, Winnie. If I went wrong, it was for nobody else's sake, but to please myself. I should never have let a girl stand in my way—not even pretty, except in a poor sort of style, and fat at that age," here Tom made a brief pause. "But of course you know I shall want something to live on," he said.

"I know that you shall have everything that I can give you," Winifred cried.

"Ah! but that's easier said than done. We must not run against the will, that is clear. I've been thinking it over, as I tell you, and my idea is that after a little time, when you have taken possession and got out of Mr. Babington's hands and all that, you must make me a present as it were. Of course your sense of justice will make me a handsome present, Winnie."

"You shall have half, Tom. I have always meant you should have half."

"Half!" he said. "It's rather poor, you'll allow, to have to come down to that after fully making up one's mind that one was to have everything!"

"But, Tom, you would not have left George out—you would not have had the heart."

"Oh, the heart!" said Tom. "I shouldn't have stood upon ceremony, Winnie, and besides, I always had more respect for the poor old governor than any of you. It suits my book that you should go against him, but I shouldn't have done it, had it been me. Well, half! I suppose that's fair enough. You couldn't be expected to do more. But you must be very cautious how you do it, you know. It's awfully unbusiness like, and would have made the governor mad to think of. You must just get the actual money, sell out, or realise, or whatever they call it, and give it to me. Nothing that requires any papers or settlements or anything. You will have to get the actual money and give it me. You had better do it at different times, fifty thousand now, and fifty thousand then. It will feel awfully queer getting so much money actually in one's hand, but nice," Tom added, with a little laugh. He got up and stood with his back to the fire, looking down upon her. "Nice in its way, if one could forget that it ought to have been so much more."

"Tom, you will be careful and not spend too much. You will not throw it all away?"

"Catch me!" he said. "I'll tell you what I mean to do, Winnie. I'll be on the Stock Exchange. The governor's old friends will lend me a hand, thinking mine a hard case, as it is. And then it's easy to make them believe I've been lucky, or inherit (I believe I do) the governor's head for business. It would be droll if some of us hadn't got that, and I am sure it's neither George nor you. Well, then, that's settled, Winnie. It will be easy to find out from Babington what the half is. A precious big figure, I don't doubt," he added, with a triumph which for the moment he forgot to disguise. Then he added after a moment in a more indifferent tone, "There is no telling what may happen when a man is once launched. If you give me your share to work the markets with, you can do anything on the Stock Exchange with a lot of money. I'll double your money for you in a year or two, which will be as good as giving it all back."

"I don't know anything about the Stock Exchange, Tom, only don't lose your money speculating."

"Oh, trust me for that!" he said. "I tell you I am the one that has got the governor's head." Then it seemed to strike him for the first time that it would not be amiss to show some regard for his sister. He brought his hand down somewhat heavily on her shoulder, which made her start violently.

"Come," he said, "you must not be down-hearted, Win. If I was a little natty at first, can't you understand that? And now I've made up my mind — it, there's nothing to look so grave about. I'll stand by you whatever happens."

"Thank you, Tom," she said faintly.

"You needn't thank me, it's I that ought to thank you, I suppose. I might have known you would behave well, for you always did behave well, Winnie. And look here, you must not make yourself unhappy about every body as you do. George, for instance, I would be very careful of what I gave him if I were you. Let them go out to their own place again, they will be far better there than here. And don't give them too much money, enough to buy a bit of land and when the boys are big enough to help him to work it, he'll do very well." This prudent advice Tom delivered as he strolled, pausing now and then at the end of a sentence, towards the door. He was perhaps not very sure that ■ was advice that would commend itself to Winnie, or that it came with any force from his mouth nevertheless he had a sort of conviction, which was not without reason, that ■ was sensible advice. "By-the-by," he added, turning short round and standing in the half dark in the part of the room which was not illuminated by the lamp, "by-the-by, I suppose you will have to sell Bedloe, before you can settle with me?"

"Sell Bedloe!" Winnie was startled out of the quiescence with which she had received Tom's other proposals. "Why should there be any occasion to do that, Tom?"

"My dear," he said with a sort of amiable impatience, "how ignorant you are of business! Don't you see that before you halve everything with me as you promise, the property must be realized? I mean to say, if you don't understand the word, sold. That is the very first step."

"Sell Bedloe!" she repeated. "Dear Tom, that is the very last thing my father would have consented to do. Oh, no, I cannot sell Bedloe. He hoped it was to descend to his children, and his name remain in the county, he intended——"

"Do you think he intended to preserve the name of the Langtons in the county, Winnie? You can't be such a fool as that. And as I suppose your children, when you have them, will be Langtons, not Chesters——"

She interrupted him eagerly, her face covered with a painful flush. "I am going to carry out my father's will against his will, Tom, and, oh, I feel sure where he is now he will forgive me. He has heirs of his own name, I mean them to have Bedloe. Where he is he knows better," she said with emotion, "he will understand, he will not be angry. Bedloe must be for George."

Tom came forward close to her, within the light of the lamp, with his lowering face. "I always knew you were a fool, but not such a fool as that, Winnie. Bedloe for George! a fellow that has degraded his family, marrying a woman that—why even Hopkins is better than she is, they wouldn't have her at table in the housekeeper's room. I thought you were a lady yourself, I thought you knew—why Bedloe, Winnie!" he seized her by the arm, "if you do this you will show yourself an utter idiot, without any common sense, not to be trusted. If you don't sell Bedloe, how are you to pay me?" he cried, with an honest conviction that in saying this his righteous indignation had reached its climax, and there was nothing more to say.

"Tom," said Winnie, "leave me for to-might. I am not capable of anything more to-night. Don't you feel some pity for me," she cried, "left alone with no one to help me?"

But how was he to understand this cry which escaped from her without any will of hers?

"To help you? whom do you want ■ help you? I should have helped you if you had shown any sense. Bedloe to George! Then it is the half of the money only that is ■ be for me? Oh, thank you for nothing, Miss Winnie, if you think I am ■ be put off with that. Look here, I came to you thinking you meant well, to show you a way out of it. But I've got a true respect for the governor's will, if no one else has. Don't you know that for years and years he had cut George out of it altogether, and that it was just Bedloe—Bedloe above everything, that he was not to have?"

Winifred shrank and trembled as if it were she who was the criminal. "Yes," she said almost under her breath, "I know, but, Tom, think. He is the eldest, he has children who have done no wrong."

"I don't think anything about it," said Tom. "The governor cut him out, and what reason have you got for giving him what was taken from him? What can you say for yourself? that's what I want to know."

"Tom," said Winifred, trembling, with tears in her eyes, "there are the children, little George, who is called after my father, who is the real heir. His heart would have melted, I am sure it would, if he had seen the children."

"Oh, the children! that woman's children, and the image of her! Can't you find a better reason than that?"

"Tom," said Winifred again, "my father is dead, he is no thing now in a different light. Oh, what is everything on the earth, poor little of property in hand, in comparison with right and justice? Do you think they don't know better and wish if they could to remedy what has been wrong here?"

"I don't know what you mean by they," said Tom suddenly. "If you mean the governor, we don't know anything about him whether—whether it's all right you know, or if—" here he paused for an appropriate word, but not finding one, cried out as with an intention of cutting short the subject, "That's all rubbish! I'll tell you what I'll do. If you go on with this folly, to drag the governor's name through the mud, by Jove, I'll tell Babington. I'll put him up to what you're after. Against my own interest! What do I care? I'll tell Babington, by Jove! to spite you if nothing more!"

"I think you will kill me," cried Winifred, at the end of her patience, "and that would be the easiest of all, for you would be my hurt, George and you."

He stared at her for a moment as if weighing the suggestion, then saying resentfully, "Always George," turned and left her, shutting the door violently behind him. The noise echoed through the house, which was all silent and asleep, and Winifred very lonely, deserted on all sides, leaned back in her chair and cried to herself silently, in prostration of misery and weakness. What was she to do? to whom was she to turn?

She had nobody ■ stand by her. There was nothing but a blank and silence on every side wherever she could turn.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THIS interview did not calm the nerves of the agitated girl or bring her soothing or sleep. It was almost morning before the calm of exhaustion came, hushing the thoughts in her troubled brain and the pulses in her tired body. She slept without comfort, almost without unconsciousness, carrying her cares along with her, and when she awoke suddenly to an unusual sound by her bedside, could scarcely make up her mind that she had been asleep at all, and believed ■ first that the little babbling voice close to her ear was part of a feverish dream. She started up in her bed, and saw on the carpet close to her the little three year-old boy, a small, square figure with very large wide-open blue eyes, who was altogether new to her experience, and whom she only identified after a moment's astonished consideration as little George, her brother's child. The first clear idea that flashed across her mind was that, as Tom said, he was "the image of his mother," not a Chester at all, or like any of her family, but the picture, in little, of the very overblown beauty of George's wife. This sensation checked in Winifred's mind mechanically, without any will of hers, the natural impulse of tenderness towards the child, who, staring at her with his round eyes, had been making ineffectual pulls at the counterpane, and calling at intervals "Auntie Winnie!" in a frightened and reluctant tone. Little George had "got on" very well with his newly found relative on the night of his arrival, but to see an unknown lady in bed, with long hair flaming her pale face, and that look of sleep which simulates death, had much disturbed the little boy. He fulfilled his avowal with much faltering bravery, but he did not like it; and when the white lady with the brown hair started up suddenly, he recoiled with a cry which was very nearly a wail. She recovered and came to herself sooner than he did, and smiling held out a hand to him. "Little George, ■ it you? Come, then, and tell me what ■ is," she said.

Here the baby recoiled a step farther, and stared with still larger eyes, his mouth open ready to cry again, the tears rising, his little person drawn together with that instinctive dread of some attack which seems natural ■ the helpless. Winnie stretched out her arm to him with a smile of invitation. "Come to me, little man, come to me," she cried.

Tears came to her eyes too and a softening in her heart. The little creature belonged to her after a fashion, he was her own flesh and blood. He was innocent, not struggling for gain. She did not ask how he came there, nor notice the straining of his eyes to something behind which may need yet terrify him. She was too glad to feel the untroubled sense of pleasure to win her bonds. "It is true I am your aunt Winnie. Come George, don't be afraid of me. Come, for I love you, she said.

Half attracted, half fired by the influence behind, which was to Winnie invisible, the child made a shy step towards the bed. "O send George away," he murmured. "O send George back to his ship. Mamma! by George I do not like him." She leant towards him, holding out arms in which the child saw a refuge from the imperative signs which were being addressed to him from behind the bed. He came forward slowly with his little tottering steps, his big eyes full of inquiry, wonder, and suspicion. "O take care of George?" he said, with a little whimper that went to Winnie's heart, then suffered himself to be drawn into her arms. The touch of the infant's little hands to her "Yes, dear, she said, with ten in her eye as far as I can and with all my heart I will take care of George." It was a vow made, not to the infant who had so comprehension, but to Heaven and his own heart.

But there was some one else who heard and understood after her fashion. As Winnie said these words with a fervour beyond description, a sudden running fire of soba broke forth behind the head of her bed. Then with a rush and sweep something heavy and soft fell down by her side, almost crushing George, who began to cry with fright and wonder. "Oh, Miss Winnie! God bless you! I knew that was what you would say," cried Miss George, clasping Winnie's arm with both her hands, and laying down her wet, soft cheek upon it. "He thought not," he said we should have to go back again in that dreadful ship, but oh, bless you! I knew you weren't one of that kind."

"Is it you, Mrs. George?" said Winnie faintly. The sudden apparition of the mother gave her a shock, and she began to perceive that the little scene was melodramatic, got up to excite her feelings. She drew back a little coldly, but the baby gazing at her between his bursts of crying, and pressing closer and closer to her shoulder, frightened by his mother's onslaught, was no actor. She began to feel after a moment that the mother herself, crying volubly like a school-girl, and clatching her arm as if it were that of a giant, was, if an actor, so very simple an actor, with devices so transparent and an object so little concealed, that moral indignation was completely misplaced against her artless wiles, and that nature was far stronger in her than guile. In the first revulsion she spoke coldly, but after a moment, with a truer might. Strid up, she said "Don't cry so. Get a chair and come and sit by me. You must not sit on your knees to me."

"Oh! but that I will," cried Mrs. George, "as if you were the Queen, Miss Winnie for you have got our lives in your hands. Look at that poor little fellow, who is your own flesh and blood. Oh will you listen to what worldly folks say and send him away to be brought up as if he was nobody, and him your own flesh and just heir?—oh! I don't mean that. It appears he's got no rights, though I always thought—the eldest son's eldest son! But no! I don't say that George! I loved himself annoying me, and if he lost his place for that, ain't it more than ever my duty to do what I can for him? And I don't make no claim. I don't talk about rights. You've got the right, Miss Winnie, and there's an end of it. Whoever opposes, it will never be George and me. But oh!" cried the young woman, rising from her knees, and addressing to Winnie all the simple eloquence of her soft face, her blue eyes blurred with tears, which flowed in half a dozen channels over the rosy undefined outline of her cheeks, "oh! if you only knew what life was in foreign parts. It don't suit George. He was brought up a gentleman, and he can't bear common ways. And the children! Oh! Miss Winnie, the little boys. Would you stand by and see them brought up to hold horses and to run errands—them that are your own flesh and blood?"

Little George had ceased to whimper. The sight of his mother's crying overawed the baby. He was too safe and secure in Winnie's arms. He move at once—but reflecting in his infant soul, with his big eyes turned to his mother all the while she spoke, was at last touched beyond his childish capacity of endurance, forsook the haven in which he had found shelter, and flinging his arms about her knees, cried out, "Mamma, don't cry, mamma, me love you!" burying his face in the folds of her dress. Mrs. George stooped down and gathered him up in her arms with a sleight of hand natural to mothers, and then, child and all, precipitated herself once more on the carpet at the bedside.

Winifred, too, was carried out of herself by this little scene. She dried the fast flowing tears from the soft face so near to her as if the young mother had been no more serious an agent than Georgie. "You shall not go back. You shall want nothing that I can do for you," she cried, soothing them. It was some time before the tumult calmed, but when at last the fit of crying was over, Mrs. George began at once to smile again, with an easy turn from despair to satisfaction. She held her child for Winifred to kiss, her own eyes trembling between joy and trouble.

"I don't ask you to kiss me, for I'm not good enough for you to kiss, but Georgie—he is your own flesh and blood."

"Do not say so," said Winifred, kissing mother and child. "And now sit beside me and talk to me, and do not call me miss, for I am your mother. I am sure you have been a good wife to George."

"I should be that, and more, since he lost his fortune and his home and all, for me," she cried. The scene which ensued was the most unexpected of all. Mrs. George placed the child upon Winifred's bed and began, without further ado, a baby game of peeps and transparent hidings, her excitement turning to laughter, as it had turned to tears. Winifred, too, though her heart was heavy enough, found herself drawn into that sudden revulsion. They played with little Georgie for half an hour in the middle of all the care and pain that surrounded them, the one woman with her heart breaking, the other feeling, as far as she could feel anything, that the very life of her family hung in the balance—moving the child to peals of laughter, in which they shared after their fashion, as women only can, interposing this episode of play into the gravest crisis. It was only when Georgie's laughter began to show signs of that over-excitement that leads to tears, that Winifred suddenly said, almost to herself, "But how am I to do it? how am I to do it?" with an accent of weary effort which almost reached the length of despair.

"Oh, dear! you that are so good and kind," cried Mrs. George, changing also in a moment, "just let us stay with you, dear Winnie—it's a liberty to call you Winnie, but oh! dear, dear! why can't we just live all together? That would do nobody any harm. That would go against no one's will. It wasn't said you were not to give me and George and the children an home. Oh! only think, it's such a big, big house! If you didn't like the noise of the children—but you aren't one of that sort, not to like the noise of the children, and so I told Georgie—they could have their nursery where you would never hear a sound. And George would be a deal of use to you in managing the estate, and I would do the housekeeping, and welcome, and save you any trouble. And why, why! oh! why shouldn't we just settle down all together, and be, oh! so comfortable, Miss Winnie dear?"

The suggestion, it need scarcely be said, struck Winifred with dismay. The face, no longer weeping, no longer elevated by the passionate earnestness of the first appeal, dropping its calculations which, perhaps, were more congenial to its nature, gave her a chill of repulsion while still her heart was soft. She seemed to see, with a curious second sight, the scene of family life, of family tragedy, which might ensue were this impossible plan attempted. It was with difficulty that she stopped Mrs. George, who, in the heat of success, would have settled all the details at once, and it was only the entrance of Miss Farrell, tenderly anxious about her pupil's health, and astounded to find Mrs. George and her child established in her room, that finally delivered poor Winnie.

"You would have no need of strangers eating you up if you had us," her sister-in-law said, as she stooped to kiss her ostentatiously, and held the child up to repeat the salute ere she went away.

Winifred had loved the young mother almost with emotion in the midst of her pleading, but somehow this return of the embrace gave a slight shock both to her delicacy and pride. She laughed a little and coloured when Miss Farrell, after the door closed, looked at her astonished. "You think I have grown into wonderful intimacy with Mrs. George?" she said.

"I do indeed, Winnie. My dear, I would not interfere, but you must not let your kind heart carry you too far."

"Oh! my kind heart!" cried the girl, feeling a desperate irony in the words. "She suggests that they should live with me," she added, turning her head away.

"Live with you! Winnie! my dear!" Miss Farrell gasped, with a sharp break between each word.

"She thinks it will arrange itself so, quite simply—oh! it is quite simple. Dear Miss Farrell, don't say anything. I have been pushing it off. I have been pretending to be ill because I was miserable. Let me get up now—and don't say anything," she added after a moment, with lips that trembled in spite of herself "There are no—letters, no one—has been here?"

"Nothing, Winnie." Her friend did not look at her, she dared not betray her too profound sympathy, her personal anguish even by a kiss.

When Winifred came down-stairs she found Mr. Babington waiting for her. He was a very old acquaintance, whom she had not been used to think of as a friend, but trouble makes strange changes in the aspect of things around us, turning sometimes those whom we have loved most into strangers, and lighting up faces that have been indifferent to us with new lights of compassion and sympathy. Mr. Babington's formal manner, his well-known features, so composed and common place, his grey, keen eyes under their bushy eyebrows, suddenly took a new appearance to Winifred. They seemed to shine upon her with the warmth of ancient friendship. She had known him all her life, yet, it seemed, had never known him till to-day. He came to meet her, holding out his hand, with some kind, ordinary questions about her health, but all the while a light put out, as it were, at the windows of his soul, to help her, another poor soul stumbling along in the darkness. It was not anything that he said, nor that she said. She did not ask for any help, nor he offer it, and yet in a moment Winifred felt herself, in her mind, clinging to him with the sense that here was an old, old friend, somebody, above all doubt and uncertainty, in whom she could trust.

Come and tell me, George.

"Mrs. Winifred," he said, "I am afraid, though you don't seem much like it, that we must talk of business."

"Yes, I wish it, Mr. Babington. I am only foolish and troubled—not ill at all."

"I am not so sure about that, but still—Your brother Tom has been warning me, Mrs. Winifred—I hope to save you from a false step that you are thinking of—going against your father's will—"

"Did Tom tell you so, Mr. Babington?"

"He did. I confess that I was not surprised I have expected you to do so all along, but so fine a fortune as you have got is not ■ be lightly parted with, my dear young lady. Think of all the power it gives you, power ■ do good, ■ increase the happiness, or at least the comfort, perhaps of hundreds of people. If it was in your brothers' hands do you think it would be used as well? We must think of that, Miss Winifred, we must think of that."

"If it was in my power," she said, looking at him wistfully, "I should think rather of what is just. Can anything be good that is founded upon injustice? Oh! Mr Babington, put yourself in my place! Could you bear ■ take away from your brother, from any one, what was his by nature? To put yourself in his seat, to take it from him, to rob him?"

"Hush, hush! my dear girl I am afraid I have not a conscience so delicate as yours. I could bear a great deal which does not seem bearable to you. And you must remember it is no doing of yours. Your father thought, and I agree with him, that you would make a better use of his money, and do more credit to his name, than either of your brothers. It throws a fearful responsibility upon you, as my allow, but till, my dear Miss Winifred—"

"Mr. Babington," she cried, interrupting him, "you are my oldest friend—oh! yes, my oldest friend. You know, if I am forced to do this, it will only be deceiving from beginning to end. I will only pretend to obey. I will be trying all the time, as I am now, to find out ways of defeating all his purposes, and doing—what he said I was not to do!"

Her eyes shone almost wildly through the tears that stood in them. She changed colour from pale ■ red, from red to pale, her weakness gave her the guise of impassioned strength.

"Miss Winifred," said the lawyer very gravely, "do you know that you are guilty of the last impudence in saying this, of all people in the world, to me?"

"Oh!" she cried, "you are my friend, my old friend. I never remember the time when I did not know you. ■ is not imprudent, it ■ my only hope. Think a little of me first whom you knew long before this will was made. Tell me how I can get out of the bondage of it. Teach me, teach me how to cheat everybody, for that ■ all that is left to me: how to keep ■ from them so as best to give it to them. Teach me! for there is no one I can ask but you."

The lawyer looked at her with a very serious face. Her great emotion, her trembling earnestness, the very force of her appeal, as of one consulting her only oracle, hurt the good man with a sympathetic pain. "My dear," he said, "God forbid I should refuse you my advice, or misunderstand you, you who are far too good for any of them. But, Miss Winifred, think again, my dear. Are you altogether a free agent? ■ there not some one else who has a right to be consulted before you take a step—which may change the whole course of your life?"

Winifred grew so pale that he thought she was going to faint, and got up hurriedly to ring the bell. She stopped him with a movement of her hand. Then she said firmly, "There is no one. no one can come between me and my duty. I will consult nobody—but you."

"My dear young lady, excuse me if I speak too plainly; but want of confidence between two people that are in the position of—"

"You mean," she said faintly yet steadily, "Dr. Langton? Mr. Babington, he has no duty towards George and Tom. I love them—how can I help it, they are my brothers, but he—why should he love them? I don't expect it—I can't expect it. I must settle this by myself."

"And yet he will be the one to suffer," said the lawyer reflectively in a parenthesis. "My dear Miss Winifred, take a little time to think it over, there ■ no cause for hurry, take a week, take another day. Think a little—"

"I have done nothing but think," she said, "since you told me first. Thinking kills me, I cannot go on with it: and you can't tell, oh! you can't tell how it harms them, what it makes them do and say. Tom—" (here her voice was stifled by the rising sob in her throat) "and all of them," she cried hastily. "Oh! tell me how to be done with it, ■ settle it so that there shall be no more thinking, no more struggling!" She clasped her hands with a pathetic entreaty, and looked imploringly at him. And she bore in her face the signs of the struggle which she pleaded to be freed from. Her face had the parched and feverish look of anxiety, its young, soft outline had grown pinched and hollow, and all the cheerful glow of health had faded. The lawyer looked at her with genuine tenderness and pity.

"My poor child," ■ said, "one can very well see that this great fortune, which your poor father believed was to make you happy, has brought anything but happiness to you."

She gave him a little pathetic smile and shook her head, but she was not able to speak.

"Then Miss Winifred," he said cheerfully, "since you are certain that you don't want it, and won't have it—and have made up your mind—do nothing but scheme and plot to frustrate the will even when you are seeming to obey it—I think I know a better way. Write down what you mean to do with the property, and leave the rest to me."

He looked at her roundly by his words, with an awakening thrill of wonder. "Write down—what I mean—do? Just that will make me helpless to do—that will risk everything—oh so you will!"

"I am true. Nevertheless, you are not you wish, at the bottom of your heart, to sacrifice yourself to your mother—"

She shook her head still more, with a gesture of impatience. "To give them back their rights."

"That means the same thing, in your phraseology. If that is what you really wish, do what I say, and leave the rest to me."

She looked at him for a moment bewildered. She rose up hastily and flew to the writing-table. However, it was to do it how, what for, by what way, she did not know. This was the first time for all his shoulders, and as first.

CHAPTER XIX

THIS WAS the morning, and nothing further happened until the afternoon. Winifred, though she was tremulous with weakness, had her pony carriage brought round, and went out, taking Miss Lancel with her. They went sometimes slowly, sometimes like the wind, as their conversation flagged or came to a point of interest. They had much to say to each other, and argued over and over again the same question. They went round and round the park, and along a bit of road between the Brentwood gate and the one that was called the Hollyport. Winifred's ponies seemed to like that way with out any will of hers. Was it without her will? But, if not it was quite inefficual. The long road stretched white on either side, disappearing here and there round the corner of the woods, but there was no one visible, one way or the other—no one whom the ladies wished to see. Once, indeed, as they approached the farthest gate on their return, some one riding quickly, at a pace only habitual to one person they knew, appeared on the brow of the Brentwood hill coming towards them. The reins shook in Win-fred's hands. She let her ponies fall into a walk, not so much of set purpose as because her wrists had lost all power, and the reins lay on the necks of the little pair, who, like other pampered servants, did no more work than they were obliged to do. The horseman came steadily down the hill, and disappeared into the hollow, from which he would naturally reappear again and meet them before many minutes. But he did not reappear. The ladies lingered, the ponies took advantage of the moment of weakness, drew aside to the edge of the road and munch grass, as if they were unconscious of their daily crime. But no one came by that way. They had not said anything to each other nor had either said a word to show that she was aware of any meaning in this pause. When, however, there was no disguising that it was futile, Winifred said, almost under her breath, "He must have gone round by the other way."

"I heard there was some one all at the Manor sum," said Miss Lancel, with a quick catching of her breath.

"That will be the reason," Winifred said with a dry cry, and she said no more, nor was any name mentioned between them as they drove quietly home. Old Hopkins came out to the steps as she gave the groom the reins. "If you please, Miss Winifred, Mr. Babington has been asking for you. He said, would you please step into the library as soon as you came back. The gentleman," Hopkins added, after a pause, with much gravity, "is both there."

"Will you come, Miss Lancel?" Winifred said.

"If I could be of any use to you, my darling, but I could not, and you would rather that no one was there."

"Perhaps," said Winifred with a sigh. Yet it was forlorn to see her in her deep mourning, walking slowly in her weakness, alone and deserted, though with so much depending on her. She went into the library without even taking off her hat. Mr. Babington was seated there at what had been her father's writing table, and Iom and George were both with him. Iom stood before the fire, with that air of assumption which he had never put off—the rightful heir aspect, determined to stand upon his rights. George had his wife with him as usual, and sat with her whispering and consulting at the other end of the room. Mr. Babington had been writing, he had a number of papers before him, but evidently, from the silence, only broken by the under-tones of George and his wife, which prevailed, had put off ■ explanations until Winifred was present. Neither of the brothers stirred when she entered. George had forgotten, in the composure of a husband whose wife requires none of the delicacies of politeness from him, those civilities which men ■ other circumstances instinctively pay to women, and Tom was too much out of temper and too deeply opposed ■ his sister to show her any attention. Mr. Babington rose and gave her a chair. "Sit here, Miss Winifred. I shall want to place various things very clearly before you," he said. "Now, will you all give me your attention?" His voice subdued Mrs. George, who had sprung up to go to her sister-in-law with a beaming smile of familiarity. She fell back with a little alarm into her chair at her husband's side.

"You are all aware of the state of affairs up to this point," Mr. Babington said. "Your father's large fortune, left in succession, first to one and then to the other of his sons, to be withdrawn from both as they in turn displeased him, has been finally left to Miss Winifred, whom he thought the most likely of his three children to do him credit and spend his money fitly. Exception may ■ taken to what he did, but none, in my opinion, to the reason. He thought of that more than anything else, and he chose what seemed to him the best means to have what he wanted."

"He must have been off his head, I shall never believe anything else, though there may not be enough evidence," Tom said.

"I dare say my father was right," said George in his despondent voice.

"I think, from his point of view, your father was quite right, but there are many things that men, when they make their wills, don't take into consideration. They think, for one thing, that their heirs will feel as they do, and that they have an absolute power to make themselves obeyed. This, unfortunately, they very often fail to do. Miss Winifred becomes heir under a condition with which she refuses to comply."

"Mr. Babington!" Winifred said, putting her hand on his arm.

"You may trust to me, my dear. The condition is, that she is not, under any circumstances, to share the property with her brothers, or to interfere in any way with the testator's arrangements for them. Thus she refuses to do."

"Don't be a fool, Winnie!" cried Tom. "Pass over that, please. We all know what you mean, and that she's to pose as our benefactor, and ■ receive our eternal gratitude, and so forth."

"I think ■ would be a great pity if Winnie took any rash step," George said.

Mr. Babington looked round upon them with a smile. "She wishes," he said, "to give the landed property, Bedloe, ■ her brother George, and to make up an equivalent to it in money for Mr. Tom there. These are the arrangements she proposes ■ me—the sole executor, you will observe, charged to carry your father's will into effect." He took up one of the papers as ■ spoke, and with a smile, caught in his own hand which she once more tremulously put forth ■ interrupt him. "Here is the proposal written in her own hand," he said. "Miss Winifred, you must trust to me, I am acting for the best. Naturally this puts an end to her, as her father's heir."

Here there arose a confused tumult round the little group in the middle of the room. Mrs. George was the first to make herself heard. She burst forth into sobs and tears. "Oh! after all she's promised to do for us! after all she's said for the children! Oh, George! go and do something, stand up for your sister. Don't let it be robbed away from her, after all she's promised. Oh, George! Oh, Miss Winnie! remember what you've promised—and what is to become of George?" the young mother cried.

"Mr. Babington," said George, "I don't think it's right to take advantage of my sister because she's foolish and generous. Who is it to go to if you take it from her? Let one of us at least have the good of it. I don't want her to give me Bedloe. She could be of use to us without that."

Tom had burst into a violent laugh of despute and despair. "If that's what it's all to come to," he said, "we'll go to law all of us. Winnie too, by Jove! No one can say we're not a united family now."

Winifred sat with her eyes fixed on the old lawyer's face. She said nothing, and if there was a tremor in her heart too, did not express it, though already there began to arise dull whispers, ought she to have done it? Was it her duty? Was this in reality the way to serve them best?

"The law is open to whoever seeks its aid—when they have plenty of money," said Mr. Babington quickly. "You ask a very pertinent question, Mr. George. It is one which never has been put to me before by any of the persons most concerned."

This statement fell among them with a thrill like an electric shock. ■ silenced

Tom's nervous laughter and Mrs. George's sobs. They instinctively drew near with a bewildering expectation, although they knew not what their expectation was.

"Mr. Chester," said the lawyer, "like most men, thought he had plenty of time before him, and he did not understand much about the law. I am bound to add that in this particular he got little information from me and the consequence was that he forgot, in God's providence, to assign any heirs, failing Miss Winifred. It was a disgrace to my office to let such a document ■■■ out of it," he added with a twinkle in his eyes, "but so it was. He thought perhaps that he would live for ever, or that at least he'd see his daughter's children, or that she would do implicitly what he told her, or something else as silly—begging your pardon. All men are foolish where wills are concerned."

There was another pause. Mr. Babington leant back in his chair, so much at his ease and leisure, that he looked like a benevolent grandfather discoursing to his children round him. They surrounded him, a group of silent and anxious faces. Tom was the one who thought he knew the most. He asked with a voice which sounded pitched in his throat, moistening his lips to get the words out, "Who gets the property then?" blurring out the question with a rush.

Mr. Babington turned his back upon Tom. He addressed himself to George, whose face had no provision ■■■ it, but was only dully, quietly anxious. It was habitual to him. George knew little about the law. He was not in the way of expecting much. Whatever new thing might come it was in all likelihood a little worse than the old. He was vexed and grieved that Winnie, who certainly would have been kind to him and his children, was not ■■■ have the money, but he had not an idea in his mind as to what, failing her, its destination would be.

"Mr. George Chester," he said, "you are the eldest son. Your father I suppose had his reasons for cutting you out, but those reasons I hope don't exist now. As your sister refuses to accept the condition under which the property comes ■■■ her, and as your father made no provision for such a contingency, it follows that the will is not worth the paper it is written on, and that Mr. Chester as good as died intestate, if you know what that means."

Tom, who had been listening intently over Mr. Babington's shoulder, threw up his clenched hands with a loud exclamation. Into George's blank face there crept a tremor as of light coming. Winifred and Mrs. George sat unmoved except by curiosity and wonder, unlightened, trying to read, as women do, the meaning in the face of the speaker, but uninformed by the words.

"If I know what that means? Intestate? I don't think I do know what ■■■ means."

"You fool!" his brother cried.

"It means," said Mr. Babington, "a kind of natural justice more or less, at least in the present circumstances. When a man dies intestate his landed property (I'll spare you law terms) goes without question to his eldest son—which you are—and natural representative. The personality, that is the money, you know, is divided. Do you understand now what I mean? The personal property is far more than the real in this case, so it will make a very just and equal division. And now, Miss Winnie, tell me if I have not managed well for you? Are you satisfied now ■■■ have trusted yourself to your old friend?"

"George, George! I don't understand. What's to be divided? What do we get?" cried Mrs. George, standing up, the tears only half dried in her eyes, her rose tint coming back to her face.

George was so startled and overwhelmed with information which entered but slowly into an intelligence confused by ill fortune that for the moment he made his wife no reply, but Tom did, who had already fully avouched all the sweets and bitters of this astounding change of affairs.

"Mrs. Chester," he said, "with an ironical bow, 'you get Bedloe, my father's place, that he never would have let you sit foot in, if he could have helped it, poor old governor. And the rest of us get our due, oh, yes, we get our due. I know I was a fool and didn't keep his favour when I had got it, and you, Winnie, you traitor, oh, you traitor! There isn't a female for the word, ■■■ there? It should be female altogether. You that he put his last trust in, poor old governor! you've served him out the best ■■■ any of us,' said Tom with a burst of violent laughter, "and there's an end of him and all his schemes!" ■■■ cried.

Winifred rose up tremulous. There was perhaps in her heart too an echo of Tom's rage and sense of wrong. This woman, the reverse of all that her father's ambition (vulgar ambition, yet so strong) had hoped for, to be the mistress of the house! And Bedloe, which Winnie loved, to pass away to a family which had rubbed off and forgotten even the little gloss of artificial polish which Mr. Chester had procured for his sons. She would have given ■ to them had the power been in her hands, she had always intended it, never from the first moment meant anything else. And yet when all was thus arranged according to her wish, above her hopes, Winifred felt, to the bottom of her heart, that to give up her home to Mrs. George was a thing not to be accomplished without a thrill of indignation, a sense of wrong. And the very relief which filled her soul brought back to her those individual miseries which this blessed decision (for it was a blessed decision though cruel) could not take away. She made Tom no reply. She scarcely returned the pressure of Mr. Babington's kind hand. She said not a word to the agitated, triumphant, yet astonished pair, who could not yet understand what good fortune had happened to them. She went straight out of the library ■ Miss Farrell's room. She still wore her hat and outdoor dress. She took her old friend's hand, and drew her out of the chair in which she had been seated, watching for every opening of the door. "Come," she said, "come away."

"What has happened, Winnie? What has happened?"

"Everything that is best. George has got Bedloe. It ■ all right, all right, better than any one could have hoped. And I shall not sleep another night under this roof. Dear Miss Farrell, if you love me, come away, come away!"

CHAPTER XX.

EDWARD LANGTON had never meant to forsake his love. He intended no more to give her up because she did not agree with him, because he thought her mistaken, or even because she had rejected his guidance and wounded his pride, than he meant to give up his ■. But he had been very deeply wounded by her acceptance of his withdrawal at that critical moment. She had not chosen to put him, her natural defender, between her brothers and herself. She had refused, so his thoughts went on to say, his intervention. She had preferred to keep her interests separate from his, to give him no share in what might be the most important act of her life. He would not believe it possible when he left her. As he crossed the hall and hurried down the avenue, he thought every moment that he heard some one, a messenger hastening after him to bring him back. But there was no such messenger. He expected next morning a letter of explanation, of apology, at least of invitation imploring him not to forsake her—but there was none. While

Winifred's heart sank lower and lower at the absence of any communication from him, he was waiting with a mingled sense of dismay, astonishment, and indignation for something from her. ■ seemed incredible to him that she should not write to soothe away his offence, to explain herself. His first sensation indeed had been that the offence given to him was deadly and not to be explained, and that she who would not have him ■ help her in her trouble, could not want him in her life; but before the next morning came he had reasoned himself into a certainty that ■ would have as full an explanation as it was possible to make, that she would excuse herself by means of a hundred arguments which his own reason suggested to him, and call him to her with every persuasion of love. But nothing of the kind took place—Winifred, sick and miserable awaited on her side the letter, the inquiry which never came, and felt herself forsaken at the moment when every generous heart, she thought, must have felt how much she needed support and sympathy. She did not want his interference; she had been able to manage her family business—to do without him; he had been de trop between her brothers and herself. Then let it be so! he said at last to himself, and plunged into his work, riding hither and thither, visiting some patients who needed him no longer, ■ prove to himself that he was too much and too seriously offended to care. To be sure, he was not the man to stand cap in hand and plead for her favour. He went over all the district in those three days, dashing along the roads, hurrying from one hamlet to another. It was not the life he had been so foolish as to imagine to himself, the life—he felt himself bluish hotly at the recollection—of the master of Bedloe, restoring the prestige of the old name, changing the aspect of the district, ameliorating everything as only (he thought) a man who was born the friend and master of the place could do. ■ had been an ideal life which he had imagined for himself, not one of selfishness. He had meant ■ brighten the very face of the country, to mend everything that needed mending, to do good to the poor people, who were his own people. He remembered now that there were those who thought it humiliating and base for a man to be enriched by his wife, and the subtle contempt of women embodied in that popular prejudice rose up in hot and painful shame to his heart and his face. A man is never so sure that women are inferior, as when a woman has neglected or played him false. Edward Langton's heart was very sore, but he began to say to himself that it served him right for his meanness in depending on a woman, and that a man ought to be indebted to his own exertions and not look for advancement in so humiliating a way. These thoughts grew more and more bitter as the days went on. He flung himself into his work; an epidemic would have pleased him better than the mild little ailments or lingering chronic diseases which were the only visitations known among those healthy country folk, but such as they were he made the most of them, frightening the sick people by the unnecessary energy of his attendance, and saying to himself that this, and not a fiction of the imagination or anything so degrading as a wife's fortune, was his true life. That he flew thus about the country without many a lingering unwilling look towards Bedloe, it would be false to say. His way wherever he went led him past the park gates, which he found always closed, silent, giving no sign. On the one occasion when Winifred perceived him descending the hill, by one of those hazards which continually arise to confuse human affairs, he, for the moment half happy in the entrancement of a case which presented dangerous complications, did not see or recognise this little pony carriage lingering under the russet trees, and thus missed the only chance of a meeting and explanation, but he did meet, when that chance was over, next day, in the afternoon, Mr. Babington driving his heavy old phaeton from the gate of Bedloe. Langton's heart gave a leap even at the mere of hearing something of Winnie, but perhaps his pride would still have prevented any clearing up, had not the old lawyer taken it into his own hands. He stopped his horse and waited till Edward, who was walking home from the house of a patient in the village, came up.

"I want to speak to you," Mr. Babington said. "Will you jump up and come with me along the road, or will you offer me your hospitality and a bit of dinner? There is full moon to-night and I don't mind being late oh, if it's not convenient, never mind."

Edward's pride had made him hesitate—his good breeding came to his aid, showing it to be inevitable that he should obey the hungry longing of his heart.

"Certainly it is convenient, and I am too glad—drive on in my house and I shall be with you in a moment." Though he had felt it to be his only salvation to hold fast by his profession and present tenor of existence, Langton's heart beat loud as he hurried on. Now, he said to himself, he should know what it meant, now he should have some light thrown upon the position at least which Winifred had assumed.

Mr. Babington, however, ate his dinner, which was simple and not over abundant, having been prepared for the doctor alone, with steady composure, and it was only when the meal was over that he opened out. Langton had apologised, it was inevitable, for the simple fare.

"Don't say a word," said the lawyer with a wave of his hand. "It was all excellent, and I'm glad to see you've such a good cook. You don't know what a comfort it is to come out of a confused house like that, with lengthy fine dinners that nobody understands, to a comfortable chop which a man can enjoy and which is a pleasure to see."

"Bedloe was not a confused house in former days," said Langton, with a feeling that Winifred's credit was somehow availed.

"Ah, nothing is as it was in former days," said Mr. Babington, shaking his head, "everything is topsy-turvy now. I suppose you know all about the last time the affair was taken. I wonder you were not there, through, to support poor Miss Winifred, poor thing, who has had a great deal to go through."

"You will be surprised," said Langton, forcing a somewhat pitiful smile, "if I tell you that I don't know anything about it. Miss Chester preferred that the question between her brother and herself should be settled among themselves. And perhaps she was right."

"My dear Langton," said Mr. Babington, laying his hand on the young man's arm, "I hope there's no coolness on this account between that poor girl and you?"

"I see no reason why she should be called a poor girl," Langton said quickly.

"Ah, well, you have not seen her then during the last two or three days. Poor thing! between making the best of those fellows and struggling to keep up a show of following her father's directions—between acting false and meaning true—"

"Mr. Babington," said Langton, with a dryness in his throat, "unhappily, as you say, there has been—no coolness, thank heaven, but a little—a momentary silence, between Miss Chester and me. Perhaps I have been to blame. I thought she— Tell me what has happened and how everything is settled, for pity's sake!"

"Yes," said the old lawyer, "I haven't the slightest doubt, my young friend, that you have been ■ blame. That is why the poor child looked so white and pathetic when she said to me that she had no one to consult. When you come to have girls of your own," Mr. Babington said somewhat severely, "you'll know how it feels to see a little young creature you are fond of look like that."

Heaven and earth! as if ■ the old fogeys ■ the world, if they had a thousand daughters, could feel half what a young lover feels! The blood rose to young Langton's temples, but he did not trust himself to reply.

"Well," Mr. Babington continued, "it's all comfortably settled at the last. I had my eye on this solution all along. I may say it was my doing all along, for I carefully refrained from pointing out to him what of course, in an ordinary way, ■ would have been my duty to point out—that in case of Miss Winifred's refusal there was no after settlement. You don't understand our law terms, perhaps? Well, it was just this, that if she refused to accept there was no provision for what was to follow. I knew all along she would never accept ■ cut out her brother—so here we come to a dead stop. He had not prepared for that contingency. I don't believe he ever thought of it. She had obeyed him all her life, and he thought she would obey him after he was dead. She refused the condition, and here we are in face of a totally different state of affairs. The other wills were destroyed, and this was as good as destroyed by her refusal. What is to be done then but to return to the primitive condition of the matter? He dies intestate, the property is divided, and everybody, with the exception of that scamp Tom, is content."

"I don't understand," Langton said. It was true so far, that the words were like an incoherent murmur in his ears—but even while he spoke, the meaning came to his mind like a flash of light. He had put aside all such (as he said to himself) degrading imaginations, and had made up his mind that his work was his life, and that a country doctor he was, and should remain, but all the same, the sensation of knowing that Bedloe had become unattainable in fact and certainty, not only by the temporary alienation of a misunderstanding, went through his heart like a sudden knife.

"I can make you understand in a moment," said Mr. Babington. "Miss Winifred made the will void by refusing to fulfil its condition, and no provision had been made for that emergency; therefore, in fact, it is as if poor Chester had never made a will at all: in which case the landed property goes to the eldest son, the personality is divided. They will all be very well off," the lawyer added. "There is nothing to complain of, though Tom is wild that he is not the heir, and Miss Winifred, poor girl—she was very anxious to do justice, but when it came to giving over her house to that pink-and-white creature, much too solid for her age, George's wife—Well, it was her own doing but she could not bear it, you know. Her going off like that left them all very much confused and bewildered, but I think on the whole it was the wisest thing she could do."

"How going off?" cried Langton, starting to his feet.

"My dear fellow, didn't you know? Come now, come now," said the old lawyer, patting him on the arm, "this is carrying things too far. You should not have left her when she wanted ■ the support that was possible. And she should not have gone away without letting you know—but poor thing, poor thing! I don't think she knew whether she was on her head or her heels. She couldn't bear it. She just turned and fled and took no time to think."

"Turned and fled! Do you mean to say—do you mean to tell me—" The young man, though he was no weakling, changed colour like a girl, his sunburnt, manly countenance showed a sudden pallor under the brown, something rose in his throat. He took a turn about the room in his sudden excitement, then came back, mastering himself as best he could. "I beg your pardon, this news is so unexpected, and everything is so strange. Of course," he added, forcing himself into composure, "I shall hear."

"Yes, of course you'll hear, but if I were you I should not wait to hear, I should insist on knowing, my young friend. Don't let pride spoil your whole existence, as I've seen some things do with boys and girls. She is well enough off to be sure. I wish my girl had the half or quarter of what she will have; but still it's ■ come-down from Bedloe. And to give it up to Mrs. George, that was harder than she thought. She thought only of her brothers, you know, till she saw the wife. What the wife did to disgust her I can't tell, but I've always noticed that when there are two women in a case like this, they always feel themselves pitted against each other, and the men count for nothing with them. As soon as the thing was done, Miss Winnie forgot her brother. She saw only Mrs. George, and to give up to her was a bitter pill. She is a good girl, and meant everything that was good, but Mrs. George is a bitter pill:

when it came to that she felt that she could not put up with it. And you were not there, excuse me for reminding you. And she took it into her head that everything was against her, as girls do—and fled. That is the worst of girls, they are so haughty. You will know when you have daughters of your own."

Thus the good man went on musing, quite unconscious that his companion could have risen and slain him every time that he mentioned those daughters of his own. What had his daughters to do with Winnie? Mr. Rabington talked a great deal more on that and every branch of the subject until it seemed to him that it was time to be driving on," as he said. And then Edward had leisure for the first time to contemplate the situation in which he found himself. Self reproach, inner disappointment coursed through his veins. He was wroth with the woman he loved, wroth with himself, one moment attributing to her a design to cast him off, a want of confidence in him which it was unendurable to think of, the next bitterly blaming his own selfish pride which had driven him from her at the moment of her need. The high tide of conflicting sentiments was so hot within him that he went out to walk off his excitement, returning, to the consternation of his household, in hour or more after midnight, the most unwholesome of all promenades in the opinion of the country folk. When he got back to his dim little surgery and study, returning, as it seemed, to a dull life, he departed of her and of all things and to the overwhelming consciousness that she was gone from him, perhaps by his own fault, the young doctor had a moment of despair. Then he rose up and struck his hand upon the table, and laughed aloud at himself. "Bah!" he said to himself, "nobody disappears at this time of day. What a fool one is, is it these were the middle ages! Whenever she has gone she must have left an address!" He laughed loud and long, though his laugh was not mirthful, at this hanging down of his despair to the easy possibilities of modern life. That makes all the difference between tragedy, which is medieval, and comedy, which is of our days. Though the comedy of common living involves a great many tragedies in every age, and even in our own day

CHAPTER XXI.

AN address is not everything. There must be the will and the power to write, there must be the letter produced, and the address obtained. The very first step was hard. "To go up to Bedloe and ascertain from the brother, who was "that cad" Langton, where Winifred had gone, and thus betray his ignorance and the separation between them—the idea of this was such a mortification and annoyance to him as it is difficult to describe. He could not bear to expose himself to their remarks, to perhaps their laughter, perhaps, worse still, their pity. A few days elapsed before he could screw up his courage to this point and when he did so his brief and cold note was marked by George in person, whose dejected aspect bore none of the signs of triumph which Langton had expected. "I was coming to ask you," George said, "my sister went off in such a hurry she left no address. She left her maid to pack up her things. I did not even know she was going. It was a great disappointment to my wife and me. We should have been very glad to have had her to stay with us until—well, until her own affairs were settled. She would have been of great use to Alice," George continued, with an unconscious gravity of tone which was almost too simple to be called by that harsh name. "She could have put my wife up to a great many things, for we haven't just seen each other, you know, to this sort of life, and it is very difficult to get into all the ways. And then the children were so good with Winnie, they took to her in a moment. Speaking of that, I wish you would just come up and look at George. My wife thinks he is quite well, but I don't quite like the little fellow's look," the anxious father said. Langton was not mollified by this unexpected invitation. The idea of becoming medical attendant to George Chester's children and at the beck and call of the new household at Bedloe filled him indeed with an unreasonable exasperation. He explained as coolly as he could that he did not "go in for" children's ailments, and recommended Mr. Marlitt, of Brentwood, who was specially qualified to advise anxious parents. He was indeed so moved by the sight of the new master of Bedloe, that the purpose for which George had come was momentarily driven out of his head. Why it should be a grievance to him that George Chester was master of Bedloe he could not of course have explained to any one. He had not been exasperated by George's father. Disappointment, and the sharper self-shame with which he could not help remembering his own imaginations on the matter, joined with the sense of angry wrong with which he beheld the place which he had meant to fill so well, filled so badly by another. George thought him worth while for recommending Mr. Marlett, "though I am very sorry, and so will my wife be, that you don't pay attention to that branch. Isn't it a pity? for surely if anything is important to the children," he said in all good faith. It was only after he was gone that Edward reflected that he had brought no information. It soothed him a little to think that she had not let her brother know where she was going. It had been then a sudden impulse of desert, a hasty step taken in a moment when he felt her left abandoned. Edward did not forgive her, but yet he was soothed a little, even though weak and distressed beyond measure by his failure to know where she was. A day or two passed in the lethargy of that disappointment and perplexity as to what to do next. Then he thought of Mr. Bibington. He wrote immediately to the old lawyer begging him to find out at once where Winifred was. "I don't tell it to you, for I know you must be able to do it. People don't disappear in these days." But Mr. Bibington, with a somewhat perishing question whether he knew how in my people did disappear in the times of olden days, and were never heard of in these famous days of ours, informed him that he knew nothing about Winifred's whereabouts. She had gone abroad, and with Miss Lurell, that was all he knew. By this time Edward Langton had become very anxious and unhappy, ready almost to advertise in the Times or take any other wild step. He resolved to lose no further time, not to delay by writing, but to go off at once and find her as soon as he had the smallest clue. This clue was found at last through the Lankers (for Langton was quite right in his certainty that people with a Lanker account who draw money never do really disappear in these days) who did not refuse him where the last circumstances had been sent. He was so incensed by this time that he went up to London himself to make these inquiries, and came back again with the fullest determination to start at once in search of Winifred. He went to Mr. Marlett, of Bentwood, who was a young doctor but recently established and much in want of patients, to ask whether he could take charge of the few sick folk at Bedloe, and made all his preparations to go. It was November by this time and all the fields were heaped with fallen leaves. He had settled everything easily on the Saturday, and on Sunday night was going up to town in time to catch the Continental mail next day.

Then—according to the usual perversity of human affairs—the epidemic came all at once, which he had invoked some time before. It broke out on the very Saturday when all his arrangements were made—two cases in one house, one in the house next door. He perceived in a moment that this was no time to leave his duty. Next day there were three more cases in the village, and in the evening, just at the moment when he should have been starting, the brougham from Bedloe drew up at his door, with an air of adaptation about the very horses, which had flecks of foam on their shoulders, and every indication of having been hard driven. George Chester entered precipitately as death. "Oh Langton! he cried, 'look here, don't fail on ceremony. I never did anything to hurt you. You tell the children in the village, why won't you call mine? Little George got it to begin with and died out with quivering lips. It is not for a moment to be supposed that Edward could resist such an appeal. He went with the distracted father, and fought night and day for two or three weeks for little George's life, as well as for the lives of several other little Georges as it were in the way. Here he had what he wanted, but not when he wanted it. When he woke up in the morning from the interrupted sleep, which was all his anxiety allowed him, he would remember in anguish that even the clue given by the bankers would serve no longer. But during the day, as he went to one bedside to another, he had too much to remember, and so the dark winter day was away.

Winifred had taken refuge in the universal expedient of "going abroad." It is difficult to tell all that this means to simple minds. It means a sort of cancelling of time and space, a flying on the wings of a dove in abstraction of one's self and one's affairs from the burden of circumstances, from the questions of the immediate, from all that holds fast to local habitation. Winifred was sick at heart of her habitual place and all the surroundings to which she had been accustomed. It was not possible for her, she thought, to explain the position, to answer all the demands, to make it apparent to the meanest spirits how and why it was that her own husband was at an end. She fled from this, and from the natural (she said) prejudice against her brother and his wife which seized her as soon as it became apparent that Bedloe was in their hands—and she fled, but not so much from Edward, as from what she thought his desertion of her. What she thought—for after a while she, too, like Edward himself, began to feel uncertain as to whether he had deserted her—to ask herself whether she had been blameless, to say to herself that it could not be, that it was impossible they could part like this—what was it that had parted them? It had been done in a moment, it had been her brothers' to dish accusation—ah, no, not that, but her own tacit refusal of his counsel and aid. When Winifred began to come to herself, to disentangle her thoughts, to see everything in perspective, it became gradually and by slow degrees apparent to her that if Edward was in the wrong, he was yet not altogether or done in the wrong. Her mind worked more slowly than did Langton's, partly because it had been far more alarmed and worn and because the complications were all on her side. She had to disengage her mind from all that had troubled and disturbed her late for weeks and months before, and to recover from the agitation of so many shocks and changes before she could think calmly, or at least without the burning at her heart or wounded feeling, hurt pride, and neglected love, of all that concerned her lover. It was some time even before she spoke to Miss Farrell of the subject that soon occupied all her thoughts. Miss Farrell had felt Edward's silence on her pupils' account with almost more bitterness than Winifred herself had felt it. She had put away his name from her lips, and had concluded him unworthy. She could talk of him even when Winifred began tentatively to approach the subject. "My darling, don't let us speak of him," she had said. "I have no command of myself; I might say things which I should be sorry to afterwards."

"But why should he have changed so?" Winifred said; "what reason was there? He was always kind and true."

"I don't know about true, Winnie."

Then Winifred faltered a little, remembering how he had asked of her to humour her father. She made a little pause of reflection, and then abandoned the subject for the moment; but only to return to it a hundred and a hundred times. She was not one of those that prolong a misapprehension through a lifetime. She pondered and pondered, and it was not in time to think herself in the wrong. She had been lately, she had been self-absorbed. And had he not a right to be offended when she so distinctly, of her own will, by no one's suggestion, put him aside from her counsels, and let him know that she must deal with her brothers alone? It made her shiver to think what a thing it was she had thus done. She would have done it again, it was a necessity of the position in which she found herself. But yet when you reflect, to put your betrothed husband away from you in a great crisis of fate, to reject his aid, to bid him—for it was as good as bidding him—leave her to arrange matters in her own way, what an outrage was that? She could not think how she could have done it, and yet she would have done it over again. To get Miss Farrell to see this was difficult, but she succeeded at last; and then they both trembled and grew pale together to think of what had been done. Poor Edward! and all those days when Winifred had sat miserable in her room, feeling that her last hope and prop had failed her, and that she was left alone in the world, what had he been thinking on his side? That she had thrown him off, that she would have none of him? In their consultations these ladies made great use of the man's wounded pride. They allowed to each other that it was the wrong of all others which he would be least likely to hear. It was not only a wrong, it was an insult. How could they ever have thought otherwise? It was he who was forsaken, and that without a word, without a reason given.

They had settled themselves after some wanderings in one of those villages of the Riviera, which fashion and the pursuit of health have taken out of the hands of their peasant inhabitants. It was not a great place, full of life and commotion; but a little picturesque cluster of houses, small and great, with an old campanile rising out of the midst of them, and a soft background of mild olive-trees behind. They had thought they would stay there till the winter was over, till England had begun to grow green again, and the east winds were gone; but already, though it was not yet Christmas, they were beginning to reconsider the matter, to feel home calling them over the misty seas. Christmas! but what a Christmas! with roses blooming, and all the landscape green and soft, the sea warm enough to bathe in, the sunshine too hot at noon. Winifred had begun to weary of the eternal greenness, of the skies which were always clear, of the air which caressed and never smote her cheek, before they had long been established in the little paradise which Miss Farrell, even with all her desire to see her child happy, could not pretend not to be pleased with. "I cannot believe it is Christmas," Winifred said discontentedly. "No frost, no cold, even flowers!" as it this was a kind of insult. "Everything," she
